Y MOST HONORED LORDS.

I dare not so much trespass against the publicke, as (after the solemn and tedious manner of Epistling) to vsurpe your time with a barren Preface: it is my gaine, if I be but heard to say, I dedicate my selfe: in which, I vnderstand my utmost abilities, and of those, doe here offer vnto your Lordships a small part, being rather the redemption of my life from the note of idlenesse, then any fruitfull course of liuing. For, being (after some yeares expence in France, for the publicke seruice of the State) retired to my priuate and domesticke cares, it was yet my couetousnesse to winne so much vpon them, as the leisure of Translation to this generall Historie of France, written by Iohn de Serres; an Author, whom (about mine own particular knowledge of this subiect) I haue heard vniuersally esteemed, for the most faithful, and free from affection, that euer toucht at that Argument; able to teach the vnlearned, to delight the learned, and draw to him as many Commenders, as Readers. The Maiesty, Graces, and Strength of whose worke, if I in my traduction, haue any way vnfinewed or deformed, I confesse a sinne against his graue; yet, in my consecration of him to your Lordships, I haue made him plenarie satisfaction: which presumption of mine, though he may glorie in, I haue no other meane to expiate, but by naked professing my selfe to both your Honours, bound in all obligation of dutie & seruice, no lesse then your selues are each to other in the faith of loue & freindship. For which sacred respect, I haue thus prefixed you joyned in the face of my Altar, where I omit to speake more of your mutuall and knowne merites, except I had volumes to fill, not pages: and desire onely, that where I am studious to be gratefull, I may not deserue to offend.

*Your Lordships deuoted in all

To the Reader.

Could not (Courteous Reader) neglect an vsuall complement, in the publishing of this worke, to recommend the worthines of the Author, and to excuse my weaknesse. To free my selfe from the imputation of Idleness, I undertooke the Translation of this Historie of France, and to giue some content vnto such as either by their trauell abroad, or by their industrie at home, haue not attained vnto the knowledge of the Tongue, to read it in the originall. Where you may see the sundry Battailles woon by our Kings of England against the French, and the worthie exploits of the English, during their warres with France, whereby you may bee incited to the like resolutions vpon the like occasions. I doubt not, but those which haue conuerfed most familiarly with the Histories of France, will concur in that generall approbation of his writing, to be as free from affection and passion, as any one that euer treated of this subiect. He hath digested into one Worke what soeuer hath bene written by many, touching the French History, since the beginning of their Monarchie. And if he hath not dilated at large the great attempts of Strangers in France, employed eyther for their Kings, or against them: he is not therefore to be blamed, nor to be held partiall, for that the subiect whereof he treats, being great, the time long, and his style short and succinct, he had vowed to note euery accident of State and Warre briefly and truely. Besides, you must consider, that he was a Frenchman: and although hee would not altogether smother and conceale those things, which might any way eclipse the glory of his Nation, least he should be taxed to haue sayled in these two excellent vertues required in an Historiographer, Truth and Integrity, without passion, yet happily he hath reported them as sparingly as he could. The History of Iohn de Serres ends with the Treatie at Uernins betwixt France and Spaine in the yeare 1598. I haue been importuned to make the History perfect, and to continue it vnto these times, wher vnto I haue added (for your better satisfaction) what I could extratt out of Peter Mathew and other late writers touching this subiect. Some perchance will challenge me of indiscretion, that I haue not translated Peter Mathew onely, being reputed so eloquent and learned a Writer. To them I answer first, That I found many things written by him that were not fit to be inserted, and some things belonging vnto the Historie, related by others, whereof he makes no mention. Secondly, his style is so full, and his discourse so copious, as the worke would haue held no proportion, for that this last addition of seuen yeares must haue exceeded halfe Serres Historie. Which considerations haue made me to draw forth, what I thought most materiall for the subiect, and to leaue the rest as vnnecessarie. But now I come to my last, though not my least care, how this my labour shall be accepted, the which must undergoe the censure of all humors. Some I doubt not, (regarding the content and profit they may reape thereby) will allow of mine endeavors, though others do but prye into it with a curious eye, so note what is defectiue, obseruing more the elegancie and choise of words, then the worthinesse of the Historie. But let me intreat as much kindnesse of these curious Surueyors, as a graue Senatour of Rome did of one of his companions, who had found him playing in his garden with his yong sonne. The Father somewhat abashed to see himselfe so surprised, requested his fellow Senatour not to publish his folly vntill he had a yong Sonne. Euen so I intreat them, not to detract nor to maligne that which is well meant, vntill they haue produced the like. Concluding with the Poet, Carpere vel noli nostra, vel ede tua. I must craue your patience in regard of the Presse, intreating you to supply with your iudicious reading such errors as you shall find committed: For that I my selfe could not attend it, being drawne away about other imployments. And so referring all to your kind acceptance, I rest

Yours,

Edward Grimestone.

IOHN DE SERRES.
TO VCHING THE VSE
of this his Inuentorie.

An Historie is the Theater of mans life, whereby all may learne one common lesson; by the goodly examples the represents vnto their eyes, eares, and vnderstandings. Euen so she inuities all men to view, heare, and to conceiue them well, what language soeuer she speaks, what subiect she treats of, what time shee notes, and what person soeuer shee represents. Thus offering her selfe to all with this excellent vse, shee deterris readily to bee embraced, Experience verifying the testimonie which Antiquitie doth giue her. That shee is the Mistresse of Adams Life, the Testimonie of Truth, the Recorder of Iustice, the resplendent Beames of Vertue, the Register of Honour, the Trumpet of Fame, the Examiner of Actions, the Comptroller of all Times, the Rendez-vous of diuerse Euent, the School of Good and Evil, and the Soueraigne Iudge of all Men, and all Actions. This praise is common to all Histories: But as in a general action euery one ought to haue a more speciall care of that which concerns his dutie: So in the generall Historie of all Nations, euery man is bound to be more particularly informed of that which toucheth himselfe, and instructed in the managing of the State, vnder which he is borne: By reason whereof I haue alwaies held the complaint of Thucydides (one of the chiefe Architects of a History) very considerable, That it was a great shame for Grecians to be Strangers in Greece; when as (busying themselves in forreine Histories) they were ignorant of their owne. May we not in like sort say, That it was a great shame that French-men should be Strangers in France: for why should the ignorance of our Historie bee more excusable in vs, then of theirs in them. Doubtlesse we often seeke for that a farre off, which is neere vnto vs at home: I commend the diligence of our men in searching out of forreine Histories. But if it may be lawfull to speake of this Subiect (as one of the common sort) I dare say there is no Nation vnder the cope of Heaven (without flattering my selfe with the loue of my Countrey) since Man was borne; that hath more admirable matters; or more worthy euents in euery kinde, and by consequence a History more memorable, then ours of France. Bee it for the forme of Gouernment: there was neuer Kingdome nor Common-weale established with goodlier lawes then our Monarchie. It is the true patterne of a perfect estate, such as the wise Politicians in former times vsed to discusse off in their Academie: A soueraigne Commander with Authority absolutely soueraigne, but fortified with a power so well qualified with the Counterpoise of inferior offices, that we may rightly call the French Monarchie a mixture of all the lawfull governments of a Common-weale, by a well gouerned proportion; if the lawes prescribed be well obserued, the which I haue (to that end) planted in the front of this building. Bee it for the greatnesse and strength of the State; although I know well that the foure Monarchies which commanded diuer Nations, had larger dominions then the French; yet was there neuer any Empire better vniited, better grounded, nor of longer continuance, more famous for the beaultie and bountie of the Land, situation of the Country, Riches of the people, and excellencie of wittes, cyther in Peace or Warre: As for the greatness of her Prouinces, what is the French Monarchie? but diuers Kingdomes vnited in one, and sundry Crownes annexed to one. But herein it excels the rest, that although they all in generall hold as it were of the Church, yet ours hath herein a speciall priuledge, hauing diuerged from Europe that great deluge of Infidels, which threatened all Christendome with Shipwracke. To conclude, it yelds to no Monarchie whatsoever, neither needs it any thing but good husbandrie. As for worthy men, which be a iuuing law, and as it were the soule of an Estate, is there any nation whatsoever that can shew so many excellent personages, yea and Kings, as France may? There is no Vanitie more vaine, nor more vnworthy of a free minde, making profession of an Historie, wholly vowed to truth, then flatterie. But the most strictest Arcopagiste that euer was, cannot deny; but our Monarchie may produce as many excellent Kings and Princes, as any other whatsoever. The three Races haue made shew in diuerse times: But the third had the continuance of a more temperate season, for the establishing of an Estate. Let iudgement bee made by an vnpassionate tryall of their Reignes and Actions: to set downe Kings beautified with sundry graces, as necessitie required, Valiant in Warre, Wise for Counsell, Resolute in Aduersities, Milde to pardon faults, when as Forgetfulness was necessary for the good of the State, and the quiet of the Realme.

What shall wee say of great and worthy Events, such as may chance to Man, being good or euill? Hath any Historie more rare Examples then ours: cyther ordinarie in the common sufferance of Prosperitie or Aduersitie, or extraordinary in the greatest, and most tragically rare accidents that may bee noted in any other Nation. there was neuer State reduced into greater difficulties, both within and without the Realme, and not subverted: And in these extreame dangers, what valiant Resolutions. Truly our History sets downe in diuerse Reignes, the Courage and Constancie of diuerse Kings and People, in shew conquered, in effect Conquerors, in that they neuer disparaged the Common-weale, in the midst of their dispaire: what loue of Kings to their Subjects, and of Subjects to their Kings, in common calamitie? Our Historie is full of these Examples, and of all things else considerable in the Societie of Man, cyther in Warre or Peace, and which depends vpon their vertues, which held the Helme of this great Barke. But as wee cannot hide, nor deprive of their due praise, (these goodly lights which shine in diuers parts of our History) by the many examples of Valour, Equiry, Wisdome, Magnanimity, Modesty, Dexterty, and other Excellent Vertues of our Kings, so to iudge thereof soundly, wee must flye to the Father of lights, who vsing these great and worthy personages for the building, preferuation or increase of this Monarchie, hath intiched them with great and pretious graces, that acknowledging him the Author aswell of all these Vertues, as of the happy successe of things managed by them, we may learne to yeld him Homage, for the Preferuation, Continuance, and Increase of this great Estate.

The negligence of our Kings hath too often brought our Royall Diadem into danger, whereof they made themselves vnworthy, making it weake and contemptible in their persons, who (by their basenesse and child sh government) suffered their Seruants to command absolutely. The Kingdome hath bene as it were dismembred by the daution of royall commands. And by this meanes Brothers deluid by strange and selfe-wild discentions, haue abandoned all to spoyle: and from these domesticall diuisions, haue sprung ciuill Warres, amidst the which, the Inferiours (fishing in a troubled Water) freed themselves, and opposing against their Sueraigne, became petty Kings. Wee haue seene their rage extend farther, attempting against the Kings person, imprisoning him, forcing him to quit his Crowne, and in the end reducing him to that extremity, as to dye desperately, seeing himselfe so cutragiously dealt withall. Wee haue seene Kings prisoners in their enemies hands, and abandoned by their Subjects, Kings besieged in their houses. Wee haue seene a poore young man appointed to guide a Ship (during the fury of a storme) without Helme, without Matte, without Sayles, and without Oares: beaten without by the Tempests, and within by the Saylers: Seized on in his Cabin by madde men, imbrued with the blood of his most trusty Seruants, murdered before his eyes, yea euen in his bosome. Wee haue seene the Crowne of Kings in their minorities, set to sale by their Tutors, who became murderers, and of Regents, Theeues, making themselves Kings: Wee haue seene a King in his non-age become madde, gouerned by the passions of Men and Women, holding the chiefe degrees in state, which did strue to ruine it with in-bred Fastions, Rages, and populer Tumults, by tragicall Massacres, and furious Hostilitie. Wee haue seene amidst these Combustions, the Stranger not onely awaked at this brute, but also Armed; entred within the Realme, and lodged within the bowels of the goodlyest Prouinces. And (which is more) installed in the Kings Authoritie by the Edict of a lawfull King, seated in the royall throne, hauing the Crowne on his head, with the Scepter and Purse in his hand, and a Daughter of France in his bedde, for a gage of this vniust pretension, a Sonne to warrant his possession, with the force and obedience of the Capitall City, and the first Princes of the blood, armed with Power and Counsell to countenance these horrible confusions. Amiddest these ruinous disorders of our Countrey, who hath preferred the Realme of France, but hee that with one and the same hand, hath made both the lawe and the King of France?

O my Countrymen, it is to you to whome your History is directed, hauing the chiefe interest in the estate of our Mother, although Strangers are forced to admire it. But what? Our Ancestors haue seene all these things specified here, and represented in particular in the discourse I now offer vnto you. But I beseech you what haue wee seene with our owne eyes, within these thirtie and fve yeares? haue wee felt lesse miserie, or tried weaker Remedies? What were our troubles, and to what extremities wee were brought vnto of late yeares? By the conference of our Historie, with our Ancestors, ours serues as a Comentarie for the well understanding thereof, yet can wee not denie but our age hath seene things farre more extraordinary and miraculous: So as wee may say That wee haue liued in a time of myracles: Without doubt our posterity will admire in particular the Historie of our time, as the rarest part of the whole body, wee that haue seene it, should often belye our Eares and Eyes in reading or hearing it, when shce shall appeare in publick to put vs in minde of that whereof wee were Eye witnesses, and therefore witnesses aboue all exception: But euery thing must bee done in order and time. Behold the first part of my enterprise, which it behooues you to looke vnto: SHALL IT then bee in vaine, and without any fruite? it is not my intention, if the end of euery commendable enterprise be the vs: Shall wee thinke that the knowledge of our Ancient Estate is vnprofitable, and in a time when as wee haue so great need of consolation? Truly in the continuance of our long calamitie, wee must needs bee oppressed with a troublesome care. But in feeling the paine, why seeke wee not the remedie? If wee often apply the example to things wee do cyther without lawe or against the lawe, how much more should it auail vs being ioyned with reason? An Example rightly represented in the Historie of our Ancestors, serues vs now as a good guide to comfort vs, when as the like misery is common to vs and them. And if it please God to make vs like in condition, what reason haue wee to complaine? At the least wee may therein obserue; that not at this time alone France is afflicted, and hath shewed her indiscretion. So likewise by the same reason, it is not now alone that shce hath felt the succours of her Protector, who preserues her, amends her follies, and repaires her defects: without this protecting hand, shce had long since perished. What shall wee then say? truly wee were much too blame to accuse our Fathers, and seeke to excuse our selues, of the like or greater errors: our waywardnesse were not pardonable, if our hearts should faint in these difficulties, seeing that wee learne in the same Historie, that our Fathers haue deliuered from the like afflictions. It is therefore a speciall vse of this History, to cast our eyes vpon the condition of our Predecessors, to mollifie our languishings, as a necessary symptome of our inward warres, which like a continual feauer hath sucked (euen to the marrowe) all the vigour of this Estate, and hath not yet left it.

We must accuse our impatience and nicenesse, if we shall complaine to haue been worse intreated then our fore fathers, seeing wee obserue in them the like afflictions. Experience layes goodly grounds to reason, this certaine experience ingenders in our hearts hope of future things, without confusion or deceit. Do wee not then reape excellent fruites of this Historie? if by the deliuerance of our Fathers wee conclude and hope for ours, but in such fort and at such times, as the wise prouidence of God hath appointed, which ordinance neither Enemies can hinder, nor Friends aduance: and therfore the direction of this truth doth teach vs to saile in this Sea, euery one as hee ought according to his degree, expecting a happy harbor by the bountie and wisdom of him that rules the waues of Men & the euent of Things. Do wee grieue at our long troubles: let vs read the reignes of John, Charles the first, Charles the sixth, and Charles the seventh of our late losses? Let vs read the reignes of Philip of Valois, and wee shall see that the losse of the same Citie was deerer to him then to vs. As wee may neuer dissemble our losses, so is there a time to loose, and a time to gaine, if in our houses in the Countrie or City, all things succeed not as wee desire, who can with reason require alwaies the like successe in a State. To conclude, if to flatter the disease be no meanes to cure it, or to compare without remedie, (seeing that chollier and despaire brings no helpe to the diseased) let vs rather seeke for remedie then increase the disease, by a bootlesse complaint. If we wish for peace abroad, let vs lodge it first in our hearts at home. This inward peace shall be a good warrant for the generall, but wee are very sick, if we thinke by waywardnesse and furie to cure the disease. If then wee seeke any found cure for our griefes, the Apothecaries shop is open, behold some preparatiues. But what is that in regard of the tedious reading of the Historie it selfe, as necessary at this day for French-men, as necessity doth force vs to seeke for consolation?

I haue endeouored therefore (my Countrymen) to trace out some slender obseruations for you in this little worke (such as I could, I see it is not according to the dignitie and greatnesse of the subiect, worthy in truth of a good writer, rather fit for that obscure age, when the most ancient Druides had a maxime, not to write at all, of those which haue left vs these small Abridgements, the which we now vse for want of better, and without doubt if our History had incountred such spirits as the Greeke and Latin did, it had bene nothing inferior to any of them, in Beauty and Profit. This is the onely cause why our Countymen haue not read our History, hauing not enjoyed the light of Excellent Writers, to represent her in her liuely colours, according to her deserts. And although our France hath heretofore had cause to complaine in this respect, yet now that fault is partly repaired, by the industrie of some that strue to plant and beautifie it. Amongst all that haue laboured in this subiect, Pu Hailan in my opinion exceeds all others with immortal commendations, hauing so happily cleared these ouer-grown bushes and made so plaine a path in this thick and obscure Forrest: if zeale to doe my Countrie seruice, and hope by my example to awake the learned to doe better, were not my iust excuse, where should I hide me from the blout of inconsiderate rashnesse? especially being in this City of Paris, not onely the capitall City of France, the fertile Mother of goods wittes, but also the Rendez-vous of the greatest miracles in the world. I will therefore speake freely, that in presuming to beautifie this History, I haue taken for the onely obiect of my aime, To seeke the truth with the vse thereof, and to giue you some cause of content. Regard not my tongue, I offer you the simple truth without painting, the which I haue curiously searched for in many good Bookes, which my necessary abode here hath giuen me meanes to obtaine, and the desire I haue to serue you, occasion to imploy them, for as I am wholly vowed to the publike, so will I yeeld an accompt not onely of my idleness, but also of my employments, I haue therefore resolved to vndertake a labour that should not bee vnprofitable, in preparing you a way to learne your Historie in the originals, with lesse paine and more profit. I do therefore call this my endeavour an INVENTORIE, by the direction whereof, you may see the body and euery part at your pleasure. If I may perswade the Reader to conserue this my labour with the writings of others vpon this subiect (both old and new) I shall not then need to put in caution, but be of an assured hope to obtaine a testimonie of my fidelitie, And it may be in time, of some diligence; at the least I bring nothing, that hath not bene well purified and applyed to the vse. The fruit depends on the blessing of God, by the iudgement of such as shall read mee, I will protest onely for that which doth concerne my selfe: I haue used the Rule, Square, Lead and Compasse, to obserue proportion both in stile and subiect, that in my course I might direct you to the firme truth; if it bee with that light and breuitie I pretended, I shall haue cause to thanke God, and to labour in some subiect of greater moment, yet I haue done my best endeavour that the learned may supply my defect, in doing better. The course is open, euery one may runne it. I leaue the prize to them that shall doe best, my intent was onely to profit the publike: and therefore I bring not an Abridgement, but an INVENTORY. I haue searched the very Springs of such as went before me. The first haue not hindered the second: and why should the second take it ill to be followed by others? one kinde of meate may be diuersly seasoned to good purpose. A small Diall makes the houres in like proportion to a great Clock: It is one of my wishes, that this goodlie subiect may be set to open view, that the learned may strue to exceed one another, and leaue no excuse for our French-men to be any more strangers in France, making the way easie and profitable: If in this respect my zeale and integritie may bee approved of my Countrie, why should I repent the imployment of some houres in so goodly and worthy a worke, as a testimonie (at the least) that I desire to discharge my dutie.

To conclude, my Countrymen, I must not conceale from you the chiefe cause that induced mee to compile this worke. About fixe and twenty yeares since, I was thrust forth vpon the Theater, (being very young) to represent the Historie of our miseries: the desire of forraigne Nations begat this desaigne, being curious to vnderstand a particular relation of our Tragedies. By reason whereof I presented this my first worke in Latin, that Strangers might vnderstand it. I held it for an Abortiue, and esteemed the losse but lightly, yet was the successe greater then my proiect, for being imbraced by the publike beyond desert, it hath so increased, that of one Booke there is made fiftene, and corrected with diuerse impressions. And as the Child increased, so the Father had meanes to do him good. GOD suffering me to liue to be a witnesse of great accidents, not onely as many of my Country-men, that sees the danger from a safe Porte, but embarked in full Seas amidst these common tempests: for being imployed in some and no small affairs (both within and without the Realme) I had the Honor to be admitted into Kings and Princes Cabinets, to manage publike causes of Prouinces, and to conferre with the heads of Parties, to learne from their owne moutnes, and from others that had authoritie and imployment vnder them, the Truth of all that passed: so as being able to giue a reason for many things which I had scene, I may likewise giue an account of most that hath passed, by the proceedings and instructions of both parties. I will adde to this opportunitie the priuate deuotion which hath alwaies held my minde inclined to this care, to gather together whatsoever was done, when as necessity of affaires thrust mee into employments: and this my desire succeeded so happily, that both great and small haue fauourable imparted vnto mee whatsoever might benefit concerning this subiect. So as I haue made a iust collection of all the substance, that may serue for the building of a perfect Historie, from the beginning of the troubles to this day. The end of this painfull labour depends of him from whom proceeds the euent of all our prayers. To him therefore I referre my selfe, protesting onely of that, which is in mee. As therefore I aduow my selfe both Debtor of this worke, and Author of these Bookes, which wander among men: so I protest the fault shall not be mine, if all turne not to the publique good, wherevnto it is appointed, as by the order shall be found most expedient. And expecting an end of this great masse, my intent was onely (as may easily appeare by the Table of the third Race) to set before your eyes (as in one Mappe) a Summarie of the ancient History, very necessary for the vniting and resemblance of that which hath happened in our time. But the iudgement of my learned friends, hath made mee to take a new course, that the length of so tedious a paiment might not bee troublesome vnto you, in giuing you the whole Historie vnto this day, fashioned of this meane and base stature, whereof I now offer you this first part, as a Patterne of the whole peece, imbarcking my selfe from the maine land in this tempestuous Sea, which must needs bee fearfull vnto mee, both by the feeling of mine owne weaknesse, and the apprehension of diuerse iudgements, as the Ebbing and Flowing of the Ocean. I durst not hazard all this small modell at one voyage. Goe forth my first parcell, and seeke thy fortune, learne by the Chapmen, how the market goes, that by thy successe

I may resolute with lesse danger to Ship the rest, the which in the meane time shall attend (in a safe Harbor) the winde of your fauourable contents.

A PLOT OR DISSEINE OF THE WHOLE HISTORIE.

My meaning is to represent in this discourse, what is most remarkable in the Historie of France, and (with a simple, faithfull, and liuely breuitie) to report altho it hath succeeded in the French Monarchie, worthe of memorie, to make our Frenchmen see a modell of this great building, reducing it to the first foundation, according to the proportion of the subject, and the order of times, the certaine light of truth; and by the changes of the greatest and most famous forreine States, to the end, that this our Inuentorie may serue the learned for a memoriall, and learners for a direction. The enterprise is not small, although the worke be little, but as it must bee valued by the fruit, so the prooffe will appeare to such as shall touchsafe to reade what my desire was able to performe. And for a ground of this goodly and excellent Historie, so worthy of knowledge, we must set downe in generall termes what shalbe handled in particular throughout the whole discourse, and lay before your eyes (as in a table by the most cleere and foundest proofes that may be drawne from likelyhoods of so obscure antiquitie) the beginning and continuance, with the greatest apparance of truth, the increase with the diuers euent and successe of this state such as now it is.

It were to seeke truth in vanitie, following the common error, to search for the originall of the FRENCH, in the ruines and ashes of Troy or in the fennes of Meotides, for in the most auncient Histories of the Trojans, there is no mention of FRANCUS or FRANCON, sonnes of Hector, who had but one sonne named Aslanax slayne at three yeares of age in the sacke of Troy. There is also no likelyhood to find the stemme of our FRENCH nation in the fennes of Meotides, where they were first called SICAMERES, hauing built a Citie by imagination named SICAMBRA: And that they issued from thence in great troupes. There is no more prooffe that they are come from these marshes, then from the deserts of Assticke. It appeares the SICAMERIANS were a different people from the FRENCH, and that the wales of SICAMBRIA are yet to build. But the newe presumption of a certaine writer is yet more admirable, who com's so far to aduertise the FRENCH of their originall, the which he findes beyond the Moone, and with so great an assurance as he sett's downe namely name the kings of the house of SICAMBRIA and of FRANCE, their race, manners, deeds, adventures and that in so good order (as reporting a thing but of yesterday, or as being a Counsellor to these supposed kings) seeming with reason to reprehend such as will not take his word for present payment, vnder the authoritie of certaine old Registers produced by him, wherein he names these kings one after one, like in presumption to the Castilians, the inuentors of the fabulous Historie of Amadis: or the deuisors of the offspring of the Panim Gods, or of the Romant of the Role, hauing forged names at their pleasure; leauing therefore all these Diuinations and Fopperies, let vs search (as neere as wee may) what is most likely by the traces of Truth, untill it may guide us to the firme land, not plunging our selves any further in the boggs and unknowne desarts, of an imagined Antiquitie.

A Plot or Dissein

The French are come out of Germany.

What then? doubtlesse we shall nowhere find a more certaine originall of our FRENCH Nation then in Germany. This is most apparant; FRANCONIA beares yet the name of the old Inhabitants, and the markes of their aunient possession: The Cities of the one and the other side of the Rhine are full of their Antiquities. We can no way doubt by these markes, but they haue inhabited in those parts, and it is likely they were dispersed betwixt the Rivers of Rhine and Danubius, vnto the Ocean. Whether the had their beginning there, or came from any other part, it auules not to dispute, seeing the search is altogether vnprofitable, for that in deed it is impossible.

Of the name of Frenchmen.

The originall of the name is verie difficult, being wholly unknowne to the first Antiquitie: for we recade not in any aunient Histories the name of French-men among the nations of Germany, yet carefully obserued by the most aunient. But who sees not the change of aunient names to new. Alemaigne is now called Germanie: Heluetia, Suisse: Brittain, England: without seeking vnecessary proofes in so apparant a matter. The FRENCH therefore being an aunient people of Germany, haue changed their name with the whole country vpon diuers subiects, but when, how, by whome and wherefore, it cannot be certainly defined, but by coniectures, more easie to be refuted then maintained. It appears only that FRANCE is a German word, which signifies free, and that their auncestors either hauing shakt of the yoke of the Romaine seruitude, and recovered their aunient libertie, or remayning free amongst so many neighbours, subiect to that great Empire were called French-men in token of their libertie.

There are learned men which write that FRANCE was the name of a Communalty of diuers people, assembled and vnted together, to preserve their libertyes, hauing taken that name as a marke of their generous resolution, and not of any certain Nation: Although Tully (a witnesse aboue all exception) notes the name of FRANCONS among the nations of Germany, which had offered obedience to the Romanes, whilst their commonweale florished, before the Empire began, which shewes that we cannot talke of so obscure Antiquitie but doubtfully, so as it is bootlesse to pronounce Oracles vpon a subiect so disputable. Truly to referre the first memories of their name to the Empire of Valentinian, and the beginning of their liberty to the defeat of the Alans, and to the bounty of this Emperour, hauing freed them in recompence of so worthy a seruice: that were to make a leape of aboue an hundred and thirtie yeares, to confound things and to be ignorant of the estate of our Auncestors, who at the time of this memorable defeat, did in nothing acknowledge the Romanes; But rather for a particular fruite of the victorie gotten by them in common with Valentinian, they had possession of a great part of the Gaules, not holding it of any but of their Sword, nor doing homage but to their owne Valour. It were in briebe not to haue obserued the originalls of true Histories. Seeing then the aunient habitation of the FRENCH was in that part of Germany which lay nearest vnto Gaule, who can with reason deny but the are issued from thence, and that in taking Gaule they made it to change both Master and Name: This is in briebe what may bee spoken with most apparance of truth concerning the originall of our FRENCH nation, if we will not urge more then may well bee iustified.

By what meanes and when they entered Gaule

As for their estate and gouernment there is great likelihood that it was a great nation growne wylke by meanes of defending themselves and succoring others with their owne forces. I adde that they were led and commanded by a king, for the most aunient Histories represent them vnder a royall authority, as I will shew els where. Doubtles they had no meanes to buyld this great Monarchie in Gaule without force and order, yet did they not erect it all at one instant, but slipt into Gaule at sundry times, eyther employed to succor the Romanes, or they themselves, seeking their fortune, and good aduentures: And as they grew familiar by diuers sommonings, so they got footing by little and little, untill that hauing not only expelled the Romanes, but all other tributarie Lords, they became Masters and possessors of this goodly country: so

this Monarchie was buyld vpon the ruines of the Empyre, and the end of the one was the beginning of the other. The Romaine Empyre had not only seized vpon all Gaule as the eye of Europe (hauing reduced it into the forme of Prouinces) but did long inioe it by their Gouernours and Lisfounts generall. This authoritie and Romaine power was in a manner dispersed ouer the whole world. But as this Empyre was framed of diuers peeces, and built by iniustice and Tyranny, so God a iust iudge & reuenger of iniquities, raysed them vp great & pouerfull enemies from all parts of the world, as it were hyred to teare in sunder this Cloake, to dismember this Bodie by peecemeales, and to punish their vniuersall rigor, by a barbarous cruelty, and their greedy iniustice, by the ranshing extortion of others. The Empire then which had robbed was sackt it selfe, and hauing taken anothers good, lost their owne, being scarce able (and that by meanes of the FRENCH) to retaine any shew of this great and vast body. The fury of Mahomet invaded Asia, and Affricke, with a part of Europe, like a violent flame, with an incredible swiftness, Spaine was seized on by the Vandales, Alans, Sueues and Gothes, Italy by the Vandales, Hunnes, Gothes and Lombards, Gaule wanted not sundry guests: the Gothes seized on that goodly Gaule Narbonise, called for the excellencie a second Italy, and left their name to this goodly Prouince, which they enioyed long, and called it by their name, first Gothia and after Languedoc, as it were the language of Gothe, although they giue other reasons of this name more subtle then true. The Burgognons seized of the country which they called by their name Bourgongne, and erected a kingdome which contained the one & the other Bourgongne with the Prouince of Lionois, Dauphine, Sauoy, and Prouence. The Normans, Brittons and Picts, tooke euery one their tickett to lodge in Gaule, according to the diuers occurrents of affaires which presented themselves in this generall dissipation of the Romaine Empyre, who amidst these confusions did with great difficulty retaine the least portion: knowing not how to oppose themselves against so great and victorious enemies. So the FRENCH hauing likewise in the beginning seized on their quarter, were so fauoured by the prouidence of God, that through their valour they layed the foundation of a newe estate, so as hauing expelled out of Gaule, both the old and new vsurpers, in the end they became Masters, and buyld this goodly Monarchie, the which since hath giuen a lawe to neighbour Nations, settled the Romaine Empeire, stopt the violence of these cruell and barbarous Nations, and (which is the greatest honour of this estate) hath maintayned the Christiā Church in Europe, the which God hath appointed for an habitation amidst the furious confusions of Asia and Affricke, where the deluge of Mahomet's blasphemies hath horribly exceeded: wherein the greatnesse and power of Gaule is to be admired, by the which Iulius Cæsar could first alter the common weale of Rome his country, into the newe forme of an Empyre, and after when as all the most furious nations did stocke together to cast downe this great masse; Charlemaigne with the same force could preserve a great part of the west from that cruell shipwracke which ruened all the East.

And as this spoyle was not generall at one instant ouer all Gaule, but by fits like vnto a River which takes her course in a newe quarter; so the FRENCH Monarchie was buyld by degrees. The FRENCH being first employed by the Romanes for their valour in notable occasions, we begin to recade of their Name with some shew and state, vnder the Empeire of Gallienus, about the yeare of Christ two hundred seuenty. Posthumus gouernour of Gaule armed them against his Master and with the helpe of their forces & the consent of the Gaules, he enioyed Gaule the space of seauen yeares, with the Title of Emperour. It is likely this first abroad caused them to taste the fertile sweetnesse of this goodly and rich Country. Thus both the example of Posthumus and the prooue of their owne forces gaue them courage to attempt for themselves, wee reade that vnder the Emperours Aurelian, Probus, Dioclesian and Constantius father to Constantine the great, they haue often returned without any other subiect then to seeke their aduantage: so were they often repulsed by the Romanes with great losse.

These fruitelesse striniges might well haue cooled the heate of their attempts, but not

not their desire to seeke for means: But they continued most obstinately their practice in Arms, and maintained their reputation even with the Romaines themselves, who were glad to have them for friends and to employ them in their wars, as Constantine against Licinius a greate enimie to the Christians: and Constantius his soune against the Germanes and Iulian the Apostate against the Persians. True it is well the Historie of the Church as Saint Hierome in particular (one of the most famous Doctors) spake of the FRENCH as of a very renowned people, who might both hurt and helpe, by their multitudes and their valour of their Armes. The style of this desseine, which I have undertaken, doth only note the thing for your understanding, without spending time in longer proofes. This Apprentisship of the FRENCH by their many voyages into Gaule, continued a hundred and thirtie yeares, for so much it was from Gallienus to Honorius, under whom they began to sett footing into Gaule, upon this occasion. Those of the City of Treues tyred with the Tyrannie of the Romaines, were infinitely grieved that Lucius their Governour a Romaine, had by force taken the wife of a notable Citizen. This excesse ministred a subject to call the French-men to their ayde, who expelled the Romaines, seized quietly on the City with the consent of the Inhabitants, and so (proceeding in their conquest) they possessed their neighbour Countries, and in time, became Masters of all that lyes beyond the Rivers of Elcaut, and Some: and in the end having woone Paris, and the territories about, they gave their name to the conquered Country. I doe briefly touch what shall be represented in particular in every place, and sett downe truelie the originall of the FRENCH in this Realme.

PHARAMOND layd the first stone in the building of this estate, CLODION followed in this desseine. MEROVE made it appeare above ground, in a more goodly forme, having purchased credit among the Gaules, both by his valour and the happy successe of his Armes. CLOVIS (adding the profession of Christ to his Predecessors valour and his owne) did so winne the hartes of the Gaules, (who were for the most part Christians) as by their hartes he got their voluntary obedience, and the assured possession of these new Conquestes. Two nations united in one by the Conquerour, giving lawe to the Conquered, with so wise and mylde a discretion, as they held him worthy of this Alliance, and Name: and the fruite of this marriage was to happy as the new name of FRANCE was generally received in Gaule. Thus this newe estate increased daily in the race of PHARAMOND by diuers occurrences during the space of three hundred yeares. But it was much more augmented by the famous race of PEPIN. And God the Author of all good order in mankind, giving him to Sonne CHARLEMAGNE to prevent the ruine of the Empire, enriched him with singular graces, and confirmed in him that great authoritie and power of the King of FRANCE, and Emperour of ROME, which greatnesse God would make profitable to all Christendome. But his rare Inheritor of these great honours did not inherite his valour and happinesse, having scarce continued 257. yeares: but degenerating from his vertues, they lost both Authoritie and Crowne, so much augmented and beautified by him and CHARLES MARTELL. So this second race, unworthy of the blood and name of their Grandfathers, was spoiled of their Kingdome by their negligence. But God the Guardian of Monarchies (who changing the persons, would preserve the State) raised up HUGH CAPET a wife and modest Prince, arming him with wisdom and dexteritie fit for the preservation of his Crowne, accompanying his Armes with lawe, and his royall authoritie with well governed Iustice. It is to HUGH CAPET that the Realme of FRANCE standes most indebted for the establishment of those goodly Ordinances, by the which (together with the valleur and fidelitie of the FRENCH) this great Monarchy hath withstood the stormes of so many ages, and maintaines even unto this day, the lawfull heire in the same race, for the space of five hundred and thirtie yeares. So as gathering the summe of all these yeares, they reckon from PHARAMOND to HENRY the fourth that now Reignes, 1175. yeares.

This

This is the Plot or desseigne of the whole History of France, the which being thus laid before we raise this great building in every part according to the true measures and iust proportions, let vs make a Diagramme as a lively figure, which may containe nakedly, and without circumstance, the names of our Kings, according to the order of these three royall Races. To the which we will add a particular Chronologie, which shall be proued by the discourse of our Inuentorie, I have distinguished it into three parts, according to the order of the three royall Races. In the front of every part I note the names of Kings, and the time they have reigned, that at my first entrance you may obserue all that is represented in this particular discourse. wherein the wise Reader (that shall take the paines to conferre this modell with the whole Historie) will iudge that I have omitted nothing that may concerne the subject of the History with all principall circumstances, to the end the truth in this short, simple, and unseemly weed, appointed for every day, may serue as well as that which the Learned and eloquent writers shew forth in open Theaters at Festiual times. To Actions carefully described, I adde sometimes my Iudgement, for the vse of the History, examined by the Maximes of State. To actions I say generally aduowed, as for the rest I leave them, remembering that I am a Witnesse and no Iudge, to do service to such as could not see the Originals. I note in the beginning the Elections, the Birithes, Lines, Aduentures, Intents, Desseignes, Matters and Completions of our Kings, the Motiues, Actions, Alterations, Crosses, Issues and Successe of their affaires, both in Warre and Peace: their Enterprises, taking of Cities and Countries, Battels, Encounters, Victories, Queribrowes, Advantages, Disadvantages, and other things remarkable in State. Finally I obseue their ends in their death, as the Catastrophe of their Life, and doying up of their Reigne. But to make this discourse more proportionable for the knowledge of our Monarchie, it was necessary to explaine it by that which hath changed of most import in forreine Estates, especially in the Church & Empire, the most famous Theaters of the world, by reason whereof I have added a most careful Collation of the one and the other with our Realme. I intreate the wise Reader to way with iudgement what I shall report concerning matters most subiect to comptonne, as those of the Church. I doubt not but that hee shall finde that I have contained my selfe within the limits of State, talking nothing of Religion, nor meddling with the diuerse humors of this age. I have onely treated of the politike government of Rome, with as much modestly as the subject would permit. I know likewise that making profession to write a History, no man will wish mee eyther to disguise or to conceale the truth, the which will warrant it selfe, and free me from reproche, in making knowne to iudicious and modest wits, that I have no other passion but my duty, whereof I can give no better proofe, then in iustifying my discourse with the Original, if there appeare any difficulty. I protest I have only had a true desire to serue the publique, whose profit is the onely scope of my labours. As for the Computations, as they be very necessary for the well understanding of the History (which is the Register of times) so hath it much troubled me, being altogether neglected by the most ancient Writers, borne in the first obscure ages. The learned which have happily handled this subject before me, finding plainly this notable difficultie, have held it expedient to make litle or no accompt to obserue the dates, which was in my conceipt, under correction be it spoken) to cut the knot a sunder instead of unloosing it. But it hath made me more carefully to labour in this search, to finde out some means amidst these extremities. And therefore I have distinguished the most notable changes, not onely from one Race to another, but in the Races themselves, placing the dates in the front of the whole discourse, at a Round ston to limit the Lands. Moreover I have faithfully collected in grosse the yeares of every reigne, and have deuised them as I thought most likely, by the continuance of publike and private actions. It is all I could do in the most ancient reignes, being unable to deuise further, but in those that approach neerer to our age, the Reader shall see the uniting of things from yeare to yeare by degrees, whereby he may maraile plainly in so goodly a light without any confusion, the Diagramme shall supply the particular default of times, which we cannot otherwise distinguish. But let us first see the whole patterne of our Monarchie, which will shew many colours and fountaine what is to come.

- Lewis the do nothing, or idle, Sonne or Brotherto Carloman takes vpon him to be King, but not being acknowledged by the French, as they were ready to dispossesse him, hee dyed, and is not reckoned for any.
29. Charles the 2. called the grosse, a Prince of the bloud of France, and Emperour of Germanie, confirmed in the Regencie by the States, following the example of these baylards, is Crowned King, hee was degraded from the Empire and the Crowne, And in his place
 30. Eudes or Odo Duke of Angers named by the Kings testament (as is sayd) is called and crowned as the other Regents, and for this cause accounted among the Kings, in the end the Crowne comes to
 31. Charles the simple, the lawfull King after 22. yeares, but being forced to renounce it, he dyes for sorrow in prison, and leaves for his lawfull successor Lewis the 4. his sonne, carried into England by his Mother, yielding to the violence of the victorious league, by the which
 32. Ralfe or Raoul Duke of Burgondie, Prince of the Bloud, was called to the Crowne, and and so is accounted among the Kings, although he were an Esurper, and he being dead
 33. Lewis the 4. called Doutremer, or beyond the Sea, Sonne to Charles the Simple, is restored, and leaves the Crowne to
 34. Lothaire, and he to
 35. Lewis the 5. his onely sonne, who dyed without issue Male, hee was the last of this second Race, leaving the Throne empty to Hugh Capet, the Stocke and first King of the third Race following.

The third Race called the Capetingiens or Capets, in number 27. Kings.

36. Hugues or Hues Capet, to whom succeeded
37. Robert his sonne, alone of that name, and to Robert
38. Henry the 1. his sonne. And to Henry
39. Philip the 1. his sonne. And to him

48. Philip the 5. called the Long, sonne to Philip the Faire, succeeded his Brother Lewis Hutin, he dyed without issue Male: who left the Crowne to
49. Charles the 4. called the Faire, his Brother, who also dying without issue Male, the Crowne came by right of inheritance to
50. Philip of Valois, the 6. of that name, first Prince of the bloud, and first King of the royall line of Valois: to whom succeeded
51. Iohn his sonne, onely of that name, unfortunate: to him succeeded
52. Charles the 5. surnamed the Wise, who preferred the State, during a horrible combustion: to him succeeded
53. Charles the 6. his sonne, called the Beloued, and yet too well noted by his long and unhappy reigne, amidst the furies of ciuill warres, bred in his minority, and increased in his frensie, so as a strange King was crowned King of France, and became Master of the greatest part of the Realme: to Charles the 6. succeeded
54. Charles the 7. his sonne, who established the Realme in expelling the Stranger and to him succeeded
55. Lewis the 11. his sonne, who hauing incorporated Bourgongne and Prouence to the Crowne, and purged the Leuen of intestine diuision, left the Realme rich & peaceable: to
56. Charles the 8. his sonne, who dying without Males, left the Realme according to the law of State: to
57. Lewis the 12. Duke of Orleance, first Prince of the bloud, who likewise dyed without issue Male, leaving the Crowne: to
58. Francis the 1. of that name, first Prince of the bloud, Duke of Angouleme, and he to
59. Henry the 2. his sonne, and Henry to 60. Francis the 2. his sonne, who dying without Male: left it to
61. Charles the 9. his brother, who dying without issue lawfully begotten: left it to
62. Henry the 3. his brother, the last of the royall race of Valois, who being slaine by a Iacobin, and dying without issue, by the same right of the Fundamentall law of State, he left the Realme intangled in diuerse confusions: to
63. HENRY the 4. then King of Nauarre, first Prince of the bloud, and first King of the royall race of Bourbon.

A Prince indued with vertues fit to restore a State, but successor to much trouble, wearing a Crowne not all of gold, but intermixt with Thornes, wreathed with infinite difficulties, gouerning a body extreemly weakened with a long and dangerous disease, surcharged with Melancholy and diuerse humours, led with the furie of the people, bewitched by the practises of Strangers, who had crept so farre into the bowels of our miserable Country, that they were ready to dispossesse the lawfull heires, and to inuest a new King, if God the Gardian and Protector of this Realme, had not opposed a good and speedy remedie, to their force (in shew triumphant) by the valour and clemencie of our Henry, incountring his enemies with the one, and by the other reducing his Subjects (strangely distracted) to their duties. God send him grace to finish as he hath begun, and Crowne the miraculous beginning of his reigne with the like issue: Truly all good and cleere-sighted French-men may note how necessary this Head is for the preservation of the State, and by their daily and feruent prayers, to pray vnto God for the long and happy life of our King. And for the peace and tranquillity of this poore and desolate Realme.

PARAMOND, the first
King of France.

A Paramond the son of Marcomir, is held for the first King of France by the consent of all our writers. He began his Reigne the yeare of Christ 420. A date very remarkable to describe the first beginning of the French Monarchie. At that time Honorius and Arcadius, brethren, (sonnes to Theodosius the great) held the Romaine Empire, invaded so by strange nations, as it was not onely dismembred into diuerse parts, but euen Rome was spoyled and sacked by Attilie King of Goths. Amidst these confusions, the French Monarchie had her beginning vpon the ruines of the Empire. The French inuited by them of Treues, for the aboue named occasion, first seized on the Cittie, and from thence extended themselves to the neighbour countries; they name Tyngrie for their first possession, which the learned hold to be the countie of Brabant, and about Lige. This conquest was not made at one instant, but augmented by degrees, and the neereſt prouinces were first surprized. The French coming from beyond the Rhin, it seemes they did first seize on that part which then lay neereſt vnto them, as the Countries betwixt the Rhin, the Eſant, and the Meuse; and from thence extended themselves euen to the river of Loyre. They hold for certaine, that this happie exploit of the French, was vnder the name and authoritie of Pharamond their King, who departed not from his native countie, but sending forth this troope, as a ſwarme of Bees, he reaped the honour and fruit of the conquest, as the Soueraigne head. Hee is commended to haue established good lawes, to haue framed and inured the French to a ciuil and well governed kind of life, and to haue laid the first stone of the foundation of this great Monarchie in Gaule: he reduced into one body, and expounded more plainly, the ancient lawes of the French, called Saliques: augmented them, and shewed the vse, as well for the government of the estate, as for private persons. And therefore he is called the author of those Lawes, although he received them from his Ancestors. He raigned xi. yeares, leauing Clodion his sonne for his successor, with a good taste of his integritie noted in his name: for Pharamond or Pharamond (according to the common pronounciation) in the old French language (that is to say) in Germaine, signifies a true mouth: a vertue in truth worthe of a Prince, and necessary for the conduct of humane societie.

This is all that may be certainly written of the originall of the French Monarchie: yet Gregorie of Tours (a very ancient author) makes no mention of Pharamond, and sets downe the beginning of this estate in grosse, as a thing vncertaine. What certaintie then may we looke for of more ancient times? We find in the Romaine histories, some apparent steps to guide vs to the knowledge of our beginning. These goodly Prouinces of Gaulle, were courted by all their neighbours: the Romaines vnder colour of conueniencie, seized on that which lay neere vnto them; by meanes whereof, they fought to become masters of the rest, but they wanted no competitors. The Helvetians (since called Suisses), & likewise the Almaignes would haue lodged there, if Cesar had not withstood them. His successors were incurred with the like difficulties, but in the end they prevailed to whom God had determined the possession, that is to the French, issued doubtlesse out of Germanie, and gouerned by Kings. We read in the liues of the last Emperours, the names of Melchaudes, Richimer, Marcomir, Berther, Sunno, Pharabert, Theodemer and Dagobert: but hereof wee cannot with reason beleue all that the Registers of Hunibauld & Tribemius do comment, touching these ancient Kings. Let vs therefore leaue these subtilties to such as haue leisure to refine their wittes, & lay before our eyes the light of a more sound and profitable truth: let vs obserue the estate of the Church, when as this Monarchie began to appeare, for hereafter the Church shall be her principall gemme, although the French Kings were infidels in their first beginnings.

the Church.

S. Ierome, Chrysostome, Ambrose and Augustine, liued in those times, spectators of the dissipation of the Empire, wherein the Church suffered much. Damasus, Siricius, Anastasi, Innocentius, Sofonus, and Bonifacius, Bishops of Rome liued there, one after another (often renowned for their pietie, learning, and dexteritie,) amidst the confusions of the Empire, & euen at Rome, whereas the Emperours were seldome scene; so as the absence of the Emperours (troubled to withstand the Barbarians, and the miserable estate of the time, which forced Christians to flie to their Bishop, for counsell and comfort in their confused afflictions) laid the foundation of their authoritie, then small, being tyed to their charges, and subiect to the Emperours command: but it grew by degrees, vntill it came to the heigh of this soueraigne and absolute power, so as in the end they haue prescribed lawes to the Emperours, Kings, and Christian Princes. A necessary obseruation, both for the truth and order of this Historie, to vnderstand rightly both the times, and meanes of their rising. In the first age, the Bishops of Rome durst not shew themselves (being persecuted, imprisoned, & martyred by the Emperours). Since Constantine the great, their authoritie began: in the dissipation of the Empire, it increased, and this Realme did fortifie and augment it. Our first Kings knew them not: their next successors maintained & advanced them as, Charles Martell, Pepin, Charlemaigne, to whom they are indebted for the greatest support and increase of their cheefe authoritie.

Fundamentall Rules or Maximes of the State of France.

But before we proceed any further in this Theater, reason and order commands vs to set downe the soueraigne Maximes of our Monarchie, as goodly pillars in the first fronte of this great building: to the end we may not dispute, either of the ancient forme of gouernment in the first age of our Ancestors, or of the Fundamentall lawes of the estate. It is necessary that our mindes (euen in our infancie) be seasoned with this common beliefe, being the bond and vnion of the naturall obedience we owe vnto our Kings. Without doubt, it is neither true, nor likely, that our Predecessors, (taking possession of this goodly inheritance) made any question of that which had bene concluded amongst them from father to sonne. The most ancient histories (whose authority is without controll,) testifie, that the French nation was gouerned by Kings: and experience ioyned with reason doth shew, that the French cannot be otherwise commanded, then by a royaltie. Whereto then serues this question amongst the French, touching the forme of gouernment, when as Gaulle was first possessed by them? And to what end should these goodly painted speeches be vttered by our ancient warriors, who made so great profession to do well, as they neglected eloquent words.

This Maxime thus layde, as the ground of the Estate of France, the truth of that which hath passed in ancient times, doth plainly shew, what the forme of this royaltie hath bene: for who doth not see, by the names of the Kings of France, (as they haue commanded in this realme, amidst so many alterations of the State, in the change of the three Races, where wee may note the succession from father to sonne, from brother to brother, & from cousin to the nearest kinsman of the bloud Royall), that it was hereditary from all antiquity? This is the law, the vse whereof is so worthily regarded in all commands, the force whereof defends the State amidst the strangest confusions, yea sucking babes haue enjoyed it without any dispute or contradiction. At the very name of an infant King, Armies haue marched vnder the command of a woman (otherwise very odious, by reason of her vices) and yet so respected (being the Kings mother) as the French haue growne desperate in most perillous batailles, returning with bloody victories, thrust forward with this onely resolution, to preferue the estate of their yong King, lying in his swadling clothes. By the force of this law, the French (after the decease of their lawfull Kings, leauing their wiues with childe) haue reuerenced the wombe of their Queene, expecting her deliury: being a sonne, hee was nourished, bred vp, and honoured as their King: And if he dyed in his first infancie, they haue performed his obsequies, with the like respect and reuerence, as to a King in his maturity.

To conclude: reason, authority, and experience, doe plainly shew, that a succeeding royaltie is better, then that which depends vpon the peoples choise and election: For what is a Royaltie, but the image of a fathers command: the loue, honour and obedience which children beare towards their parents, bee the effects of the lawe of nature figured in their hearts. A father commands ouer many children, who although they bee planted in diuers parts (as wee see in the peopling of great families,) yet all returne to the chiefe stock or stemme: all acknowledge and honour the father, all obey him while he liues, by a more voluntary obedience, for that it is meere nature. Behold the pattern of a ciuill gouernement. To apply it to our subiect: it appeares, the first man had this naturall authoritie, euen as wee see it at this day. As mankind multiplied into diuers families, so this multitude had neede of a greater gouernement. Man cannot liue alone: society consists in commandement and obedi-

ence. From this fountaine a royaltie springs. Looke what is done in a family, the like is in a state, by the same force of nature: one commands and is obeyed. There, this naturall respect is that bond of lawfull obedience. So here in like sort, whereas the commandement of one giues lawe to all, for that the lawe of nature hath power ouer all, it doth authorize this respect in the hearts of subiects, by a voluntary obedience to their Kings as to their fathers. And as wee neede not to be taught to honour father and mother: So, who is so vnkind that will make any question to honour the Prince vnder whom hee is borne. It is that which the originall of the first truth doth teach vs, Honour father and mother, not onely to tie vs to them that gaue vs life, but to those that make vs to liue happily in the common societie of mankind: that is, to the father in the house, and to the King in the state, as the father of our fathers. Thus a Royaltie is the most antient and best forme of government, when as the King is Father of his people, according to the ordinance of nature, as we shal shew else where at better leisure. I hope this final digression shal be excused for the necessity of the subiect. A Royaltie then is the Image of a fathers authoritie. How can a father then (whom God hath giuen by the course of nature) be chosen by his children? If to liue well according to nature, and by consequence, that which proceeds from nature, be the best, who doubts, but a Royaltie (the which God hath giuen vs by the law of nature, the soueraigne law of societie, wherein wee are borne,) is without doubt better then that which depends on the tumultuous factions of people: Thus much for reason. Now let vs see what Authority saies, which speaks plainly, & in the goodliest estate of the world, which was the common weale of Israel, wherein God had planted his church, as his most precious iewel. Truly, the lawfull Royaltie of the house of Dauid, hath bin hereditarie, & successiue from father to sonne, and from Cousin to the nearest kinsman. A parente whereby to frame a perfect estate, farre better then the common weale of Plato: who notwithstanding hath respected the bloud Royall in the race of Kings, with great prerogative, moued thereunto by the force of nature, to acknowledge the best forme of government in an hereditary succession, whereas one is borne to commaund, another to obey.

I will dilate no more of so rich and ample a subiect, hauing onely coated that which is necessarie for the circumstance of my purpose. But what shall wee say of Experience, the mistres of fooles? What is hee, but may thereby feeble the visible proofs of this truth? Doubtles those Countries and States, which haue kept this libertie to chooseth their Kings, do often feeble (to their costs) the tumultuous fruites of their elections, struing with much paine to maintaine this privilege against the lawes of nature, posting from nation to nation, with much toyle, and small profit, searching for that a farre off, which they might easily finde at home: and for the avoiding of tumults (which might growe among equall Competitors) they procure vnto themselves infinite troubles, the which they might auoide, in receiuing of him willingly whome God should cause to be borne among them, with a lawfull authority. But some will object, that which we cannot deny to haue bene practised in two Races, That the French had in former times authority to place and displace their Kings: as appears as well by the Kings Chosen by Parliament, which were borne vpon targets: as also by the famous examples of Peppin, and Hughe Capet. Wherevnto the answer is true and plaine, that this consent was but the teale of the naturall prerogative due to the race of our lawfull Kings: and their disallowing, a declaration of their base foolishness, vnworthy of that naturall prerogative, wherewith they were honored in their birth, and from the which they did degenerate in liuing ill. And as we see in the succession of Kings, the nearest allied holds the other by the hand: so in these two alterations, when as necessitie forced the French to change their King, (as when the like necessitie constraineth the children to giue their furious father a tutor) wee may obserue, that they haue alwayes made choise of men nearest to the blood royall, preferring vertue before a maske of Authoritie corrupted with vice, the publique good before

In old time at the reception of a new king they used to carrie him vpon a target in a publike assemblie.

A the priuate interest of a vicious man, receiuing nothing but the name of his noble race. They haue preferred (as much as they could) their naturall respect to the bloud royall. The lawe made the King: that is his birth. But the law of nature, followed by the law of nations, and the free consent of the people, hath not bene the cause, but the very effect of this naturall authoritie. So this royall authoritie is limited and ruled by the souereigne law of State: which doth so aduance the head about all the members of the bodie, as they may not be separated. For, what is a King without subiects, but a head without members? the King preserves his estate, as the head doth the bodie. But, as the head (from whence life proceeds to the bodie) liues with the bodie, so the King (who preserves the estate by his authoritie) is preferred in the estate, by the consent of his subiects.

In this inseparable vnion, hee doth fortifie his power by theirs, and his commaund with their voluntaty obedience. Plato sayes, that Authoritie not subiect to controulment, is pernicious to him that commaunds, and to them that are commaunded. It is a lawfull and profitable restraint for Kings, and the necessary counterpoyle of their authoritie. This lawe will haue euery member to hold his place, in the bodie of a State: And by consequence, that the subiects consent, (who offer their goods and liues to their King) be held in due degree. This hinders no more the hereditarie prerogative of a Royaltie, then the diuerse ministerie of the members, do the soueraigne authoritie of the head, ouer the whole bodie. And as in the beginning, or in the rising, or infancie of an estate, vertue ministers occasion for the people to chooseth such as should commaund ouer them successiue, (leaving as it were in sacred gard, in the hands of their best men, what they hold most pretious, and so to their successors, who by all reasonable coniecture, must be good and vertuous, being borne of good parents) euen so, in the end, vice makes them to hate such as abuse this prerogative: and in like manner, the same vertue makes them flie to others, whome they hold more worthy to commaund, in that they are obedient vnto reason. This Maxime then stands firme, that the authority of the states not being incompatible with the souerainety of a king, the royaltie of France is, and hath alwayes bene merely hereditary, without any exception, nor can it otherwise subsist and stand (all well considered). And who so thinks or speaks otherwise, imaginyng popular common-weales in France, he is ignorant of the disposition of the French, and feeds himselfe with a dangerous vanity.

But this lawe of a succeeding royaltie is limited by a third Maxime: That the right of the Crowne is tied to the heires male: whereas in many nations, for want of males, the soueraigne Authority of a royaltie falls to the females of the royall race. And this lawe, receiued by the approbation of the subiect people, is happily put in practise. The president is very memorable and remarkable in the Realme of England, whereas Queene Elizabeth alone, hath surpassed the happinesse of the greatest Kings her predecessors, ruling a long time with great Authority in peace: So as hauing gotten most famous victories ouer her enemies, shee hath erected, through peace, the goodliest trophies that euer king of England could haue planted there. So great is the force of the lawe in the society of mankind, the which God will haue inuolable vnder the gage of faith and publique order. But the royaltie of France is wholly restrained to the males, the fundamentall lawe of state (being called the Salique lawe) not admitting the females. For this soueraigne lawe is set downe in these words: In the Saliqueland, let no portion of the inheritance come to the female: but let the male haue the possession. That is to say, the males onely are capable of the Crowne of France: the females being wholly excluded, and by consequence their issue, the which can pretend no more interest then their mothers, neither haue they any portion in the renewes of the Crowne, which cannot be alienated. So as it is giuen them but for terme of life, by assignation of dowrie at the Kings good pleasure.

This fundamentall lawe is called Salique, by excellency, although the Salique lawes containe the rights of priuate men: but amongst them, that which concerne the maiesty of the prince, is the principall, and for this cause is knowne by this worthy observation. The practise of this fundamentall law is apparent, in the first race, where A the cheefe prooffe of antiquitie must be made in the daughters of Childbert, sonne to the first Clouis: In the daughters of Cherbert sonne to Clotaire the first, in the daughters of Contran, son of the same Clotaire, all which were excluded from the Crowne, and in their places the neereft Princes of the blood admitted, by the consent of all the French. The second race hath no examples of this law in the particular circumstance of women. The third hath very notable ones: Edward King of England was excluded by iudgment of the States, from the right he pretended to this Crowne, being sonne to one of the daughters of France, the onely daughter of Philip le bell. Philip of Valois, was preferred before his Neece, daughter to Lewis Hutin. And of late memory, Francis the first of that name, Duke of Angoulesme, before the two daughters of Lewis the B twelfth, without any controuersie.

The prerogative of a King is nothing impaired by the peoples consent as is last receiuen.

The third. The male onely capable of the Crowne, the female excluded in France.

Here the Author would have a tained his position to be taken for an vn-doubted truth

This law was obserued among the French before Pharamond was borne: and by vertue of this law he reigned as Successor to his Ancestors, Marcomir, Sunno, Melobaudes, and others. And as he was appointed by the wise providence of God, to bee the first Architect of this Monarchie, so was hee indued with singular graces fit for so excellent a worke, in the which the law should fortifie the valour of this fierce & warlike nation. Thus Pharamond is renowned for his wisdom and iudgment, who did countenance & authorize the Salique lawes, and that especially which was the chief, to take away all future debate from his Successors. And for the better strengthening of his lawes, he assembled his captaines, whereof the Countessors of our ancient Kings C were chosen. They name among the chiefe of them Widogast, Sabogast, Wifogast, and Besogast: the which our fabulous curiosities do transforme into some great Orators, without any apprehension of truth. These were good warriors, & yet wise men, and iudicious. But who can beleue they were great Rhetoricians? So Pharamond was not the Author, but the bewtifier of the SALIQUE lawes, as Iustinian of the ciuill lawes of the Romaines.

Of the word
Salique.

Salique were.

To search out the originall of the word, neither my style, nor my humor will suffer me to dispute thereof: every one hath his iudgement free. But this is my opinion: as words be the images of things, so are they inuented to represent the nature of the thing whereunto they are applied. It appeares, that among the French, the Salians were those D that held the cheefe degrees, and gaue the name to the whole Nation. So as all Frenchmen are oftentimes called Salians. The SALIQUE lawes therefore are the French lawes appointed to rule, and gouerne the French. It was the ancient name continued with the most ancient lawes, the which, the honour of the Nation, and the reuerence of so sacred a thing, hath forbidden in any sort to alter. So the SALIQUE lawe hath continued time out of mind the Soueraigne law of State, vnder the which the French haue liued: and so haue continued from father to sonne, without any alteration, either in the substance, or the word, maifesticall in the heartes and tongues of all French men. What apparence is there then, that Phillip of Valois hath borrowed the name of Pharamond, in the inuention of this law, to make it serue his turne? How much unlikely E is it, that so important a law, being the ground of the Estate, should bee vnknewe to the French? What a drowlines had it beene in so wise & circumspect a nation, to suffer themselves to be abused by a new-come Prince, and by so grosse a pollicie, to drawe themselves into apparent combustion, which hung ouer their heads, in preferring the French before the English, who had then so good a portion in France, where hee possessed the goodliest, and richest prouinces? How vnfound is this policy, to imagine, that a poore Prince, Count of Valois, hauing to do with a rich King of England, who encountered the Frenchmens minds with an intestine force, by the golden vertue of his Angels, could haue abused such as were kept in their obedience, by the force of right and reason, for the preferuation of the Crowne of France, their Countie? Who sees F not, but it had beene the ouerthrowe of Philip of Valois cause, to say that hee had forged a law at his pleasure, to exclude the lawfull heire, and her offspring, from her right? Truly the good cause of Philip of Valois made him victorious against the forces of

A of Edward King of England; and the auncient reuerence to him, authorized by a continuall vse, and receiued by the common consent of the French, reiected gold, to respect the order of right, for the benefit of the lawfull heire. 430.

These French lawes were called Saliques, of the river Sal which is in Franconia, or East France: it ioynes with Mein, and is not yet dried vp. It is neyther new, nor extraordinary, for people to deriue their names from Mountains, or Rivers: and to shewe an example, springing from the same thing, by noting the Rivers. The Country where the City of Paris is seated (not onely the chiefe of this great realme, but the Theatre of the whole world, if by a happy peace she may recouer her ancient beauty) is called the Isle of France, for the concurse of diuerse rivers, which ioyne with Seine: and to this B end, the ship (the armes of our chiefe Cittie) shewes the oportunitie of these goodly rivers. Who can with reason reiect the apparency of this likely-hood? That as our ancestors remayning alongst the riuer of Sal, were called Salians, so the name hath continued to posteritie: the which for the like reason are called Ripuares, as made for the commodity and vse of the dwellers vpon that banck, the which they likewise called Ripuares, or Ribberots. Truly long time after, Conrad of Franconie, the Emperour, was called Salique, to marke his beginning in that Country, by the ancient name. Thus much for the word. But the inuolable Maximes and Principles of the State of France, the consent of all the true & ancient writers, the prescription of so many ages, the generall approbation of all the French nation, should make vs hold this Salique lawe, for C certaine, without seeking for new opinions, not onely weake and vnprofitable, but insupportable in the State, where the olde prouerb must stand for an oracle, Remoue not the stone well layed. Thus hauing briefly set downe the principall lawes of the State of France, I will retorne to the course of my history.

Thus hee raigned, thus he liued, and thus died Pharamond, the first King of France, leauing for hereditary successor of his Realme, his sonne Clodion, according to the right of lawe: and King in effect, by consent of the French. This age was the sincke of Babarous nations, by whome God would iustly punish the vniust pride of the Romains. The greatest parte came out of Asia, staying first in Germany, and from D thence like Caterpillers or Grasshoppers, read themselves ouer Gaule, Italie, and Spain: that is to say, the Goths, or Getes, Alans, Hunnes, Sueues, & others: & from the North the Bourguignons, Normans and Lombards. We must know the Change of these nations, for the vse of his history. But it sufficeth to touch them briefly in their places, without cloying our chiefe subiect with a cumbersome discourse.

B4.

CLODION

CLODION, or CLOION the hairy, 2. King of France.

The first attemp. of Clodion.

CLODION, the sonne of Pharamond, succeeded his father in the yeare 431. and reigned one and twenty yeares. He laboured to follow his fathers counsell, and to settle himselfe in Gaul: but having transported certaine troupes, which made a happy beginning, passing to the countries of Cambresie and Tournay, betwixt the rivers of Somme and Esout, beheld a furious multitude of diuers nations assembled to the chace, of Sindales, Alans, Sueues, and Burgundians (jealous to see this great and warlike people follow their steps, in the conquest of a land not onely set to sale, but abandoned in the disorders of the Romaine Empire,) opposed themselves against them. The French not able to withstand so great united forces, retired themselves into their Country of Franconia. To this ialousie, was added the practise of Stillicio, Lieutenant B generall to Honorius Emperour of the West, who easily engaged these Nations, (seeking for worke) against the French, laboured by all meanes to crossie them, and to possess himselfe of Gaul: yet the successe did not suite his desire: for being prevented by Honorius his maister, he was slaine, with his sonne Eucherius, whom he had appointed absolute heire of that goodly portion. But the providence of God had left it in prey to these great and victorious Nations, being come from diuers parts of the world to diuide the Empire. Thus confusion preuailed by his authority, who had most interest in the practises of Stillicio, who in taking Gaul for himselfe, retained still the Romaine name, being ouerthrowne by Honorius. The deluge of these barbarous nations overflew all Gaul, which from yeare to yeare was replenished with new guests. C The Burgundians had already seized on a great part, with the title of a kingdom, where-

2. King of France.

A whereof Arles was the chiefe City. The Goths possessed Gaul Narbonne, euen by the Emperours consent, who granted what he could not take from them: with promise to passe no further. So this victorious nation, dispersed in diuerse places in Italy, Gaul and Spain, were called by sundry names, Wisigoths, and Ostrogoths, according to the place where they were planted, by their great multitudes and valour. Such was the disorder of the Romains, who in their seasons had subdued the whole world, by their victorious armes. Their tempests and stormes reigned during the Empires of the two brethren, Arcadius and Honorius, the one commanding in the East, and the other in the West: of Theodosius the second, sonne to Arcadius: and in the beginning of Valentinian the third, a vicious and unhappy Prince. The raigne of Clodion fell out in those times not greatly memorable, but to obserue his resolutions and manly endeavours, to settle and increase the conquests of his father, but with no successe. Thus great and heroicall enterprizes haue often staves and lets in the beginning, or such difficult crosses, as they seeme quite suppressed.

Aetius a Romaine borne, succeeded Stillicio for the Emperour, in that which remained in Gaul: he opposed himselfe violently against the French, who at diuerse times endeououred to passe the Rhin, and to returne into France. Clodion fortifying himselfe courageously against this storme, fainted not for all these first difficulties. In the end, hee resolved to hazard all vpon this last cast: and to this effect hee rayled a mighty army, with an intent to go in person to the conquest of this goodly kingdom. But God had C resolved to giue it to the French: yet by an other hand then that of Clodion, for he dyed in this voyage, being on the banks of Rhin, with an intent to passe it, in the yeare of grace 451. leauing Merovee heire of his desseigne and valour.

He was called Le Cheneu, or hayrie, for that he made a lawe, that none but Kings and their children, with the Princes of the blood, should weare long hayre, in token of command: after the Romaine maner, who shaued the heads of their slaues and seruants, and left the Periwig onely to the Patricians, and the head bare. This custome, confirmed by the law of Clodion, hath bene long time obserued in France: so as by this make, Clodamyr the sonne of Clouis (being slaine in a battaile by the Burgundians) was knowne among the dead: and in token of a degrading or dishonouring, D they shaued such as they degraded from the royall dignity: as it appears by infinite examples: amongst the which our History makes mention of one very memorable, of Queene Clotilde, who chose rather to cut off the heads of her young sonnes, then to haue their hayre sold or shauen: that is to say, she preferred an honest death before the dishonour of her children: for in cutting off their hayre (the marke of their naturall dignity) they were deprived of all hope to enioy their degree, and were confined into a base estate, unworthy of their greatnesse, to dye continually with heart-breaking, reproche and infamie.

Geneseric King of the Vandales, at that time seized vpon Affricke, and euen when as he besieged Hippone (which at this day they call Bonne, famous for the fishing of corall) E S. Augustine dyed the third moneth of the siege, the fourth yeare of his ministry, in that City, and the 76. of his age, hauing both scene and felt those tragicall desolations, in the desolate estate of the Church, afflicted then in diuers parts of the world by these Barbarians. Theodosius the second, the sonne of Arcadius, a good and a wise Prince, did his best endeour to stop the course of this last shipwrack, but hee preuailed not. The insolencie of Valentinian the third (a Prince extremely vicious) thrust it headlong, and the ill government of his seruants, namely of Bonifacius gouernour of Affricke, and of Aetius gouernour of Gaul (called in the Barbarians, to the subuersion of the Empire: who to be reuenged one of another, (being capitall enemies, for the ialousie of their greatnesse) did what they could to ruine their maister.

MEROVEE

MEROVEE the third King of France, who gaue the name and greatest grace to this first race.

Meroovee fees footing into France.

Meroovee, sonne, or the nearest kinsman to Clodion, succeeded to the Crowne, as well by vertue of the fundamentall lawe of state, as by the free Election of the French, in the yeare 451.

He was farre more happy then Clodion: for he not onely effected his desire in passing the Rhin, and taking footing in Gaule: but did happily extend the limits of his new kingdom further. And the same Ætius which crossed Clodion, made the way easie for Meroovee vna-uares, for the execution of his enterprise, by this occasion: Ætius fell in disgrace with Honorius his maister, being greued to see the great successe of the Goths, Vandales and other barbarous nations in the Empire, imputing the fault vnto his seruants and officers. Thus growing iealous, hee calles him from his government of Gaule, and sends Castinus in his place, who was not onely vnaacquainted with the estate of the Gaules, but was also discontented with Bonifacius gouernour of Affricke, with whome he had commandement to ioyne his forces, to oppose against the common enemies of the Romaines. During those actions, Honorius died, leaving Theodosius in the East, and Valentinian in the West, two yong princes of diuers humors.

Meroovee imbracing this occasion with great dexterity, founds the hearts of his neighbors the Gaulois, and finds them disposed to his denotion. He rayseth an army, passeth the Rhine, takes Treues at the first comming, and then Argentin, (which is now called Strasbogh) with the Countries adioyning to it. Hee extends euen vnto Cambresie and Tournay, and proceeding farther into Gaule, hee seised on the best Cities of Champagne, with so great expedition, as no Romaine appeared to stop the course of his victory.

A victory. Valentinian aduertised of this successe, called back Ætius, to quench this fire, sending him into Gaule with an armie against the French: but there was other worke prepared for him, for Attila King of the Huns, (who named himselfe the Scourge of God, to chastise the Empire) hauing assembled an incredible number of men in the desarts of Asia, (being five hundred thousand souldiars) fallies downe like a furious deluge, spoiling all the countries where he passed: and hauing crossed through Poland into Germanie, and passed the Rhin, he threatened to invade France, a country desired by all these nations, for her fertilitie and beauty. Ætius had no shorter course, nor better meates to auoyde this storme, then to become friends with the French, and with all the other possessors of Gaule, who were threatened by this common storme: so as in steed of warre, he made a peace with Meroovee, vpon this extremitie.

Attila entred Gaule, and aduanced so farre, that hee besieged Orleans, (where Auian liued then, a most famous Bishop, who did greatly comfort the besieged by his piety and wisdom) whilst that the forces of their confederate friends assembled, by the meanes of Ætius, the Romaines, French, Gothes, and Bourguignons. Orleans being at the point to yeeld, Thierry King of the Goths arriues so happily, as he forceth Attila to raise his siege, & to take another course. Attila marching away with this vaste body of an armie, he was pursued speedily by Ætius and his confederates, who ouertooke him in the fields of Catalauna, the which is diuersly taken, either for the country about Chalons, or about Tholouse. The battaile was giuen, and the combate was furious, but the check fell vpon the Huns, who lost (as it is constantly written) 180000. fighting men, and the victorie remained in commun to the Romaines, French, and Goths: but the triumph and honour to Meroovee and his men, who fought very valiantly. Thierry King of the Goths, was slaine very happily, to make the way easie for Meroovee.

It was propounded in counsell, to pursue Attila, but Ætius would not yeeld thereto, so as Attila saued himselfe, being beaten, but not vanquished: for with the same forces he seized vpon a great part of Pannonia the happy, whence in the end came the name of Hongarie, although after the death of Attila, who did but lay the leuain, and his posterity finished what he had begun. A question is made, what moued Ætius to leaue Attila halfe vanquished. The reliques of his discomfited army were not small, after so great a losse: so as it seemed best not to force him to despaire, seeing there is but one onely helpe for the vanquished, not to hope for helpe. Ætius might also haue giuen this aduise, by reason of his realousie against the French, who should haue reaped an ouerplus of greatnesse by the absolute ouerthrow of this Barbarian. But with what intention soeuer he did it, it succeded ill for himselfe, for Valentinian his maister was so discontented with him, as he caused him to be slaine, depriving himselfe of a sufficient and faithfull seruant: and (as one reproched it vnto him) hee had cut off his right hand with his left. In the meane time Meroovees affaires succeeded well in all places: hee had wonne much reputation: hee was feared of the Romaines, honoured of the Gaules, and respected and beloued of all men. Thierry King of the Goths, gaue him place by his death, with whom the Romaines might haue ioynd: and his greatest opposition, was the wisdom and valour of Ætius, the which did no more check him.

Thus the prouidence of God (which meant to vse him for the building of this Monarchie,) made way for him euery where. Hee likewise knew how to imbrace all these opportunities with such dexterity, that taking hold of all occasions, hee entred the country, taking possession of Paris, Sens, Orleans, and the neigbour Prouinces, with the consent of the inhabitants; and ioyning these with the rest, hee wonne the Gaules, with so good vsage, as he was held worthy to command ouer them: & so without any contention, he began to frame the body of an Estate, calling France (by the name of his ancient country) the country of Gaules, being newly brought vnder his obedience. Hereby we may see, whether it be likely that Valentinian gaue the French their libertie, for recompence of this notable seruice: and that from thence they began to be called Frenchmen, that is to say, Franc and free, as some writes, not well obseruing the Romaine History, whence these Romaine obseruations should wish reason be drawne.

The estate of
the Church.

Such was the valour, wisdom and happinesse of this great and worthy Prince, who with great reason gaue his name to this first race, called Merouingiens, to aduow him the principall pillar of their establishment. He began to raigne the yeare 451. and ruled ten yeares onely, not omitting one houre to do well. In his time there chanced notable accidents in the Church. As on the one side the Barbarians dismembred the State, so the heretikes troubled the Church by their monstrous innouations, sprung vp against the truth of the ancient & Catholike doctrine: and their chiefe practises were against the sonne of God. Nestorius diuided the Natures: Eutiches did confound them: Theodosius the second, assembled a generall Councell at Ephesus, against Nestorius and Masarian his successor: another at Chalcedon against Eutiches. There were likewise Synods at Orange, Valence, Carpantras, Arles, Tours, and Venise, for diuers necessities of the Church, the which order and discipline might remedy. Cyrillus and Theodoret liued in those times, great personages, and worthy defenders of the truth.

CHILDERIC, or CHILPERIC, first King of that name, the 4. King of France,
In some Copies HISPERIC.

THe French and the Gaules being thus vnitd, they choose Chilperic the sonne of Merouee for their King, with great solemnitie, being the first assembly of this new people, consisting of two nations, and installed him, according to their ancient maner (raising him vpon a Targer) they carried him about the assembly. Hee began to rule in the yeare 461. and raigned xxx. yeares. A Prince noted in diuerse examples, both in his life and gouernment: for in the beginning he was vicious and vnfortunate, but being reclaimed by affliction (hauing changed his life) good hap did accompany him in the end of his dayes. At his coming to

A to the Crowne, he did greatly abuse his authoritie, in oppressing of his subiects, with excessiue taxes, rauishing the wiues, and daughters of the French: who seeing themselves ill intreated in their goods and honours, they assemble, and resolute to expell Chilperic, as vnworthy to reigne, and to call in Gillon a Romaine for their King, who gouerned in Gaulle for the Romaines, and held his seate at Soissons. The hate and contempt of the subiects against their Kings, is a great meanes to blemish their authoritie. The vices of Chilperic bred this discontent in the French, and the scourge was readie to chastice him, though not to ruine him.

Chilperic (not able to oppose himselfe against this common consent) giues place, by the Councell of Guyemans a man of great account, who promised him to bee his true friend in his affliction, and to vse his best endeouours to pacifie the French, being incensed against him, and to cause him to bee recalled. To this end, hee takes a token from Guyemans, for the more secret treating in his absence. The token was a peece of a gold ring, whereof either of them tooke a moitie. This done Chilperic, retires himselfe into Turinge, to King Basin his deere friend and kinsman, expecting better fortune. Guyemans proceeds with such dexteritie, as creeping into fauour with this new King, and keeping his credit with the French, hee makes himselfe fit to effect his purpose, both by the one and the other. The issue answereth the proicct. Hauing plausible audience with Gillon, hee aduiseeth him, that to get authoritie among his subiects, hee must inure them to obedience: and therefore hee must not forbear to lay publike charges vpon them, else they would contemne him, and in the end insult ouer him, if in time hee did not accustome them to beare the yoke of his new authoritie. According to this aduise, the King (vnacquainted with the humour of the French,) imposeth taxes contrary to custome, and doubles charge vpon charge. The same fire which had inflamed the French against Chilperic, incensed them presently against Gillon. For (say they,) to what end should this newe maister become a tyrant? We can dispossesse him with the like facilitie that we haue made him. Thus they generally complaine, euerie one (according to the credit hee hath with the people) cries out, that they must preuent this mischief. Such as were the motiues and instruments to expell Chilperic, are not the last to complaine. Guyemans doth secretly aduertise Gillon, that the meanes to auoid the danger which Chilperic fell into, was to preuent this practise in the breeding, and to put the principall authors thereof to death, as the ringleaders of rebellion. Gillon entertaines this aduise: he puts them to death that were the instruments of Chilperics disgrace. And so with one stone giues two stroakes. He take them away that might frustrate his desseine, and disposeth the Frenchmens hearts to desire their ancient King. And thus he makes the way for Chilperics returne, by a very happie dexteritie, and the client was answerable. Gillon (hauing put these aforenamed to death) became very odious to the French. Guyemans abandons Gillon, and cunningly embraceth this occasion, in fauour of Chilperic. He blames the French for their lightnes, to haue expelled their naturall Lord, and recuiet a stranger farre more insupportable. Thus he makes them resolute to call home Chilperic: who vnderstanding their desire, and seeing the peece of gold (the token of his returne) sent by his faithfull friend, returnes confidently into France: he is received by the French, and by their ayd forceth Gillon to resigne him the place, and to retire himselfe to Soissons. Such was the first part of Chilperics life. The last was of another temper: for being taught by himselfe, he was so addicted to do good, as he got the good will of the French, of whome he was beloued, honoured, and obeyed all the rest of his life. So as to good minds capable of reason, affliction serues as a chastisement, and not for a ruine: for an instruction, and not a destruction. Hee did fight happily against Odoacre King of the Saxons, subdued the Germans, woon a great coutry along the Rhin. He added to this State the Country of Aniou, hauing forced the citie of Angiers: and to make absolute his happines, hee had one sonne, who augmented and assured his Realme. They only obserue one notable error committed after his returne, in taking Basine to wife, being the wife of Basin King of Turinge, who had courteously entertained him in his distresse, violating the sacred lawes of hospitalitie, suffering himselfe

585. selfe to be abused with the loue of a woman, accounted a witch: for they say, this woman (who had forsaken her husband for him) was a witch, causing him to see a vision the first night of their vnlawfull marriage, the which did represent the state of the succeeding kingdome, by lions, vnicornes, leopards, the which appeared first in this vision, then by beares, and wolues: And lastly by catter, dogges, and other small beasts, the which did teare one another in sunder. You must pardon these fables of antiquity, (bred as it seemes long after) by the which she would represent the estate of the three races, according to their diuerse occurrents. Chilperie hauing liued thus, and reigned thirtie yeares, he left Clouis his sonne for successor and heire of one of the goodliest and bewtifullest pyllers of the French Monarchie as shall appeare by the following discourse.

CLouis the 1. the 5. King of France. and the first Christian King.

CLOVIS, succeeding his father Chilperie, was installed in the Royaltie, by the French, according to their ancient custome, borne vpon a target in open assembly. Hee began to reigne the yeare 485. and reigned thirtie yeares. Hee had scarce attained to the age of fiftene yeares, when as he mounted to the royall throne. A yong man of great hope, borne for the stablishment of this monarchie. His forefathers had layed the foundation, but he did build vpon these goodly beginnings with to great valour, wisdom, and good fortune, as he is to be held for one of the greatest Architects of this estate, hauing had the honour to be the first King of France that receiued the Christian religion, the greatest beautie of this Crowne: and a priuilege so carefully planted by his successors, as they haue purchased the title of most Christian, as a marke of their chiefest greameffe. The progresse of the Historie will shew both his vertues, and vices. But at this entrie, his mind being guided to so great a worke, (whereunto the wise prouidence of almighty God had appointed him) fortifieth

A fortifies it selfe, the first fve yeares of his raigne, (being the time of his apprenticeship) 485. before he vndertooke any thing, the which hee did manage so discreetly, embracing all occasions that were offered, as in the end hee thought himselfe able to subdue all Gaule, if God had not stayed the ambitious course of his vnmearurable desires, to shew vnto great personages, that hee reserues a Soueraigne prerogatiue ouer all their enterprises.

We haue said before, that in the dissipation of the Empire, the Gauls had many vsurpers, Bourguignons, Goths, and Frenchmen: the Romains had the least part, for hardly could they keepe Soissons, Compiene, Senlis, and other small townes thereabouts. The Bourguignons enioyed a great countrie, the two Bourgongnes, the Duchie and the Earledome, Sauoy, Lyonnois, Forests, Beauuolais, Daulphiné, and Prouence, Arles being the Metropolitan City of the Realme. The Goths possessed all Gaule Narbonnoise, to the which they gaue the name, and all Guyenne with the appertenance. The French had the best part, from the Rhin vnto Loire, embracing all the rich Provinces of the Lowe countries vnto the Ocean, the countries of Heynault, Cambre, Picardie, Normandie, the Ile of France, Maine, Antou, Touraine, Vandenois, the province of Orleans, Beauue, Hurepois, Gastinois, Soigone, Berry, and the neighbour countries, although these great and large territories had particular Lords, amongst the which the King was acknowledged for Soueraigne. Such was the state of Gaule, when as Clouis vndertooke the helme of this French monarchie.

C To become absolute Maister of this goodly country, which was set to sale to the mightiest: he begins with the weakest, the neerest, and him with whom hee had the most apparent shew of quarrell: which was the Romane, who held nothing of this great name, but the shew and pride, in a weaknesse altogether contemptible. Siagrius sonne to that Gyles of whom we haue spoken, commanded at Soissons for the Romans. Clouis had an hereditarie quarrell against him, hauing sought to viurpe his estate, irreconcilable quarrels among Princes. Hauing so goodly a shew to demand reason for so notable a wrong, he defies him. They assemble their forces: Clouis calles to his aide Ragnachaire, the petty King of Cambray, and Chararic of Amyens: the first assists him, the other excuseth, being desirous to keepe the stakes, and to be a looker on, and then D to toyne with the stronger. Siagrius is overcome in battell. In this ouerthrow he leaues his estate to Clouis, and flies to Alarie King of the Goths, being at Tholouze. Clouis not content with Siagrius goods, demands his person of Alarie, and obtaines it. Siagrius is sent vnto him, his hands and feet bound. Hauing him in his power, he makes him taste the griefe of his misery, reproching him that he had basely lost his gouernment, & deserved capitall punishment, and so he cuts off his head: afterwards he suppressed Chararic, and Ragnachaire, vpon diuerse occasions. Hauing seized vpon all that be'onged to the Romane name, he turned his resolutions against the Bourguignons and the Goths, but with an industry fitting so politike a head, seeking some colour of iustice, he makes a league of peace with the two nations, to pick a caule of quarrell, hauing some controuersie with their Kings, for some title in shew lawfull. The issue is answerable to his desseigne, for he knew so well how to obserue times, watch for occurrences, & creepe so cunningly into their affaires, as in the end hee dispossessed them both.

In the house of Bourgondie there were foure brethren, Gondebault, Gondegesil, Chilperie and Gothemar, the children of Gondioch. The iealousie of their portions thrusts them into choller, and the fury of couetousnesse polluted the hands of Gondebault the elder with the parricide of his yonger brother Chilperie, and of his wife, but God preferred Clotilde from the crueltie of this man, being the daughter of Chilperie, to be the meanes of this murderers misery. She was exceeding faire: this qualitie bred a desire in Clouis, but especially to get footing in Bourgondie, and some interest to deale with the affaires of that state. And for that reason Gondebault would by no meanes like of that alliance: yet not daring to shew the true cause, he made the pretext of his resuall to be the diuersity of religion, which could not agree with these vnequall mariages. Clouis preuented it with great policy, for hauing promised Clotilde that she should haue liber-tie of Conscience, he remoues the lee wherewith Gondebault did crosse him: so as the marriage was concluded. And although Clouis were a Pagan by profession, yet was he no enemy to the Christians, sitting himselfe to the humour of the Gauls, who generally followed the Christian religion. He suffred his wife likewise to baptise her children: and she a wife Princeesse insinuating with her husband, desired nothing more then to vntune him vnto God, the which chaunced in this sort. Clouis did succore the Sicambrians his allies, (which bee the inhabitants of Guedres and Iuliers) against the Germanes. Being in the battell, he found himselfe engaged in the midst of his enemies troupes and in great danger of his life. He then makes a vowe vnto God, that if he would giue him the victory, hee would presently submit himselfe to the Christian Church, and be baptised. God heard him. He obtains the victory, and being returned, he resolues to performe his vowe. His wife Clotilde infinitely glad of this holy resolution, sends for Saint Remy Bishop of Rheims, (a man of great pietie and eloquence) to instruct him in the true doctrine, wherein he was very ignorant, as a man that had made profession of armes all his life, borne and bred in superstition, and neuer had discomfited of Christian religion, but like a souldiar. It was necessary he should be instructed by a discrete man, that in leauing the vanity of Pagans, he were not infected with the errors of Arrians, which then were dispersed in diuerse places. And euen his owne sister Lantilde was infected therewith.

Clouis becomes a Christian.

The preaching of Saint Remy had great efficacy with Clouis: and the example of Clouis with all his men of warre. In this action, the good sayings are worthy to be noted. Bend thy neck to the yoke in mildenes. (saith Saint Remy to Clouis) worship that which thou hast burnt, and burne that which thou hast worshipped. And hee answereth, I worship the true God which is the father, the sonne and the holy ghost, the Creator of heauen and earth. So, being baptised, he exhorts his men to the same beleefe. They cry alioynly: We leaue our morall Gods, and are ready to follow the immortal. So Clouis was baptised at Rheims by Saint Remy, with great solemnity, and with him 3000. of his souldiars, to the incredible ioy of the Gauls, greatly affected to Christ an religion: hoping by this conuersion to haue better vltage in time to come.

This acte is very remarkable, hauing consecrated our Kings to Christian religion, the which hath preiudiced this Realme vnto this day from most horrible confusions. Amatus saith, that a dove brought a viall full of oile in her bill, at that instant, with the which our Kings are annoynted, when they are installed. But Gregory of Tours, a more ancient Author, writes onely, that Clouis was baptised. They likewise hold, that Clouis did at that time chaunge the royall armes, and that for three toades, or as the learned say, three diademes guenies, in a field at ge, he tooke the flowers de-lis without number. Many monuments of our Kings in the first and second race, iustifie this chaunge of Armories, made by Clouis, as we see them in the most ancient Temple. Without dilating any more therof, Charles the 6. in the Scutcheon of France, reduced the flowers de-lis to three.

Religion the only true bond of Citidians.

Gauls called France.

Humility mercifullous.

This publique profession of Christianity won the hearts of all the Gauls vnto Clouis, and did perfect the vnion betwixt them and the French, making their yoke easie, and then tractable. He fortified his commaunde with this bond of religion, and layed a foundation for the absolute greatnesse of this Monarchie, which euen then beganne to take place, through out all Gauls. Thus Gauls (with more solemnity then vnder Merouee) was called France, by the common consent of all nations: the Gauls were no more grieued to serue the French, being victors: hauing willingly suffred themselves to be conquered, & hauing one faith & one lawe, they could not but wish the good of their common Country: so much may religion preuaile to vntune mens hearts in a common weale. In this beginning Clouis shewed an excellent fruite of his baptisme, exceeding all his conquests. By his last victory he had subdued the Germanes, & to accustome them to obedience, had imposed great & rigorous burthens. But now he doth relieue them, sends home their hostages, & moderates their yoke, shewing thereby that he is growne milder. This humanity was approued as a second victory, & more honorable then the first.

A Truly it is as great a victory in a great Prince, to conquer by clemencie, as it is a profitable policie to winne mens hearts by reason. The Conquerour that pardons, beautifies his triumph, adding to their conquered bodies their hearts, admiring his vertue no lesse victorious then his forces.

Clouis was ill affected to the Visigoths, who held a great and large Countrie in Gauls, obscuring the French Monarchie, the which hee desired to establish: but hee must finde some honest pretext to make warre. Although in effect the right of conuencencie was his greatest interest, as it is often the most lawfull title of Princes: yet hee seekes a quarell against Alaric King of the Visigoths, vpon the alliance he had made with him, the which (he sayes) had bene broken, for that the banished men and male-

B factors of France, had found a free and assured refuge in his dominions: wherevnto he added a complaint of their bounds, in the diuision whereof he would resolutely haue the aduantage. But to giue a better colour to this quarrell of State, hee ioynes religion: For (saith he to his people) to what end should these Arrians haue so good a part among the Christians. Yet before he would come to open force, he talks of a friendly conference. The two Kings appoint a day and a place for an enterview, to parlee of their affaires. But this meeting increased their hatred: for being both vpon the place, some confident seruants to Clouis, gaue him notice, that Alaric had laide an Ambuscadoe, to surprize him in their parle. Clouis was much moued with this, and resolues to make warre against Alaric: hee raiseth an armie, and beeing ready to marche towards Guyenne, behold a new occasion, which makes him turne his forces towards Bourgogne.

Warre against the Visigoths.

We haue shewed, how that Gondebault King of Bourgogne, slue his brother Chilperic, father to Clotilde, vpon the first diuision of their portions, after their fathers death. Hee had two bretheren remaining, Gondemar and Gondegisil, of whom he desired infinitely to bee freed, hauing too many bretheren, and too little land, according to his vnfatiable desire. Their debate was for Prouence and Daulphiné, which they demanded for their portions. Gondebault enioyed the chiefe Cities, except Vienne, which the bretheren held. Clouis his Armie ouercomes that of Gondebault, marching victoriously through the Countrie of Venaïson, where the battell was fought. Gondebault saues D himselfe with great difficultie in Auignon, and is presently besieged by Clouis, who yet grants him an honourable composition, and labours to reconcile him with his bretheren: which done, he returnes into France, and Gondemar and Gondegisil retire into Vienne, dreaming of nothing lesse then to haue their elder brother for an enemy. But Vienne must be the pitte-fall of their misery, to swallow them both vp, one after another: for behold, Gondebault is with a strong armie at the gates of Vienne: and his bretheren are reduced to that extremitie, as hauing no meanes to defend themselves, nor to get reliefe from their friends, the City is easily taken, and euery man seekes to saue himselfe as he can. Gondemar flies into a Tower, where he is besieged, assailed, and burnt, with all his troupe. Gondegisil, is taken aliue after this tragick feare, but being alone, he slippes away, and flies to Clouis, whome hee found in Armes ready to march vpon this new accident.

Warres in Bourgogne, and why.

Clouis takes new aduise. The ancient hatred he bare to Gondebault: (who had crossefied him in his marriage,) the iniustice and more then barbarous crueltie: the complaint of this poore Prince his ally, who cast himselfe into his armes, had much power to perswade him to the voyage of Bourgogne. But that which made him resolute, was for that Gondebault prepared to succour Alaric, against whom Clouis did now march with his forces. Thus the iust iudgement of God provided a scourge for this murderer, who adds rashnesse and insolencie to his first disorders. Clouis enters with an armie into Bourgogne. Feare doth not onely surprize the countrie, but also the peoples iust hatred of this tyrant, being infamous with so many parricides: so as in few dayes the principall Cities yeeld vnto Clouis, and the rest are ready to submit themselves into his hands, as to their deliuerer.

Gondebault pursued by God and men, faintes, being insolent in prosperitie, and daunted daunted in aduersitie. All things conspired to his ruine. But as God doth not alwaies A take sinners at the rebound, hee stayed the blow by meanes of Clotilde, who grieuing to see her house decay, to the overthrowe of the state of Bourgogne, makes intercession to her husband, for her vnkle and his Countrie, and preuailes so with him, through her intercession, as shee perswades him to passe no further, but to leaue the rest to her vnkle Gondebault, with a reasonable peace, whereof she drew the articles. Thus Clouis dismisseth his armie, hauing onely provided for the gard of Vienne, Mascon, Chaalon and other Townes taken from Gondebault; and hee giues the charge of them to Gondegisil.

A treacherous attempt of Gondebault.

This is all that Gondebault could hope for in so great a danger; but he would needes B perish, when as he sees himselfe without any enemy. By Clouis departure, he marcheth so secretly with his forces, as in one night he surpriseth Vienne, by the Conduit heads, guided by him that had them in charge, being cast out of the Citie, with the scumme of vnprofitable people. Vienne must bee the Sepulchre of Gondegisil, as it was of Gondemar: for in this vnexpected surpris, as he and the Bishop sought meanes to saue themselves in the temple of Saint Mary, amazement giues an easie entrie vnto Gondebault, who being master thereof, doth massacre both Gondegisil his brother, and the Bishop, without any respect.

A iust punishment of the murderer Gondebault.

Clouis moued with this treacherous attempt, returnes with his armie, and besiegeth Gondebault, who vnable to resist, escapeth by night, and saues himselfe in Italie, with Thierry, King of the Ostrogoths, his friend and confederate. They being tor- C mented in conscience, without all hope of releefe, hee falls into horrible dispaire, and dyes, hatefull euen to those that had receiued him: leauing a notable example to all men, that man is the cause of his owne miserie, that hee deceiueth himselfe, when as ouerruled by his owne passion, hee thinks to mocke God freely, who sleepes not, when as men are most secure in their wickednesse. But after a long patience, God payes both the principall, and the interest, and hee that seekes an other mans goods, doth often loose his owne, the halfe being better then the whole, for to liue quietly with content. This was the end of Gondebault, and the beginning of the title which the Kings of France pretended to Bourgogne. The D States of Provence, Dauphiné, and Sauoy were dependances on this Crowne. Clouis reueyning Dauphiné and the Countreies adioyning vnto Bourgogne, he left Sauoy, and Provence to Sigismond and Gondemar the children of Gondebault, ioyning equitie and mildnes to his iust victorie.

The first winning of Bengale, Dauphnisme, and Provence.

Hauing thus settled the affaires of Bourgogne, he marcheth presently with his victorious armie into Languedoc, against Alarie King of the Visigoths, who held not onely that goodly Prouince, but all the Countrie from the Pirenee mountaines, euen to the banks of Rosne and Loire, as wee haue sayd. Clouis hauing assembled his armie at Tours, marcheth into Poitou, where Alarie attends him with his forces, meaning to fight with him at his entrie. The battaile is giuen, and much blood E shed on either side, but the absolute victorie remaines to Clouis: as the bodies, the field, and the head of Alarie, whome hee slew with his owne hand: an accident very remarkable, that one Prince should kill another with his sword in hand in the fury of the fight. This happened in the yeare 509.

Alarie slaine
by the hand of Clouis.

The fruit of this notable victorie was so great, as all yielded to Clouis, where hee marched. Those of Argoulaine made shew of resistance: but a great parte of the wall being fallen, (as it were miraculously) not onely the Citie yielded, but all the Countrie, being terrified, offered their voluntarie obedience vnto Clouis: as if God (holding him by the hand) had put him in possession of all that Prouince, as the lawfull heire. Auvergne makes some shew to resist, but in the end it yeelds with all the Citie of the Prouince. In this generall reuolt against the Visigoths, Almaric the sonne of Alarie gathers a new head in the Countreies of his obedience, with wonderfull speed. Clouis seekes him out, and finds him nere to Bordeaux. The battaile is fought, and the slaughter great on either side: the one armie fights for honour,

504.

A nour, and the other for life, and goods. But Clouis remains conquerour, who in detestation of his enemy, calles the place the Arrien field; which name continues vnto this day. Almaric flies to Thierry his confederate, King of the Ostrogoths in Italy, with an intent to returne speedily to be reuenged of Clouis. All the countrie remains peaceable to Clouis: yea Tholouse the capitall Citie of the Goths kingdome. And thus he returnes, leauing a part of his army in garrison in the Citie of his new conquest, vnder his sonnes command: and in his Standard (as a trophie,) he carried for a deuote, Veni, vidi, vici, I came, and saw, and ouercame, like vnto Cesar. This great conquest gotten with incredible celeritie, and admirable successe, is a worthy prooffe of Gods providence, who disposeth of States according to his wife and iust pleasure, pulling B downe one, and raising vp another.

Thus Clouis hauing expelled the remainder of the Romaines, seized on the Bourgognons estate, and the Visigoths: remaining in a maner absolute Lord of the Gaules, vnder the title of the Realme of France. Hee desired much to liue at Tours, (as indeed it is the goodly garden of France;) but seeking to giue a perfect forme to this new estate, (as one head hath but one body) hee chooseth Paris for his capitall Citie, being searted in the Ile of France, and the true mansion of Kings, as well for the fertile beauty of the Countrie thereabout, as for the concourse of Riuer, which bring infinite commodities from all parts, by the channell of the Riuer of Seine, into the which all the rest fall, as the common store-house of all commodities. Thus Paris from small beginnings C (as may be noted by the lowe buildings and narrow streetes of the Ile, being the first plotte) is growne to a wonderfull greatnesse, being the head Citie of all the Realme.

The brute of Clouis force, spread ouer all, with a great renoune of his valour, moued Anastasijs Emperour of the East, to desire his friendship: although hee had more reason to be his enemy, hauing dispossessed him of his ancient inheritance. Thus the Empire declined, flitting his most dangerous enemies, against whom he should oppose himselfe. Hee salutes him with a very honourable Ambassage, sends him a Senators robe, the priuilege of a Patrician and Cittizen of Rome, and the dignity of a Consull: in signe of the honour his successours should haue, to bee Emperours, and D to preferue the reliques of the Empire from a generall shipwrack. Clouis entertained Anastasijs Ambassadors with honour and bounty, desirous to ouercome them with civilitie, as well as by the valour of his victorious armes.

The Emperour sends Ambassadors
to Clouis.

The violent course of Clouis victories seemed vnresistible: but behold an vnexpected enemy, not onely stayes him suddenly, but takes from him the greatest part of his new conquests, defeats his Armie, and drawes him into danger neuer to performe any thing worthily. The nation of the Gothes was then very great, being dispersed in diuerse parts: in Gaul, Italy, and Spaine, so as one people issued from the same beginning (as we haue sayd) was distinguished by diuerse names, to marke the places of their severall abodes. The Visigoths or rather Westgoths, were they that dwelt in the E West, that is to say in Gaul, vnto Italy: the Ostrogoths or Eastgoths possessed Italy, by consequence East to Gaul. These Eastgoths had done great and notable exploits in Italy, taken and sackt Rome, and hauing seized on the goodlyest Countreies of Italy, had there established a Kingdome vnder their name, the which was ruined by the Lombards, and the Lombards by the French, as wee shall see in the continuance of this history.

Clouis being conquerour
is conquered.

These Goths (named Getes by the Greekes) an ancient people of Asia, scattered themselves first along the riuer of Danubie, entring the Countrie nere to Constantinople, as well on the maine land, as in the Taurique Chersonese, nere to this quarter.
And so extending their limits, did possesse Valachie and Hongarie, and in the end
F Scandina, and the Countrie which lies nere the Riuer of Vistula, in the Countrie of Sueden towards the Baltique Sea: where they made their last retreat, after many losses, receiued in many places, in seeking of their fortunes. The Realme of Gothie carries

510. carries their name euen vnto this day. I thought good by the way, to note the estate A of the Goths fit for this subiect. Thus the successe of the French forces, and the alliance so carefully sought by the Emperour, (a capitall enemy to the Gothike name,) did easily moue Thierry king of the East-goths, to succour his kinsman Almarick, a prince spoiled of his possessions: whose example did sollicite all the Goths to preuent the danger, which did threaten them very neere. So as from Italie, Sicile, Sclauonia, and Dalmatia, by his owne meanes, and the credit of his friends, he gathers together fourescore thousand fighting men, the which he giues to Ibba to leade, against Clouis: and he himselfe remains in Italie, to make head against the Emperours desseins, least hee should cause some diuision in fauour of Clouis his confederate. The Gothike armie enters by Piedmont, takes Grace and Antibou, and in short time, all Prouence obeyes him.

A great losse both of Provinces and men.

The people of Languedoc (louing their old maisters, and not able to indure the infolencie of a new) yeeld easily to the stronger. Prouence remains thus to the East-goths, and Languedoc returns to the Vuisgoths: Clouis being brought a sleepe with the imagination of a generall triumphe, awakes at this brute: hee armes, and marcheth speedily against the enemy: hee is beaten, and loofeth 30000. men, at this encounter: whereby it appeared, that he held not victoires at his girdle, nor they proceeded not from his valour. Clouis who vanquished euery where, finding himselfe beaten, and not able presently to make head against a victorious enemy, returns into France, rather mad then transported with furious choller, tossing in his braynes how to be reuenged of so notable a disgrace. The Goths giue him leaue to runne and take cold, being content to haue recovered their owne. After this he attempted no more against them, and the greatest part of Bourgogne returned to the children of Gondebauld. But in the end, both Prouence and Bourgogne shall bee incorporated to the Crowne, by diuerse accidents, the which we will note in diuerse places.

Clouis: cruell practises to become great

Clouis suruiued fise yeares after all these losses, remaining commonly at Paris, hauing no heroicke mind, to attempt any great conquests, yet of a cruell disposition, which made him die with desire of other mens goods. Hee employed all his wits to put his kinsmen to death, hauing some teigneuries included within the compasse of his great monarchie, with an imagination to leaue his children a great estate vnted. In this desseine, he puts to death Chararic, to haue Amyens: Ragnachaire, to become maister of Cambray: and Sigibert, to haue no companion at Mets, although he were acknowledged in all these places for foueraigne. This ranshing of other mens goods was vnexcusable, but his tragickall proceedings to haue it, was more detestable. I tremble to present the horror of these execrable crimes: you may reade them in the originall of Gregorie of Tours. The truth of the historie requires they should bee registred, but reason would haue the memory of so dangerous examples buried in obliuion. I desire to be dispensed withall, if I discourtie not of these monstrous enormities. A modest tragedie goares not the scafold with the blood of Iphigenia, being content to report by a messenger, that she was slaine by her fathers comand, drawing a curtaine to hide the blood. But if any one will vrge me with the debt which a historie doth owe, E I will say that Clouis caused Chararic to be slaine, hauing seized on him and his sonne, and condemned them to monastery. As they were cutting of their haire, the sonne seeing his father weepe bitterly, said: These greene branches will grow againe: (meaning, the haire they cut off) for the stocke is not dead: but God will suffer him to pe- rish that causeth them to be cut off. Clouis aduertised of this free speech. They com- plainne for the losse of their haire: (sayes hee) let their heads bee cut off. And so they were both put to death. To get Ragnachaire (who had faithfully serued him both against Siagrius, and in all his other enterprises) hee corrupted some of his domestickall seruaunts, with promise of great rewards, in token wherof he sent them bracelets of lat- ten guilt. These traitors bring him Ranachaire and his brother with their hands and feete bound. Hee beholding them: Outcasts (sayth hee) of our race, unworthie of the blood of Merouee, are you not ashamed to suffer your selues to be thus bound? you are un- worthy to liue: repay the dishonour you haue done to our blood with your bloods: and so gaue

Horrible murders com- mitted by Clouis.

A gaue to cyther of them great blowes with a Battell Axe which he held in his hand, and slue them both, in the presence of his Captaines and Councell. But when the Traytors demanded their reward, and complained of his Bracelets: Auant (sayth he) Traitors, is it not enough that I suffer you to liue? I loue the treason, but I hate Traytors. But the last exceeds the rest. Hee perswades the sonne of Sigibert to kill his father. This infamous parricide murders him, and returns to Clouis, to put him in possession of his treasures, whom he had thus massacred: who being in the chamber, and bend- ing downe into a Chest, to draw forth bagges full of gold, hee caused his bracelets to be beaten out, and being the stronger, seized on Mets, making a good thew to the peo- ple, as ignorant of this murder.

B Thus Clouis liued: thus he reigned, and thus he dyed, in the yeare of our Lord 514. of the age of 45. the thirtieth yeare of his reigne, in the flower of his enterprises, in the City of Paris. A Prince whom we must put in ballance, to counterpeise his vertues with his vices: valiant, politick, colde, wise, temperate, diligent in execution, of admit- table authoritie, and indued with excellent politicke vertues, fit for an estate. Con- trarywise, hee was extremely couetous, ambitious, wilfull, cruell, bloody, infinitely giuen to the world, immortalizing his good hap in this mortall life, by his many en- terprises, the which hee feared not to execute with the losse of other mens goods and liues. We must not wonder, if we read of confusions in the following reignes: wherein we shall first see blood for blood, and the robber robbed, spoiled, dispo- sed, according to the trueth of Oracles. Woe to thee that robbest, for thou shalt bee rob- bed: that killest, for thou shalt be killed: the same measure thou measurest, shall be mea- sured to thee againe.

The death of Clouis.

His vertues & his vices.

Vnder his reigne the Romane Empire vanished quite into the West, Spaine, Gaul, Italy, and Germany, were seized on by strange nations, retaining no markes of the Romane name. The East had yet some shewes of the Empire, whereof Constantinople was the seate. Leo, Zeno, Anastasius Emperours liued in those dayes, with many ene- mies, shame and losse. The Pope of Rome thrust himselfe forward amidst these The estate of the Church, confusions and ruines, recouering that which the Emperours had lost.

Leo, Hilarie, Simplicius, Felix, Gelasius, liued in those times, learned men. The Councell was held againe at Chalcedone, against Eutiches and Dioscorus.

THE

The 6. raigne vnder the foure sonnes of CLOVIS.

Childebert. Clotaire.
Clodamir. Thierry.

Who raigned together forty and two yeares, as Kings of France, yet with a particular title vnder this generall. but in the end Clotaire remayned King alone. And therefore their raignes are distinguished.

To this Coniunction of foure brethren some giue the sixt degree in the number of Kings, and Childebert as the eldest, beares the title.

C H I L D E B E R T the 6.
King of France

CLOVIS, his deffine was to rule alone in a great vnited Kingdome, A but he sees his resolutions fristrate: for this vaste bodie compounded of many peeces, is scarce vnited, but it is disioyned againe, yea in his lifetime. and the rest is diuided into foure parts to his children, according to the lawes of nature, but to the visible preiudice of the Estate, incompatible of so many maisters, as the following discourse will shewe. A lesson both for great and small, and a notable president of the vanity of humane enterprises: where the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning. They take great paines to settle a firme estate, which shalbe soone dismembered, either by lawe or force, and that shalbe dispersed sodeinly, which was gathered together too hastily.

Let

6. King of France.

A Let euery one consider, what hee leaues to his Children, for the which there is no warrantable caution, but a good title. These foure sonnes diuide the realme into foure Kingdomes. Childebert was King of Paris, and vnder this realme was comprehended the Prouinces of Poitou Maine, Touraine, Champagne, Anjou, Guyenne and Auvergne. Clotaire King of Soissons: and the dependances of this realme were Flemandois, Picardie, Flaunders, and Normandie. Clodamir King of Orleans: and the estates of this realme, were, all the Duchie of Orleans, Bourgogne, Lionois, Dauphiné, and Prouence. Thierry was King of Metz: and to his realme were subiect, the Countie of Lorraine, and all the Countiees from Rheims vnto the Rhin, and beyond it all Germany, which was the auncient patrimony of the Kings of France. Hee was receiued in this royall portion with his bretheren, although hee were a bastard, the which hath bene likewise practized by others in the first line. And as euery one of these foure Kings called himselfe King of France, so they also added the name of their principall City where they held their Court. Thus they called them by speciall title, Kings of the Citie where they had their residence. And in truth euery one caried himselfe as King in the Countiees vnder his obedience, nor acknowledging the elder, but by mouth onely.

As the plurality of Masters is a plague in an estate, so is it miraculous that the realme had not bene ruined by so many Kings: especially amidst such monstrous confusions, which then reigned, full of treacheries, cruelties, and parricides. I tremble to enter into this labyrinth, the which I will but passe ouer, measuring the Readers sorrowe by my griefe, in reading and writing these tragical confusions. But let vs observe things by order. After these foure brethren had peaceably made their diuisions, and taken lawes of their owne accord (in the yeare 511. according to the most approved calculation) they marry their sister Clotilde to Almaric, sonne to Alaric, King of the Vuisgoths, who had recovered a good part of Languedoc, the which Clouis had taken from his father, and by this marriage they yeld vnto him the Cittie of Toulouse. But this alliance was the cause of great diuisions, and ruine. Ambition and Couetousnes (good Counsellors of state) made euery one to conceiue as great a kingdome for himselfe as that of his father, perswading them to attempt any thing to bee great. D Bourgogne was quietly returned into the possession of Gondebaulds children, Sigismund had the name of King, as the elder, and Gondemar a portion.

Clodamir King of Orleans, as nearest neighbour, castes his eyes vpon this goodly Country, although hee had no cause of pretension, but onely conueniency. Yet hee findes a colour to beginne this quarrell. The rights pretended by his mother Clotilde, issued from the house of Bourgogne, and the zeale of Iustice, to chastise Sigismund, for that he had slaine his eldest sonne, to please his second wife and her Children. He enters into Bourgogne with a mighty army, seizeth on Sigismund, his wife and children, brings them to Orleans, and there castes them all into a well. Thus God punished the cruelty of Sigismund, an vnkinde father, by a cruell and disloyall hand. Clodamir presumed, that he had conquered all, hauing slayne the King of Bourgogne. But the Bourguignons, incensed with this crueltie, confirme Gondemar in his brothers seate, and leauy an army to defend him against Clodamir.

The armies ioyne. Clodamir putt vp with this first successe, promysing vnto himselfe a second triumph, thrusting himselfe rashely into his enemies troups, is slayne with a Lance, and is knowne by his long haire: the marke of Kings and Princes of the bloud, as wee haue said. The Bourguignons cut off his head, perch it on the top of a Lance, and make shewe thereof to the French, in derision: who retire themselues after the death of their Generall. But Childebert & Clotaire his brethren, returne into Bourgogne with a strong army, & force Gondemar to flie into Spaine, leauing them free possession of the realme, the which was their proiect, rather then the reuēge of their brothers death. Bourgogne was diuided among the brethren, as a cōmon prey: all the realme of Bourgogne was therein comprehended. Thierry King of Metz had his part, but the poore children of Clodamir are not only excluded, but two of them are barbarously slaine by the cruel commande-

Horrible confusion among brethren.

Clodamir takes, and is taken.

Cruelty of brethren.

CLOTAIRE the first, the seventh King of France.

CLOTAIRE remained alone King of France by the death of his brethren: for their children were dead, and Childebert the eldest dyed without issue. Behold the frute of so great pames, after their diuisions, to build great Monarchies. Clotaire reigned five yeares alone: he had by two wiues, five sonnes and one daughter, that is, Cherebert, Chilperic, Sigebert, Gontran, Gautier, and Clofide: not reckoning Gratus, whom he had by a Concubine. His raigne was short and wretched. He sought to extort the thids of all Ecclesiasticall liuings for his private affaires: but the Clergie opposed themselves against him, so as his threats preuailed not. In the beginning he subdued the Saxons, subiects to the French: but the Turingiens being vp in armes, and he about to suppress them, the Saxons ioyne with them, to withstand him with their common forces. Yet these mutinous nations (seeing themselves encountred by too strong a party) craue pardon, and promise him obedience. Clotaire refusing to accept it, forceth them to make defence: the which they performed so desperately, as they defeated the French: and Clotaire with great difficulty, saued himselfe.

It is an indiscretion for a Prince to thrust his subiects into despair.

An example for Princes, not to thrust their subiects into despair: but to embrace all occasions wisely, that may purchase a willing obedience, and not to seeke it by extremities. After this defeat, he returnes into France, and being at Compiègne, hee desires to go a hunting. Being old and decayed, he heats himselfe, falls into a quotidian and dies, the yeare 567. He was much grieued in his sicknes, for hauing liued too too ill: but he protested, that he hoped in the mercies of GOD. As our histories report.

8. King of France.

26

- A Before that he ruled as King alone, he erected the little realme of Tuetot, vpon this occasion. On a good Friday hee slewe Gawier of Tuetot his seruant, in the Chappell whereas he heard seruice. They report the cause diuersely. The greatest part hold, that the King had rauished his wife, lodging in his house, so as he that was beaten suffered the punishment. Pope Eugenius displeased with this infamous murder, condemned him to repaire the fault, vpon payne of excommunication. Clotaire for satisfaction ordeynes that from thenceforth the Lords of Tuetot should bee free from all homage, seruice, and obedience due to the King, for the land of Tuetot in the Countrey of Normandy. And so this small seigneury hath continued long with the title and prerogatiue of a Realme, vntill that this title of a realme was chaunged into a Principality, the which the house of Bellay doth now inioye. This was the life and raigne of Clotaire the first of that name, vicious, and vnfortunate, followed with a confused and horrible tragedy in his children, whom we must marke distinctly in the front of this tumultuous reigne, therby to tread more safely the blinde maze of these obscure governments.

Clotaire the first of that name, had four sonnes.

- C Cherebert King of France.
Chilperic King of Soissons.
Gontran King of Orleans, or Bourgaugne.
Sigebert King of Metz, or Austrase.

All which reigned together fiftene yeares: but in this eight raigne they giue the ranke and name of King to Cherebert, as to the eldest, although each of them called himselfe King of France, and commanded absolutely ouer the Countreies vnder their obedience.

CHEREVERT, the eight King of France.

Division of port of season a division of nature.

VE haue seen the Strange government of the foure sonnes of great A Clouis: let vs now view the rest of this tale, in the children of Clouis: who suruiuing his brethren, & their children, obtained the realme alone: but presently to be diuided into 4. parts. Of 5. sons lawfully begotten, 4. suruiued him: Cherebert the eldest, Chilperic, Sigebert, & Gontran. His bodie was scarce interred, when as the fire of diuision kindled among the brethren, about the diuiding of the Realme. Chilperic, a craftie and proud man, finds meanes to seize on his fathers treasure, and labours to become master of the Citie of Paris. But not able to effect it, he was forced by his brethren (supported by the chief Noblemen of the Court) to come to a diuision, euery one according to his order. Cherebert, as the eldest of the house of France, hath Paris for his part. Gontran, Orleans, and Bourgogne. Chilperic, Soissons: Sigebert, Metz, or Austrasia: euery portion with his dependances. After this diuision of parts, their wills were so diuided, as it is wonderfull, the realme had not bene utterly ruined amidst these horrible confusions, in so feeble beginnings.

Prouence, by consent of the brethren, was given to Gontran King of Orleans, and Bourgogne. But notwithstanding this accord, Sigebert King of one part of Bourgogne, and of Austrasia, contends for it with his brother, and lowes diuision among the Prouençals, doubtfull to whome they should yeeld obedience in this contention. I had bene woon and lost by Clouis, (as wee haue shewed) but soone after the death of Clouis, Thierry the Ostrogothe (who had woon it,) looser it againe through the inclination of the Prouençals, who willingly come to the ancient obedience of the Crowne of France. And the Emperour Iustin the second, liking it better in the Frenchmens hands, then in the Ostrogoths, leaues them that which he cannot take for them. In this respect, he added his content by his deed onely.

Horrible confusions betweene the brethren.

Be their wines.

After the death of Cherebert, his brethren contend for his spoyle, with irreconcilable hatred. Gontran was the most temperate and tractable, desiring that this discord for parts, might bee determined by the French Clergie, as iudges competent, and without passion. But his aduise was not allowed. Chilperic and Sigebert, ambitious and turbulent men, would carrie it by force, yet was it agreed by common consent, that none of them should enter Paris, before this Question were decided, touching their portions. But there fell out other accidents vppon this theater, whereas cunning, malice, impudencie, and furie haue caused both men and women to play along and make scene, being the Authors and enders of these miseries. I tremble at those confusions, whereas Brunehault and Fredegond two renowned women in our France, for their notable wickednesse, shall appeare in diuerse scenes of this tragedie.

One branch makes warr
then.

Brunehault was daughter to Anathagilde King of Visigoths, the wife of Sigebert King of Metz, or of Austrasia. Fredegond first was concubine, and after wife to Chilperic King of Soissons. By the policies and impudencie of these furious heads, it cannot bee spoken, how much miserie France suffered during their reignes. But let vs view euery thing in order, if any order may bee found in the most horrible Chaos of innumerable confusions. Sigebert was much troubled in his territories of Germanie, to see them against the Hunnes. Chilperic embracing this occasion against his brother, enters his countie, with a great armie, & takes from him the Citie of Rheims. This surprise awakes Sigebert: and for that he would not loose the principall to keepe the access, he leaues Germanie, and speeds into France, wonderfully greeued with the wrong he had receiued from his brother: pursuing his reuenge with such vehemencie, that hee takes Soissons the capitall citie of his Realme, with his sonne Theodebert, forcing him to retire with Fredegond to Tournay, being ashamed of his cowardly desecine.

Thus Sigebert comes a Conqueror to Paris, where he is receiued by common consent: and so all the cities belonging vnto Cherebert, yeeld him obedience. But as he thought himselfe a peaceable King, mounted to the toppe of his desires, hauing nothing to trouble him, but wallowing in his delights, behold two yong fouldiours (suborned by Fredegond) came to his Court, enter freely into the hall, and approch so neere him, and

A and with such oportunity, as cyther of them stabs him with his dagger, and he falls downe dead in the place. These murtheiers were sodenly torne in peeces, so as they could not be knowne, nor declare by whose commandement they had committed this murder: yet was it generally thought, that this was the practise of Fredegond, to free her husband, and to make the way more easie for her affaires, by the death of this brother who crossed her most. In truth, the death of Sigebert changed the countenance of the Court: euery one runnes after Chilperics fortune, who was receiued King of France in the place of his elder brother, and he entertaines all those with fauour that offer him seruice, CHILPERIC the first, the ninth King of France.

Chus Chilperic began to reigne in the yeare 578. and raigned 14. yeares at Paris and Soissons, while that Childebert the sonne of Sigebert reigned in Austrasia, and Gontran at Orleans and Bourgogne. He found Brunehault the widow of Sigebert at Paris, a woman of a subtil and audacious spirit: so as fearing least she should animate his sonne against him, hee confined her to Rouan, whether he likewise sent his sonne Merouee, to take possession of the Citie: but in steed of taking the Citie, hee was surprized by the beauty of Brunehault, who could so conningly gaine the loue of the inhabitants, as the Bishop himselfe allowed of this marriage, although she were his Aunt. Chilperic moued with the same of this loue, which proceeded vnto marriage, came to Rouan, and according to the Ecclesiasticall discipline, degraded and banished this Bishop: and by his absolute authority, puts Merouee into a Cloyster. But he stayed not long there: for after the departure of Chilperic, a certaine friend of his called Bosson, drew him forth, being set on by Fredegond, hauing brought with him three hundred men (too small a 578. number to fight, and too many to flee.) And so it happened to Merouee: for being A pursued and taken by his father Chilperic, hee was slaine by his commandement. And least Audouere his mother, (a vertuous Princess) and Clouis her other sonne, should seeke meanes of reuenge, hee rejects his wife, and causeth Clouis his other sonne to be secretly slaine, being brother germaine to Merouee. These disorders could not be done without the complaint of the Nobility against Fredegonde, who held not yet the degree of a wife with Chilperic, although she had free access both to his Court and bed, from the which she had dispossessed his lawfull wife. Chilperic (to pacifie these complaints) pretends some reasons for this diuorfe: and disguising the murders cunningly, he takes Galsonde to wife, the daughter of Athanagilde king of Spaine. But the impatiencie of Fredegonde, doth soone dissolve the bonds of this bashfull respect, thrusting B Chilperic into such a fury against this second wife, as he strangles her, and maries Fredegonde publicly: who possessed her husband so absolutely, as she commanded imperiously, vnder the cloake of his authority.

crimes.

From these domestical crimes, insolvency rageth against the poore people, by taxes, impositions, and insupportable exactions: and report imputes all to the cruelties of the same workewoman. Complaints found out in all places: but absolute authority had so preuailed, as they could find no remedy: the people being weak, & such as else might haue had means to countenance the ancient French liberty, were either terrified or in- charmed by this Proserpina. But Chilperic must beare the punishment of his execrable wickednesse, by the malice of her, who had made him an instrument to massacre brother, children, & wife, & to contume by degrees his poore subjects. Whilest that Chilperic loued her exceedingly: she affected a nobleman in Court called Landri de la Tour (who by her fauour had obtained two of the greatest offices of the Crowne, of Duke of France, and Mair of the Pallace: to whom she most vildly afforded the best place in the Kings bed. This villanous & detestable loue, was cunningly cloaked with the deuises of this strumpet: who hauing a sonne by Chilperic, as a new gage of loue, she purchased daily more credit with him. But this was a short comfort for Chilperic, for foure moneths after the birth of this sonne, whom he named Clotaire, he was vn hapily slaine by her and Landri, when he least expected death: this was the occasion. One morning as Chilperic (ready to go to hunting) came booted into his wifes chamber to salute D her, he found her combing of her head, with her haire ouer her face: drawing neere vnto her without speaking, he toucheth her in iest, with his riding wand on the hinder part of the head: she supposing it to be her adulterer Landri, accustomed to come secretly vnto her at all houres, saith vnto him: In my iudgment Landri, a good Knight should alwaies strike before, and not behind. The King vnderstanding by halfe a word, more then he desired to know, departs amazed, takes horse & goes a hunting, not with any intent to kill the beast, but deuising how he might be freed of Fredegonde & Landri. But he had to do with a woman of too subtil & wily a spirit, who hauing passed her apprenticeship in so many other murders, could soone resolute to deprive her husband of his life, to saue her owne. Without any further delay she sends for Landri, reports to him the history, concludes with him to kill the King her husband in his coming from hunting, & findes ministers to execute this desseigne: the which succeeded as they had plotted against Chilperic, suffering in the end (by the same hand, which he had caused to shed so much blood, the horrible paine of his miserable massacres: for as he came melancholike to the chafe, accompanied onely with one page, he was sodenly set vpon by these murderers, who slew him with his page, so commodiously, as they returned vndercried to the troope, as if they had neuer dreamed of it.

The King is found dead: euery one cries out, euery one runs vp and downe, and those first of all that had done the deed. But it was giuen out, that the murderers were fled into Lorraine, from whence assuredly they were come by Childeberts command. The Court is filled with teares, especially Fredegonds chamber, who continued in passions with her Landri, and could not be comforted: the one calling for her good husband, the other for his good maister: but the quick sighted held them for Crocodiles teares. Thus

Thus

A Thus liued, and thus died Chilperic, hated and detested euen then, and of the posteritie: for prooue that a wicked life will haue a wicked end: and that God ruins the wicked by themselves, euen when they promise themselves all impunitie. They add impunitie to his execrable wickednes: for hee denied the truth of the three persons in one Deitie, and the incarnation of the sonne of God: wherein consists the hope of our saluation. But admonished by the French Church, hee protested to leaue his error. A monstrous Reigne, vnder a monstrous King: where Potentates may see, that misery is the true reward of sinne: And that horrible crimes, are punished with extraordinarie paines euen in this life. This Tragical end of Chilperic, a wicked and vnfortunate Prince, happened in the ycare. 588.

CLOTAIRE the second, the tenth King of France.

A memorable raigne in confusion.

C He beginning, middle, & end of this reigne is remarkable for it is apparent, that God is the true gardian of this Realme, without whome it must needs haue perished in these strange confusions. Clotaire a young child of foure moneths, gouerned by his mother, a most wicked woman, being come to yeares, hee finds himselfe incumbered with many warres, yea ciuill warres against his owne kinsmen, and bloud. Who will not then confesse the issue of his reigne, (being peaceable and well gouerned,) to bee a singular testimonie of the prouidence of God, towards this estate. This young child, the sonne of bad parents, was notwithstanding receiued for lawfull King by the French, by vertue of the fundamentall law, which had appointed this Realme to be hereditary. Whereby is shewed, how farre the election of our Kings extend euen in this first race.

the law of state.

But to conceiue well the diuerse occurrents of this reigne, wee must remember, that Clotaire the 1. had 4. sons, Cherebert king of Paris, who is reckoned the 8. King of France, and

588. and died without children: Sigebert King of Metz, slaine by Fredegonde: and Gontran A King of Orleans, who furnished all his brethren, a good and a wife Prince, and died without children. Sigebert King of Metz left for heire Childebert his sonne, with his wife Brunchault, a subtilie, and a wicked woman. This ground being laid, I will returne to the course of my historie. Gontran King of Orleans, vnckle by the father to this yong King, was his nearest, and most assured kinsman, so as by a generall consent of all the French, he was called to be Regent of the King, and realme. And now they talked of an assemblie: Fredegonde (flying the light and libertie of publique assemblies, fearing not onely to be reiectd from the gouernment, but to be accused for the murder of her husband) preuents the States from the calling of Gontran, the first Prince of the blood, and the kings vnckle: as they should haue done, if leisure had suffered them to assemble, and to speake in an vnited bodie, with publike authoritie. B

Norab!e' subdetic of a woman.

Thus shee gaines time, beseeching the cheefe of the Councell, to prouide for the Conuocation of the Estates: and in the meane time, to giue order, that Gontran may come to Paris, both to informe of the execrable murder, and also to take vpon him the charge of her sonne, and the gouernment of the common weale. This discourse was far from her thoughts, but shee supposed to make an euasion by this goodly shew. And in the meane time shee practised to kill Gontran. Shee did write vnto him in all humilitie, holding him as a father to the King her sonne, and the support of her widowhood. Gontran foreseeing the policie of Fredegonde: prouided so wisely, that being arriued at Paris, he was receiued by a generall consent, Regent of the Realme. He made C no shew of discontent to Fredegonde, who notwithstanding (hauing a guiltie conscience) packs vp her baggage, being readie to flie vpon the least shew that Gontran would call her into question. But it was not his meaning: his onely proiect was to bring vp his yong nephew, and to preferue him in his realme wherein hee was borne, supposing this mild manner of proceeding to bee the best, both for the King and the Realme.

Thus without any alteration, he wisely dissembles all the actions of Fredegonde, hee respects her as the Kings mother, and imployes her in the education of her son. And knowing how much the preience of the Prince workes in the subjects, to haue him acknowledged for King: He makes a progresse throughout the Realme, leading with him D this yong infant, with the mother, receiuing in all places, the oath of fidelitie, and obedience. Being returned to Paris, he giues him in gard to the mother, and applied himselfe wholly to the gouernment of the Realme. As the affaires were managed with this good order, two great difficulties crosse Gontran, almost at one instant: for Childebert King of Metz, (iealous of his vnckles Authoritie,) requires to be associated in the Regencie, the which he pretended to appertaine vnto him, with the same right it did to Gontran and Fredegonde: for the punishing of whome hee complained much, both of the foulness of the fact, which should not remaine unpunished, and of Gontrons sufferance, which was too palpable. For the which Gontran prouided, stopping Childeberts entrance into Paris, and causing Fredegonde to retire herselfe quietly to Rouan, by reason of the peoples hatred, reuiued by Childeberts complaint. And for that hee would not seeme to haue altogether neglected the punishing of Chilperics murder, he caused information to be made against a Chamberlaine of the Kings, called Chermphie, who being found guiltie, he caused him to be slaine in the Temple, whether hee was fled. And so proceeded no farther in this search, least Fredegonde should be found too farre engaged. Besides this crosse, there happened a second: for one named Gondenault, ha- An imagine-rie King.
uing termed himselfe a long time to bee the sonne of the great Clotaire, and kept in a Cloyster: in the end he escaped, and was openly maintained by Childebert, who fought both a colour of trouble, and inuocation. He is followed by a parte of the Nobilitie, and Clergie, and seizeth on many good Townes, in Guienne. And hauing written his letters F to all the Prouinces, hee carries himselfe for lawfull heire of the Realme, with better right (said hee) then this yong child, the sonne of a strumpet: And by consequence a doubtfull heire to the Crowne.

That

A That which was most to be feared in this newe accident, was the spirit and force of Childebert: but Gontran preuented it with iudgement. For seeing himselfe olde, and without Children, and knowing his Nephewes humour, hee doth institute him his heir, and by that meanes makes him to abandon Gondenault. So this supposed King left by Childebert, was soone abandoned by all the rest, and by them was deliuered into the hands of Gontran, who presently put him to death. And hauing assembled the Clergy of the realme, hee caused the Bishoppes to bee condemned, who had so rashly followed the frensie of this bold Impostor. Gontran hauing with such dexterity preuented these dangerous difficulties, and performed those good turnes to the King his Nephewe, in his infancie: he retires himselfe to Chalons, where soone after he died without Children, leauing his estate to Childebert, and the realme of his poore pupill (who had scarce attained the age of ten yeares) to the mercy of the waues & tempests of all sorts of miseries incident vnto states.

Gontran was no sooner dead, but the ambitious desire of Childebert, growne great by the new estates of Orleans and Bourgongne, inflamed him against yong Clotaire, conceiuing an assured victory in his ouerweening brayne, imagining soone to suppress a yong Childe and a woman ill beloued. But the God of victories had otherwise disposed: for Childebert hauing brought a mighty army to field, and entred into the heart of France: behold Fredegonde (armed with more then a manly courage and wisdom, encounters him with an other army, being fortified more by her exhortations, and the presence of the yong King, (whome shee shewed openly to the French), then by the number of men of warre. The battell was giuen, and the imagined Conquerour was vanquished by a Childe and a woman, being surprised with so happie a celeritie by Fredegonde, as he could hardly beleue she had bene parted from Paris, when as he sees his whole army defeated. He lost in this conflict 20000. men, his honour, and his life: for hauing recovered his Country with much ado, hee died of melancholy, leauing a memorable example to Princes, neuer to attempt a warre to take from another without iust occasion.

He left two sonnes, Theodebert and Thierry. The first had for his portion the realme of Austrasia: the second had Bourgongne. Brunchault his mother furnished him, and kept at Metz with the eldest: she presently stirred vp these two Princes, (ouer whome shee D had great authority as their grandmother,) to pursue Clotaire, for the shame and death of their father. Behold suddenly an army of Austrasians and Bourguignons, marcheth into France, led by these two yong Princes. Clotaire accustomed to these sports, opposeth himselfe in person, and gettes the victory, with such successe, (as they say) the course of the river of Aurance (where the battaill was fought) was stayed by the dead bodies of the conquered. Fredegonde leapt for ioye of this second triumph, by reason of Brunchault, who was her chiefe obiect: but her ioye was presently conuer- F into her owne funerall, for shee died soone after: to teach reuenging spirits, that their hatreds which they would haue perpetuall, are mortall, and at the least wise ende with their deaths.

Thus Fredegonde died in her bed, and was interred neare to Chilperic, whom she had caused to be slaine: so as in this peaceable death, we may consider the patience of God, which doth often attend those it referres to his last iudgement. But Brunchault (who thought her selfe a conqueresse, by the death of Fredegonde her capital enemy,) incensed Theodebert & Thierry her grand-children anew against Clotaire. They raise another army, vnder the conduct of Beroald, not willing any more to hazard their persons, being taught by the successe of two great defeats. Beroald is slaine in this battaile, and yet the victory remaines to his men, with great losse to the French: so as it seemed, the warre would grow more violent betwixt these Princes, who nowe beganne to see a part of their reuenge against their Cousine Clotaire. But the malice of Brunchault, who had F banded the Cousins, must nowe diuide the brethren.

This old bitch, euen in the fury of war, found stil meanes to follow her beastly lechery: & then had she got a yong courtier called Protade, for a stallion: whom she entertained in view and knowledge of the whole Court, and aduanced him beyond dutie or desert. A The dislike of this vnchast conuersation (offensiueto the whole world) doth in the end force Theodebert to find a meanes to withdrawe his mother from the view of the multitude, who were eye witnesses of the filthinesse of this shamelesse old woman, and of the ignominie of his house. He supposed to send her away with pollicie: perswading her she should doe best to retyre her selfe into some goodly monasterie, there to lead a godly life, and to seeke for rest befitting her age. This admonition caused her partly to leaue the Court, and State of Theodebert, but not to change her mind. She retyres then from Metz, and comes into Bourgongne to her other sonne, full of choller: and finding Thierry ill affected against his brother, shee presently kindles the vnfortunate fire of dissention betwixt them, which consumed them both, and finally her selfe. B That posterities may note in this tragedie, the examples of Gods iust iudgement, who punisheth one sinne by another, and the sinner by his owne sinne.

This lewd woman perswades Thierry, that Theodebert was a bastard, the sonne of a Gardiner, and that he had lawfull cause to make warre against him, as an vsurper of that which belonged vnto him by right. Thierry being exceeding couetous, embraceth this occasion, prepares an armie against Theodebert, and imployes this Protade in the principall charge, who was a kindler of warre in the spirit of this yong Prince. The cheefe Noblemen of Bourgongne infinitely grieued with these disorders, not daring directly to charge Bruneault, they set vpon her Minion & kill him. By this meanes they drawe Thierry to an accord with his brother Theodebert: and so either of them sends backe his troupes. Thus this fire seemed to be wholly quenched, the which kindled soone after in another place, & by the practises of the same workwoman, Thierry had remayned long vnmarried, entertayning change of women, by the counsell of this birche, who daily prouided him store of this stuffe: but solicited by the continuall perswasions, & prayers of his Council, he takes to wife, Membergue the daughter of Datarie, King of Spaine, louing her with that honest affectio, that a man ought to loue his wife. Bruneault ialous of this lawfull loue, fearing to be dispossessed of her authoritie and credit, if a lawfull wife possessed her husbands hart, she workes by her charmes, reducing Thierry to that extremitie, that hee was not able to accompany with his wife: and for a bait to his adulterie, she furniseth other women (whome he might freely vse) as shee loathed him of this poore Princeesse, causing him to send her home to her father Datarie, as vnable to beare children: who infinitely greued with this disgrace, done him in the person of his daughter, resolues to reuenge. Hee complaynes of this iniurie, both to Clotaire, and Theodebert, whome he knew to be enemies to Thierry, and all together resolue to make warre against him.

Bruneault seeing this great storme ready to fall vpon Thierry, she perswades him to compound with his brother Theodebert, at what price soeuer, whose humour she knew wel. This accord was sold by Theodebert to Thierry at a deere rate: (for he had the Counties of Champaigne, Touraine, Artois, and many other places) but it cost him selfe much dearer: for by this composition, all the armie was dispersed, and euery one retyred home. Thierry (who by the aduise of his mother, stood vpon his guard) surpriseth his brother Theodebert, with such aduantage, that not onely he recouers all that he had giuen him, but by the Councell of this Proserpina, he embrewes his hands in his blood, murdering him most barbarously. Theodebert had but one onely daughter, whome Thierry would take to wife, to haue some honest pretext to seize vpon all his Estates. But Bruneault, (who desired greatly to see him maister, but not to haue a companion in this absolute authoritie,) dissuades him from this marriage, inferring (to couer her hidden intent) that it was not lawfull to marrie his neece. Thierry blinded with passion (who by a iust iudgement of God, sought to die by poyson of this viper, by whose meanes hee had done so much mischief) replies, that the daughter of Theodebert was none of his neece, seeing that Theodebert was not his brother, being begotten by another father: reproching Bruneault, that he knew no more then she had taught him. And that vpon this occasion, shee had encouraged him to kill him. And as they grew hot in wordes,

A wordes, hee threatened to kill her. Bruneault (seeing her selfe taken by the nose, and measured by the same measure she had measured to others,) resolues to preuent Thierry, and to murder him. She therefore giues him a morrell mixte with a languishing poyson, which caused him to consume of a bloody fluxe: that as he had spilt the blood of others, so hee might die in blood: and that the same wretched counsell which had bin the sepulchre of his brother, should likewise be his owne, for a memorable example to posterity, that God suffreth nothing unpunished, and doth often punish the wicked by themselves, and by their owne practises. Such was the tragick end of the troublesome life of Thierry. But what shall become of Bruneault? The Iustice of God goes slowly, but he recompenceth the slownes with the grievousnesse of the punishment. B Let vs then heare the continuance of our history. Bruneault carries a good countenance after the death of Thierry. She makes him a stately funeral like a rounney: and of foure bastard sonnes which Thierry had left, she chooseth him that pleaseth her best, to install him King in his fathers place: and in the meane time she continewes the gouernment of the reame, and callies herselfe Regent. To conclude: she doth promise vnto herselfe, in all her courses, faire better successe then Fredegonde, presuming that she exceeded her in iudgement and experience, no man remaying to controule her actions: but her discourtes were vaine imaginations, and her foolish hopes the snarcs of her owne ruine. The Nobility of Bourgongne (infinitely grieued with the horrible wickednes of this woman, resolue not to endure the new tyranny which she practised,) had recourse vnto Clotaire, as to their true and lawful Lord. Bruneault plays the resolute: she prepares to war, sendes diuerse Ambassadors into Germanie: the chiefe was Varnare Mayre of the Pallace of Austrasia, a man of great authority both at home and with strangers. Hauing sent him for succors to some Princes of Germany, shee growes ialous of him without cause, and sends a trustie seruant of hers named Albon, to finde meanes to kill him. Albon hauing read those deadly letters, teares them: but vnwares he lets fall the peeces of this letter, the which are gathered vp and caried to Varnare: who vpon this new accident, takes a new aduise. He resolues to crosse the practises of this murderesse, (so well knowne and hatefull to all men,) who likewise would make away her best seruants, who had bene too faithfull vnto her, in the execution of

D her wicked desseines. Varnare doth treat so politickly in Germany, as hee with-drawes their hearts and forces from Bruneault, and winnes them vnto Clotaire. This Counterbattery thus made, hee returnes into Bourgongne. His returne bred an vnexpected change, for she, who had alwaies deceiued, was deceiued, & in the end fell into the pittefall. Varnare did not seeme to knowe what she had deffined: whereby hee had meanes to countermine all Bruneaults policies, with so wise a dissimulation, by his great authority, as he gaines all the chiefe men for Clotaire: deliueres into his hands the children aforesaide, pretended to be heires, and by this means giues him an easie victory ouer Bruneaults troupes: who yeelding vnto Clotaire, deliuer vp this wicked woman, the cause of all their miseryes. So at length the Wolfe is taken vnwares. Clotaire a victor, was receiued by common consent of the Austrasians and Bourguignons, and by that meanes, beeing absolute maister of that great inheritance of Clotaire his grand-father, beganne his reigne by a worthy act of memorable Iustice. Hauing in his power the chiefe motiue of all these mischiefes, hee caused Bruneaults proceesse to be made by the greatest personages he could choose in all his dominions: that in so notable an assembly, the sentence might be irreprochable.

By their censures, Bruneault was found culpable of infinite and horrible crimes, and was condemned to die, by a terrible and extraordinary punishment: for she was tied to the tayle of a wild mare, and drawne through a stony and rough Country, so as (being torne into diuerse peeces) she died at diuerse times most iustly, as shee had cruelly caused many others to die. A notable example, to shewe, that the greatest cannot auoid the soueraigne Iustice of God, who punisheth in this world, when it pleaseth him: & when he spareth them, it is a signe, that hee reserues the punishment to his last Iudgement.

Bruneault put to a horrible death.

Thus

Thus died Bruneault, onely commended in histories, to haue built many temples, & giuen great reuenues for the mainteynance thereof, whilest that she wallowed in her pleasures. Saint Gregorie hath set downe certaine letters of his to Bruneault, wherein hee commends her highly for her piety and singular wisdom. Clotaire seeing himselfe King of so great a monarchy, after a long and horrible confusion of intestine warres, imployed all his care to pacifie the realme, leauing notable examples to princes to cure the wounds of an Estate, after ciuill warres, by mildenes. Hee doth publicly proclaim pardon of all iniuries both generall and particular: to abolish the memory to come, making his example a lawe of perpetuall forgetfullnesse. This moderation, more victorious then any great and seuerer chastisement, wonne him the loue and obedience of his subiects, and confirmed a true and no counterfiet concord amongest the subiects themselves. He gouerned them after their owne humours, vsing his authority with mildenes. And for that they had liued in the Court of Kings, from whence they received aduancements and honours, the which they could not do by their annuall offices, (as then the gouernments were), hee erected perpetuall magistrates, with such authority, as it might well bee termed, the true pattern of a royaltie.

Stillesse pro remedie to cure a de-cayed estate.

He then augmented the great authority of the Maires of the Palace, who controlled Kings, and in the end viurped the royaltie, whereas before they were but controllers of the Kings house, and not of the realme. A notable president for Princes, in the settling of an estate, not so to communicate their authority to their seruants, whome they desire to gratifie, as they may haue meanes to become maisters. Clotaire layed the first stone in the chaunge which shall happen to his posterity. He had one onely sonne, whose name was Dagobert. It was his greatest care to haue him well instructed, committing him to Arnoul Bishop of Metz, a learned man, and of a good life, and likewise to Sadragejule his gouernour. But Dagobert discovered euen then his bad disposition, intreating his gouernour Sadragejule vnworthily. Wherewith Clotaire the King was wonderfully moued against his sonne, who shewed afterwards that this was but a preparatiue to that he would attempt against his owne father, forcing him in his life time to giue him the realme of Austrasia for his portion. This kinde of rebellion was the fruite of Clotaires too great lenity: as also priuate quarells which bred great disorders in the Court.

To great facility hurtfull
to an estate.

Thus wee see, there is nothing absolutely perfect in this world. Clotaire dies in the yeare of Christ 631. hauing gouerned 44. yeares, from his Cradle, and passed happily through many perillous difficulties. A happy and a wise Prince. But as humane things are subiect vnto variety: so we may say, that the French Monarchie reuiued and died in him. And at his death sprong vp the soueraigne authority of the Maires of the Palace, the which grewe to that greatnesse, as they dispossessed this race of the Crowne. It was Clotaires intent to gratifie his subiects, and to ease the succeeding Kings, but in effect it was a meane to haue many Kings, and to make the lawfull contentible, setting the seruant in the maisters place. In truth, as it is most dangerous in an estate, to giue too much authority to a seruant, so is it most certaine, that the slothfullnesse and dissolutenes of these last Kings, was a ladder whereby our Maires mounted to this greatnesse, & to their ruines. The which succeeded by degrees, vnder the respect of the Kings name, for from that time of Clotaire, vnto the last King of this race, are 120. yeares. Pepin grandfather to that Pepin, who was the first King of the second race, was Maire of the Palace, and began first to deale absolutely in the gouernment of the realme.

The lenity of Clotaire is also noted by another error: for hee tooke so great liberty to do what he list without order, as his subiects wold do the like. And by this contempt of the lawe, the King grew contemptible, being not well obeyed in his age: the which bred great quarrels betwixt great and small, who shewed no great respect, neither to King nor Iustice. In this Estate died Clotaire, leauing Dagobert for his successor, the yeare .632.

DAGOBERT

DAGOBERT the first, the
xi. King of France.

DAGOBERT the first of that name, tooke possession of this great Monarchie, without any controuersie. Some write, that he had a brother called Aribert, to whome he gaue for his portion all the Countie on this side Loire: but dying without children, it returned to him againe. At his coming to the Crowne, he found great difficulties amongst his Subiects, being bred vp without Iustice, vnder the long libertie of ciuill warres, and the lenitie of Clotaire: whereto he prouided wisely, reducing Iustice, fortifying it by his authoritie, with so good a moderation, as no man was offended at his too great seueritie, neither durst any man attempt against the lawes, seeing both the reine and the rod in the hands of their lawfull Prince. Thus hee purchased the commendation of a good and wise King, and peace to his people, by their obedience to iustice. To this good order he added profession to loue holy things: and the better to confirme this opinion in his subiects minds, hee built and enriched many Temples, especially that of Saint Denis, the which since hath bin the sepulchre of our Kings.

There were great numbers of Iewes in France, the which were hurtful to the Realme: he banished them by a perpetual Edict, out off the territories vnder his obedience. But this zeale of religion, was polluted with the foule blot of Adulterie, which made him infamous both to subiects and strangers. Amand Bishop of Paris admonished him of his fault: but Dagobert impatient thereof, banished him. Pepin his Maire continued so in this reprehension, that although Dagobert were moued, and threatened to banish him, yet in the end hee yeilded to reason, by the vertuous constancie of Pepin: and hauing dismissed many of his lewd followers, he calls home Amand. An example for Princes & seruants: for the one to continue firme in their duties, for the other to yeeld to reason.

Dagobert

645 Dagobert subdued the Gaſcons that were revolted: brought the Britons to obedience, suppressed the Sclavons, established the Realme of Austrasia, and gave reasonable succours to the King of Spain against the Saracens. This is the sum of his armes led by Peppin; whilest that he lived at his pleasure, in his chamber, amongst his women, or in his monasterie at his deuotion. He had two sons, Sigibert and Clouis. Having assembled the Estates in great solemnitie, he declared, that he had ordered Sigibert to be king of Austrasia, and Clouis King of France, preferring the younger before the elder without any controuersie. He gaue them likewise gouernours, by reason of their yong ages. And so he died in the yeare of grace 645. hauing reigned 14. yeares without any trouble. A Prince to be numbred amongst the most worthy, but for this blemish of incontinencie. B

Thus vpon the facilitie of Clotaire, the voluptuousnes of Dagobert layed another dangerous stone in the foundation of a new royaltie, the which vnadvisedly they built for their seruants, to their Childrens cost.

CLAVIS the second, the 12. King of France.

The first of the idle Kings.

Now wee take the declining of the hill, to seeke the last of these Kings beneath in the valley, who had nothing royall but the race, the name, and the habiliments, hauing resigned their Maiestie, authoritie, and power into the hands of their Mares. It shall bee sufficient to set downe their names, the dates of their reignes, and the continuance of their race, vntill a more vigorous royaltie come to take his turne.

Hereafter in this first race, you shall see our Kings but once a yeare, the first day of May, in their Chariots deckt with flowers, & greene, and drawne by foure oxen. Who hath occasion to treat with them, let him seeke them in their chambers, amidst their delights. Let him take of any matters of state, he shall be sent to the Maire, who deales with al that cocernes the state: he opens packets, makes answers without any counsel, but

of these idle
Kings.

A but his owne. He heares the complaints of subiects, and giues audience to Ambassadors of foraine Princes. Hee ordereth all as it pleaseth him. Hee giues, reuokes, discharge, contracts, ordeines, makes Edicts, and disanulls them. To conclude, hee frees his master from all trouble, to impose it on himselfe. But we shall see to what end he labours thus, and why hee hath taken on him the authoritie and purse of his master. Let vs now speake something of our Clouis.

Clouis then remains in France, a peaceable King: and Sigibert his elder brother retires himselfe to his Realme of Austrasia, according to Dagobert their fathers decree. This accord was embraced by two brethren of a good and mild disposition, and was maintained wisely by their mother Nantilde, and their Tutors. A notable example of rare loue betwixt two brethren, especially in great diuisions: and the iealousie of mothers, who do often support one child against another.

Clouis had married a gentlewoman of Saxony, named Baudour, a woman of a good and holy life, and much giuen to deuotion, as the Abbate of Shelles, S. Baudour, with other foundations do witnes. Whilest that she busied her selfe in her deuotion, and to build monasteries, Clouis laboured to confound his mind, drowning it in the flood of his voluptuousnes. Yet they obserue one thing in him, which shewes that hee was not wholly deprived of iudgement: the which happened in a time of a great dearth. To releue the poore people, he suffered them to take the silver, wherewith the Temple of S. Denis had bene couered by Dagobert. Doublesse, the care of the poore, is a worke worthie of a great Prince. Bountie is better then sacrifice: and Christian soules be the true stones of a spirituall Temple, where God dwels, as in his proper mansion. So as to nourish and support the poore, the precious members of the Church, is to build a goodly Temple.

Sigibert King of Austrasia (hauing no children, nor hope of any) was so sollicit by Grimoald Maior of his pallace, as hee adopted his sonne Childebert, and sone after hee himselfe had a sonne: and died, leauing him heire generall of all his realme. But Grimoald, vnder colour of this adoption, desirous to establish his son in the possession of Sigiberts estate, takes his yong sonne, and sends him to be brought vp in a monasterie of Scotland. In effect, he had seized on all the realme, if Ersembault, Maior of the Pallace of France, had not valiantly opposed himselfe against this his cruell vsurpation, hauing defeated and taken both him and his sonne, and punished them both by a sollemne sentence at Paris. A notable example for many considerations: but especially a singular prooffe, that God is the Protector of Orphelines, and a iudge of the vsurpers of an others right. Clouis had three sonnes by Baudour, Clotaire, Childebert and Thierry. All three shall be Kings succeffiuely: but Childebert was presently King of Austrasia, left without any lawfull heire, after the death of the sonne of Sigibert. Hee reigned sixteene yeares, and died in the yeare 692. hauing left his Realme in great peace, without any enemy.

CLOTAIRE the third, the 13. King
of France.

CLOTAIRE, the eldest sonne of Clouis, was King of France, first vnder the government of Erich, and then of Ebroin Mayre of the Palace: a wicked and cruell man, who shall minister occasion to take of his life, in the succession of these latter Kings. Vnder his reigne, he made great exactions vpon all the people, who (as he said) liued too plentifully, and forgot themselves by the inioying of too happy a peace. Clotaire reigned foure yeares, and died without name and without children, in the yeere 666. of whom we may say, as of the rest that succeeded him: That they haue left nothing memorable, but that they left no memory.

CHIL-

CHILDERIC or CHILPERIC
the second, the foureteenth
King of France

A CHILDERIC the second son of Clouis was already in possession of the realme of Austrasia: but a greater drawes him into France, where he findes important difficulties, for Ebroin doubting (if Childeric should raigne) he would take from him the dignity of Maior, and giue it vnto Froald Maior of Austrasia, who was his trustie seruant; perswades Thierri, the yonger sonne of France, to seize vpon the realme: and causeth him to be Crowned King. But Childeric comes with a strong army, being fauored by the French, who hated Ebroin, and (in respect of him Thierri,) and were well affected to the elder: so as he seizeth vpon Thierri and Ebroin. Hee did onely shauie Thierri & put him into the Monasterie of Saint Denis: and he sent Ebroin to Lusson in Bourgogne. To small a punishment for so foule a fact: may rather, a perpetuall pryson, and insupportable torments had bene more meete for his ambitious spirit.

Childeric then was receiued of all the French, to whome soone after he made a slender recompence: for he grew so proud and cruell, as there appeared in all places signes of his tyranny and cruelty. One amongst the rest cost him deere: for hauing caued a Gentleman called Bodille to bee whipped, hee gaue him a iust occasion to seeke his ruine. The French, wearied with his insolencies, take this barbarous act very disdainfully. so as Bodille had an easie meanes for reuenge vpon Childeric, although hee were a King: he resolues to kill him, and wants no friends to accompanie him in this execution. The match is made, to surprise him a hunting, at their best advantage. Childeric being there, he is eniured by Bodille and his Companions, who increate still: and 67 8. he being ill attended by his followers, is slaine by Eodille: who followed by his confederates, goes presently to a neere Castle, whereas Blisilde the Queene remained great with child: being entered, he slew her with her child, leauing a memorable example to Princes; neuer to thrust their subiects into dispaire; nor to abuse their authority to the dishonour and contempt of their Nobility, which is their right arme.

Thus died Childeric, hauing reigned but two yeares. Leauing an odious memory to his posterity, to haue begun well, and ended ill: cleane contrary to Childeric the first, his Predecessor, who began ill and ended well.

THIERRI the first, the 15. King of France.

C Hilderic being thus slaine, the French (not able to liue without a king, B and desiring none, but one of the bloud royall) post to S. Denis, draw forth Thierry, and establish him in the Realme, from the which they had deposed him, for his elder brother: and make Landregesil the Son of Archembault Maior of the Pallace, with whom they were well pleased, during his Mairalty. A notable example, both of the peoples consent gouerned by reason, and the efficacy of the Soueraigne law, the which is the Ioule of an Estate, and the ground of a lawfull Empire.

The Realme was very peacefull in this beginning, when as Ebroin (perswaded by some discontented Noblemen) leaues his Cloister and raiseth an armie, in the beginning but small, but it so increased, by the kings contempt and his Mayors; as he remanins a Victor, with an incredible celerity. Ebroin seizeth on the Kings person, intreats him with all reverence and respect, and protests to require nothing, but to bee held his most faithfull seruant, as he had beene in his first reigne. Landregesil was then absent: who seeing the King taken, and all the fauour of the French turned to Ebroin, being

A being victor, hee willingly giues care vnto him, and ypon his faith and promise of good vsage, pates himselfe into his hands, by whome he is treacherously and cruelly name. Ebroin hauing begun this course, continues his cruelty, to satissie his reuenging minde, vntill that he himselfe (after that he had murdered many good men, contrary to his oath, amongst the rest Leger Bishop of Autun, hauing admonished him of his dutie, and Martin Maior of the Palace of Austrasia, to whome hee had giuen his faith with a sollemne oath) in the ende he thrust himselfe vnadvisedly into the hands of Ermanfroy, a French gentleman, his capitall enemy, who slue him when he least feared it, hauing nowe an imagination to bee mounted to the toppe of his greatnes, and to tast the sweete Liquor of his insatiable reuenge.

B A notable obseruation for treacherous and reuenging spirits, who are then vanquished, when they thinke to bee Conquerors. Thierry a King in shewe, is a spectator of these Tragedies, as of a game at tables, of his diuers Maiors, which play at leuell coyle, vntill that Pepin gets it, and enioyes it onely, with the Soueraigne gouernment of the French Monarchie.

Pepin during the confusions of these reigns had beene in Austrasia, and purchased great credit with all men: so as he was held worthy of this great charge, the which he gouerned with so great wisdom and valour, as hauing settled France in a peacefull Estate, he had purchased more credit & authority among the French, then the King himselfe. In the ende Thierry dies, in the yeare 693. hauing reigned 19. yeares

C leauing Clouis and Childebert, his Children, for a witnessse that he had liued: but in effect Pepin and his for the true heires of the Realme.

DAGOBERT

HE reigned foure yeares, and left two Children, Chilperic and Thierri, with no better memorie then the rest. So there passed fortie and foure yeares, during which time Pepin had good meanes to fortifie his authority, the which was in effect absolute, by the negligence, or rather idlenesse of these Kings, who made a necessary way to newe desseins, by their voluntary suffrance to incroach vpon their authority. Pepin well acquainted with the humour of the French, (naturally bent to love their Princes) did not openly despise his matters: but excused their weake dispositions, not capable of much pame, representing the heauie burthen of a great Estate, and that the honour to gouerne it, is a trouble which costes deere. He settled an impression in the Frenchmens mindes: That those onely were worthie to bee Kings, that knewe howe to gouerne.

So without any insinuating speech, the ordinarie seruices hee did to the realme, maintayning t^e peace, his great profession to loue religion, Iustice and the people, (whose ease hee was wonderfull carefull of) did recommend him to all men: and the good turnes hee did to all persons, by reason of his charge, did daylie purchase him many friends and seruants. Doubtlesse, as it is as great policie to bee a good man, so is there no small dexterity in the king of Cities and Countries by the hearts of men. Thus Pepin layed the foundation, and his successors finished the perfect building of a newe gouernment.

A lesson for our Kings, to haue a care howe they referre the charge of affaires to their seruants, and to whome they trust, and howe. This example doth verifie, that they were better to be more careful, and take more paines, then to disrobe themselves of this great authority, the which makes them not only eminent aboue all men, but

Read and Iudge O yee
Kings.

A carries as it were a tipe of the Maie^{ty} of God, in the gouernment of the world, whereof they must yeeld him an account, and not loote that by base cowardinesse, which they should mainteine by vertue. But let vs returne to Pepin, hee made great shewe to loue religion, and vpon this cause he makes warre against Rabod Duke of Frisse a pagan, whom hee conquered and forced to receiue the Christian religion with all his subiects. He restored Lambert Bishop of Traict to his dignity, being expelled by Abbrin, and confined into a Monastery: finally, he infinitely fauored all that tended to the seruice of God: and one of his chiefest cares was to aduance them that had charge ouer the Church, whose loues he had so purchased by this good vsage, as they soone requited him, causing the people to loue him, with whom such as rule their consciences

B haue great authority.

This was a point of state, as much as of deuotion. He also made prooue of his valour in diuers sorts, reducing the people of Germany on either side the Rhin, to the obedience of the French, who began to mutine, and to restore the beautie of the realme of Austrasia. He was carefull to maintaine Iustice, and imbraced the people, no waies oppressing them with any new impositions. In the meane time he was not carelesse of himselfe and his Children. He commaunded absolutely, being armed with the authority of his Soueraigne, neither was there any appeale from him vnto the King. Hee had two sonnes by Plectrude, Drogon and Grimold: he gaue Champagne to Drogon, and after his death hee caused his sonne to succede him with the title of a Duke.

C In the beginning he gaue the offices of great Master, and generall of the Treasure, to Nordbert his deere friend: but after his death he inuested his owne sonne Grimold in those places. But as the vanitie of man transports it selfe beyond the limyts of respect, it chanced in the end, that Pepin forgot himselfe in his prosperity: for not satisfi-
uinent,
ed with Plectrude his lawfull wife, hee fell in loue with a gentlewoman named Alpaide, by whom he had one Bastard, (which shalbe verie famous in the course of this historie, vnder the name of Charles Martel): and as the mischief encreased, hee puts away Plectrude and marries Alpaide. Lambert Bishop of Traict admonished him of this fault: but he suffered Alpaide to cause him to be slaine by her brother Dodon, who soone after felt the punishment of this bloud: for being strooke with a disease of wormes, not
D able to endure his owne stench, he cast himselfe headlong into the riuer of Meuse. Grimold the sonne of Pepin, following his fathers example, abandoned himselfe to strange women, disdayning his wife. But this adultery was decreed to them both: for Grimold (too familiar with one named Kangare, sonne in lawe to Rabod Duke of Frisse), was slaine with him, by a iust iudgement of God, hauing taught him so filthy a trade, to abandon himselfe to strumpets, and to reiect his wife. Pepin was so perplexed for the death of his sonne, as hee died for grieue and choller against Rabod the author of this murder. Thus both he and his sonne reaped the fruits of their adultery.

Vpon his deathbed he ordained Charles his Bastard to succede him in the gouernment of the realme: but Plectrude imbracing this occasion, vpon the death of her husband, and well supported by her kinsfolkes, causeth Charles to be taken and put in prison at Cologne, and aduanceth Thibault the sonne of Drogon, her owne sonne and Pepins, to the gouernment, although in effect she vnder his name gouerned all the affaires of state. This gouernment of a woman (which is vsually imperious and without reason) offended the most resolute among the French: so as weary to be commanded by a distaste (Dagobert dying during these alterations) they tooke a Prince of the bloud called Daniel, forth of a cloister, who had bin a Monke the greatest part of his youth. Him they crowne King, vnder the name of Chilperic the second, to haue a royall name to counterbalance his actions: and they giue him a Nobleman of France called Rainfroy, to be his Master: who hauing leued an army, defeated Thibault & his grand-mother Plectrude with small fight. But when as Rainfroy thought himselfe voide of all enemies, hee findes a strong Competitor: for Charles Martell being freed from prison, could potently imbrace the occasion, and get authority by the perplexity of Plectrude, to whom hee offers himselfe with all his meanes. The decree of Pepin did import much:

Charles Martell
Bastard to Pepin.

much: but the dexterity and valour of Charles could bee no more concealed, then a 724. goodly light in darkenesse. Hee entertaynes such as were affected to Plectrude and her sonne, in such sort as (seeing themselves abandoned) they receive him: for Maior, according to the will of Pepin, whose image Charles did carrie in his forehead, and his memory liued yet in the hearts of the French.

Charles being received and installed Maior of France, first assured himselfe of the Children of King Dagobert, causing them to bee gently brought vp in a Monastery, and afterwards (not pursuing his reuenges as Ebroin had done) he made a publike declaration, that his onely intention was, to free the Realme from the confusions which were so visible to all men, and restore it to the ancient dignity: neither would hee attempt any thing, but by the consent and aduice of the French. And in deed, hee began to manage the affaires, to the great content of all men. Hee established an olde Prince of the bloud, named Clotaire, with a Counsell of state, vnder whose name and authority hee gouerned as Maior and chiefe of the Counsell: and therefore some writers reckon this Clotaire among the Kings of France, although he were no King. Rain-froy with his Chilperic (finding himselfe too weake for such an enemy) had recourse to Rabod Duke of Frise, a capitall enemy to the house of Pepin, with whose aide hee leues an army, incounters Charles, and ouerthrowes him at the first charge. But Charles nothing amazed at this checke, rallies his forces, and knowing that the enemy pult vp with this victory marched in disorder, hee charged their confused troups with such aduantage, as hee defeats them quite, neere vnto Cambray: so as Chilperic and Rain-froy could hardly escape with a small trayne. And so Charles proceeds with his victory: for beeing aduertised that Plectrude was at Cologne, and ment to disturbe the quiet of Austrasia, hee approacheth neere vnto Cologne, where he is receiued by the Inhabitants, and hauing Plectrude and her sonne Thibauld in his power, hee inflicts no other punishment, but inioynes them to liue in quiet, and to attempt nothing without his liking. A worthie reuenge of a generous minde to pardon the vanquished. Endon succors him: but being vanquished by Charles, hee submits himselfe with the pretended Chilperic, to his discretion: and so did Rainfroy, relying vpon the Conquerors faith: Charles vseth the victory modestly, pardons Rainfroy, and giues him the gouernment of Aniou, and suffers Endon to enioye his liuing, vnder the obedience of the Crowne. And to settle the Realme in good order, he degrades Chilperic, being aduanced against Lawe, and causeth the eldest sonne of Dagobert to be chosen King, named Chilperic, as the true and lawfull heire.

So hee reigned vnder the gouernment of his Maior.

CHILPERIC

It is a second victory to vic-it well and mildly.

CHILPERIC the third, the
 19. King of France.

A Prince of no valour, simple and voluptuous. In his time the Sueues, Saxons, and Bauariens (disdaining to liue vnder a simple and effeminate King) fought to withdrawe themselves from the French obedience: but Charles reduced them to the yoke, reaping repentance for their rebellion. Plectrude was wearie of ease: who abusing the mildnesse of Charles, retires to Vimes, with her daughter Sanichilde, the lawfull childe of Pepin, and seekes to draw the people of Danubie into rebellion against Charles: who hauing intelligence of her practises, posts thither with a running Campe, pacifies the Germanes, and puts her in prison:
 B but wee read not how hee disposed of her, nor of her sonne Thibauld. Thus hee confirmed his authoritie in all places. In the meane time Chilperic dyes, hauing reigned fuyeyare, and in his place his Brother was Crowned King.

It is a great him that troubles a State.

F

THIERRI the second, the 20
King of France.

He reigned ten yeares, and dying, left his sonne Chideric the last King of this first race of Merovingiens. This is all that is memorable in these two reignes, whilst that the second race prepares to come in place, and to take possession of the Crowne, and scepter of the French Monarchie.

Charles Martel, from Maior of the Palace is chosen Duke or Prince of the French. He laies the foundations of a newe raigue for his posterity, and in this respect is numbred among the Kings, the 22.

Now our discourse must be of that great Charles surnamed Martel, by reason of the force both of his body and minde: shewing breefely according to our stile, what meanes he had to raise his race to the royall Throane.

As things succeeded in this sort, Charles Martel, who knewe what force an interest purchased by good order hath in an Estate, informs his friends privately (which were many) howe much it did import (considering the apparent weaknesse of their King, and the necessity of the realme) to haue one Commander, whome all the rest might obey: for when the King speaks not, euery one (holding himselfe as great as his Companion) will play the King, and so by consequence many mischiefs growe daylie, a multitude of matters beeing a ruine to an Estate. That the authority of a Maior was not great enough to that effect: and although it might be extended vpon necessity, yet was it not convenient: seeing that which concerns the good and quiet of all, ought to be approved by all and settled by a free and generall consent.

Having thus disposed the mindes of such as might rule in matters of great import,

Multiplicity of matters is a ruine to an Estate.

51

A hee makes a conuocation, which hee calls a Parliament, in the which it is concluded: That seeing Charles Martel had by many proofs shewed himselfe wortheie of a great command, having well vied his authoritie of Maior, and that vrgent necessitie required a speedie and conuenient remedie: therefore the absolute government should be deliuered into his hands. And to the end his authoritie should be knowne, and obeyed with more respect, hereafter hee should be called Prince, or Duke of Frenchmen. This decree did greatly countenance the authoritie of Charles Martel, being confirmed by such an assemblie, and by so affectionate a consent: but his vertues made him to be held as most wortheie of so honorable a charge: occasion made prooffe of his vertue, and the successfe was a foretelling that the Realme was appointed to his posteritie. Soone after there fell out this notable occasion.

We haue made mention of Eudon the pretended Duke of Guienne, Martel having vanquished him, suffered him to enioy his liuing, vnder the obedience of the Crowne. This accord pleased not Eudon, who not able to bee reuenged of Martel, practised such meanes as ambition and couetousnes did prescribe him. The Sarazins (a Turkish nation) had passed out of Asia into Affrike and Spaine, and had possessed those goodly and great Prouinces vnder the command of their King Abderame. Eudon sollicitis them to come into France, and promisseth a free passage. The Sarazins willingly imbrace the offer of so easie an entrie, and resolved to people France with a great Colonie of their nation. They enter Guienne with an armie of foure hundred thousand fighting men. A fearefull number at this day, but plainly set downe by the common consent of all writers. Charles Martel seeing this great storme readie to fall vpon France, resolves first to take away the cause of their coming: and as Eudon's discontent had drawne them in, he labours to be reconciled vnto him.

The Sarazins
inuide France with 400000
men.

He concludes a peace with Eudon, taught by the horrible spoile of Guienne, what it is to set such to worke. In the end hee disposeth all things to stop the violence of so rauishing an enemy, assembling all the forces he could, to make a bodie able to encounter them: but he armed himselfe cheefly with resolution and courage, fit instruments in necessitie, vnder the prouidence of the God of armes and victories. The Sarazin was alreadye aduanced as far as Touraine, within view of Tours, neere to the river of Loire, where Martel resolved to attend him, as well to ingage him in a Countrie far from retreat, and to make Eudon and his men more resolute, in whose Countrie it was, to be tried, as also to haue France readie in case of necessitie. Abderame trusting in the multitude of his souldiars both of horse and foot, resolves to compass in the French: and to this end had dispersed his battaillons, euery one apart making shew of a great armie, appointing his horse mingled with Camels, and furnished with sundry newe kinds of armes, to toyne the battaillons one to another. The order and countenance of this armie was fearefull to men neuer wonted to behold such an huge inundation of Strangers.

The Sarazin
of his men.

Martel (who fought more with courage and valour in a good cause, then with numbers) having assembled the bodie of his armie, hee confirms their resolutions before the combat, wishing them to haue no hope but in God, and in themselves, shewing, that they had their enemies before, and the river of Loire behind: that he had commanded them of Tours not to open the gates, but to the Conqueror, and had appointed troupes of horse vpon the wings of his armie, to kill such as fled, as enemies. To conclude they had no other France, but where they were, in the which they must either conquer or die. Eudon with his Guennois made their armie apart, not farre from Martel, and with his consent.

The battailes being aranged, and euery Commander having perswaded his men to do their best endeouours, the Sarazin giues the charge, supposing to compass in the French easily, as with a net: but on all sides he finds men couragious in their defence. The encounter was great, & the combat furious: In the heat of the conflict Eudon disbands, & violently chargeth the Sarazins campe, being full of women, children, & baggage, & with a small gard forceth the defences, & enters it, cuts in peeces, & kills all he encounters.

73 2. encounters without difference of age or sexe. The Barbarians not accustomed to the readines of the French, who encountred his sundrie Battaillons in grosse, as they presented themselves, turning after the manner of their discipline: seeing many of his men slaine, and for a second mischeete, hearing the cries and shriekings of women, and children, massacred in the campe, began to bee amazed, and to wauer. Martel (discouraging their countenance, and that their battayllons grew thin) cries out mainly to his souldiars. Courage my friends. God hath set vp his banner, hee fights for vs: let vs charge these miscreants. The souldiars (encouraged at this voice, and at the visible successe of their armes,) cry victory, victory. The Sarazins not knowing which way to turne him, being charged on all sides, breakes his battaillons, abandons his ranks, and casts away his armes. All are disperfed, the multitude oppresseth them.

Hereupon Martel and Eudon ioyned together, after the spoyle of the campe: vpon this disorder they charge valiantly through these dismen-bred troupes, as into a thicke hartest, without any resistance: all ouerflowes with bloud, they are wearie with killing. The remainder which fled is small, the prisoners lesse: all die by the sword, or are beaten downe with battleaxes: the victorious French (inraged with the sight of these vanquished Barbarians, seeking to dispossesse them, their wiues and children, of their habitations) made them the subiects of their cholier. King Abderame is found dead, in a heape of carcases, not wounded, but smothered by the multitude that fled. Histories assure, there were slaine vpon the place three hundred seuentie five thousand men, and of the French fiftene hundred, amongst the which were many of the Nobilitie and men of account. Thus God did ouerthrowe the greater number by the lesse, and by his force the multitude was an incumber to the enemy. But about all this deliuerance was remarkable, for that God not onely freed France from the slavery of Infidels, but also the rest of Europe, the which this deluge had almost ouerflowne, as it had done Asia and Affrike alreadie. So thankes were giuen vnto God, in all Christian Kingdoms, and the name of Martel generally renowned, as a cheefe instrument of the singular deliuerance of all Christendome. After this defeat, hee diuided the spoyle among the souldiars, and the better to reward the Nobilitie, he remitted them the tenthes and tithes for certaine yeares, with the consent of the Clergie, to whome he promised satisfaction.

This memorable defeat was a seale of the new dignitie granted vnto Martel by the fauour of the French, confirmed by his owne valour, or rather by the bountie of God, the essentiall cause of his happinesse. This battaile was called the Battail of Tours: it happened in the yeare 730. but the end of this warre was the beginning of another, and almost from the same spring, and by the same current. We haue shewed *Eudon*s deeds at the battaile of Tours. For this great seruice he expected some notable recompence: But Martel excusing himselfe, that he could not alienate the reuenues of the Crowne, nor doe any thing to the prejudice of his Master, left Eudon no more aduanced then before the warres, and very ill satisfied: but he died soone after, leauing Hunault and Ieffroy his children, heires of his discontent.

After their fathers decease, they seeke all possible meanes to trouble the quiet of France. Their cheefe strength was in Guienne: they had leuies some in Prouence, through the fauour of Maurice, Gouvernour of the Countie, and Earle of Marquilles, but especially in Languedoc, whence they were issued, as I haue said, being descended from the Fisigoths, whose memorie with their name liues still throughout all that Prouince, although they all depend vpon the Crowne of France. Thus they assemble all the people they can, either by friends or credit, and fortifie good Townes against the French, attending to make warre with al violence. But finding all these meanes too feeble for so great a proiect, they proceed farther. The Sarazins remayning in Spain were much grieved at so great a losse of their men, being a general dishonour to all their nation. They are easily drawne into this League, to be reuenged of the French: & the better to further their partie, they ioyned with the Vandales, Ostrogoths, & Alans, which remained yet in Spain, not friends among themselves, yet common enemies to the French.

King

A King Athin led the Sarazin troupes: Hunault and Ieffroy brethren commanded those that were assembled in the Prouinces on this side Loire. Besides their forces they had intelligence within Lions, and the best Citties of Bourgogne, assuming themselves to seize vpon Daulphiné, as well for the neernesse of Languedoc, (where they had a great partie) as also by meanes of Maurice the Prouenfall, and the credit they had with the principall of the Country.

Thus they make a great party, to vndermine and ruine the state of France, and did manage their practises with such secrecie, as their army was sooner in field then Martell could haue intelligence of their preparations. The bodie of this armie assembled in Languedoc, passeth the Rosne, entrench into Daulphiné, and goes through it with such celerity and ease, as (the Citties of Pierrelate, Saint Pol, Montlimar, Liron, Valence, Romans, & other Townes bordering vpon the Rosne, (hauing yeelded at the first brute) they surprise the Cittie of Lions, by meanes of their intelligence. Vienne alone held firme for the Kings seruice, in this deluge of Goths and Sarazins. They passed from Lions by Sauoye and the Countries on either side of the mount Iura, and in the ende seized on many of the best Citties of Bourgogne, Chaalon, Maison, Dijon, and Auxerre, by meanes of their intelligences and the generall amazement. Martel slept not in this confusion: but to prevent this vexpected storme, he assureth the Citties, and leues men with all expedition. The towne of Sens (through the resolute counsell of their bishop Otho) sallies forth so fitly vpon the Sarazin army, as (hauing slaine a great number)

The fidelity of the Vienneois.

The courage of a Bishop.

C they force them to raise the seage with shame. Other townes by their example growe resolute, vnder the assurance of their Commander, whom they finde carefull of their preferuation. Thus this army halfe victorious, (fearing a second kirmish of Tours, by the waighty blowes of Martel, loth to ingage themselves farther in France) retires into the Countries of their allies, leauing garrisons in the townes they had surprised. One part passeth into Languedoc, and lodgeth in friend townes: another seizes on Auignon (then a Cittie of Prouence) by the meanes of Maurice gouernour of the Country: Arles holds firme for the Kings seruice, amidst these confusions and the treachery of Maurice. Hunault and Ieffroy retorne into their Country of Guienne, to prevent the desseins of Martel, and to retaine their townes in obedience. Hauing thus disposed of their affaires, they send ioynly into Spain for newe forces, whilst that Martel labors to settle that which they had disordered in many places. And in truth they had provided worke for him, the which he preuented in this sort.

Newscumprits of the League.

He sends Childebert presently into Prouence with a meane army, as well to assure the townes that stood firme, as to keepe the enemy at a bay, and to crosse their desseins. Hee himselfe remains in Bourgogne with a great army, to recouer such townes as were held by the enemy. Both worke according to their proiects, but not with like successe. Childebert beseegeth Auignon, but with much toyle, losse of time, and small hope of successe, so as he was shamefully forced to raise the seage: but then comes Martel with his army, hauing recovered the Citties of Bourgogne, Lions and the rest of Daulphiné, with the like facility as they had bin lost: punishing the rebels in all places. Being incamped before Auignon, he so presseth the seage, as in fewe daies he takes the towne and cuts the Sarazins in peeces: yet their King Athin saued himselfe in Languedoc, by the riuier of Rosne, and retired to Narbonne to his other troupes. Martel (hauing releued the Cittie of Arles with a newe garrison) passeth into Languedoc, and beseegeth Narbonne, being then a very strong Cittie and of great importance for the whole Prouince. And as this seage grewe long, behold a newe armie of Sarazins comes out of Spain, vnder the conduct of Amoré, an other petty Sarazin King. Martel fearing least they of Guienne should come, and those within the Cittie issue forth, and all being vnted make one bodie of an army: he resolues to fight with them apart, vsing this stratagem which succeeded happily. He leaues a part of his army before the Cittie, with the same countenance as if it had beene whole, rising without sound of drum or trumpet: and surpriseth this newe army of Sarazins with such celerity, as he defeats them.

A new army of Sarazins in France.

Athin

739. Arhin frustrate of hope of any succors, saues him selfe by sea, with a small troupe, and abandons Narbonne, and the whole Country, to the mercy of Charles Martel, then a Conqueror. This was the ende of that perillous warre bred by Hunault and Ieffroy the sonnes of Eudon: and the fruit of all these broyles in Languedoc, was that they brought those Cities which had followed them, to extremity, whome Martel punished seuerely for their rashnesse and rebellion. The histories name Narbonne, Nismes, Beziers and Agde, the which he caused to be sackt and burnt. It is likely that the ancient walls of Nismes were then pulled downe, whereof we now see the ruines of an admirable greatnesse, vndoubtfull signes of the ancient beauty and welth of that goodly Citie: the which in the time of the Romaine Empire, being free in Gaule Narbonoise, did enioye the privileges of Italie, hauing had the honour to furnish Rome with an Emperour.

Languedoc seuerely punished by Martel.

Hunault and Ieffroy (being authors of this warre) remayned yet unpunished. Martel was diuerted by the warre he made against the Frisons, whome he vanquished and forced to become Christians: and to that ende he sends them Doctors. A pardonable zeale in a warrior: for in truth mens soules cannot be wonne by the sword, nor religion forced, but must bee planted in the heart by reason. The punishment of these turbulent men, was referred vnto Pepin, who knewe well howe to effect it, as we shall see. At this time King Thierri died, hauing reigned fve and twenty, years in conceit: and left Childeric his sonne, not heire of the realme, but of his idlenes, to make the last release of the Crowne, and configne it into a better hande.

CHILDERIC the fift, the 21, King of France, and the last of the first race.

HEE

A HE was King in shewe nine yeares, fve vnder the authority of Charles Martel, and foure vnder Pepin, who dispossessed him, made him a Monke, and seated himselfe in his place, as wee shall see in order. 741.

But let vs obserue what remaines of Martel. The care and toyle of great affaires, with his old age, hauing toare broken him, hee resolves to dispose of things in time, and to leaue a peace to his Children. He had foure sonnes, Caroloman, Pepin, Giles and Griffon, all of diuers humours. Caroloman and Giles more modest, and of a milder spirit, Pepin and Griffon, more rough and ambitious. Whilest he liued, hee greatly honored the Kings person, neyther did he in open shewe meddle with that maine point of royaltie: but in effect, diuiding his authority to his Children with the title of gouernments. He purchased them an interest by his vertue, & in time the possession of the realme. To his eldest son Caroloman he left Austrasia, to Pepin (whom he knew to be of a more quicke and hardie spirit) France, as the bodie of the Estate. And seeing Giles vnfit for armes, and giuen to deuotion, hee made him Arch-bishop of Rouan. To bridle the turbulent spirit of Griffon: and to take from him all occasion of debate, he would not giue him any certaine portion, but the good will of his elder brethren: being taught by the experience of former raignes, that many commanding brethren are dangerous to an estate: the wing himselfe more wise and happy therein then Clouis.

C Thus Charles Martel (hauing liued fifty fve yeares) died in the yeare of grace 741. hauing commaunded absolutely in France twenty and fve yeares, as Maior or Prince of the French, vnder the raignes of Chilperic, Thierri and Childeric. One of the worthiest men that euer liued, either in this Monarchie or in any forraine Estate. He was religious, wise, iust, valiant, modest in prosperity, resolute in aduersity, temperate in authority, not passionate nor reuengefull, diligent and happie. By these excellent vertues hee did quietly purchase this goodly degree, whereby his posterity hath mounted to the royall throne, although he had but the payne to get it, and the honour to preserue the realme from ship-wrake in the weakenesse of these Kings, and the stormes of many confusions. His Children (according to the diuersity of their humours) had diuers euents. Caroloman wanted no valour, but hauing accompanied his Brother Pepin in diuers exploits, in the ende he resignes him all his authority, becomes a Monke, and dies so at Vienne. Giles full of ambitious heat, not pleased with the wife resolution of his father, did all he could to crosse his brother Pepin, although hee had giuen him a sufficient portion in Normandie. Transported with this spleene, hee stirres vp the Saxons, Bauariens, and those of Guienne, against him at diuers times. In the end (being oppressed in all places, he vndertakes a voiage into Italie, to attempt some thing against his brothers: but he was slaine by the way, by a gentleman of Bourgogne, as a man of no valour nor quality. This fire was thus quenched, and Giles died vnworthily, leauing this lesson to posterity, That ambition hastens ruine, and contrariwise, That the one halfe is better then the whole.

Forerunnings or preparatiues to the raigne of Pepin.

I PEPIN, seeing himselfe alone in great authority, vnderpropt by the merits of his Grand father and father, resolved so to behaue himselfe, as his owne deserts should not onely confirme this reputation left him by inheritance: but also perswade the French that hee was worthy of a greater command, and by their free consents, hold him capable of the Crowne. He knew the humor of the French, who loue and honour their King with an especial deuotion, and cannot bee induced to doe otherwise, but by great and vrgent reasons. Hee manageth this desseigne with

742. with such dexterity, as hee effects it, and the meanes (which the providence of God A did minister vnto him) did as it were guide him by the hand: for to him wee must attribute the principall cause of this notable change.

The Sarazins infinitely greeued with these two defeats, prepare an other armie: Ieffroy was also on this partie, and it seemed this third League did threaten France with a greater confusion. Pepin remembring that his father had bene surprised, tends forth his spies, and being speedily aduertised, he assembles all the forces he could, with an incredible celeritie: and finding himselfe first in armes, he enters into Guyenne, and scizeth on the passages of the Pyrene mountaines. Ieffroy being thus surprised, sets a good face on it, promising obedience to Pepin: and is a mediator for the Sarrazins, vnder-taking that they should renounce their interest, and neuer enter more into France. Pepin obtaining his desire, (being glad to haue prevented this storme, and forced to redoubted enemies to receiue a law from him) applied himselfe to the peoples humor, who loue peace better then a bloudie victorie. He dismisseth his armie, busying himselfe in repaying of the Churches which the Sarazins had ruined in diuers places: to ease the Citties that were spoiled, and in giuing them meanes to recouer themselves: to establish Iustice, to vnburthen the subjects of publike charges, and finally to let the French vnderstand that he was as fit for peace as warre.

Estate of the Church.

The Church of Rome was then in great reputation throughout all Christendome, and the Popes did onely busie themselves with the seruice of God, to maintaine Princes in concord, and subjects in their liberties, the which purchased them greater credit, C for the singular respect Christian people bare to religion. Zacharie held then the Pontificall seat, and had the Lombards for a cause of continuall feare, being his neere and irreconcilable enemies: against whome he could not haue more assured and speedie helpe then in France, and by Pepins meanes, who held the soueraigne authoritie. Martel had already auoided a most dangerous warre, through the amitie he had with Luitprand King of the Lombards, after whose death, Rachise Duke of Friol, chosen in his place, threatens the Pope openly: for all the Lombards faire shewes, and his large protestations of friendship, were but foretelings of the breach of his faith. For this reason Zacharie entertained Pepin carefully, the which did helpe him much to compass his desire. And although his ambitious humour made him sometimes to speake too D peremptorily of his victories and ordinarie defects, yet could he containe himselfe in greatest occasions: and behaved himselfe in such sort, as he seemed not to aspire vnto the Crowne, but that necessitie and the common consent of all the French, did (as it were) force him thereunto. The most remarkable thing in all the course of this history, is the order he held to compass a desseine of so great importance.

As he discoursed couertly of his intention, and openly of the vrgent necessitie to provide speedily for the estate of the Realme: hee had feed men to preach forth his prayes, and the disgraces of Childeric, being as visible in the one, as remarkable in the other: reason giuing due praise to vertue, and dishonour to vice. In the one they see a simple stupidity, in the other a wise viuacitie: in the one a foolish lightnes, in the other a stayed grauitie; in the one a brutish suite, and in the other a moderate and temperate spirit: in the one a beastly carelesnes, in the other an actiue diligence; in the one a dissolute intemperancie, and in the other a well gouerned continencie. So as in the one was all good, and in the other all bad; in the one all pleased, in the other all displeased; and their actions were the table of their contrary dispositions. Childeric loued no man, neither did any man loue him. Pepin loued all, and was beloued of all, tying all vnto him by all occasions and good turnes, and all to his masters losse. The common people loued Pepin intirely, as the Protector of their libertie: and hated Childeric as one that regarded not the common good, in respect of his foolish and beastly veltuoufines: being neither willing nor able to doe well.

So the one being contemned and hated, was held vnworthie to raigne: the other prayed and beloued, was esteemed most worthie to be a king. The friends of Pepin failed not to proclaime his merits in all places, and the people embraced it with all content.

A content. But there were many difficulties in the execution of this generall desire: religion (much respected by the French): the naturall reuerence and deuotion they bare to their Kings, and the remembrance of the merits of old Clouis, were strong lets to stay the violent desires of the most affectionate. But Pepin could well prevent all this by an admirable and happy dexterity. To the remembrance of Clouis vertues, he opposed the memory of horrible disgraces and infamies, wherewith his posterity had bene polluted: and withall, the carelesnes of these latter Kings, noating all in ranke from father to sonne. And contrarywise, hee did represent vnto them, the liuely remembrance of the great merits of Pepin his grand-father, of Martell his father, and his owne: and from experience past, hee concludes of the future hope. As B for the reuerence of the French to their Kings: hee shewed that it was vowed to true Kings, and not to Kings in imagination, painted and disguised: and that the oth of fidelitie tyed them to a religious King, being valiant, iust, mercifull, vpriight, diligent, practised in affaires, fite to withstand his enemies, to punish the wicked, to defend the good, and to protect the Christian lawe, according to the expresse wordes of the sollemne othe which the French giue their King at his Coronation. Why should they then be bound to a vicious King, negligent and carelesse of himselfe and his subjects, vnder the colour of a Crowne and Scepter? To conclude, the contract was limited, and the French were bound to obey that King that was a lawfull King, who (being C endued with royall vertues) performed the office of a true King. These reasons were plaine, and easilie receiued of all men, finding this change to be very necessary for the common good: neither was there any one but expected some profit in his owne particular, and sought to purchase the fauour of Pepin.

But yet there remained a scruple of religion, for the dispensing of their othe. This article must be decided at Rome, where Pepin (assuring himselfe of his good friends, who were necessarily to vse him) hoped for a good end, seeing the principall was determined by the consent of the French. He therefore sends Bruchard Bishop of Bourges and Felrad his Chaplaine vnto Rome, men pleasing to all, and faithfull to himselfe, to represent the Estate of France, and the generall desire of the French, to Pope Zacharie. The Pope (duly informed of the weaknesse of Childeric (being hated and D temned of all men, without any support,) and of the generall resolution of the French to receiue Pepin, but chiefly moued with hope, to draw great helpes from him against the Lombards his capitall enemies) dispensed the French from their oth of obedience to Childeric, and to all his race.

Now shall that race be dispossessed, and this decree shall be the last act of the Merouingiens Tragedie.

THE SECOND RACE OF THE KINGS OF FRANCE.

called Carolingiens, either of Charles Martel, or of Charlemagne, the chiefe pillars of this race.

Oracles to iudge rightly of the estate of this second race.

*God is Iudge, he puls downe one, and sets up another. Man walkes as a shadow: he strines in vaine: he gathers goods, and knowes not who shall eniay them. O Lord what is man, that thou shouldest be mindfull of him? or the sonne of man, that thou so regardest him?
Man is like unto nothing: his dayes are like a shadow that vanisheth, the sonnes of men are as nothing: and great men are but as a lye. If they were all together put in a ballance, they would be found more light then vanitie. It is hee notwithstanding, that preferueth Kings.*

CHARLES MARTEL OF

- | | | |
|------|-----|---|
| 741. | 22. | The stock or stem of this second Race, is numbred among the Kings, the 22. for he raigned in effect during the life of the Idic Kings, and so was buried among the Kings. After the royall gouernment of 25. yeares, he left it to his sonne. |
| 750. | 23. | Pepin , the brieft, or short, who was crowned King, Chilperic 4. being degraded in the yeare 750. & left the crowne peaceable to his sonne. |
| 814. | 24. | Charlemagne , great in name and in effect, who remaining absolute Monarke of the realme of France & Austrasia , with all the dependances Northward: he added to this great masse, all Italy , & the greatest part of Spain , & so possessing the territories of the Empire in the west, he was receiued & installed Emp. of the west, having raigned 40. y. |
| 840. | 25. | Lewis his sonne , surnamed the Gentle, succeeded him, and raigned King & Emperour 27. yeares, and to him succeeded: |
| 878. | 26. | Charles the 2. called the Bald King and Emperour , who raigned 33. yeares: and to Charles the 2. succeeded, |
| 879. | 27. | Lewis the 2. his sonne , called the Stuttering, King and Emperour, who raigned but a yeare and six months. |
| | | At his death he left his wife with child, who being borne, was acknowledged for lawfull King, and called Charles the Simple : his minority lasted 22. yeares. Many Tutors, & many confusions. These Regents are crowned Kings, and (acknowledged by that name) doe hold the ranke among Kings, and so we must diuide these 22. yeares, to euery Regent according to his raigne. |
| 881. | 28. | Lewis the 3. and Caroloman , bastard of Lewis the Stuttering , raigned as Regents five yeares. |
| 889. | 29. | Charles the 3. a Prince of the blood , called the grosse, as Regent, he raigned 7. yeares, being both King and Emperour: he was put from them both. |
| 896. | 30. | Eudes or Odon sonne to Rob. Duke of Aniou , as Regent he raigned 10. y. In the confusion of these last Maisters, the royall authority being greatly weakened, many Countreies freed themselves from the obedience of the French Monarchie. So fell out |
| | | THE ECLIPSE OF THE EMPIRE,
Both in Germanie & Italy . The body of the Empire remained in Germanie , being afterwards gouerned by an Emperour, chosen by the Princes Electors. And Italy was dismembred into diuers Principalities, vnder diuers Potentates. In the end, after this minority of 22. yeares, |
| 899. | 31. | Charles the 4. called the Simple , sonne to Lewis the Stuttering was crowned as lawfull King, & raigned 25. yeares. But Raoul of Burgongne , |
| 923. | 32. | A Prince of the blood, was called by the League, to put downe King Charles , called the Simple: being imprisoned by them, and forced to renounce the Crowne. Charles dying with griefe, Raoul raigned 13. yeares: but in the end was expelled from this vnjust usurpation. |
| 936. | 33. | Lewis the 4. called d'Outremer , or beyond the sea, sonne to Charles the Simple , being called out of England, (whether his Mother had carried him to preserve him from the League) was acknowledged King, and raigned twenty and nine yeares. |
| 954. | 34. | Lothaire his sonne succeeded him, who raigned thirtie and three yeares. |
| 986. | 35. | Lewis the 5. sonne to Lothaire , raigned about two years, and dying without issue, interred with him the race of Charles Martel as his Ancestors had of long time obscured his vertues, and that of the valiant Charlemagne , unfortunate in their successors. |

Thus the second race called Carolingiens, having raigned 230. yeares, ended in Lewis the 5. and gaue place to the third race, which begins at this day.

PEPIN the short, the 23. King of France: and first of the second race.

THE French thus freed by the Popes dispensation, from their oath of obedience, assemble their generall Estates: and to auoyde confusion in the Realme, apparently growen by the negligence of their Kings, they conclude to reiect Childeric, and to choose Pepin: the one vnworthie to raigne, by reason of his vices, and the other most worthie to be King, for his royall vertues.

And to the end, the fundamentall Law of state should not bee directly infringed in this new election, they bring Pepin from the race of great Clouis, of whome they sayd hee should be acknowledged for the next heire, seing that (vertue & his race being duely weighed) he approached narest to him in vertue. Pepin himselfe would not assit at this assemble: that the offer of this dignitie (being made without his apparēt seeking it) might be the more honorable. Being called to heare the general conclusion of the Parliament, and the common desire of all the French, hee presents himselfe, being pleasing to all men, in more then an ordinary sort: little of bodie, but shewing in his countenance the greatnes of his spirit: amiable by his mild and modest behaviour, and admirable for his graue pleasing Maiestie.

The Assembly lets him vnderstand by Boniface Archbishop of Mayence or Mentz, that the French (in regard of his vertues, and their future hope) had by a free and generall consent, chosen him King of France. And for execution of the said decree, hee was instantly (in the presence of them all) installed King, the royall Crowne was set vpon his head by the said Archbishop, and then he was raysed vpon a target, and carried about the assembly, after the ancient ceremonie of the French. And by vertue of

A the same decree, Childeric was chalenged as vnworthy of the Crowne, degraded, shaued, and confined into a Monastery, thereto passe the remainder of his daies. This notable change happened in the yeare 750. in the City of Soissons, but with to resolute a consent of all the French nation, as there appeared not any one that made them to dislike thereof. A most assured testimony, that God had so determined, hauing referred to himselfe the soueraigne authority ouer Kings, to place and displace, gird & ungird, raise and cast downe, according to his good pleasur, alwaies iust, & alwaies wise. To him we must ascribe the principall and soueraigne cause of all changes: For God is the gouernour, as hee is the Creator: It being a necessary consequence, that he gouernes that which he hath created and by his prouidence wateth especially ouer mankind, for whom he hath made the world. If we shall otherwise seeke the nearest causes of this alteration, we may iustly say, that vice dispossessed Childeric, & vertue set Pepin in possession of the Crowne: loue & the reuerence of his subjects, being the support of publike authority: hate and contempt the ruine thereof. To the end that Princes by so worthy an example, may learne to banish vice, (which making them hateful & contemptible) thrusts them from their Thrones: and to plant vertue, which causing them to be respected and honored, makes them to raigne ouer nations.

Now we begin a new government, vnder new Kings, and in a new race. In the beginning we shall see two great Princes, vnder whom good order shall make an alteration of affaires, with an abundance of all blessings, both spirituall & temporall: iustice, wisdom, policie, armes, valour, large limits of territories, abundance of peace, & the excellent knowledge of learning, to raise this estate to the greatest happines that euer it enioyed, & scarce any other kingdom whatsoeuer, let forraigne nations say what they please. But the happines of these two Kings shall not be hereditary in their posterity, who beginning soone to degenerate, shall decline by degrees, vntil that vice degrading them of the Crowne, vertue shall giue it to another, who shall shew himselfe a more lawfull successor, and righter heire to Charlemagne, hauing a better part in his vertues. This second race shall enioy the kingdom 237. yeares, beginning to raigne in the yeare 750. & ending in the yeare 987. hauing begun by vertue, and ended by vice. A goodly lesson for Potentates: that bounty, wisdom and valour, are no hereditarie possessions to be left vnto their children, but they are the gifts of God, the author of all good, and their soueraigne Prince, to whom they owe homage for their greatnesse, as to him of whom depends absolutely all the kingdoms of the earth, and whose prouidence is the infallible rule of the changes which wee see incident to mankind, the which the ignorant without reason, attribute to blind fortune.

Pepin seeing himselfe seated in the throne of the French Monarchie, by the honorable fauour of the French: he resolues to satisfie their hopes by the effects of his actions: and begins to confirme in their mindes the true and firme bond of obedience, the which is vnted with these two strings, loue, and the peoples respect to their superiours. No thing being more naturall, then to loue him from whom wee receiue or hope for good, and to respect him whom we hold sufficient to make vs to liue peaceably and in quiet, especially when he hath power and command in the commonweale, without the which the particular cannot subsist.

Thus Pepin assembles the generall estates, meaning to laye a good foundation in time for the affaires of the realme, by the aduice of such as had called him. and according to his Fathers stile, hee names this assembly a Parliament, whereto hee calles the Clergie, the Nobilitie, the Iudges of the land, and the common people: that with one consent they might resolue what was necessary for the whole estate, consisting of these goodly parts. During these alterations, the Saxons (as farthest from their Maisters) had shaken off the yoke of the French obedience: and by their example and practices, had drawne other people of Germanie (subject to this Crowne) to the like reuolt. Pepin armes presently, and goes with such expedition, as he ouerthrowes them at the passage of the riuer of Vistula: but the Popes distresse giues him presently a new cause to imploy his forces: for Zacharie being dead,

Stephen the second (a Romaine borne) succeeds both in place and troubles: being forced to defend himselfe against the Lombardes, the capitall enemies of the Romaine seat. Astolpho was then their King, who made great preparations against this new Pope, although he made no shew of open hatred. Stephen well informed of the Lombards humour and intent, resolves (not to attend the stroke) but to fortifie himselfe in time, & seeking first to Constantine Emperour of the East, without any successe, hee intreats Pepin to succour him: from whom having received a favourable answer, the better to obtaine the remedy he expected, he resolves to go into France: where being honourably entertained by Pepin, he doth againe Crowne him King of France, in Saint Denis Church, in a great and solemne assemblie, and makes miserable Childerica Monke, assigning him the Cloister for a perpetuall prison, & a Priars frock for an ignominious punishment, without any hope of returne. Then he employed all his wits to perswade Pepin, to undertake the voyage of Italy against the Lombards, and drew him easily therunto. But Astolpho (feeling the Pope,) employed Caroloman the brother of Pepin to divert him from this enterprise. This Caroloman was a Monke, and in great reputation of piety: but he could not dissuade Pepin from this desire: yet would he not attempt any thing rashly, but first trie mildnesse before force. Hee therefore sends his Ambassadors to the Lombard, to summon him to yeeld Ravenna, and all the Townes of the six gouernours to the Pope. Astolpho vsesh great temperance in his answers, to shew the reverence he bare to the Church of Rome, and to Pepins intercession: but he refused neuer to yeeld any thing. Pepin finding the Lombards evasions and policie, who sought but to auoid this storme, assembles a Parliament: and layes before them both dutye and necessity, to succour the Pope. To this end hee resolves to leane an Armie against the Lombard. Winter being spent in these treaties, and in the preparations for warre: in the Spring he enters Italy with a strong and mighty armie, which marcheth victoriously in all places, taking Townes, and spoiling the country of Astolpho, and then hee went to besiege Pavia, the capitall City of Lombardie. Astolpho foreseeing his ruine, flies to humble intreaties, both to the Pope and Pepin. The Pope lulled a sleepe with the Lombards faire promises, not greatly louing the French, but by constraint: suffers himselfe first to bee abused, and then hee perswades Pepin to returne backe into France.

Astolpho promised to yeeld vp both Ravenna, and all that hee detained from the Church, the which he could not performe in so great a desolation of his country, being thus charged with such an enemy. Stephen was well satisfied with this promise, forgetting the Lombards humour, so well knowne vnto him. Pepin glad to see the Pope satisfi- ed having no other object but to giue him satisfaction, returns presently into France, to his owne affaires. But he had scarce passed the Alpes, when as Astolpho assembles all his subiects (being mad with rage for their great losses, and infinitely incensed against the Pope, who had drawne in the French) and enters the territories of the Church in hostile manner, sackes and spoiles all with a furious cruelty: & todenly besiegeth Rome, where the Pope was resident. Stephen amazed at this unexpected violence, sends back to Pepin, implores his aide, lamentes his credulity, and detests the treachery of the Lombards: he beseecheth him to make haste, if he will preferre his old age from the cruell hand of this disloyall, and the whole Church from a horrible desolation, exceeding that of the Vandales or Ostrogoths.

Pepin moued with the Popes intreaties, and the ancient danger: assembles his forces, with a wonderfull celerity: and although Constantin by a most affectionate message laboured to divert him, yet he brings back his army into Italy. The fruit of his returne was both sodaine & great: for Astolpho at the brute thereof raised the siege from before Rome, and retires to Pavia, the capitall City of his realme. Pepin besiegeth him on: & forceth him to accept of such conditions of peace, as hee would preferre. viz. Astolpho should presently deliuer up all that he held of the Church, and giue hostages: and Pepin should remaine in Italy at the Lombards charge, until hee had performed all things. Astolpho sends in forty hostages, yeelds Ravenna, with the Citties of the

A the sixe Gouernours, and those hee held in Romagnia: but when there remained no more to deliuer vp, but the Citties of Ferrara and Faenza, the Lombard did cunningly delay the full accomplishment of his promise, to finde some meanes to send backe to rude an officer as the French, lying vpon his countrie in garrison, and spoiling it, and so to deceiue both the Pope and Pepin: but behold a strange accident befalls him. Being a hunting, chasing more after his fantasies then the beast, his horse casts him downe a rocke and breakes his neck.

Of an ill life an vnhappy
end.

Thus the subtil Lombard thinking to deceiue, was deceiued: he ended his subtiltie with his life, and the warre begun by him without reason, by a iust death. The Pope recouers his places, and Pepin returns into France, taking nothing in Italy, but leaving the realme of Lombardie in the same estate he found it, without any alteration. This Kingdome ended not with Astolpho, for Didier Duke of Hetruria his neefe kinsman, seizeth presently thereon, by meanes of his intelligences: but Rachise brother to Astolpho (who was lately become a Monke) leaues his frock, to enioy his fathers kingdome: yet for that he was the weaker in this iust title, the Pope pacified this contro- uersie in fauour of Didier, who remained King of Lombardie, vpon condition that the Citties of Ferrara and Faenza should be yeelded to the Church. But let vs returne to Pepin. his absence, with two yeares continuall warres, had broken the vsuall custome to call a Parliament, and bred many disorders within the realme: so as being returned into France, he presently called a solemne Parliament, wherein he established lawes ac- cording to the inconueniences that were to be redrest: as good lawes doe commonly proceed from bad manners. In this assembly he gaue audience to the Ambassadors of the Emperour Constantin, who demanded a confirmation of the amitie and alliance which the Emperour had with the house of France: and receiues the new homage of Tasillon Duke of Bauiere. So referring all matters of importance to the iudgement of the Estates, honouring them that had honoured him, he doubled his subiects deuotion, and established good lawes within his realme. But knowing the humour of the French, impatient of rest, he found how difficult it was to retaine them long in peace, without some foraine imploiment: and necessity presents him two occasions, one in Guienne, and the other in Saxonie, Countries subiect to the Crowne of France, but both impatient of the French command. The Saxons began first with whom Tasillon Duke of Bau- ere, (who as we said did homage to the King) ioines, contrary to his oth. This warre seemed of some difficultie, drawing to it all the other Germanes subiect to this Crowne: but Pepin preuented it with such speed, as hauing suppressed the Saxons, he forced them to a new obedience, charging them to bring him yearly three hundred good horses for an homage: that they should vndergo the censure of the Estates, & be enemies to the enemies of the King and realme.

He makes a foraine war to auoide a ciuill.

Hauing thus pacified Saxonie, he makes a generall assembly at Wormes, to settle the affaires of Austrasia: from thence he marcheth with his victorious armie, against Ieffroy Duke of Guienne, according to the resolution of the Estates, being leuiued for that occasion. We haue said, that Eudon father to Ieffroy had greatly disquieted France, and left his children heires of his discontent: but Martel withdrewne by new difficulties, could not finish that which he had begun. Ieffroy remains sole Duke of Guienne, by the death of his brother: he growes daily more insolent, bandies all his subiects of Guienne openly against France, and afflicts the Clergie infinitely in their liues and livings. Pepin begins with admonitions and threats, but Ieffroy grows more obstinate in concerning his Kings command: so as they must come to open force, and Ieffroy must pay the interests of his long delays. Pepin enters Guienne with an armie, and Ieffroy seeing his resolution, sends his deputies to auoide this storme, beseeching him with all humilitie to pardon what was past, promising obedience. Pepin (hauing commanded him to make restitution to the Clergie) returns into France, and dismisseth his armie, supposing Guienne to be quiet. Ieffroy, seeking his owne ruine by his furious rashnes, goes to field with such forces as he could leue among his subiects, & hauing passed Loire, he enters Bourgoigne in hostile manner, hoping to surpris Charlens. The King held a Parliament at 7 64 Orleans, when this intelligence came vnto him, he sends them presently to Neeers: as-sembleth his forces, and marcheth against Ieffroy, who suddenly repasseth the riuier, and with great marches recouers Bourdeaux, as the Citie of his greatest safetie, being as much confuted in his defence, as he was rash in his attempt. Pepin pursues him, and in his passage all the Townes of Guienne yeeld without any difficulty, as to him whom they acknowledge for their lawfull King. Ieffroy forsaken of all men, pursued criminally by his Prince, is slaine by one of his household seruants, and is interred like a beast, in a marish nere to Bourdeaux. In detestation of his memory, the place is called the Tombe of Caiphaz vnto this day. Thus was the vniust and rash rebellion of Ieffroy punished: & by his death the warre died in Guienne: and the wife valour of Pepin was so much the more commended, for that his iust pursute was accompanied with patience and mildnesse. But Pepin was mortall the toile of so great wartes, & the care of publike affaires, had much broken him, so as his old age might be more profitably employed in the maintenance of Iustice and peace, then in warre, the burthen whereof he might without danger lay vpon his eldest sonne Charles, a wife & a valiant young Prince, of whose modestie and obedience he was well assured.

Pepin resignes the Crowne to Charles.

Thus resolving to passe the rest of his dayes in quiet, but not idly, he retires to Paris, but soone after he was surpris'd with a sicknesse, whereof hee dyed, and so went to heauen, there to find rest which he could enioy on earth: it was in the yeare 768. & of his raigne the eighteenth. By his wife Berthe with the great foote, he left two sonnes, Charles and Caroloman: recommending them to the Estates, to giue them portions at their pleasures. So great was the assurance of this good Prince in the loue of his subiects, whom as he had made the most assured gard of his person & state, so at his death he left his children to their faithfull discretion. He had seuen daughters, Berthe the wife of Milon Earle of Mans, mother to that great roland, Hiltrude wife to René Earle of Genes, mother to that renowned Oliuer, Roharde, Adeline, Idubergue, Ode and Alix. He had the happines to enioy his owne father, vntill hee came to the age of man: the like good hap continued in his children: and for the perfecting of his happinesse, hee had a sonne, one of the greatest and most excellent Princes that euer ware crowne. Thus Pepin the first of that race, mounted the royall throne of France: thus he reigned, thus he liued, and thus he died, leauing to his posterity a happy taste of his name. A religious Prince, wife, moderate, valiant, louing his subiects, & beloued of them, happy in father, in children, & in his government, an excellent patterne for excellent Princes, who by his example hold it for a resolute maxime, That the strongest citadell of a Prince is the loue of his subiects, and the surest bond of their authority, a respect gotten and preferred by vertue.

Estate of the Empire and of the Church.

BEFORE we enter the raigne of Charlemagne, we must briefly represent the estate of the Romane Empire, the which was happily vnitd to the French Monarchy, and of the Church of Rome, by reason whereof there happened great and notable exploits vnder his raigne. The Empire of Rome had nothing remaining in the West, as we haue shewed. Gaul was possessed by the French, with the best part of Germanie: & since the beginning of their Monarchie, vnto the time we now describe, it hath beene greatly enlarged, not onely in compasse of territories, & obedience of people, but also in reputation of ciuility, mildnesse, iustice, wisdom, and valour, as well by the happy successe of their victorious armies, as by the modest vsage of their victories, towards such as they subdued. Spain was apportioned to diuers nations, Vandales, Goths, Sarazins, pelmel, some here, some there. Italy was in miserable estate. Rome (sometimes the head of the world) was then the sinke of all confusion, the Rendezvous of all furious nations, as if they had vndertaken the ruine thereof by taske, hauing sackt it three time: for vnder the Empire of Honorius, in the yeare of grace 414. the Goths, by their King Alaric, F tooke it after two yeares siege, and sackt it, without demanteling thereof. Fortie five yeares after, vnder the Empire of Martian, in the yeare 459. the Vandales vnder the conduct of Genferike their King, take it againe, sacke it, spoyle it, and disgrace it, leading

The Empire in the West.

In Gaul.

In Spain.

In Italy.

A leading the widow of the Emperour Valentinian the third, safely in triumph. In the time of Iustinian the Emperour, the Goths vnder the command of Totila, hauing vndermined it with a long siege, tooke it, sackt it, and demanteled it. Thus Rome was no more Rome, but a horrible confusion, after so many ruines, retaining nothing of her ancient beauty, but onely the traces of her old buildings, and the punishment of her tyrannie, hauing endured that which she had caused other Citties to suffer.

Behold Italy wasted, infinitely tormented by sundrie enemies, who had vniustly afflicted all the nations of the earth. The Goths had first seized thereon, and enioyed it long. but as vnder the Empire of Iustinian in the yeare of Christ 552. they were expelled by the valour of Narfes, an excellent Captaine, who defeated their armie, slew their King Totila, and repeopled Rome: so soone after, the Lombards comming out of Germanie, lodged in their place, as if they had played at latell-coyle, being drawne thither by Narfes himselfe, discontented with the ill vsage hee received from Iustinian his maister. The Lombards held Italy about 200. yeares, vntill that Charlemagne expelled them. At the same time the six Gouernours for the Empire of Rome, held Ravenna and some other Citties depending, (thus was the greatnesse of the Romane Empire restrained) but with such couetousnesse and insolence, as it tyred them no lesse then forraigne foes. That gouernment of sixe ended by the Lombards, and the Lombards by the French, (as the sequel will shew) who purchased credite euery where, by comparing the barbarous and confused inuasions of these warlike nations, they adding to the valour and good successe of their armes, iustice, pietie, temperance and clemencie: this reputation of vertue, winning them as many hearts as their swords did Citties.

Italy desolate, by the Goths.

By the Lombards.

The which are extolled by the French.

During these confused and obscure times, there passed about 400. yeares, from the first sack of Rome, vntill that Charlemagne (expelling the Lombards) became absolute maister of Italy, & was made Emperour at Rome. All this passed vnder the Emperours of Theodosius, sonne to Arcadius, of Valentinian the 3. Martian, Leo the second, Zenon, Anastasijs, Iustin the first, Iustinian the first, Iustin the second, Tiberius, Mauricius, Phocas, Heraclius, Constantin the second, Iustinian the second, Philippicus, Artemius, Leo the third, Constantin the third, Leo the fourth, Ireneus, Nicephorus, vnder whom by a publicke and iollemne contract, the distinction of the Easterne and Westerne Empires was made.

The command of the West is left as it were in garde with Charlemagne, and the French nation. But the East was in a bad plight, although the name and teare of the Empire were yet at Constantinople: for besides the dissipation of the State, (to increase their miserie) a new sect sprung vp, forged by Mahomet an Arabian borne, vnder a colour of libertie, by the mixture of sundrie doctrines, and after a mould of carnall felicitie. With this charme hee corrupted infinite numbers of people, and erected a new Kingdome in the East, from whence hee vtterly expelled the Romane name, with all the dignitie of the Empire. This was in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, in the yeare of grace 623. an infamous date, to note the beginning of Mahomet's blasphemies. Hee began in Arabia, hauing wonne credit with the Sarrazins, who were Arabian Souldiars, desperate aduenturers, and discontented with the Romans: and by the first beginning of his new doctrine, hee gotte so great reputation, as hee assembled an infinite number of men, armed with an incredible celeritie, vnder the ensigne of libertie. So as he marched as a conquerour in all places, hauing not onely subdued (by the force of these tumultuous troupes, Arabia, where hee was borne) but also Persia, Palestina, Iudea, Egipt, and Affrike, and then ranging ouer Asia the lesse, became to the gates of Constantinople, in lesse then thirtie yeares.

The beginning of Mahomet's blasphemies.

But the providence of God, caring for the preferuation of his Church, opposed the French Monarchie, against the violent rage of Mahomet, which else had ouerflowed all Europe, into the which hee had already made a breach by Spain, had gotten a great countie, and was ready to invade France, if Charles Martel had not stoppt his course at Tours, as wee haue sayd. During these confusions in the Empire, the Bishop of Rome grewe great by these ruines. The Goths and Vandales were more enemies to the estate, then to religion: for although for the most part they were Arrians, yet did they aduow themselves Christians, and held the common signe of Christianity, so as in the taking and sacking of the Citie of Rome, the Bishop was somewhat respected, & in his fauour the people built vpon the foundation of the ruined houses: and many of the Countie finding more safetie at Rome, then in other cities of Italie, retired themselves thither, and peopled the Citie. So by this occasion newe Rome (the seat of the Popes iurisdiction succeeding the Emperours) hath bene built within old Rome, amidst the Pallaces, walkes, Basiliques, Colizees, Amphytheatres, and other ancient buildings.

Contention for the Premacy.

But about all, the credit and authoritie of the Bishop of Rome (by these new occurrences) crept in by degrees, vntill he aduanced him selfe about the Emperours, Kings, & Princes of Christendome: yet he of Constantinople held himselfe the superior, being in the proper seat of the Empire, and in the light of the Imperiall Court. Thus they fall to debate, and the cause of their dissensions was the preheminance of their seas, and the authoritie of the vniuersall Bishop. This contention bred infinite confusions in the Church, and in an vnreasonable time, which inured men to sacke and spoyle. So as S. Gregorie Bishop of Rome (a man of singular pietie & learning) hauing courageously opposed himselfe against Iohn Bishop of Constantinople, who affected this title of vniuersall Bishop, and detesting so vnreasonable and vnreasonable an ambition, cries out. O times, oh manners, the whole world is set on fire with warre. Christians are euery where massacred by idolaters, Citties and Temples razed by Barbarians, and yet the pastors of the Church (as it were treading under foot the common calamitie of Gods people) dare usurpe names of vantage, and braue it with these prophane titles.

speech of
S. Gregorie.

The reader curious to vnderstand the Estates of those times, and to note the degrees and authoritie of this vniuersall Bishop, established in the Church, may read the epistles of this good father, great in name, and in effect, without troubling my selfe to set them downe in particular: whose intention was to shew, That who so taketh vpon him the authoritie and title of vniuersall Bishop in the Church, and to haue any Soueraigne preheminance, presumes about Iesus Christ, the onely head of the sacred bodie of the Church, and by consequence he doth asseme that he is the forerunner of Antichrist. And yet after these graue and serious admonitions of Saint Gregorie the great, within tenne yeares after Boniface the third obtained from Phocas the Emperour the title of vniuersall Bishop, with authoritie ouer the vniuersall Church, as Platina the Popes Secretary doth report.

Hee that tak-on him the

ner of Antichrist.

Dispute for Images.

To this quarrell for the Supremacie, was added the controuersie for images, which caused infinite confusions: the Emperours and Bishops were banded one against another, and by their dissensions the people were stirred vp to seditious reuolts, the which after many Tragicall euents, were a meane to ruine the Empire of the East. It was a popular custome to erect Images to those whome they would honour, as hauing deserved well of the Common weale. Christians desiring to honour the memorie of holy men, began to set vp images euen for them also, following this ciuill custome, and did erect them in Temples, as places consecrated to deuotion. Some Bishops fauored this new deuice in the Church, and others did impugne it. Epiphanius did teare a picture in peeces, and Serenus did beat downe an image, the one in the East, the other in the West. The Christians borne and bred in this ancient doctrine of the Apostles, My children beware of images, maintained in the Catholike Church, by succession from father to sonne, could not digest this innovation: no more could the Emperours.

Images at the first a polunacent on.

Hence grew the dissention, the greatest part of the Bishops holding the contraries: That it was a part of the seruice of God, and a bond to retayne mens soules in deuotion with reuerence. This contention grew in the time of the Emperour Philippicus called Bardanes, who by an Edict caused them to be throwne downe, in the yeare of grace 713. the which continued to 782. vnder Constantin the second called Copronimus, an enemy

A enemy to images, who commanded them to bee cast downe, contrary to the liking of his mother Irene, who not onely maintained them with violence, but also caused them to be confirmed by a Council held at Nicea Citie in Bithynia, beinge that at Constantinople (where she had made the conuocation of this Ecclesiastical Assembly) the people were resolute to withstand them. Hence grew an execrable Tragedie in the Imperiall Court. Irene beinge her sonne resolute against her deuotion of Images, was so transported, (as hauing seized on him in his chamber) she caused his eyes to be put out, so as dying with griefe, she vnrings the Empire. Through this bad government, confusion so increased in the East, as in the end necessitie made the way for Charlemagne, to take vpon him the dignitie and title of the Emperour of the West, and to preserue the continuance of this Historie.

Tragicall cruelty of a mother against her sonne.

I am bound to obserue these notable occurrences, in those times, as belonging to the subiect of my Historie, to represent truly both the Estate of the Empire and of the Church, when as Charlemagne vnderooke the gouernement of the Empire, and vniited it happily to the French Monarchie. The wise reader may verifie more plainly in the Originalls, (from whence I haue drawne this Inuentorie) what I haue briefly set downe here touching the occurrences of those ages, wherein the Oracle of holy antiquitie was verified by the end of these strange Tragedies. The truth is lost by contending. The first simplicity of the Catholike Church, being rich in her pouertie by the abundance of truth, contained since the golden age of the Apostles and their Disciples, was changed into rich and stately pompe: the Crowne of martirdome wherewith the first Bishops of Rome had bene honoured, into a triple Crowne, which not onely hath and doth giue Lawes to the Emperours, Kings and Princes of the earth, but doth tread them vnder foot, dispossesse them of their estates, and declares them incapable of rule when they obey him not: and for a marke of this soueraigne authoritie, hee makes them to kisse his feet, in token of the homage of deuotion, and spirituall reuerence, as hauing power ouer soules, to iudge of all men, and all things soueraignly, and not to bee iudged by any, as the circumstances of our historie wil shew in diuerse places.

HE Estates of France assemble after the death of Pepin, and by A their consents and aduice, Charles and Caroloman his sonnes diuide the realme betwixt them by equall portions. Charles was crowned at Wormes, Caroleman at Soissons: writers agree not in the declaration of their portions, for that by the death of Caroleman, the whole realme came to Charles, three yeares after the death of their Father. Brothers of diuers humors, who in the end had ruined each other by this equalitie of power, which proues often an vnjust and a dangerous ballance in an estate. But Gods will was to preserve so great a Monarchie in Europe, to be a harbour for his Church, by chosing a great Prince, to vnite in him alone the power which is dismembred by the command of many Maisters.

patern of a great King.
His manners.

Charles was endued with singular gifts, both of body and minde, wherevnto (by the wife care of his father Pepin) was added (as a scale) the instructions of a vertuous conuersation, learning and armes. For the ground of all vertues, he was carefully instructed in religion, the which hee loued and honoured with great reuerence all his life time; and likewise the Churches and Pastors. Charitie, temperance, equitie, care of Iustice, and of order to releue the people, to keepe his faith both to friend and foe, and to vse a victory modestly, were the notable effects of this excellent knowledge, as remarkable in him, as in any Prince that euer liued. Hee loued learning by nature, and learned men. Paul of Pisa instructed him in the Greeke and Latin tongues, and Simon in Philosophie and the Mathematikes. Hee called these humane sciences his pastimes, and the companions of his Sword, and sometimes did recreate himselfe therein.

24. King of France.

A therein. Hee tooke a delight in poetry, as some of his writings do witnes: but especially in Histories, wherein he was exceeding well red.

The vniuersities of Paris and Pisa, (built or enriched by him) witness the loue and honour hee bare to learning. In armes hee had his father Pepin for his chiefe schoole-master, and experience doth testifie how much he profited. Before his father left him, he had great commands, and discharged them with such reputation, as the continuance of his armes, when he was King, shewe plainly, that there was never soldiar that carried sword with more valour, nor great Captaine that commanded with more obedience, nor performed any thing with greater fortune, nor vied his victories with more mildnesse & iudgement. neyther did euer King or Prince raigne with more authority, nor was more reuerently obeyed then our Charlemagne, well deseruing the name of great for his vertues. He was of a liuely disposition, quicke, active, and velt good a grace, as if the one could not bee without the other: and this moderation of diuers humors, made him as admirable in his wit, as venerable in his countenance, and person.

There appeared in him a graue sweete Maiefty, in a goodly personage, great, strong, and patient of labour, A quicke spirit, cleere, sound, both in apprehension, memory, and iudgement: resolution neuer failed him in difficulties, no replie in discourses: terrible to some, amiable to others, according to the cause, persons and occurrences. Ver- C tues which purchased him so great credit, as he was beloued, respected and feared of all men: with such obedience, as the effects of his raigne do shewe: for hauing receiued a great Kingdome from his father, he enlarged it with a wonderfull successe, God hauing raised y^e these three great Princes, one after another, Charles Martel, Pepin & this great Charles, to preserve the Christian name in a great Monarchy, amidst the de- luge of barbarous nations and the ruine of the Empire. The success of his raigne.

I haue coated these his singular vertues in the beginning, to giue a tast to the obseruation of his great and admirable actions, where there wants nothing but order, to relate them fully in so great a diuersity, the which hath ministred occasion to the obscure writers of those times, to be too breefe or too tedious, & ofte-times to report matters D very vnlikely, for the greatnesse of things which they haue handled in a fabulous manner: and in deed the euents are almost incredible, and more miraculous then ordinary. Doubtlesse I could gather out of the most confident authors, and that according to the order of times as euery thing hath changed, and answerable to the greatnes of the subiect, that which cannot well be represented without some direction.

All the deedes of Charlemagne must bee referred to that which he hath done either whilest hee was King alone of France, or when he was Emperour, and had vnitied the Empire to his royaltie. And in those times, there is first to be obserued what he did in the life of Caroleman in Guienne, and after his death in Italy, Spaine and Saxony, where he had great matters to decide. This is the dessein of our relation.

Caroleman was infinitely iealous of his brothers greatnes, whome with greafe hee did bee loued, honored and obeyed of all the French, for his singular vertues, both of body and minde. This iealousie (too ordinary a Counsellor to Princes) made him to seeke all meanes to oute- E quine and ouerthrowe the affaires of Charlemagne, who had his eyes fixed vpon Italy, as the goodly and most beautifull theatre of his valour, the true subiect to maintaine his authority and power among Christians; and Caroleman did all hee could to crosse his desseins. And this was the estate of Rome and Italy.

Rebellion in Guienne by Hunault.

Presently after the decease of Pepin, the Church of Rome fell into great confusions, A by the practises of Didier King of Lombardie, a sworn and capital enemy, having corrupted some of the Clergie: hee caused Constantin brother to Toton Duke of Nepezo, (his vassall and trustie) to bee chosen Pope, with such violence, as hee made Philippicus (being already Canonically chosen) to be degraded. This better party, seeing themselves contemned by the Lombard, assemble together, and by one common consent choose Stephen the third, a Sicilien, for Pope, who resolues to call in the King of France, and to oppose him against his enemies desseins. Charles solicited by the Pope, sends twelue Prelates speedily to Rome, to fortifie their party, against the other: meaning at greater neede to apply a greater remedy. The matter succeeded according to their desire that had intreated him, for the Counsell being assembled at Latran, they confirme Stephen lawfully chosen, and depose Constantin raised by disorder and violence.

But Didier would not be controuled with this repulse, and seeing that force had not succeeded, he resolues to trie policy, and to vnder-mine Stephen with a good shew. He sends to congratulate his election, purgeth himselfe of the Antipope Constantin degraded: accuseth both him and his brother of ambition, protesting to liue with him in amity: and for prooffe of this his good meaning, he desires him to be pleased with his repaire to Rome, thereto confer with him in priuate. The Pope (who neuer flies to the French but in necessity) was easily perswaded by Didier: who came to Rome, confers with the Pope, and makes great protestation of his obedience. But this good shew continued not long.

There was a gouernor at Rome for the Emperour, called Paul Ephialte. Didier corrupted this Grecian: and as the execution of Iustice was in his hands, hee makes vse of him so cunningly, as in the presence of Pope Stephen, hee causeth him to seize vpon two of his chiefe Secretaries, Christopher & Sergius, (accused by him of supposed crimes) and to hang them infamously. Their greatest offence, was to haue fauored the French. This presumption proceeded farther, for he caused all the principall Cittizens to be banished, whome hee noated to bee of the French faction: that hauing taken away all lets, he might be master of Rome in despite of the Pope. Stephen discovering the Lombards practise, to his preiudice, flies to Charlemagne, beseeching him to prepare an armie against his forcer that did ruine him by his apparent mildnes. Charlemagne was fully resolved: but Didier had provided a remedy in France, by the meanes of Caroloman, to stop Charles his passage into Italie, making worke for him in Guienne, where there grew a perillous warre vpon this occasion.

Wee haue sayd before, that although the Countrie of Guienne depended of the Crowne of France, yet were there many tumults through the practises of some Noblemen of the Countrie, who stirred vp the people (being mutinous of themselves) to rebellion. The cause of these reuolts was the abuse of the Kings bounty, who suffered such people as they had conquered, to inioy their priuileges, and liberties, intreating them with all fauour. Eudon began first vnder Martel: Jeffroy and Hunault his children, and heires of his discontent, had continued it vnder Pepin: Jeffroy being dead, Hunault succeeds him with the like hatred, the which Caroloman entertayned to employ him against his brother Charles. And as reasonse and ambition thrust him on to attempt against him, so did he make his profit of the couetous ambition of Hunault, feeding him with the hope of the reuenues of Guienne, seing his humour was to bee a Duke, supposing to haue credit inough with the people, if hee were fauoured by one of the Kings of France against the other. Guienne was a part of Charles his portion: Hunault layes the foundation of his desseine, to withdrawe himselfe wholly from the Crowne of France, and to make open warre against Charlemagne, in practising the people of Guienne, to bee declared Duke by their consent, according to the right which he pretended. The countenance of Caroloman could do much, but drew wisdom and courage of Charlemagne preuailed more, for being aduertised of Hunaults practises, and of his brothers secret desseignes, hee armed with such speede, as hee surprised the townes

A townes of Poitiers, Xaintes and Angoulesme: and by that meanes all the Countrey adioyning. Hunault (who made his accou without Charles) finding himselfe preiured, fled to a Nobleman of the Countrey named Loup, whome hee not onely held to bee very firme to his faction, but also his trustie and affectionate friend. Charlemagne tends presently to Loup: hee summons him to deliuer Hunault into his hands, as guilty of high treason: and in the meane time hee builds a fort in the midst of the Countrey, whereas the raiers of Dordone and Lisle do ioyne, the which hee called Franfuc, as it were the front of the Sarrazens, whom hee had caused to feare if these desseins had succeeded. Thus getting Hunault with all his family, hee doth punish him as a rebell: he pardoned Loup, and all that had obeyed him: and so ends a dangerous warre without blowes: but he graunts life and liberty to Hunault, and the enioyng of all his goods: leaving a memorable example to Princes, howe they ought to carry themselves in ciuill warres, preventing a mischief by wisdom and diligence, and not to thrust their vanquished subiects into dispaire, by rigour. Caroloman seeing his practises against his brother to succeed ill, vndertakes a voiage to Rome, with an intent to cause some alteration there: yet with a shew of deuotion. His Mother Berthe (who likewise went this voiage), was honorably receiued in her iourney by Didier king of the Lombards, treating a marriage betwixt her sonne Charlemagne and Theodora, Sister or Daughter to this Didier, one of the greatest enemies of her sonnes good fortune. Yet Charlemagne, to please his Mother, receiued this wife, but soone after hee put her away, as vnfit for his humours and affaires: and so that which seemed a cause of loue, bred greater hate betwixt these two Princes. Caroleman hauing effected nothing at Rome, but only made shew of his foolish and malicious ialousie, too apparent in this his stayned deuotion, returnes into France, and there dies soone after, in the year. 774.

Now is Charlemagne alone by his Bothers decease: who quietly takes possession of his Estates, and reteineth such of his seruants as he knew to haue bene most trustie to his brother, during their common ialousies, expecting the like faithfullnes, hauing entertained them when there was least hope.

The deeds of Charlemagne King of France alone vntill he was Emperour.

Charlemagne hauing put away his wife Theodora for subiect of incontinency, hee married with Hildegade or Ildegrade, Daughter to the Duke of Suene his vassall, by whom hee had Charles, Pepin, Lewis, and three daughters Kotrud, Berthe & Gille, the nurcery of his Noble family. Carolomans ialousie died not with him, but suruiued in Berthe his wife: who (impatient of her condition, thrust head-long with Didier King of Lombardy, as to the most bitter and irreconcilable enemy of Charlemagne) retires with her two sonnes to procure the Pope (Stephen being dead and Adrian a Romaine gentleman succeeding him) to confirme and Crowne the sonnes of Caroloman for Kings of France. The Lombard had two strings to his bowe, meaning both to put the Pope in disgrace with Charlemagne (the easier to suppress him being destitute of French succors, whereon hee chiefly relied,) and likewise to set France on fire, by the establishment of newe Lords. Didier beseecheth the Pope to graunt this confirmation, to the children of Caroloman for this sake. But Adrian (well acquainted with the Lombards humour,) was so resolute in denying his request, as they fell to open hatred. Didier discontented with this repulse comes and enters the six gouernments, with all his forces, being a Seigneury vnder the Popes iurisdiction, spoiles the Countrey, and beleegeth Ranenma, the chiefe City of the Exarchie.

The Pope sends his Nuncio vnto him, to expostulate the cause of this so sodaine warre against his subiects, desiring him to yeeld what he had taken, and not to proceed in this hostile manner, without any reasonable cause, vpon paine of excommunication.

By his owne preiudice.

At that instant there fell out a great occasion to increase the hatred betwixt Charles and Didier, for that Hunault (who had bene vanquished in Guienne) retired himselfe to Didier, and is not onely courteously receiued: but honored with the charge of general of the army, the which he had leui'd against the Pope. Didier lustred himselfe to be so abused with the persuasions of Hunault, touching the meanes to attempt against the Estate of Charlemagne, that holding Italy vndoubtedly his owne, hee plotted a warre, and assured himselfe of a certaine victory in France. Thus pride and iniquitie hastens his ruine. The Pope hauing no other defence but his excommunication, not defensible against the armies of Didier, flies againe to Charlemagne, as to his sacred Anchor or last hope, intreating ayde from him in his necessity. Charlemagne had great reason to arme against Didier, who had alwaies crossed his affaires: fed his brothers realousies, receiued his widow and children, labored to haue them chosen Kings of France, to trouble or ruine his Estate: entertayned his rebellious subiects, and with them practised to make warre against him.

The iute and summons of the Romaine Church, was a great motiue to induce him to arme, against him who professed himselfe an open enemy to Christian religion, whereof the Kings of France had alwaies shewed themselves protectors and gardiens. But not to attempt any thing rashely, hee first sends his Ambassadors to the Pope, to assure him of his good will, the which should not be wanting in his necessity: but hee thought it best to try mildnesse, before hee vsed force against the Lombard. He therefore sends his Ambassadors to Didier, and doth summon him to restore what hee had taken from the Pope, and to suffer him to liue in peace.

Didier (who relied much vpon his policy,) giues good words to the Ambassadors, promising to performe all that Charles demanded: but in effect hee would haue the Pope accept of conditions of peace from him, and that the children of Caroloman should be declared Kings of France. These demands were found vnreasonable on either side: the treaty is broken, the French Ambassadors returne, and Didier renewes the warre more violently then before, against the Church: and hauing spoyled all the territory of Rauenna, he takes Faenza, Ferrara, Comachia, Compagnia, and Romandiola, townes of the sixe governments.

*Charlemagne*s Ambassadors informe their master, that the warre with the Lombard is inuitable, and find all things at their returne readie to invade Italy: for Charlemagne being forced to suppress the rebellious Saxons, who (impatient of the French yoake) revolted daylie, had leui'd a goodly army, the which was readie to be employed against the Lombard.

But Charles would not attempt any thing in a matter of so great consequence without the aduice of his Estates. Yet loath to loose time, he causeth his army to march, and makes his Rendezuous at Genewa (a towne vnder his obedience vpon the way to Italy), and hauing diuided his army into two, he seizeth vpon the passages of Mont Cenis, and Saint Bernard, which are the two entries from France to Italie. The Estates hauing found the causes of warre against Didier King of Lombardie to be iust, Charlemagne causeth his army to aduance with all speed, and ioynes neere vnto Verceil. Didier attends him there, and giues him battaile: but at the first encounter, he is vanquished by Charlemagne. The Lombard hauing rallied and fortified his troups, receiues a newe defeat, and so great a one, as he is inforced to suffer his enemy to be master of the field. An infallible entrance to his ruine. Thus hauing tumultuously trussed vp what hee could, he sends his sonne Aldegise to Verona, with the widow and children of Caroloman, casting himselfe into Paui, the which he had carefully fortified, as the dungeon and tortresse of his last fortune.

Charlemagne pursues him at the heeles, beseegeth him with all his forces in Paui, and

A and resolues to haue it at what price soeuer. And to shewe his resolution, hee sends for his wife and children into France, to the end the Italians (that were doubtful) might know his minde, and without attending any newe occurrences, resolue to obey the victor. Hauing coopt vp Didier in Paui, and seized vpon all the approaches, hee resolues to take Verona, which they held the strongest place of all the Lombards estate. So leaving his Vncle Bernard to continue the seege at Paui, he marcheth with part of his army to Verona.

His resolution accompanied with these goodly beginnings, and this checke of Didier (shut vp as it were in a prison) gaue a great alteration to the affaires of either party, amidst these people of diuers humors. The Spoletins, the Reatins, those of Ancona, of Ferre and of Osimo (as it were in spight one of another yeeld to Charlemagne, and desert the wretched estate of Didier, as a worthy reward of his trecherous iniustice and violence. The Venetians (being Neuters, spectators of this tragedie, who neuer had delt in any sort with Didier,) offer amity and succors to Charlemagne, who was desirous they should keepe the sea quiet, least the Emperour should be an actor in this quarrell for Didier.

Charlemagne stayed not long at Verona, before the Cittie beganne to yeeld: Berthe the widow of Caroloman, being the chiefe instrument to drawe them to composition, his forces being (as shee saied) verie tearefull. Aldegise the sonne of Didier finding himselfe vnable to resist so resolute a consent of the Cittizens, nor to releue his fathers misery, flies secretly to the Emperour of Constantinople.

I has Verona yeelds to Charlemagne by composition, who receiues both Berthe and the Inhabitants to mercie, to whom hee performs his promise: he inflicts no other punishment vpon Berthe and her children, but a gentle admonition of their vnciuill rashnesse, and to returne into France, there to do better, and to liue more honorably. This was about Easter, which drew Charles to Rome, where hee remayned onely eight daies, to visit the holy places, and to conferre with Pope Adrian. They write wonderers of the great entertaynement the Pope gaue him, and of the shewes of amity of Charlemagne. Hee confirmed all that his father Pepin had giuen vnto the Pope, and greatly augmented it. The Pope made Charles a Patritian of Rome, a degree to mount vnto the Empire: from thence Charles came to Paui, the which being for the space of ten monethes pressed without by warre, and within by pestilence and famine, in the end yeelds by composition: and Didier (who had hated Charles without cause, and attempted warre vpon an houre) falls into his hands, who shewes himselfe wife and modest both to undertake a warre, and to vse the victory.

Thus Charlemagne hauing wisely vnderaken a iust warre, and ended it happily, hee ruined the Kingdome of the Lombards, carrying Didier prisoner to Lion, or to Lege, for writers speake diuersely of the place of his imprisonment. This was in the yeare dome of his 776. A notable date to represent the tragick end of so great a Kingdome, the which continued in Italy onely two hundred and foure yeares, vnder Princes of diuers humors. But iniustice, tyranie and pride prouoked the wrath of God against them, so as thinking to take from an other, they lost their owne: to vsurpe the liberties of others, they fell into an ignominious slavery, and their subailty was the cause of their owne misery.

A mirror for Princes and great States, neuer to attempt an vniust and vnecessary warre, to vsurpe an other mans right, & neuer to thinke to preuaile ouer a good cause by craft and policy. Charlemagne vsed his victory with great moderation towards the conquered nation, to the great content of all the Italians, who held it a great gaine to haue lost their old master, and to be rightly free, being subiect to so wise a Lord: for he left them their ancient liberties, and to particular Princes (such as were vassals to Didier) their Seigneuries: to Arasise sonne in lawe to Didier, hee left the Marquisate of Fenestru. He placed French Gouernors in conquered Lombardy, meaning to haue them treated with the like mildnesse, as the ancient patrimony receiued from his Predecessors. During the seege of Paui a Councell was held at Rome by Pope Adrian, in 77 8. favour of Charlemagne, to give him honours answerable to his deserving of the Church, and namely the right to give all benefices throughout all Christendome, was said to belong vnto him. Charlemagne being returned into France, Adelise the sonne of Didier sought to disquiet Italie, aided by the Emperour Constantine, and the practises of Rogand to whome Charlemagne had giuen Friul, who revolted from his obedience: but all these rebellions were soone suppressed, by the faithfull care of the French Gouvernours, whome Charlemagne had left in the Countre newly conquered: and Rogand being seized of it, suffered the paines of his treacherous rashnes, being beheaded by the Kings commaundement. Thus Italie remayning quiet to him and his (as conquered by a iust warre) it shalbe hereafter incorporate to the French Monarchie in this second race, being giuen in partage to the children of France whilest that the good gouernment of our kings maintaines the dignitie of the Crowne. But the end of this war was the beginning of an other in Germanie, wherof the Saxons were the chief, darwing vnto them according to the diuersitie of occasions) other people of Germanie their neighbours. This war continued 33. yeares, nor all successiue, but at diuers brunts & seasons: the Saxons hauing for a perpetual subiect, to crosse Charlemagne in his desseins, especially being buisied in many other matters of great consequence. I will breefly relate this war of Saxony, reporting with one breath, what hath bene seuerally dispersed in the whole history, without confusion of times or mater, following a stile fit for this history.

A memorable warre in Germanie.

In those times Germanie was subiect to the Crowne of France, although it had particular Estates, vassals to our Kings, whatsoever the Germanies say, who confesse but a part thereof. The Saxons were subiect to our Crowne, as appears by that aboute written, and namely vnder Marcel and Pepin his sonne. The motives of this warre were diuers, the impariencie of a people desiring their ancient libertie, not able to beare an others command, & (as the Germanies say) the hatred and ialousie of a mighty neighbour, threatening them with seruitude, & the controuersie for the limits of their lands: but the greatest and most important cause of these wars, was the diuersitie of religion, for that the Saxons would obstinately hold the Pagan superstition, which they had received from their Ancestors, and Charlemagne urged them to forsake their Paganisme, and to make open profession of the Christian faith: moued with zeale to the generall advancement of the truth, and the priuat dutie of a Prince to his subiects, to provide for their soules health. A thing very worthie obseruation. Belial did then fight against Christ, Pagan superstition against Christian veritie. Put alas, by whome, and wherefore are these vniuall warres at this day? Christian fights against Christian: the most sacred signe of Christianitie appears on either side in Christian and French armies: Christians bloud is spilt by Christians, through a blind furie, & want of vnderstanding in the fundamentall accord of the sauing truth. These are not onely different, but contrary wars to those of Charlemagne: and our imaged tumults, are begun & nourished without reason, both against the good of the Estate and Church. Vpon this controuersie of religion, the Saxons made war eight times against Charlemagne: especially when they found him buisied els where, watching their oportunitie, either to crosse him in his desseine, or to frustrate his attempts. At such time as hee was in Italie they played the wild colts, not onely in reiecting the French command, but also making open war against those Cities in Germanie, which obeyed Charlemagne: they had taken Eresbourg from the Crowne of France, euen vpon his returne, & besieged Sigisbourg, robbing, & spoiling all the Countie about Charlemagne assembling a Parliament at Vormes, leues a great armie, to charge the Saxons in diuerse places. This Councell succeeded happily: for hauing vanquished the Saxons twice in one moneth in a pitched field, he reduced them to their ancient obedience, vsing his victorie with much modestie and wisdom, desiring rather to shew them the power of his authoritie, then the rigour of his force. The chief among them was Widichind, & as religion was the chief motive of these ordinary rebellions, so Charlemagne seeking the establishment of Christian religion in Saxony with great zeale, happily effected it. Having vanquished this Widichind by reason, and humanitie, and brought him to the knowledge of the truth, by his graue & wise conuersation, whom

The causes of this warre.

The difference betweene the warres which Charles made, and ours this day.

Hee subdues the Saxons, and perswades Widichind to be a Christian.

78 4. He perswaded without any violence, to leaue the Pagan superstition, which force of armes could not effect in him, nor in the Saxons: for Mens soules are not gained by force of armes, but by reason. By the meanes of this Widichind, the greatest part of the Saxons were drawne to the knowledge of the true God, and the obedience of the French monarchie: the most obstinate were forced eyther to obey, or to abandon the country: as in deed great numbers of the Saxons rettyred themselues into diuers strange countries.

Thus the war of Saxony ended (being both long & dangerous) & these which were conquered by the truth, were the true conquerers, in knowing the true God. Charlemagne hauing caused the Saxons to leaue their false opinions, was careful to haue them instructed in the truth: to this end he appointed holy and learned men in all places, and gaue meanes to maintaine them: as the Germanie histories report more particularly. It sufficeth me (in declaring this briefly) to shew his piety, comparable with his valour and happinesse, and for a president to Princes, to make religion the soueraigne end of their armes and authorities. This Widichind was a great personage both in wisdom, valour, and authority, and by consequence very notable in the order of our subiect. From him are descended very famous races: The two Henries, the one called Oiseleur or the Fowler, and the other of Bamberg, and the two Othoes, all Emperours: and likewise the Dukes of Saxony, the Marquis of Misne: the Dukes of Sauoy, common consent of learned writers, the which ought to be well obserued in the continuance of this Historie. The offspring of Widichind.

Care of religion most worthy of Princes.

From this warre of Saxony sprung many other in the Northerne parts, wherof I will intreat, hauing discouered briefly of the warre of Spaine, both for that it chanced during that of Saxony, as also (being very memorable) for the ouerthrow of the Sarazins, who threatened Christendome like a deluge. Histories differ much touching this warre, but I will report what is most likely, by the consent of most approved writers, whereof the studious reader may iudge by conference, I being but a faithfull reporter.

The motive of this Spanish warre, was more vpon pleasure then necessitie; but the zeale of religion gaue a colour and shew of necessitie, to the heroycall desire of Charlemagne, seeking to enlarge the limits of the French Monarchie by armes. So this warre of Spaine was more painfull, more dangerous, and of lesse successe then that of Italy, whereunto necessity and duty had drawne Charlemagne: but his wife proceeding in the action, did warrant him from all blame.

Warre in Spaine.

The occasion which made him bend his forces against the Sarazins in Spaine, was the assurance of his good fortune, the quiet peace of his realme, the meanes to employ his Souldiars, the Spaniards hate against the Sarazins, and the generall feare of all Christians, least these Caterpillers should creepe farther into Eutrope. This was the estate of Spaine: the Sarazins had conquered a great part thereof, and were diuided Estate of into diuers commands, vnder the title of Kingdomes: yet these diuers Kings resolved to oppose their vnited forces against Charles their common enemy. Foreseeing then the tempest, they seeked to preuent it, and to crosse the desseignes of Charlemagne, which being discovered, they caused King Idnabala, a Sarazin, to insinuate into his friendship, being a man full of subtil mildnesse. This stratagem prevailed more then all their forces. Charlemagne was thrust forwards by Alphonso surnamed the chaste, King of Nauarre, and by the Asturiens and Galliciens (Christian people of Spaine) to vndertake this warre, being easie, profitable, and honourable, and by consequence most worthy the valiant happinesse of Charlemagne. Moreover this Idnabala (making a shew of friendship,) laboured to hasten him to the execution of this enterprise, from the which he knew well he should not diuert him: but in effect it was to betray him, by the discouering of his intentions: flattering his desire to get the more credit by pleasing him. Charlemagne then well affected of himselfe, and perswaded by others, calles a Parliament at Noyon, and there concludes a warre against the Sarazins of Spaine.

Charlemagne
part.

The armie he employed in that action was goodly, both for the number of men, A and valour of great warriors, being the choise of the most worthy Captaines in Christendome. Amongst the which they number Milon Earle of Angers, Rowland the sonne of Milon and Berthe sister to Charlemagne, Renald of Montaban, the four sonnes of Aimon, Oger the Dane, Oliver Earle of Genova, Brabin, Arnold of Bellande, and others: the great valour of which persons hath bene fabulously reported by the writers of those obscure times, with a thousand ridiculous tales, unworthy the valour of those heroic spirits: proofes of the ignorance of that age, being barren of learned wits. They say that Charlemagne, to make this voyage more honourable in shew, did then institute the order of the twelve Peeres of France.

Being entred into Spain, he found no Sarazin forces in field, but their Citties well B fortified, having resolved a defensive rather then an offensive warre. The most renowned Sarazin Kings were Agolands, Bellingan, Denifis, Marfille and Idnabala, which be the subject of our fabulous tales: but the last as I have sayd, made shew of friendship with Charlemagne, and open hatred against the other Sarazin Kings: with whom notwithstanding he had most strict correspondencie to betray Charles. The first Cittie he attempted was Pampelune in the Kingdome of Nauarre, the which he tooke, by force, but with much paine, losse, and danger. Having sackt it, and slaine all the Sarazins he found, Saragey yeelds to him by composition, with many other small Townes, terrified by the example of Pampelune. This beginning encouraged him to march on, relying on his wonted fortune: but as he passed through the Prouinces of Spain, like a C victorious Prince without any difficulty, having given a part of his armie to lead to Milon of Angiers his brother in law, it chanced neere vnto Bayonne, that Agolands a Sarazin King, (having in this common dispaire, thrust an armie into field,) incountred Milon with his troups, little dreading any enemy) and tooke him at such an aduantage, as he defeated him. The losse was very great, for they report it was of forty thousand men: where Milon was slaine for a confirmation of the Sarazins victory. Charlemagne was faine off, and not able by any diligence to prevent the losse: hee pacifies this amazement, least it should daunt the whole armie. Hee hastens thither, and gathers together the reliques of these discomfited troups, keeping the conquered Citties, and such as were friends in their obedience.

But after this follows a second accident. Agolands puffed up with the pride of this D victory passeth into Gasconie, and besiegeth Agen, to divert Charlemagne from his pursuit, and to draw him home to defend his owne country. So as Charlemagne fearing least his absence, and the Sarazins late victory, should alter the minde of them of Guienne being then subjects of small assurance, he returnes into France. Agolands having continued some moneths at the siege of Agen, and prevailed little, but in ouer-running the country, the which he did freely (without any great resistance) euen vnto Montonge: the countrymen being retired within the Townes, expected the returne of Charlemagne their King. Agolands army was great and proud, with the remembrance of their late victory: so as Charlemagne returning with his troups from Spain E hee eyed, he maintained his countries more through his authority, then by present force, yet hee fortified the courage of his subjects with his presence, and bridled the Sarazin: who could not be ignorant with whom he had to deale, nor where hee was: being environed with enemies on all sides, and in an enemies country. The Sarazin seeming to incline to a peace, gaue Charlemagne to understand, that he had first inuaded, and that his passage into France was onely to draw him out of Spain, and to leaue to the Sarazins their conquered countries free: and therefore the treaty of an accord was eafie, seeing there was no question, but to yeeld enery man his owne, and to suffer him to enjoy it quietly, the world being wide enough for them all. But to the end this treaty might take effect, after many messages on eyther part, they resolved to parlee. So F vpon Charlemagne's faith, Agolands comes to the Campe.

Charlemagne either moued with zeale of religiõ, or making it the colour of his actions, gaue the Sarazin to vnderstand, that he should haue his friendship, if he would leaue his Pagan

A Pagan superstition, be baptised, and make open profession of Christianitie. The Sarazin, although hee had a goodly armie, yet not willing to hazard any thing: content with this reuenge of Charlemagne, desired nothing more then to returne quietly into Spain. Being now in Charlemagne's campe, to maintaine his reputation, he makes no shew of feare, but talking to his owne aduantage (as if no force but only reason should moue him,) he enters into a serious and cunning discourse with Charlemagne, shewing, That vnecessary warres were the ruine of mankind, and that he was grieued to see so much blood spilt: That he had not begun, but followed, being urged by necessity to defend himselfe against the forces of Charlemagne. That he was not yet so abject, nor his forces so weake, as to refuse the battaile: but for that it were an infinite losse to hazard so many men, hee desired to make triall of the right by some troups, and he that vanquished should haue the right and true religion on his side: protesting to yeeld to that religion which should appeare the best by that triall. The condition was accepted by Charlemagne. The proofe of this priuate combate was made: and the Christian troupe vanquished the Sarazin.

Thus Agolands protests openly to be a Christian: but in heart he had no such meaning, and takes this occasion to breake the treatie. He findes Charlemagne at table, well accompanied with his chiefe followers (for then it was the custome of our Kings not to eate alone) and sees twelve poore men ill apparelled sitting by vpon the ground, C neere to the table of the Noble men. He demanded what those poore miserable creatures were which did feed apart. One answered, they were the messengers of God. He then sayd, their God was of small account, seeing his messengers were so miserable and contemptible: and therevpon takes occasion to retire himselfe, having lost no labour by this treaty, but qualified the force of Charlemagne, viewed his traine, and made shew of his courage and dexteritie, euen without an Ambassador.

Charlemagne, on the other side was resolute to haue his reuenge, for so notable a D losse of men, and so bold an affront of the Sarazin: with all speed hee raiseth an armie of an hundred and thirty thousand men. A notable number for this realme, and so (fraught with choller and indignation) hee returnes into Spain. His entrie was prosperous, for at the first incounter hee defeated Agolands armie, neere to Pampelune, and for a seale of his victory, hee carried away the head of his enemy Agolands, slaine by the hand of Arnold of Belange, a noble and valiant Knight: but the sequelle was not answerable to the beginning, for notwithstanding the overthrow of these Sarazin troups, all the rest in Spain were not vanquished, where there were more Kings and more men of warre, who had great correspondencie with Amurath the King of Babilon, where was their nursery and store-houise. Marfille and Bellingan brethren, were the chiefe of the remainder of the Sarazin armie, wherein there was a great Babilonian Giant, called Ferragus, of an exceeding greatnesse, who was slaine by Rowland nephew to Charlemagne. and this act is famous in our Histories, and is sung by our E gether the reliques of their defeated troups: they make shew of resolute men, and vow to sell this victory dearely to Charlemagne, being fauoured by many good Townes within the countie. Charlemagne stayes suddenly, and pursues not his victory. But God referues to himselfe a soueraigne power ouer mens desseignes, yea ouer the greatest, and in matters of greatest consequence, to the end that all may learne to aske counsell and successe from him. It was his will that the French forces should not possesse Spain, the which he allotted as a portion for another nation.

Thus Charles, who should haue bene all fire after his victory, tempered his heate, which caused Idnabala the Sarazin, (having free access vnto his campe) to make A some motion of peace. He was a good Secretary of his companions minde, what hee sooner he made to speake of himselfe. Charlemagne (considering by late experience, that the successe of armes was variable, and that this warre was to his subjects losse, employing both liues and goods for the purchase of an vncertaine victory, and seeing himselfe charged with infinite great affaires in his estates, to the preservation whereof 79 I. whereof reason called him, rather then to seeke for new) he seemes not vnwilling to A hearken to the motion of Idnabala, who told him plainly, that hee found the Sarazins affaires to be so desperate, as they would gladly imbrace his friendship, at what rate fouer. The Sarazins answer (reioycing at this new accord) was soone made. The treaty being begun, the fundamentall article of religion was propounded, the which Charlemagne makes shew to maintaine with great vehemencie : but the Sarazins being obstinate, Charles is content to grant them peace, paying some great summes of money, as a token they had bene vanquished. Hee sends a Nobleman of his Court names Ganes, to treat with them : (the people haue since called him Ganelon, as an odious name) who (being corrupted by Marfule and Bellingand) promisseth them meanes to send Charlemagne into France, and to make him receiue a notable disgrace. B

 They agree to make a composition, being in shew very honourable for Charles : to whom they promise to pay (as an homage and an acknowledgment of the peace hee should graunt them) what summes hee should appoint, and so should retire with his armie into France, leauing such troupes in Spaine as he pleased, to maintaine the conditions agreed vpon. Ganes discouered vnto them the necessitie of his returne, and *Charlemagne*s great desire to leaue the smallest forces hee could in Spaine. The composition made, Charlemagne departs with his armie, attending a better opportunitie to end what he had begun : leauing Rowland onely with twenty thousand men, for the execution of this treaty. But to make his passage the more easie, he commands him to lodge in a place of aduantage, of the Pyrenean Mountaines, called Roncevaux. C
 The French army passed, marching towards France, vnder the conduct of Charlemagne, who dreamed not of the disgrace hee receiued by this meanes.

Whilest the French armie remoued, Marfule and Bellingand slept not, but gathering together all the forces they could, they lodge their troupes secretly in the hollow caues of the Mountaines, being places inaccessible and vnknowne but to them of the coun-trie. They had intelligence from Ganes, what forces Charlemagne had left in Spaine, vnder the command of Rowland, to whom the authority of his vnkle, and the credit of the people of Spaine in the chiefeft Townes, was of more esteeme then his twenty thousand men, although they were the choise of all the armie. Rowland had no feare of the enemy, when as returning to his garrison, he is sodainly charged by the Sarazins, D farre more in number then the French. Seeing himselfe thus assailed on all sides, they defend themselves valiantly against these miscreants : but still fresh troupes issue forth on all sides, in so great numbers, as in the end the French (tyred with so long and painfull a combate) are oppressed by the great multitude of Sarazins.

Rowland performed both the duty of a good Capitaine, in so extreame a danger (gathering together the peeces of his shipwrack) and of a resolute souldiar, in fighting valiantly, for hauing beat downe a great number in the presse, in the end hee slew King Marfule with his owne hand. But Bellingand holding this victory absolutely his owne, pursues the French, so as Rowland (not able to stand) retires himselfe a part, where hee dyes for thirst, through the long and painfull combate he had endured : and all together tyred, he striues to breake his good sword Durandal : but his strength failing him, E he dyes, and with him Oliuer and Oger the Dane, Renold of Montauban, Aymant of Be-lande, and other great personages, whose names remaine in fabulous tales : and the faule of their singular vertues, not onely in the Originals of true Histories, but the hon-nor of their heroycall deeds, is ingrauen in the common beleefe of all French men.

Charlemagne
takes reuenge of this treacherous defence.

Charlemagne aduertised of this vnexpected and strange losse, returnes sodainly, and takes reuenge vpon the Sarazins, killing an infinite number vpon the place : he causeth the traitor Ganelon to be drawne in peeces with foure horses (found to haue bene the author of this miserable defeate) and transported with a iust disdain for this preindici-al affront, hee resolueth to passe farther into Spaine for his reuenge. But the great affaires of his other estates, called him into France, and so the warre of Spaine ended with him. F
 him's success, hauing troubled Charlemagne at diuers times, for the space of foure-teene yeares. But God had appointed the limits of his desseignes, as hee referues to

A himselfe a Soueraigne power ouer all mens enterprises, yea of the greatest. Charles 79 3 made a tumb for his nephew Rowland, and honored the memorie of those worthie warriors, (being dead in the bed of honor) with monuments. I haue reported this in one discourse, to represent as a table, what hath chanced most memorable, the which can hardly be gathered without some direction in the confusion of so long and obscure reports, wherewith this historie of Charlemagne is intangled. At his returne from Spaine, necessitie bred diuers warres, to exercise the valour and diligence of Charlemagne.
 ne, both in Italie and Germanie, God sauiouring him in all places. Italie (during these troubles of Spaine) had rebelled by Adalgise the Duke of Beneuents meanes, to reposse the race of Didier, but it was soone suppressed by Charlemagne, to the cost of the bred a warre in Bauiere, for that King Tassillon sonne in Law to Didier King of Lombardie (pressed by his wife being wonderful discontented with Charlemagne) shakes off the forced to sue for peace. Charlemagne grants it, imposing the yoke of the French Monarchie, but Tassillon not able to containe himselfe, raisth a new war in another place, as when we stop one breach, it opens by another vent. He stirs vp the Huns and Aua-res (a neighbour people of Austrasia, one of the Estates of our Monarchie) against Charlemagne, who suppressed them with such happy success, as Tassillon vanquished by C Charlemagne, and found guiltie of rebellion and treason, was condemned to loose his Estate according to the Salique law : and so the kingdome of Bauiere ended, the which was wholly incorporate to the Crowne of France.

The Huns and Auares (of whose names ioyned together, the word of Hungarie hath bin deriued, and the Hungarians be issued from these vnited nations) were likewise punished by Charlemagne, & brought vnder the yoke of the French Monarchie. They had begun a war in disquieting the Countrie of Austrasia : Charlemagne opposed his forces, but at diuerse times : so as the warre continued eight yeares, and the success was, that all their Countrie obeyed him : and the Danes, the Sorabes, the Abrodites, the Westfalians (all vnited in this warre of Hongarie) were likewise brought vnder the same obedience of D Charlemagne. The limits of the Northren region called Austrasia were so extended, as it was distinguished into two kingdomes, noted in the Germane tongue, to shew that the Original of our Ancestors is out of Germanie, and that our ancient Kings haue commanded there, seing their possession is manifest, and that they haue not onely giuen a Germane name to the Countrie that is beyond the Rhin, but also to that on this side. I am not ignorant how much this discourse is diuersified with sundrie probabilities, euery one preferring what likes him best. But, not transforming of coniectures into Oracles, (as without doubt the plainest is the best) behold a true diuision of the Seigneries which Charlemagne had in Germanie, as the traces of names yeeld an assured testimonie. The Realme of Austrasia, which ioynes vpon France, was called Westreich, that is to say, the E of the East, whence the name of Austrich is properly deriued, being then of a greater command then at this day, for it contained Hongarie, Valachia, Bohemia, Transiluania, Denmarke, and Poland. Then was our Monarchie great : but all these nations haue either returned to their first beginnings, or were seized on by new Lords. It was very needfull to shew the estate, that we might obserue the declining thereof, with the motives and seasons of these diuerse changes. Thus the French Monarchie grew great by the happie valour of Charlemagne, and his children grew in age and knowledge, by the wise care of their father, who framed them to affaires, meaning first to make them succeed him in his vertues, and then after in his dominions : But man purposeth, and God disposeth.
 F France, Italie, Germanie, Spaine, & Hongarie made the Romaine Empire in the West, Charles being master of these goodly Prouinces, was in effect Emperour thereof. There wanted nothing but the sollempne declaration of this dignitie, to haue the title as he ioyned the thing, and to be autentically inuested by a free and publike declaration of his possession.
 The prouidence of God, who gaue him the thing, procured him the title by this means, Leo was the Pope of Rome, against whom was raised a strange sedition, by Silmesfer and Campull, men of great credit in the Court of Rome. Vpon a follemne day of procession they seize vpon Leo, before Saint Laurence Church, they strip him of his Pontificall robes, cast him to the ground, tread him vnder their teete, bruse his face with their fistes, and hauing drawne him ignominiously through the dirt, they cast him into pryson: but he stayed not there, being freed by a grome of his Chamber called Albin:

and hauing recovered Saint Peters Church, hee intreated Vingise Duke of Spolete, to free him from this miserable Captiuitie. Vingise sayd him not: hee came to Rome, and carried him to Spolete. Being arriued there, hee presently went into France to Charle- magne, whome he found full of troubles: yet Charles neglected all other affaires, to assist Leo in his necessity. So as hee came to Rome with a goodly army, to succor the Pope: where hee did speedily pacifie the confusions where with Rome was afflicted, B punishing Leoes enemies according to Lawe. They demanded audience, the which Charles graunted them, assembling the Clergie and people to heare and decide this scandalous controuersie. But when as hee demanded their opinions, the Prelates told him plainly, that the Church of Rome could not be iudged by any other then by it selfe, and that the Pope ought not to vndergo the censure of any man lyuing, and that he himselfe ought to be iudge in his owne cause.

Charlemagne willingly leaues the iudgement seate: and then Pope Leo mounted vp his throane, where (after hee had protested by oath to be innocent of those crimes, wherewith his enemies had charged him) he absolues himselfe, and condemnes his enemies, according to his Cannon. The Pope is Iudge of all men, and all things, and not to be iudged by any. C

Charlemagne being drawne to Rome vpon this occasion, finds all disposed to declare him Emperour of the West, seeing that with the price of his blood (opposing himselfe against the furies and incursions of barbarous nations) hee had valiantly gotten possession of the Empire.

The beginning of the Empire of Charlemagne:

Crowned Emperour.

HE Pope by this possession (acknowledging Charles for true Emperour,) crownes him Emperour of Rome, with a full consent of all the Romaine people, which assisted at his Coronation, crying with one generall voice happines, long life & victory to Charles Augustus Crowned the great and peaceable Emperour of the Romaines, alwaies happie and victorious. This was in the yeare 800. on Christmas day, the thirtieth yeare of the raigne of Charles, Italy hauing suffered a horrible confusion during the space of 33. yeares, without Emperour, without Lawes and without order.

The seat of the Romane Empire, since Constantine the great, remayned at Constan- tinople, a Cittie of Thrace, situate in a convenient place for the gard of the Easterne Prouinces, all the West being full of new guests, who hauing expelled the Romaines, the name, authoritie, and force of the Empire remained in the East, where the State was in a strange confusion, the mother being banded against her sonne, and the people within themselves.

Constantine sonne to Leo the fourth, was Emperour, being gouerned from his infancie (with the Empire) by his mother Irene: being come to the age of twentie yeares, hee tooke vpon him the gouernment. There was then a great diuision in the East,
needes

A needes bring them into the Christian Church. The Emperours with the greatest part of the people opposed themselves. This contention had his beginning vnder Philip Bardanes (as wee haue sayd) continued vnder Leo Isaurus, and from him to his sonne Constantin, surnamed Copronimus: and of Leo the 4. sonne to the sayd Constantin. This disquieted all the East with infinit scandals.

The same fire continued in the minority of Constantin, gouerned by his mother: a woman of a violent spirit, who hauing vnderaken the protection of Images, held a Councell of many Bishops for the defence thereof, but the people growing into a mutiny expelled them Constantinople by force, where their assembly was held. But this woman (resolute to proceed) assemblèd the same Councell at Nicea a Cittie of Bitunia, B first of that name: where it was decreed, that the Images of Saints should be planted in Christian Churches for deuotion. Charlemagne did not allowe of this decree, and ey-ther himselfe, or some other by his command, did write a small treatise against this Councell: the which wee see at this day with this title. A treaty of Charlemagnes, tou- ching Images, against the Greeke Synode.

This cunning woman had made choise of the Cittie of Nicea, that the name of this ancient first Councell might honour this newe introduction with the pretext of antiquity, for there are some that confound the first Councell of Nicea with the second, and Constantin the 4. with the first. Constantin continued in the hereditary hatred of his father and grand-father against Images, so as beeing of age and in absolute possession of C the Estate, hee disannulled all these new decrees, and caused the Images to be beaten downe in all places: yet he made all shewes of respect vnto his mother, yielding vnto her a good part of his authority and command. This respect was the cause of a horrible Tragedy: for this woman transported for two causes (both by reason of her newe opinion, and for despight that shee had not the whole gouernment in herselfe) growes so vnkind, as shee resolues to dispossesse her sonne of the Empire, and to seize on it herselfe. Thus the authority her sonne had left her, and the free access shee had vnto his person, made a way to the execution of her desseine, for hauing corrupted such as had the chiefe forces at their command, and wonne them with her sonnes D treasure, shee seized on him, puts out his eyes, sends him into Exile (where soone after hee died for greefe) and tooke possession of the Empire. These vnnatural and tragick furies, were practised in the East, whilst that Charlemagne by his great valour built an Empire in the West. Irene in her sonnes life would haue married him with the eldest daughter of Charlemagne: but this accident crossed that desseine. The tragickall death of Constantin.

After the death of Constantin she sent to Charlemagne, to excuse herselfe of the mur-ther: disauowing it, and laying the blame vpon such as had done it without her command. And to winne the good liking of Charles, shee caused him to be dealt withall touching marriage (for at that time Festruide was dead) with promise to consent that E he should bee declared Emperour of the West, and to resigne vnto him the power of the East. But Charlemagne would not accept thereof: the Nobility and people of the Greeke Empire did so hate her, as hauing suffered her the space of three yeares, in the end they resolued to dispossesse her.

In this publicke detestation of this woman, the murderesse of her owne Childe.
Nicephorus a great Nobleman of Greece, assisted by the greatest in Court, and with the consent of the people, seizeth on the Empire, in taking of Irene: whome he onely banished, to giue her means to liue better then shee had done. He afterwards treats and compounds with Charlemagne, that the Empire of the East continuing vnder his command, that of the West should remaine to Charlemagne. Irene banished, the diuision of the Empire.

By this transaction of Nicephorus and the consent of the Greekes, the possession of the Empire was ratified and confirmed to Charlemagne, and then beganne the diuision of the two Empires, East and West. That of the West beganne with Charle- magne, and continued in his race whilst his vertues did protect it: afterwards it was transported

8 = 6, transported to the Princes of Germanie, who likewise acknowledged the Germanie A stemme of Charlemagne, borne at Wormes, crowned at Spire, and interred at Aix, all Cit-ties of Germanie: and the truth sheweth, that as the Originall, to the first commaund of the French, was whole in Germanie. Hetherto we haue represented, breecfly as wee could (considering the greatnes, and riches of the matter) what Charles did whilest he was King of France onely: now wee must relate with the like stile, what hath hapened worthie of memorie vnder his Empire.

His deeds while he was Emperour.

In Saxony.

At Venice, where Charlemagne had the repulse.

C HARLES liued fiftene yeares, after hee had vniited the Romaine B Empire to the French Monarchy. Grimoald Duke of Beneuent sought to disturbe Italie for the Lombard: but Charles prevented it in time, by the meanes of Pepin his sonne, a worthie and valiant Prince. Gri-moald was thus vanquished, yet intreated with all mildnes, so as being restored to his Estate, he became afterwards an affectionate and obedient servant to Charlemagne, who was a wise Conqueror, both in his happie valour, and the wise vjing of his victorie. About the same time, the warre in Saxony was renewed, being alwaies prone to rebellion: with the warre against the Huns, Bohemians, Sclauoniens: and the second against the Sarrazians. The which I haue breecfly reported in their proper places: here I note them onely, to shew the course of things according to the order of times, the goodly light of truth.

He had likewise a great and dangerous warre against the Venetians, wherein he im-ployed his sonne Pepin. Obeliers and Becur, great personages, were the cheefe Commaunders for the Venetians. The Emperour and his Frenchmen receiued a great check by the Venetians, who had this onely fruite of their victorie, (that among all the people of Italie subdued by Charlemagne) they alone were not vanquished, but had happily made head against great Charlemagne. They did greatly increafe their name, and reputation, but nothing enlarged their territories by this conquest, glad to haue defended themselves against so noble and valiant an enemy. By reason of this Venetian war, Charles stayed sometime in Italie, to assure his estate. He would haue the Countie conquered from the Lombards, to be called Lombardie, with a new name, to moderate their seruile condition, by the continuance of their name, in the ruine of their Estate.

Seeing himselfe old and broken, his children great, wise, and obedient, he resolved to giue them portions, and to assigne to euery one his Estate. To Pepin he gaue Italy, to Charles Germanie and the neighbour Countie, keeping Lewis his eldest sonne neere about him, whom he appointed for the Empire and Realme of France. Hee fought to reduce all his Estates vnder one Law, making choise of the Romaine, both for the dignity of the Empire, and being more ciuill, but the French loth to alter any thing of their custome and lawes, hee suffred them as they desired: and those which had longer serued the Romaines, and loued best the Romaine Lawes, he gaue them libertie. So as Gaulle Narbonnoise (which comprehends Daulphiné, Languedoc & Prouence;) do vse the written Law (as the ancient Prouince of the Romaines) and the rest of France obserue their custome and Lawes.

Denmarke (a dependance of the realme of Germanie, and part of Charles his portion, as we haue said) was revolted from the obedience of the French. Charles by his fathers commaund prepares to subdue them: but God had otherwise decreed, for hereupon he dies, to the great greefe of his father, and all the French, who loued the louely qualities of this Prince, the true heire of his fathers name and vertues. Charlemagne mourned for his yongest sonne, when as sodainly newes came of the vntimely death of Pepin his second sonne, King of Italie, a Prince of admirable hope, a true pattern of his fathers greatnesse. Thus man purposeth, and God disposeth: thus the sonnes die before the father: thus the greatest cannot free themselves from the common calamity of

A of mankind. Thus great Kings and great Kingdomes haue their periods. Charlemagne 809. left his children, and the realme her best support: for these two Princes carried with them the fathers valour, leauing Lewis their brother with large territories and few vertues, to gouerne so great an estate. After the death of these two great Princes many enemies did rise against Charles, seeming (as it were) deprived of his two armes, the Sarazins in Spaine, the Sclauens, and the Normans, in the Northerne regions. but he vanquished them all, and brought them to obedience, old and broken as hee was. Rebellion against Charles.
Wee haue shewed how that Nicephorus had beene made Emperour by the death of Irene. It chanced that as hee fought against the Bulgariens (a people which had possessed a part of Thrace, neere vnto Constantinople) he was slaine in the conflict.

B Hee had one sonne named Staurat, who by reason should succeed him: but Michel his brother in law seized on this poore young man, and makes him a way, and hauing corrupted the chiefe men with gifts, hee vlrpes the Empire: and least that Charlemagne should crosse his desseignes, he seekes to insinuate with him, not onely ratifying what Nicephorus had done for the diuision of the Empire, but by a new contract doth acknowledge him Emperour of the West. Thus the affaires of our Charles were daily confirmed, but his minde (toiled with these new losses, and the painfull difficultes he had suffered throughout the whole course of his life) required nothing but rest. All his life time he held the Church in great reuerence, & had imployed his authority to beautifulie, and bountifully bestowed his treasure to enrich it: but this great plenty in so happy a peace, made the Churchmen to liue loosely. Charles well instructed in religion (knowing how much it did import to haue doctrine and good manners to shine in them that should instruct others:) he doth call five Councils in diuers places of his dominions, for the gouernment of the Church: At Mayerce, at Rheims, at Tours, at Chalons, and at Arles: and by the aduise of these Ecclesiasticall assemblies, hee lets downe orders for the reformation of the Church, in a booke intituled Capitula Caroli magni, which they read at this day, for a venerable prooffe of the piety of this great Prince. A worthy president for Princes, which seek true honour by vertue, whereof the care of piety is the chiefe foundation.

Charles has

He held likewise a great Council in the City of Francford. These are the very words D of the History) of the Bishops of France, Germanie and Italy, the which hee himselfe would honour with his presence, where by a general consent, The false Synode of the Greekes, (I mean the very words of the Originall) contrarily called the seventh, was condemned and reiected by all the Bishops, who subscribed to the condemnation. But there fell out a new accident, which drew Charles againe to armes. Adelphonse King of Nauarre surmamed the chaste, by reason of his singular temperance, did carefull y aduertise him, New warre in that there was now meanes utterly to subdue the Sarazins in Spaine, Charlemagne (who desired infinitely to finish this worke, so oft attempted without any great successe) giues care to this aduise, leaues an armie, and marcheth into Spaine, relying on the Spaniards sauiour, being Christians. Adelphonse meant plainly, but so did not the chiefe of his Court, nor his associates, who feared his forces no lesse then the Sarazins, and euen the most confident seruants of Adelphonse, doubted to be dispossessed of their gouernments by a new Master. So they crosse Adelphonse in countermanning of Charles: but the lots were cast, his army is in field, and he resolute to passe on. He enters into Spaine, where he finds so many difficultes, as he returnes into France: and so concludes all his enterprises, embracing againe the care of religion, and of the Church, as a subiect fit for the remainder of his dayes. Hee was three score and eight yeares old when he left the warres: so he spent three whole yeares in his study, reading the Bible, and the bookes of Saint Augustin (whom he loued aboue all the Doctors of the Church. He resided at Paris, to haue conference with the learned: where hee had erected a goodly Uniuersity, furnished with learned men, such as that time could afforde, and enriched with goodly priuileges. Hee had an extraordinary care to haue the seruice of the Church supplied, as a Nursery of the holy Ministry. Thence grew so many Col-ledges of Chanoinis, with such sufficient reuenues.

Thus

Thus Charles spent three yeares happily in the onely care of his soule, leaving a goodly example to Princes, to moderate their greatnesse with pietie, their enjoying of temporall goods, with the hope of eternall, and to thinke of their departure out of this life in time. Thus foretelling his death (wherevnto he prepared himselfe by this exercise) he made his will, leaving Lewis his sonne sole heyre of his great Kingdoms, and bequeaths to the Church great treasures, as more at large is contained in his will, set downe in the H. story. His Testament was the messenger of his death, for soone after he fell sicke, and continued so but eight dayes: dying happily vnto the Lord, in the yeare of grace 814. of his age the 71. and of his raigne the 47. including 15.
 yeares of his Empire. He was interred at Aix La Chapelle, where hee was borne, and his memory honoured with a goodly Epitaph, set downe in the History.

Hee was one of the greatest Princes that euer lived. His vertue is the patterne of Princes, his good hap the subiect of their wishes. The greatnesse of his Monarchie is admirable, for he quietly enioyed all France, Germanie, the greatest part of Hunga-rie, all Italy, and a part of Spaine. But his vertues were greater then his Monarchie:
 his clemencie, wisdom, and valour: his learning (yea in the holy Scripture) his vigi-lencie, magnanimitie and singular force be the theater of his immortall praises. And yet his vertues were not without some blemish (as the greatest are not commonly without some notable vice,) for hee was giuen to women, adding Concubins to his lawfull wiues, by whom hee had bastards. I haue noted elsewhere the number of his wiues and children. Lewis the weakest of them all, remained alone, the sole heyre of this great Monarchie of France & the Romaine Empire, but not of his noble vertues.

We are now come to the top of this great building, we shall see it decline:
 and therein note the admirable providence of God, who amidst the confusion of this estate, hath alwayes preferred the Maiestie of this Crowne.

LEWIS

LEWIS the gentle, the 25. King, and Emperour of the West.

A The vertues of Charlemagne had raised this estate to an admirable greatnesse, so the small valour, or rather the vices of his posterity, caused the declining, and (if God had not preuen-ted) had bene the ruine thereof. His intent was onely to change the race vnworthy to raigne, but not the realme, the which hee hath preserved vnto this day by his providence, in the bosome of one country, and in it his Church: for the which he maintaines, both the estates where it remains, and the whole world, which cannot subsist but in regard of it.

B Thus the French Monarchie being come to the heigh of her greatnesse, the lawe imposed vpon all humane things, would haue it decline, that of her peeces other estates might be built. Not long after the death of Charlemagne, it began to decline.
 The foolish lenity of Lewis his sonne, was the beginning, the which was continued by the disordred confusions of his successors, who (in spight one of an other) hastened the ruine of their house, making the way by their vices and misfortunes. This is the substance of all the Kings remaining in this second race: the which wee cannot represent, but in noting faithfully the order of those confused times, during the which this barke hath bene in a manner guided without a Pilot, and without helme, by the wis-dome of God, who hath miraculously preserved it, amidst so many tempests. And therefore without any tedious discourse, being intricate enough of it selfe, I will labour to shew (as in a table) both the continuance of this race, and the diuers motives of events to bring Hugh Capet vpon the stage, and carefully to shew the estate of his posterity, as the chiefe end of my desseigne.

Lewis was surnamed the meeke, or gentle, as well for his deuotion, (wherevnto he was more giuen, then to gouerne his estate) as also for his great facilitie: which

The declining of this race.

815, was the cause of many miseries both to himselfe and his subjects. He began to raigne the year 815. and ruled 26. yeares Emperour of the West, and King of France. His father had not greatly employed him in affaires, observing his disposition, and had married him with Irmengrade the daughter of Ingram Duke of Angers, an officer of the Crowne of France, having giuen him the Duchie of Guienne for his maintenance. By this wife Lewis had three sonnes, Lothaire, Pepin, and Lewis, who acted strange tragedies against their father.

To his second wife hee married Judith the daughter of Guelphe Duke of Suene, by whom he had Charles, surnamed the Bald, who succeeded him in the Crowne of France. Bernard the sonne of Pepin was King of Italy, as Charlemagne had decreed. Lewis (more fitt to be a Monke then a King) was so giuen to deuotion, and of so soft a spirit, as he made his authority contemptible, both within and without the realme. This disposition (vnfit for a great command) made the nations subiect to the Crowne, to fall from their obedience, the Saxons, Normans, Danes, and Brittans. And although Lewis did his best to preuent it, yet could hee not preuaile, but made himselfe wholly contemptible in attempting that which he could not effect, and (after his vaine struing) compounding of great controuersies with vnreasonable conditions. Bernard a young man and ambitious, was perswaded by the Bishops of Orleans and Milan, to attempt against his Vncle Lewis, and to seize vpon the realme of France, which belonged not vnto him. So his ambition cost him deere, and that suddenly: for being in field to go into France against his Vncle, with an imaginarie fauour of the French, to be proclaimed King, it fell out contrary, for both he and all his Councillors, were taken by Lewis his subjects.

Lewis wonderfully moued with the presumption of this springall (as we often see milde natures fall into extremities of choller when they are moued) hauing both his Nephew and Councillors in his power: he despoiles him of his realme of Italy, declares him and his vnworthy, confines him to perpetuall prison, and puts out his eyes: the like he doth to all the Bishops and Noblemen he could get: and after some fewe dayes patience, he chops off their heads. This act was held very strange, proceeding from Lewis, and committed against such persons, it began to breed a generall diuicke, the which was aggravated by a domestick dissention, all which together caused a horrible Tragedie.

Lewis had indiscreetly giuen portions to his children, making them companions of his regall authority. After the decease of Bernard, hee gaue Italy to Lothaire, and did associate him in the Empire: to Pepin hee gaue Aquitaine: to Lewis, Bauaria: and would haue them all beare the name of Kings. Lewis good to all, was too good to his second wife Judith, an ambitious woman: who hauing one sonne by him, called Charles, had no other care but to make this sonne great, to the preiudice of the rest: not foreseeing that they were of power, and could not patiently endure the ialousies of a mother in lawe, nor the words of an old man, being too much affected to the one of his children against the rest, at the suggestion of a Mother in lawes an ordinary leuaine of bitter dissention in families of the second bedde.

Moreouer this imperious Germaine, abusing the facilitie of her good husband, played the Emperesse and Queene ouer all, to the discontent of the greatest, who had no fauour with Lewis, but by the fauour of his wife: they did hate and contemne him, as being vnworthy to raigne, suffering himselfe so flauishly to be gouerned by a woman. This was the generall motiue of their discontent: but there were many other particularities, which grew dayly vpon diuers and sundrie occasions. The Bishops were most of all incensed against Lewis, by reason of the death of those men of the Church, whome hee had so cruelly caused to be slaine with Bernard. So Lothaire, Pepin, and Lewis (by the aduise of these malecontents) resolute to seize vpon their Father, Mother, and young Brother, to dispossesse them of all authority, and then to gouerne the State after their owne appetities, wherein they must vse force and a publicke consent. Lothaire (as ring-leader of this desseigne,) leuies a great army,

A army, and calls a Nationall Councell of the French Church at Lions, supposing sooner to suppress Lewis by this meanes then by a Parliament. Lewis appeares: he receiues all complaints against himselfe, and yeelds to the Centure of the Prelats, which was to retire himselfe into a Monastery, there to attend his deuotion, and to resigne the Empire and the realme to his Children. This was put in execution. Lewis was conueied to Soissons, to the monastery of Saint Medard: his wife and sonne were confined to other places, and the whole gouernment committed to Lothaire and his brethren. Thus Lewis, so much addicted to Church-men as he purchased the name of deuout, was ill intreated by them, & receiued a poore recompence for his so humble submission. The name of a Councell (venerable of it selfe) did at the first retayne men, supposing that this ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction did not extend but to admonition: but seeing this tragicall attempt of the Children against the father, there was no good man but stood amazed at this presumption, and pittied their poore King, being brought to such calamity. But all power remayned in the hands of the rebellious Children, and the greatest of the Church were guilty of this outrage, seeking to maintaine their decrees. Thus this poore Prince (to the generall greefe of his subjects) continued in prison five yeares: for he entred in the year 829. and came forth in the year 834. But this deliery was the beginning of a newe confusion. For Lothaire hauing beene forced to yeeld vnto his father, goes to field, takes him prisoner againe and leads him to the Couent at Soissons, where he stayed not long, for the French did bandy openly against Lothaire, and his bretheren did abandon him, so as hee was forced to yeeld vnto his father and to craue pardon. This miserable King, thus ledde for a long time, giues portions to his Children. To Lothaire hee leaues the realme of Austrasia, from the riuer of Meuse vnto Hongarie, with the title of Emperour: to Lewis Bauaria, and to Charles France: Pepin enioyed Guienne without contradiction.

Lewis (not content with Bauaria) quarrells againe with his father, and (to force him to giue him a better portion,) hee leuies an army and passeth the Rhin. The pitifull father, although tyred with so many indignities, yet transported with choller against his sonne, goes to field with an army: but age and greefe deprived him of meanes to chastise him: for hee fell deadly sicke, which made him leaue this world, to finde rest in heauen. This was in the year of grace 840. of his age 64. and of his Empire the 27. He left three sonnes, Lothaire and Lewis of the first bedde, and Charles of the second, these two first Children did much afflict the father and themselves, and all were plinged in bloudie dissentions, the which order doth nowe command vs to represent particularly.

Lothaire as the eldest and Emperour by his fathers testament, would prescribe Lawes to his brethren, and force them to a newe diuision. As he had succeeded against his father in taking him twise prisoner, and stripping him before hee went to bed; so he sought to dilanull his will, as made against the right of the elder, and the Imperiall dignity, the realme of France belonging to the eldest, and the goodliest territories of the Empire to the Emperour. Thus hee quarrelled with Charles King of France: and with Lewis, who had his part in the inheritances of the Empire, in Bauaire, the dependances of the realme of Bourgoeny (that is to say Prouence and Daulphiné) and in Italy.

This was the leuaine of these tragicall dissentions among the bretheren (as Nitard a writer of approved credit, learned, and a Prince, (for he was sonne to Angelbert the sonne of Berthe daughter to Charlemagne, and was employed to compound these quarrels) doth very particularly describe.

Behold the direction to a longer discourse, whereof Lowe but an abridgement, noted with the principall circumstances. Lothaire then armed with authoritie, force, malice, policie, and boldnes, thinke to giue his bretheren their portions: and there were great presumptions he should preuaile, ioyning his force with the intelligences he had in the dominions of Charles and Lewis.

This common interest to defend themselves against a common enemy, made them to ioyne together, resolute for their generall preservation. Lothaire seekes by secret treaties to diuide them, but not able to make any breach in their vnion, hee prepares force and policy. Lewis was in Bauiere, of whome he kept good gard, that he should not passe the Rhin, to ioyne with his brother: hee likewise leuies an armie to surprize Charles in France. This preparation of warre did awake the vnited bretheren, who assemble their forces, and ioyne notwithstanding all Lothaires oppositions. Lothaires armie was at Auxerre, meaning to passe into the hart of France. The vnited bretheren (having assembled their forces neere vnto Paris, Saint Denis and Saint Germain) approche, to haue a better meanes either to treat with him, or to encounter him. First with great humilitie, they offer to performe what should be held reasonable, beseeching him to remember the condition of bretheren: the holy peace of the Church, and the quiet of Gods people, suffering them to enjoy what their father had bequeathed, or else they would diuide France equally, and hee should chooe what part he pleased. Lothaire refusing nothing flatly, led them with delayes, expecting forces out of Guienne, led by Pepin, and in the meane time he diuided the Cities by his practises, meaning to assaile his bretheren both within and without, and to surprize them by authoritie and force, as hee had done heretofore his poore father, presuming of the like meanes.

Lothaire thinking to surprize his bretheren, is opposed and defeated.

But the subtilly was taken in his owne snare, for as Lothaire (finding himselfe the stronger) refused these conditions of peace, saying openly: That his bretheren would neuer bee wile vntill hee had corrected them, behold the armies lying neere to Fontenay (after these vaine parles of peace, Lewis and Charles charge Lothaires armie) (alredie a Conqueror in conceit) with such aduantage, as hee was not onely put to rout, but also ouerthrowne with a notable slaughter, noted vnto this day, by the place where the battaile was fought, the which for this occasion is called Chaplis, and the straight is called by the victors name, the valley of Charles, to continue the memorie of so bloodie a victorie, where euen the Conquerours had cause to weepe, hauing shed their owne blood, although forced to fight.

It is not now that France began to bee indifferent, banding against it selfe, and digging in her owne bowels, by the domesticall and viciall dissensions. Lothaire after this defeat changed his humor with his state, for hardly could hee rectyre with his shame to saue his dominions. Hee enioyed the titulare maske of the Empire with Austrasia, yet very much curtailed and danded to his three sonnes, Lewis, Charles, and Lothaire. Of these great inheritances, there remaines nothing cleere but Lorraine, of the name of Lothaire. And so the great discourtes of him whome the whole earth could not satisfie, without taking from father, and bretheren, were buried in a cloister: for Lothaire (having remorse of conscience for attempting against his father and bretheren, and all to beare rule) lost the honour hee had sought with such eagernesse, and (to soder the paines hee had inflicted vpon his father) hee professeth himselfe a Monke in the Abbie of Pluuiers, and dies a Monke in the year 855, taking on him the frocke, and being shauen, as the ciuil death of a King or Prince of the blood royall, according to the French opinion, which continues vnto this day, for a note of the greatest paine they could suffer that were borne in this authoritie, to bee shauen and made Monkes, and to change the crowne of France into a Monkes crowne, dead to the world.

Lothaire dies a Monke.

This was the Catastrophe and end of this turbulent Prince, by the iust iudgement of God, published then in the greatest assemblies, and made knowne vnto all by open and publike writings, for a notable testimonie and witness to all men.

That

A That whosoener disobeyes father and mother: deceiues his bretheren, troubles the peace of the Church and state, in breaking the sacred Lawes of God and nature, hee dismembers himselfe by peece-meale, loosing his goods, honour and quiet, for assured gages of the horrible torments which attend him in the euertlasting prisons, appointed to tame the vntamed, and to make them suffer the infinite paines of their infinite wickednesse.

Charles and Lewis were well satisfied to haue prevented their brothers desseins, not making any further pursuit of their victory. They seeke to confirme true concord by the settling of their Estates. Hauing stayed sometime vpon the place where the

A second battaile between Charles and Lewis.

B battaile was fought: buried the dead, released prisoners and proclaimed a general pardon to all that would followe their armes: they call the Bishops, to take their aduice vpon occurrents, who beeing solemnly assembled exhort them vnto concord, laying plainly before them the iust iudgement of God against their brother Lothaire, least they should drawe the people againe into these extremities by their dissensions.

The Brethren (beleeuing their good aduice) part good friends: but when as Lothaire sought to renew the quarrell, they met againe: but this struing was in vaine: they assemble in the City of Strasbourg then belonging to this Crowne, and there make a tollome alliance for the & their subiects, to liue together in peace & concord.

C The forme is double, one in the Romain tongue, the other in Dutch, that is to say the Germaine. As for the Romaine, it seemes to be that of Languedoc and Prouence, by the Language, although there bee some words which are not at this day in vse with vs, as the reader (curious of this antiquity) may see in their proper places, excusing my stile which suffers me not to dilate any further, but onely to note what may be found in the originalls, touching this subiect.

This allyance made, they come to the diuiding of their parts: and to this end they appoint twelue deputies, (whereof Nitard saies he was one), who without respect of fertility or quantity, regard that onely which was most conuenient, for the necessity and commodity of their Estates. I know this partition is diuersly set downe by many: and who sees not in so obscure antiquity, that it is impossible to make a true designation, seeing that in small successions there is so great diuersity? But in all this variety of opinions, it remaines for certaine, that Charles the onely sonne of the second bed, (who had bene so much persecuted by the Children of the first wife), remayned sole King of France: that the territories of the Empire were much decayed, nothing remaying in effect, but the name of these which lie on this side the Rhin, especially in the dependances of the Realme of Bourgogne, as Daulphiné and Prouence. Daulphiné doth yet carry the ancient name of the Empire, in respect of the river of Rosne which doth separate it from Viaretz, a Country opposite, called by an expresse name the Realme, as also for this cause Charles was called by expresse words in the designation of his portion, King of France, it confines at the one end with Lionnois, at the other with Vzege, which extends from Saint Esprit to Ville-neueue of Auignon, along the Rosne; all the sayd limits beeing of his portion, bee called by a particular name the Realme, vnto this day, especially in their Leases, which retayne more plainly the traces of the ancient tongue.

The portions of Charles and Lewis.

E An obseruation which I ought vnto my Country, for the which I keepe a ranke in the Theater whereon I meane to represent the Estate of our goodly Prouinces of Gaule Narbonoise, in old time honored with the name of a second Italy, and at this day so grossly vnkowne to strangers, as in the Theater of the world they leaue a blanke for it, like to the deserts of Affricke, although it yeelds not to any Prouince of this great and goodly Kingdome, whereof it is one of the cheefe parts, and worthiest members. So Daulphiné and Prouence were left to Lewis in his partage, for the commodity of Italy the which was giuen him, notwithstanding the pretensions of Bernards Children.

But Lewis enioyed not long these great possessions, for the which he had so much

829. troubled his poore father, his miserable subjects and himselfe for he died without issue, without any issue male, leauing one only daughter called Hermingrade, heire of all his great Estates.

Behold the last rebellious sonne of the father, and one of his scourges, deed without any great memory, the which was like-wile extinguished in his daughter and in the diuers changes happened in these Estates. Thus the Children impatient to see their poore father liue, died after many fruitlesse toyles, the one in a monastery, the other without heire to carry his name, although the imagination of a famous race and of an extraordinary raigne, had made them forget the holy Lawes of nature against their father. Charles and Lewis had made profession of more then brotherly loue, as their familiarities carefully obserued by Nitard, in eating, lying and playing together do testifie, leauing to the wise reader to iudge, howe vncertain the loue of brethren is when as Couetousnes and ambition creepes into their counsell.

Charles married his Neece Hermingrade, daughter to his brother Lewis, to Boson Earle of Ardennes, brother to his wife Richilde. His colour was to match his Neece with a Prince of a good house, and of more vertue, and thereby to binde Boson vnto him, but his intent was other, as we shall hereafter see. Boson tooke possession of the Countries belonging to his wife as her dowry, & calls himselfe King of Arles. A point very remarkable, to vnfold many difficulties that shall followe in the foresayd Countries, and especially in Prouence, where haue happened many changes, the which wee will endeauour to represent in their proper places.

Hermingrade daughter to Lewis married to Boson King of Arles.

This was the Estate of the heires of great Charlemagne, but his posterity did worfe: where the most famous memory of our Kings shalbe noted by their vices, eyther of body or minde, one being called the stuttring, an other the bald, the simple, the cruell, the Barren, and all misfortunes, to shewe as it were in a goodly table, that all the greatnes of this world, is but meere vanity.

CHARLES

CHARLES surnamed the bald, sonne to Lewis the gentle, the 26. King and Emperour.

C HARLES called the bald, King of France, beganne to raigne the the yeare 841. and reigned thirty eight yeares. He caused himselfe to be proclaimed Emperour after the death of Lewis, who suruiued Lothaire, without contradiction. The greatest part of his raigne passed in the confusions before mentioned, or in the hatred and dissensions of brethren, or in combustions and open warres. But why should I encrease mine owne trouble and the readers, with the report of these particularities, vnworthy of brethren, and worthy of eternall forgetfulness?

A raigne of small fame, but onely to note the confusion from whence sprong the first occasion of the fall of this race: a King of small merit, hauing performed nothing praise worthy, for in that wherein hee desired to winne the reputation of doing well, hee did exceeding ill. His greatest ambition was to seeme a good Vncle to the onely daughter of his brother Lewis, with whome hee had made so strict a League of loue. He married her to Boson, as I haue sayd: but the elements shew that he married her with an intent to gouerne her inheritance at his pleasure.

Being proclaimed Emperour, hee leuies a great and mightie army, and goes in person into Italie. His pretext was to suppress the Dukes of Spoletum and Beneuent, who sought to free themselves from the subiection of the Empire, and to become Soueraignes: but his intent was to seize vpon the strong places of Italie, and so by consequence, of that which belonged to his Neece Hermingrade.

But Boson her husband discovering her Vncles intent, preuented him, by loyng with the sayd Dukes, and prouiding for the Citties of Italie with all expedition,

879. expedition, as his wiues inheritance: and then hee aduertised Charles entring into the A Countrie, that it was needlesse for him to passe any farther, and to put Italie to vnnecessarie charges, seeing that he himselfe could gard it sufficiently, & the foresaid Dukes did submit themselves to reason. But being easie to iudge that Charles hauing an armie in field, and a resolute desseine, would not retyre without constraint, Boson makes factions in France, in the heart of his Estare, to diuert him. An easie matter, both for their discontents against him, and the miserie of that age, nourished in the libertie of vnciuill warres. This occasion drew Charles from this vnuust desseine, for at the first brute of rebellion, he turnes head towards France. but there chanced more to him then he expected, for he not only left his Neeces patrimonie, but his owne life in Italie, with a notable instruction, Not to loose this life for the desire of an other mans B goods. Thus died Charles the bald at Mantoua, the yeare 879. leauing the Realme to his sonne Lewis, the which hee fought to augment with an others right.

Charles diuersed from the warre of Italy.

Where he died

LEWIS the second called the stuttering 27. King and Emperour.

HE reigned onely two yeares, and succeeded his father likewise in the A Empire, but not without opposition, for the Princes of Italie fought to be Soueraines, and the Germanes (bearing impatiently the confusions passed) desired to restore the beauty of the Imperiall dignity, greatly decayed in Italie, by such as possessed the lands of the Empire. They spared not the Pope himselfe, who by little and little, vsur-ped the Imperiall rights in Italie. These complaints being made to Lewis the Emperour, John the 3. Pope of Rome came into France to redresse that which concerned

A concerned the Sea of Rome. He was courteously received by the King, staid in France 880.
a whole yeare, and there held a Councell at Troyes in Champagne.

The raigne of Lewis was very short. The Pope was scarce gone, but hee was lodged in the bed of death. He had no lawfull children but two bastards, Lewis and Ca-roloman, both men growne, whereof the one was already married to the daughter of Boson King of Arles. His wife was with child. In the doubtfullnesse of the suite which should be borne, he must provide a Regent to gouerne the realme, if it were a sonne.
And although Lewis loued his two bastards deere'y, yet would he not haue them Regents, but made choise of Eudes or Odon Duke (that is to say gouernour) of Angers, the sonne of Robert of the race of Widichind of Saxony (of whom we haue before made mention) to bee Regent of the Realme, and experience taught, that his iudgement was good,

Lewis leaves his wife with childe.

Thus Lewis dyed, hauing left nothing memorable but a sonne: wherein I obserue three notable things, The efficacy of the Lawe of State, preferring the right of the law-full heire not yet borne: The minoritie of a King, subiect to many confusions and mi-series: and the liberty of great men in the weakenesse of a young Prince, who sithe boldly in a troubled streame. In this raigne happened the Eclipse of the Empire.
The first check giuen to this second race, was by a League, which dying in shew, made the King to dye in effect, and in the end carryed away the Crowne, burying both the King and all his race in one tombe. This History is very obscure, by reason of the Regents which are numbred among the Kings, during the minoritie of the lawfull heire:
and therefore good directions are needfull in so confused a laborinth of diuers raignes Behold therefore the simple and plaine truth.

Lewis the Stuttering being dead, the Parliament assembled to resolu for the go-uernment of the realme, vntill that God should send the Queene a happy deliury: The estates and if it were a sonne, appoint who should be Gouvernour to the King, and Regent of the Realme, vntill he came to the age of gouernment. There was no Prince that made any question to the Infants title that was to bee borne: or that sought to take the aduantage of the time, to aduance himselfe vnder colour of neerenesse of blood: but it was concluded by common consent, they should carefully preferre the Queenes D wombe, vntill her deliury. The Kings will was plaine, for he called Eudes (as we haue said) to be Gouvernour to his child vnborne, and Regent of the realme: but Lewis and Regents Caroloman, bastards of France, had so laboured for voyces, as they preuailed against this Testamentary decree, and were chosen Regents by the Estates, who for confirmation of this authoritie, decreed they should be crowned, yet with a profitable exception for the pupils interest, the lawfull heire of the Crowne.

A dangerous proceeding, making seruants taste the sweetnesse of Soueraigne com- A dangerous mand, which made the way to a horrible confusion, and multiplying the authoritie of many masters, did greatly preiudice the lawfull heire, the which may not (without extreame danger) be imparted but to one onely. The Queene was happily deliuered E of a sonne, the which was saluted King, and was called Charles, of whom wee shall speake hereafter. The day of his birth was the 12. of December, in the yeare 881.
But we must now passe 22. yeares full of troubles, before our pupill comes to age: so as to marche safely in so obscure a laborinth, wee must distinctly note the diuers partels of this interreigne.

thers death.

The Minoritie of Charles called the Simple,

the which continued 22. yeares vnder 4. Regents, whom they call Kings.

Lewis and Caroloman Brothers, the bastards of Lewis the Stuttering, chosen by the States, raigned two yeares or there abouts, to whom they adde Lewis the idle, the sonne of Caroloman, but hee is not numbred among the Kings.

Charles the Grosse raigned nine yeares.
Eudes or Odon, eleuen yeares.

Behold the 22. yeares of this minoritie.

The 28. raigne vnder LEWIS and CAROLOMAN.

They talke diuersly of these Kings, who in deed were no lawfull Kings, but guides to a lawfull King. A confused and obfcure age, which hath left such famous persons in doubt. But wee may say in their excuse, that men being weary of these confusions, haue willingly left them doubtfull, to hide the infamie of their times, or else no man durst set Pen to Paper, to represent the shامتull courfes of those miseries.

Lewis and Caroloman tooke either of them a part to gouerne: Lewis the countrie on the other side of Loire, and Caroloman that on this side. They had the Normans, and Lewis defeated Boson King of Arles for common enemies, and as continuall thornes in their sides, in diuers places and vpon diuers occurrents, for the ending whereof, they besiege Boson in Vienne, and resolute to take it: but presently the Normans come to his succour. Caroloman continues the siege, and Lewis goes to encounter the Normans. But oh the vaniry of humaine conceptions: the Regents are frustrate of their hopes, for Lewis loofeth his Armie, and afterwards his life, through griete of his defeat. Caroloman on the other side takes Vienne, but not Boson, who saues himselfe in the Mountaines of Viuares. And contrarywise, hee that hoped to haue his greatest enemy in his power, was

Charles called the grosse, began to raigne the yeare 882. and raigned nine yeares. His entrance was goodly, but his end tragically fowle. Hee was installed in the Regencie with the same ceremonies that the other two forenamed, for he was crowned King, with promise to restore the Crowne to the lawfull heire, and to gouerne according to the will of the States. Hee was sonne to Lewis called Germanicus, sonne to Lewis the gentle, as wee haue said. This neereffe

A surprised by death vnlooked for and extraordinarie, hauing ended his rege and become sole Regent by the death of his brother. But the manner of his death is diuersly obserued: some write, that running in iest after a gentlewoman, he was crushed vnder a gate, whether his horse had violently carried him. Others say, that hee was slaine by a boare, going a hunting: or that being at the chase, he fell downe and brake his necke. But all this notes, that the manner of his death was violent and extraordinarie. So the Regencie of these two bastards, gotten by force against the Law, was both short and vnfortunate.

Lewis succeeded to these two brethren. Men dispute with much vncertainie what he was to Caroloman, either brother or sonne, but all agree he was an idle person. It is likely hee was the nearest kinsman, hauing seized on the authoritie after the death of these two Regents, but in effect the French had the power in their owne hands. It chanced as they were readie to free themselves off this Lewis, that he died, and so they called Charles the grosse, King of Baniere, first Prince of the blood, to this great dignitie.

CHARLES called the grosse or great, 29. King and Emperour.

of blood gave him an interest, and the Imperiall dignitie, power, and meanes to gouerne the Realme well. So the eyes of the French were fixed on him, as the man which should restore their decayed estate, after so many disorders and confusions. His entrance was reasonable happie, (as at the first every thing seemes goodly) being respected of all his subiects. He went into Italie, and expelled the Sarazins which threatened Rome, but being returned into France, hee found a new taske, for the Normans (a Northerne people, gathered together not onely from Denmarke, but also from Sweden and other neighbour Countries, as the word of Norman doth shew, signifying men of North) were dispersed in diuerse parts vpon the sea coast of the Realme of France: and had chiefly set footing in the Countries of Arthois, Therouenne, and other low Countreies, and in Neustria one of his greatest and neereest Prouinces, taking their oportunitie by the troubles so long continued among the brethren.

Charles marcheth with his armie against them, but at the first encounter he was beaten. This checke (although the losse were small) stroke a greater terror, and in the end caused an apparent impossibilitie, to recouer that Prouince from so great forces: so as he was aduised to enter into treatie with them, and to make them of enemies friends, leaving them that which he could not take from them. The which hee did absolutely of his owne authoritie, (being very great, vnited in these two dignities,) without the priuie of his Estates. So Charles yeelded Neustria to the Normans, vpon condition they should do homage to the Crowne of France. Then gaue they their name to the Countrie which they had conquered, ratified by this sollempne title, and called it Normandie. He likewise lost Friseland, and gaue Giselle in marriage (being the daughter of Lothaire his Cousin) to Sigefrid or Geffroy one of the cheefe of the Normans, thinking thereby to stoppe this storme. But thereby he wrought his owne ruine, for this grant was found so wonderfully strange, that the French, not only greened that the Regent had done it without their aduice, but also that (in yeelding this goodly countrie to the Normans) he had dismembred the inheritance of the Crowne, which is inalienable by the law of State. And although necessitie might inferre some consideration for Charles his excuse, yet the French for this respect conceived so great a hatred against him, as they could not rest vntill they had degraded him. And as one mischeefe neuer comes alone: Charles finding himselfe thus dildayned, fell sicke. This corporall sicknes was accompanied with a distemperature of the mind, farre more dangerous: by an extreme ieaousie hee had conceived against his Queene Richarde, daughter to the King of Scots, suspecting her to haue bene too prodigall of her honour. These two infirmities of bodie and mind made Charles altogether unfit for his charge, which consists more in action then in contemplatiue authoritie, and in a season when as occasions were ministred on all sides. This difficultie and disabilitie to serue effectually in the regencie of the Realme and Empire vnited in one person, of whome all men expected much, and they discontent of the ill gouernment which the French and Germanes (depending of this Crowne) pretended, in quitting Normandie, made both the one and the other, to enter into strange alterations against Charles. At the first his great authoritie kept the boldest in awe, and his sicknes did excuse him: but after some yeares patience, the French & the Germanes by a common consent resolved to dispossesse Charles, and to call a more sufficient to the place, every one according to the limits of his countie. The Germanes made choise for their Emperour, of Arnoul sonne to Caroleman, the sonne of Lewis the gentle, retaining the respect they bare to the blood and memorie of Charlemagne. Thus the Eclipse of the Empire chanced not altogether, but this change was the first moriue to alter the Imperiall dignitie, whereof afterwards was framed an estate in Germanie, vnder the title of an Emperour, as we shall see. The French likewise reiect this miserable Charles, from the regencie of the realme, and call Eudes or Odou Duke of Angers, named by the will of Lewis the stuttering.

So this poore Prince is dispossessed of all his estates, and abandoned of euery man, reiected both from realme and Empire, hauing so ill provided for himselfe in time of prosperitie, as he remained naked without a house, where to shroude himselfe from the disgrace disgrace of this shipwrack: being banished from his Court, and driven into a poore village of Sucuis, where he liued some dayes in extreame want, without any meanes of his owne, or releefe from any man, in the end he dyed, neither pitied nor lamented of any: in a corner vnkowne, but to haue bene the Theater of so extraordinary a Tragedie, That one of the greatest Monarkes of the world, should dye without house, without bread, without honour, without mourning, and without memorie, but the note of this end so prodigiouly memorable. A notable patterne of the vanity of this world, in diuers circumstances: In Charles, in the people, and in the Chastisement. In

Charles, to learne by his example, to carry themselves wisely, both in prosperitie and aduersity. Hee wanted no iudgement, and had abundance of wealth: but hee was neither temperate nor wise in his abundance, in the which the actions of his life shew him to haue bene imperious and indiscreet, purchasing enemies, in contemning those that had rayfed him to those dignities, hauing bene too confident in himselfe, and carelesse of the condition of mans life: and from this extremitie he fell into another, in the time of his greatest afflictions, suffering himselfe to be cartied away in the current of melancholie, and his soule to be swallowed vp in despaire. In the People, who worship him in the beginning, whom they deuoure in the end, and with an inexcusable malice, tread vnder foote the afflicted: and without due consideration of the true cause of affliction, they esteeme no crime greater then affliction it selfe, whereon they should haue pittie, and detest the vice, the which they couer with the cloake of prosperity. But from Charles, the People, and the Rodde, let vs ascend to him that holds it, which is God, and learne to depend on him, both in wealth and woe, not trusting in our selues when we abound, nor distrust in him when we are in greatest extreames: the which he can easily redresse. Doubtlesse greatnesse cometh neither from the East nor from the West. God raiseth one, and pulleth downe another, that weighing duly the vncertaintie of this life, and profiting by the example of others, we may learne not to be wise vnto our selues, but to stop our mouthes, and open our eares and eyes, to see what God doth, and heare what he saith, seeking the true remedies of consolation, in him that neuer failes the afflicted which flie vnto him.

So that great King and Prophet banished from his house, said, I haue held my peace, for thou hast done it, and The Lord is iust in all his wayes. A most reasonable warrant of Iustice, and excellent fruite of afflictions. Such was the entrie and end of Charles the Grosse, at the first a King and Emperour, and in the end lesse then his most miserable subiect. After him Eudes came in place, thrust forward by them that had reiected Charles the Grosse,

Behold Eudes at last, who should have been in the beginning. Hee A began to raigue, or rather to bee Regent, the yeare 894. and raig-ned eight yeares and some moneths, but not without difficulties.
For the order of the historie wee must carefully observe his race, which in the end shal game the highest place. We have made mention of Witland of Saxony, one of the most famous personages of his time. Being greatly favoured by Charlemagne, hee sent a sonne of his into France, named Robert or Rupert, who had great dignities. This Robert had two sonnes, Eudes and Robert, who shall soone minister matter to take of his life. This last Robert was father to Hugh the great, and hee father to Hugh Capet, who in the end shall sit in the royall throne: we shall see by what degrees and meanes. But to unfold many difficulties which appeare in the reading of this historie, and in the diversitie of titles given those that are descended of Eudes race: we must observe, that the name of Earle and Duke, were titles of gouernment, and not of inheritance, and that their go-uernments were temporary, so as one & the same man (being possessed of diuers go-uernments at diuers times) doth carrie in diuers respects the title of Duke, and Earle of those Prouinces, whereof hee hath beene gouernour: the which was vially for a yeare, or for three. So as wee find in this house, Dukes of Angers, Paris, Guienne, and Bourgonne, according to their commands.

Duke and Earle but titles of Offices.

Eudes undertooke the gouernment of the Realme, according to the decree of the Estates, vnder the conduct of a good Pilot. He was held to bee a good and a wise man, yet could hee not please all the French that had called him to the Regencie.
They

A They complaine that Eudes was well pleased to rule and to keepe the King in awe, being no more a child: & after so bad gouernment of the former Regents. Such as sought Eudes maligto bee partakers of the authoritie vnder the yong King, did vehemently insist against Eudes, to haue him leaue the gouernment of the realme: but necessitie did contradict it, not permitting him to abandon the helme in these tempests. In the end (after many clamors) Eudes authoritie is limited to the gouernment of Guienne. Eudes maligned in his Regencie.

Eight yeares passed in these contentions, but now the seed of innouation was in the heart of the State, the libertie of priuate men hauing cast away all respect: all the members of the bodie were sicke, and the soueraigne authoritie shaken by a generall disorder, which in the end changed by degrees. Italie wauered, Germanie was quite safe-Blen away, as I haue sayed: and France was greatly troubled with diuers factions, among the which, the Kings part was reckoned the greater: but experience shewed it was the weakest, for Eudes kept them in awe. The King who had the greatest interest, thought least thereon, being ill aduised by them who sought to abuse his simple and tractable disposition, and to aduance themselves by his ruine. Hee solicits Eudes in such sort as in the end he strips himselfe of all authoritie, and resignes it into the Kings hands, who knowes neither how to manage it, nor how to auoyd his owne misfortune, the which Eudes preuented whilest he liued. It was not long before his death, that he resigned al his authoritie of Regent vnto Charles as to the lawfull heire, the which hee could not long keepe when hee was in possession thereof, according to his soueraigne desire.

CHARLES

CHARLES the 2. called the simple; 31. King.

HEE was Crowned in the yeare 902. Eudes gouerning with him eight yeares from his coronation, Charles remayning alone after the death of his Regent in the yeare 902. raigned 27. yeares. His raigue was miserable both in the beginning, midst and ending. He ratified the accord made with the Normans, by Charles the Groſſe, and ſealed it with the marriage of his ſiſter Gilette with Rhou or Raoul (hee is alſo called Rheulon) their chiefe Commander, who hauing left the Pagan ſuperſtition and imbraced Chriſtian religion, purchaſed a great reputation in that Country, whereof he was firſt called Duke.

But the Normans ſute ceaſing, a more violent fire is kindled by conſuſion. All breaks forth: A league made againſt the King, diſcouers it ſelfe, and takes armes without ſhame or reſpect, but being the breeding of the change of this ſecond race. We muſt obſerue it very diſtinctly, and ſeek out the motives thereof.

B

ROBERT Duke of Aniou, that is to ſay, gouernour by the death of his brother Eudes, becomes the head of this League, accompanied with many great men of France. The euent ſhewes that their intent was to reiect Charles the ſimple, as vnworthy to raigne, and to chooſe a newe King. I doubt not but Robert affected the Crowne for himſelfe: but that is very likely that hee couered this his deſſeine

The motive of this league

with ſome goodly pretext. The writers of that obſcure age haue concealed the motives; but as by the effects we knowe the cauſe, ſo by the euent of this League when it was ſtrongeſt, we may iudge of the intent.

They aduanced a Prince of the bloud for king, cauſing Charles to quit the Crowne, Charles put diſgracing him with the name of ſimple or fooliſh, and delaring him incapable of ſo great a charge. Who ſeeth not then the reaſon, that during the minority of Charles the ſimple, the diuerſity of maſters had bred infinit conſuſions in the ſtate? and that ſince his coronation, things were nothing repaired, although Eudes had reſigned him the Regency. They pretend it was neceſſary to furniſh the realme with a more worthy Prince, to giue an end to theſe miſeries. But that which cheefeſly moued the vndertakers, was their private intereſt, the which they cloaked with the common-weale. The humors of this inſufficient King offended many, too milde to ſome, too ſeuere to others and ingratefull to ſuch as had beſt ſerued him.

The commentary which hath bene added to the text of the Originall is not likely, that Robert as brother to Eudes pretended the Crowne, as heire vnto his brother being lawfully choſen by the States. But wherevnto tends all this? Eudes had left no ſufpition to pretend any intereſt vnto the Crowne, hauing bene Regent after others, and enioying it but by ſuffrance, reſigning it willingly or by conſtraint vnto the lawefull heire. Truly the French mens carefull keeping of their Queenes wombe, their acknowledging the childe borne after the fathers death for King: their chooſing of Regents: their placing and diſplacing of one and the ſame Regent, do plainly ſhewe both the efficacy of the Lawe, and the reſolute poſſeſſion of the French, the which they yeilded not eaſily to a man with ſo weake a title. What then? I ſhould rather thinke that the peoples complaint, tired with ſo long calamities, was their colour to furniſh the realme with a more wiſe and profitable guide, and that they ſought a Prince (as in the ende they tooke Raoul King of Bourgongne, the firſt Prince of the bloud) of which League Robert was the ringleader, as the firſt in dignity and moſt valiant in courage, or the moſt raſh in ſo dangerous an enterpriſe.

Robert the head of the league and in armes.

The memory of his brothers wiſe and peaceable gouernment, and his owne valour, oppoſite to the fooliſh and baſe diſpoſition of Charles, blemiſhed with this name of ſimple, (for his folly and contemptible humors) gaue a great Luſtre to this enterpriſe, with thoſe great intelligences he had within the realme, and namely with the Normans his confident friends.

With this aſſurance hee armes boldly againſt Charles, promiſing himſelfe an vn-doubted

925. of Friul, who hauing freed himselfe from the Empire, had vanquished Lewis the sonne of Boson, who inioyed Italie (as we haue sayd) as husband to the daughter of Lewis one of the sonnes of Lewis the gentle. Raoul made a quiet end with Hugues Earle of Arles, who had gotten possession of that goodly Cittie as gouernour, seated in a fertile Countre, and very conuenient: he suffered him quietly to inioy the Cittie and territories about it, holding it of the Crowne of France.

Thus passed the raigne of Raoul, without any great profit after so much toyle and trouble, vnder a colour to do better then the lawfull heire, wrongfully dispossessed by him; Leauing no memorie but his ambition and iniustice, in a deluge of troubles and confusions, wherein the Realme was plunged after his departure to the great discontent of all the French. He died after all these broyles in the yeare 936. at Compiègne.

Necessitie obseruations for great estates. An age wonderfully disordred, wherein we may profitably obserue by what accidents and meanes great estates are ruined. Ciuill warres bred the first Symptomes. As order is the health of an estate, so is disorder the ruine. The seruant hauing tasted the sweetness of command, imagins himselfe to be master, being loath to leaue the authoritie he had in hand, holding it as his owne by testament. In this resolution there is nothing holy, all is violated for rule, all respect is layd aside, every one playes the King within himselfe: for one King there are many. & where there are many masters, there are none at all. The which we must well obserue, to vnfold many difficulties in the History of this confused age, wherein we read of many Kings, Dukes, and Earles, although these titles were but temporarie, hauing no other title but the sword and the confu-

Confusions of thole times. Thus was France altered after the death of Charles the simple, by the practises of Roberts League. There was no gouernour of any Province throughout the realme, which hold not proper to himselfe and his heires, those which were given vnto them but as offices. From hence sprang for many Dukedomes, Earledomes, Baronies, and Seigneuries, the which for the most part are returned to their first beginnings. Italie (giuen to an Infant of France) was possessed by diuers Princes. Germanie withdrawne from the Crowne, was banded into diuers factions, so as the Empire of the West confirmed in the person of Charlemagne, continued scarce a hundred yeares in his race: for Lewis the fourth, the sonne of Arnoul (of whome we haue spoken) was the last Emperour of this bloud. In his place the Germanes elected Conrad Duke of East Franconia, the yeare of grace 920. the Empire being then very weake. After Conrad was chosen Henry the fouler Duke of Saxony, and after him his sonne Otto, Princes adorned with great & singular vertues, fit for the time to preserve the West: for the East did runne headlong to her ruine, so as since Nicephorus (who liued in the time of Charlemagne) they did not esteeme them, but held them as abiects in regard of those great Emperours which had liued before them, namely Michel Curopalates, Leo Armenien, Michel the flammering, the two Theophiles father & son, Eusebe the Macedonien, Leo the Philosopher, Alexander, Constantine a Romaine, all which had nothing of the Romaine but the name. Thus this poore sicke bodie languished, being tome in peeces by the infamies of these men, either of no valour, or altogether wicked, attending the last blow by the hand of the Mahometans, whose power they fortified by their vitious liues, vntill they had lodged them vpon their owne heads.

In the Church A notable spectacle of Gods iust iudgement, who dishonours them that dishonour him, and expells them from their houses that banish him from their hearts. In these confusions of State, the Pope of *Rome*s power increased daily, by the ruines of the Empire, who thrust himselfe into credit among Christians by many occurrents. Their designs was to build a Monarchie in the Church, by authoritie, power, Seigneuries, ciuill Iurisdiccions, armes, reuenues, and treasor, being growne to that greatnes, as afterwards they sought to prescribe lawes to Emperours and Kings, who refusing it, and disputing vpon this primacie, many dissensions grew among them, and so were disperfed among the people. This is the summe of all that shall be discoursed in the future ages in Christendome, wherein we shall view the the sea of Rome, the Empire and the king-

A. dome. I treat but of matters of State, wherevnto the subiect and the order of our definition doth tie me, to report by degrees so long and so obscure a discourse of those ages plunged in darkenesse.

Plantina the Popes Secretary reports a very notable accident, happened at Rome in those times: a yong maide loued by a learned man (these are his words) came with him to Athenes, attyred like a boy, and there profited so well in knowledge and learning, as being come to Rome, there were few equall vnto her in the Scriptures, neither did any one exceede her in knowledge: so as she had gotten so great reputation, as after the death of Pope Leo, she was created Pope, by a generall consent, & was called Iohn the eighth. But it chanced, that hauing crept too neere to one of her gromies, shee grewe with child, the which shee did carefully conceale. But as she went to the Basilique of S. Iohn de Lateran, betwixt the Calistes and S. Clement, she fell in labour, and was deliuered of this stolne birth, in a sollemne procession in view of all the people. And in detestation of so fowle a fact a pillar was erected where this profane person died.

So without flattering the truth, not the Empire alone went to wrack, but also the realme and the Church, being in those daies full of confusions, in which they fell from one mischiefe to another, by the barbarous ignorance of all good things, both in the State and Church, as the wise and vnpassionate reader may obserue in the continuance of the history plainly described. But lets returne from the Empire and sea of Rome, to France. We haue sayd, that when Charles the simple was first imprisoned, the

C Queene Ogiva his wife had carried her sonne Lewis into England to Aldestan the King her brother. She had patiently suffred all, during the furious raigne of Raoul the usurper, while the experience of diuers masters did ripen the French mens discontent, to make them wish for their lawfull Lord. After the death of Raoul, Aldestan King of England, (hauing drawne vnto him William Duke of Normandie, the sonne of Rhou) sends a very honorable Ambassage to the States of France, intreating them to restore his Nephewe Lewis to his lawfull and hereditary dignitie. The French with it: so as without any difficulty, Lewis the sonne of Charles was called home, by the Estates of France, whether he was accompanied with a great troupe of English men and Normans, as the shewe of a goodly army, which might seeme to force them to that which they willingly yeelded vnto.

LEWIS returns into France, having remayned nine years or thereabouts in England, surnamed D'outremer or from beyond the seas, by reason of his stay there. He beganne to raigne in the yeare 935. and raigned 27. yeares. A disloyall and vnsfortunate Prince, hauing made no vse of his afflictions, vnworthy the bloud of Charlemagne. And thus their ruine aduanced by the default of men, the which God held back by his patience. He found the Estate of his realme like vnto one that returnes to his houte after a long and dangerous nauigation. He was receiued with great ioye of all men. Those which had beene most opposite vnto him, made greatest shewes of faithfull and affectionate seruice, to insinuate into his fauour. Amongst the rest William Duke of Normandy, but especially Hugues the great, Maïor of the Pallace, whome wee haue already noted, as the sonne of Robert the chiefe of the said League. Hee had employed all his meanes for the calling home of Lewis into France, and at his returne he spared nothing to confirme his authority. This was the meanes to lay the foundation of a greater authority for his successors.

They must begin the newe government of this Prince with a wife, to haue lawfull issue. The Emperours allyance was very needefull. Otho held the Imperiall dignity, being the sonne of Henry the fowler Duke of Saxony. He had two sisters Herbergue and Anoye. King Lewis marrieth the eldest, and in signe of brotherly loue he motioned the marriage of the youngest with Hugues the great. Lewis had two sonnes by Herbergue, Lothaire (who succeeded him to the Crowne of France) and Charles, who shalbe Duke of Lorraine and contend for the Crowne, but shall loose it. Hugues the great was more happy then Lewis, for of the yongest hee had Hugh Capet, who shall take their place,

A place, and ascend the royall throne, to settle the French Monarchie, shaken much in the confusions of these Kings vnworthy to raigne, or beare any rule: And of the same marriage Hugues had Otho and Henry, both Dukes of Bourgoigne, one after another.

Behold now vpon the Stage two great and wise personages, the King and his Maïor, whom we may call a second King: they strue to circumuent each other, the which their actions will discouer: but man cannot preuent that on earth, which is decreed in heauen. At this time William Duke of Normandie, the sonne of Rhou, (who had shewed himselfe so affectionate in the restoring of the King to his dignitie) was traitterously massacred by the meanes of Arnoul Earle of Flanders his capitall enemy: leaving one sonne named Richard, a young man vnder government. This vnspected and extraordinary death must needs breed great troubles in Normandie, an estate which was but now beginning. It did greatly import for the good of France, to haue this Province in quiet. Lewis was likewise particularly bound, for the good enterrainment he had receiued of William in his greatest necessitie, the which tyed him to his sonne.

Normandie.

These were goodly shewes to make him imbrace this cause: so as hauing intelligence of this accident, hee sends expressly to Richard and his Councell, to assure him of his loue and succour, and follows him the presently to Rouan, with a traine fite for his royall greatnesse, being loth to see the weakest after so strange an alteration, where the most audacious do commonly fish in a troubled streame. The colour of his coming was to comfort Richard with his counsell and fauourable assistance: but in effect, it was to seize vpon his person and estate. Hee sends for this young child to his lodging, conducted by his gouernour the Knight Osmond: he doth assure him with sweete words of his fatherly loue: but when night came, he would not suffer him to depart, detaining him three dayes with a carefull garde. The people incensed by them that had the charge of the young Duke, mutine, and besiege the Kings lodging.

Hauing pacified this popular fury, in deliuering them their Prince, hee protests to haue no other intent, but to preserve his estate. And so in an open assembly of the Citizens, receiuing him to homage, hauing giuen him a discharge of his lands and Seignuries, hee doth solemnly promise to reuenge the death of William against Arnoul Earle of Flanders, and gets the consent of the Normans, to lead their Duke with him to be instructed with his sonne Lothaire, a young childe of the same age. Hee brings him to Laon, whether Arnoul the murtherer of William repaires, in shew to purge himselfe of the murther: but in effect, to perswade him, so to seize on Richards person, as he might enioy his estate.

Lewis being resolute in this determination (a man disloyall by nature, and louing nothing but himselfe) hee caused this poore young Prince to bee straightly garded: but this Gouernour Osmond, retires him cunningly out of Laon, conducting him to Senlis, to Hebert his fathers confident friend. This is hee which imprisoned Charles the Simple, contrary to his faith: and now hee detests Lewis his Soueraigne Lord, who seekes to doe the like vnto one of his vassalls. But we shall soone see the Iustice of God aboute all, who will punish one by another, and shew himselfe an enemy and reuenger of all disloyaltie and misdemeanour, both in seruant and maister, and in all other, as all are naturally subiect to this soueraigne lawe of integritie and faithfulness to all men.

Lewis deales
treacherously with the Duke of Normandie

Hugues the great, Earle of Paris, and Maïor of the Pallace, had won great credit with the Citties and men of warre: but, hee was more feared then loued of Lewis, a treacherous and reuengefull Prince, whome hee distrusted, and opposed his authority against him. Hebert was his confident friend. So in this occurrent of this young Prince, hee comes to Paris, and winnes him to promise fauour vnto Richard, or at the least to make him promise, not to bee his enemy.

The

9.4.2.

The King likewise (knowing how much his friendship did import in these labours to winne him, (such was the strangenes of that age, as the master must be the seruant) the which hee obtayned, vpon condition to giue him a good part of Normandie. Here vpon the match was made, that Hugues should accompany Lewis to the warre of Normandie, and should enter on the one side while the King came on the other, promising to diuide their conquests according to their agreement. But this succeeded not according to their meanings, the two deceiuers were deceiued. but the greatest bare the greatest burthen. This complot of Lewis and Hugues could not be so secret, but it came to the knowledge of Hebert, who gaue intelligence to Richard and his gouernors, Osmond, and Bernard the Dane: so as they assemble at Senlis, and resolute to crosse this double dealing of Hugues, with the like policy. To this ende Hebert (according to the familiarity he had with Hugues) goes to conferre with him, to put him in minde of his promise: of the right of a yong Prince vniustly pursued by Lewis, and of his treacherous, and disloyall disposition, who hauing vsed him to worke his will, would in the end deceiue him, beseeching him to stand firme in a good cause, for his ancient and faithfull friends, and not to fortifie their common enemy by the afflictions of an other, but in defending the right vniustly set vpon, prouide for his safety and profit. Hugues (who thought it best to haue two strings to his bowe,) distrusting Lewis in his heart more then any man lyuing, doth easily grant Hebert to assist Richard against Lewis, and doth confirme his promise by oth.

is deceiued.

Hebert hauing thus ingaged Hugues, and yet distrusting him greatly, whome he sees to play on both sides, returns to Senlis, to Richard and his gouernors, where they conclude, that if Hugues ioyned with the King against Richard, they would compound with the King to his cost: and so it happened. The King goes to field with his army on the one side, and Hugues on the other to invade Normandie in diuers partes, when as Bernard the Dane, chiefe gouernor of the State for Richard, and Osmond of his person, came boldly vnto Lewis and sayd vnto him, that he had no neede to attempt Normandie by force, when as he might enioy it by a voluntary obedience: for prooue whereof, if it pleased him to come to Rouen, he should be obeyed. But withall he aduised him to take heed of Hugues his ancient enemy, shewing him treacherously the countenance of a friend & seruant, leaue he were circumvented, but rather to accept of a Normandie with Rouen, the which offered it selfe vnto him to receiue peace from him, & yeeld him obedience as their Soueraigne Lord.

Lewis vniustly giues eare to this aduice: he comes presently to Rouen, and is honorably receiued, sending word to Hugues, that seeing the Prouince obeyed, there was no neede of further proceeding, and hauing not employed him in this voluntary conquest, it was not reasonable he should participate in another mans estate: that the publicke good and reason required him to leaue Richard as he was, vnder the obedience of the Crowne, without dismembriug of his Estate. Hugues (who pretended a good part of this rich Country) was greatly discontented with Lewis. Hauing dismissed his army, he retires to Paris, detesting his infidelity. Hebert embracing this occasiō, comes to Hugues, and according to the familiarity of their ancient friendship, he laughs at him, in iustifying himselfe to be abused by his approued enemy, abandoning his trustie friends against all right. The shame to haue failed of his word, & despite to haue bene deceiued, made Hugues soone resolute, not onely to leaue Lewis, but to embrace *Richard*s party against him, with all his power.

It was a notable stratageme, to diuide Hugues, and leaue him discontented with Lewis: but being assured of his friendship, they lend into Denmarke (from whence the Normans were descended) to King Aigrold, kinsman and friend to Richard, for succors, the which succeeded more happily then they expected.

Enr's oppresion the War 1531.

Lewis is at Rouen, who doth not onely command there as Soueraigne, but doth seize on their goods, whome he doth any way suspect; deuising occasions, and holding it for a capitall crime to be any way affected vnto Richard, fauoring his followers with the best matches in the Country, and giuing them credit and authority in the Prouince,

A by marriages: he imposeth extraordinarie charges vpon the people, already surcharged with the feeding of so many horsemen. To conclude, he doth all a man may doe, that hath no other counsellor but his grearneffe, and that seekes his owne ruine by his blinde couetousnesse.

In the meane time Aigrold comes in Denmarke, and in the end comes into Normandie. The King of Denmarke comes to succour the Duke of Normandie. die with a goodly armie: the King likewise brings his forces to field. Richard, who had the chiefe interest, is at Senlis in safety, and Hugues at Paris, a looker on. Aigrold, before hee enters into open hostility, sends his Ambassadors to Lewis, to let him vnderstand, that the reason which had drawne him into Normandie with his armie, was to mainteine the right of his cousin Richard, who had not deserved to be spoyled of his Bestate, vpon no other cause but his minority: who (although hee had no father,) yet should he not bee destitute of Kinsmen and friends. And therefore hee intreated Lewis (rather then to come to the doubtfull euent of armes) to suffer Richard to enioy Normandie, as his father and grand-father had done. And this he did to liue the right on his side.

Lewis bold in deceiuing, and a coward in danger, charged with the wrong hee had done vnto a pupill, seeing himselfe abandoned by Hugues, whome he had discontented out of season, and not trusting much the other Noblemen that followed him, hee makes a very milde answer to Aigrold: and after some negotiations, he yeelds to a parlee with him, as the chiefe mediator of *Richard*s rights. Being in field, and conferring together vpon this occasion, behold an vnexpected accident falls out. He which had bene the cause of the Earle of Flanders quarrell, and by consequence of the murthering of William, the father of Richard, was there present with the King. Our histories say, it was Ellain Earle of Montreuill. A Dane (an old friend of Williams) knowes him, hee chargeth him therewith: and as they grow to choller, hee kills him. Then both parties fell to armes: the French charge the Danes, but they finde themselves too weake: all are dispersed, and with this vprore the Kings breake off their parlee. Lewis goes to horse, the which being strong headed, carries him among the thickest of the Danes. Behold he is now prisoner in the hands of some souldiars: but as in this tumult the gard was neglected, he escapes: yet in the end he is taken againe, and lead in triumph to Rouen. Thus the murder supported by Lewis, was the cause of his imprisonment: and he seeking to wrong a pupill, did releue him with his owne person, in exchange that he had restrained him against all right.

Lewis taken prisoner, as a paillie, and

The Queene Gerberge greatly troubled for her husbands imprisonment, flies to Otho the Emperour her brother, who (preuented by Hugues his other brother in law, and seeing the wrong Lewis did, to disquiet a young Prince in the possession of his estate) refuseth to succour him: so as necessitie inforceth Gerberge to vse Hugues (to her great griefe) to be a mediator for the deliuey of the King her husband. Hugues intreated by the Queene his sister in law, deales at length in this accord, but vpon good termes; That the King should yeeld to Duke Richard all the Duchie of Normandie, and for a surplusage that of Brittanie, to hold them freely without retention of soueraignty or homage: the which was much more then the pupill required, who would willingly haue done homage to the King, as to his soueraigne Lord, and haue yeelded him faithfull obedience. Behold the issue of Lewis his deceite, being deceiued by a poore young man, whom he thought to circumuent; verifying by a notable example, That whoeuer seekes to take away an other mans right, looleth his owne.

Enlarged vpon
conditions

Behold Richard restored to his estate, where he carrieth himselfe with such equity and moderation, by the wise aduise of Bernard and Osmond his Gouernours, as he wins the loue of his subiects, and by their counsell, he takes to wife Agnes or Eumacette, the Daughtre of Hugues the great, for confirmation of the good turne hee had receiued from him in his necessity. This alliance of Hugues with Richard, increased Lewis his ieaousie against him, so as hee resolved to imploy all his forces to suppress him. He goes to the Emperour Otho his brother in law, informing him, that Hugues practised to deprive him of the realme: and that he would speedily attempt it, if hee were not

951. not prevented: with whome he so preuailed, through this common iealousie of Princes, (who impatiently do see any other to growe great by them) as he leuied a great army, the which ioyned with that of France, and beleeged ROMAN: but with such vnhappy successe, as the Emperour (hauing lost both his Nephew and a great number of his men) aduised the King to compound with Hugues his brother in lawe, and to leaue Richard, Normandie in peace, according to their former treaties.

So hauing labored to reconcile these brothers in lawe, he returned into Germany. This counterfeit reconciliatiō, was but a breathing of the peoples miseries, which they suffred by the dissention of Princes: but there was no firme friendship, for Hugues trusted not Lewis, but kept aloofe in his great City of Paris, leauing the King at Laon, being then the chiefe seat of his royall abode.

Hugues, by this cunning proceeding, kept himselfe out of Lewis his hands, who on the other side dissembled: & seeing that force could not preuaile, he watched all opportunities to surprise his enemies: amongst the which he hated none so much as Hebert Earle of Vermadois, both for that which hee had done against his father, and his late proceedings against himselfe. He gouerned this dislike so wisely, as in the end Hebert was hanged. And this was the meanes: Lewis pretending to loue Hugues, shewed a good countenance to all such as were affected vnto him, especially to this Cont Hebert, whome hee fauored extraordinarily, protesting to trust him in all things: the successe was answerable to his plot. He calls an assembly of his vassalls at Laon, and fortifies himselfe to be the strongest. thether he calls Cont Hebert, of whose counsell in shewe he made great esteeme, and writes his letters vnto him, that he would vse him. Hebert growne familiar with Lewis, and sent for by him, comes to the assembly, fearing no enemy. Lewis being master of the City, reading a letter after dinner in the great hall, he cried out. It is truly sayd, that English men are not very wise. The Noblemen about him desirous to knowe the cause of this speech: hee fained, that the King of England had demanded his aduice by this letter, What he should do to a subiect that had called his Lord into his house, under colour of good cheere, had seized on him, and caused him to die shamefully: Hebert answereth with the rest: That he must die infamously. The King replies vnto him presently. Thou hast condemned thy selfe by thine owne mouth, thou wicked seruant, thou didst inuite my father to thy house, with a shewe of loue: being there, thou didst detain him and cause him to die cruelly. The company stood in shew amazed, but in effect ready to execute the Kings pleasure, not able to contradict so manifest a truth: for the information of the death of King Charles the simple was notorious to the world, so as presently, by Lewis absolute command, Hebert was taken away, deliuered to the executioner, and hanged in vewe of all the world, the place being neere vnto Laon, (noted by so memorable an execution) is called Mont Hebert vnto this day. And thus the treachery of Hebert (after a long delay, when he least suspected) was punished by the treachery of Lewis: and he himselfe after all these exploits died at Rheims, in the year 955, hated and detested of the French, leauing to Lothaire his sonne a Crowne neere the ruine, and to Charles his yongest, the fauour of his elder brother, for a poore portion, as wee shall declare heereafter.

LOTHAIRE the 34. King
of France.

956. He began to raigne in the year 956. and raigned 31. yeares, performing nothing that was memorable, but that hee was heire to his fathers treacherie & misfortune, and the last but one of his race. He was a forerunner of the change, which happened to his posteritie. He renewed a League with the Emperour Otho the second, who had succeeded his father Otho the first, with an intent to reuise the enterprise of his father Lewis, against Richard Duke of Normandie, either by policie, or else by open force. He sought wise to surprise Richard, a good and a wise Prince, with a shew of good meaning: but hauing attempted all in vaine, in the end hee vsed open force, and was shamefully repulsed and beaten. Thus he spent some yeares vnprofitably in this wilfull passion against the Normans, bringing infinit confusions into France, both by his owne forces, and by theirs against whome hee vndertooke this vobinary ware.

These miseries are set forth at large, by those writers which liued in that age. This breefe will serue for the matter, according to our stile to shew, That these calamities, bred only by the passion of an ill aduised King, thrust the subiects into furie and dispaire, and then into harred against him, being vnworthie to be respected, hauing so litle regard of publike peace. The general Estates assemble for the redresse thereof. The Normans suffering as well as the French, demaund nothing more then peace, and Duke Richard, notwithstanding his treatie with Lewis the fourth, offered to hold of the Crowne of France, so as his subiects might liue in quiet.

These honest, profitable and necessarie offers, augmented their hate against Lothaire, who sought war without any cause, although he were vnfortunate, alwaies mitinous, and alwaies beaten. To this phreneticall passion of his fruitles quarrels against the Normans, a new fantasie possessed Lothaire, to breake the league with the Emperour, & A to make warre with the Germanes, or the possession of Lorraine, (anciently called Austrasia) the which he sayd belonged vnto him by right, time out of minde. He sought by ill gouernment to repofse that which lay farre off, being vnable to keepe that which he had in his possession. He ingaged Regnier and Lambert, the sonnes of the Earle of Mons in this action, promising to diuide the conquest: and did so contemne his brother Charles (whom his father had recommended vnto him) leauing him no portion but his fauour, hoping this liberty should breed more loue in him, and also the reuerence of a brother tyed to his eldest, should make him respectiue to the publike authority) as he fled to the Emperour Otho for helpe. Otho (embracing this occasion) determines the sure which Lothaire would commence against him, in respect of Lorraine: inuesting Charles therein, who sought releefe of him for his brothers discontent: but Otho restoring Lorraine vnto him, tooke from it great Seigneuries giuen to the Bishops of Cologne and Liege, with condition also that hee should depend of the Empire. Hereof grew great iarres betwixt the French and the Germanes, with so violent a rage, and passion, as they were rather furious robberies, then iust and well gouerned warres. Charles the brother of Lothaire, carried himselfe very indiscreetly, as if he had been no Frenchman but a Germane, and was wedded to the Emperours passions with such vehemencie, as if all his good fortune had depended thereon, and had vtterly renounced France as a capitall enemy. Moreouer, the ordinary trafficke from France to Germanie, was a dayly cause of discontent to the French: to whom Lorraine C was an ordinary passage for their commerce. so as diuers persons receiuing dayly, and vpon diuers occasions, discourtesies from Charles Duke of Lorraine, the French conceived a hatred in their hearts against him, which burst out in a seasonable time, for the vtter ouerthrow of all the good hap wherevnto God had called him, the which he could not gouerne by his indiscretion and cruelty.

But the prouidence of God, making way for his decrees, would expell them from the Crowne, which had banished all faith, valour, humanitie, iustice, and other royall vertues, and disposed the people to these changes, by their default, who had the principall interest to entertaine their loues by equity and good vsage. Lothaire hated of all men, dyed in the yeare 964. leauing behind him an execrable memory of his actions, and Lewis his sonne for a finall conclusion of his race, as an outcast of great Charlemagne.

He was likewise called idle, hauing done nothing worthy of memory, but in leauing the place to a better Prince, and more worthy then himselfe, whom God, the protector of the Crowne of France, had reserued for this estate, in so great necessitie, for as God had decreed, that out of the house of Hugues the great, should issue a great King, which should repara the errors of this bastard race of Charlemagne, so likewise hee had prepared the meanes, both for the father to lay the foundation, and for his sonne B Hugh Capet (appointed for this dignity) to finish this goodly building, as it appears in the following discourse,

H V G V E S, or Hugh Capet, the 36. King, and the first of the third race: the which raignes at this daye vnder Henry the fourth.

THE royall throne of France (remayning void, by the death of Lewis the 5.) did visibly call Charles Duke of Lorraine to the Crowne. (of whome we haue before mademention) as the first Prince of the blood royall, to whome I say the fundamentall Lawe did adudge the Crowne, for want of heires males, law- Charles Duke of Lorraine full sonnes of Kings. Charles was sonne to Lewis the 4. brother to Lothaire, Vncle to Lewis the 5. the last King. But it chanced otherwise, for Hugh Capet, sonne to Hugues the great, Maior of the Crowne, the Palais, Earle of Paris and also Prince of the French, carried it from Charles, being advanced to the Crowne by the free election of the French, assembled in Parliament, Hugh Capet Capet was elected King, and Charles Duke of Lorraine reiectd from the Crowne. This election being confirmed by the blessing of God, who hath mainteyned the possession (thus made lawfull, by the consent of the French nation,) in the successiue posterity of Capet, who happily prelerued the French Monarchie vnto this day, against the sundry violences of strangers. The date of this change vnto the third Race.

This change happened in the yeare 987. in the moneth of Iuly. But as this action was one of the worthiest that euer chanced in this realme, being an estate vnder which our Ancestors haue liued, and we do liue at this day: which gouernment hath continued 619. yeares. Yet all this is handled, by our ordinary writers, with such obscure breuity, as if Hugh Capet had fallen out of the clouds, or beene suddenly bred in one night, like vnto a muskrom.

The

987. The wife reader, which seekes the truth, must giue me leaue to dilate my stile, to shewe him by degrees, the breeding, continuance and establishing of this newe royaltie, in the house of France, transplanted into the house of Capet, as I could collect it by the curious search of the Originalls, and as the traces of truth could direct me in to crooked a Laborinth, vnkowne to the greatest part of our French nation. What I haue heere described, is faithfully drawne out off diuers authors which liued in those times. I haue onely fitted my report to be the more intelligible, and will simple represent what passed in this change, not giuing my iudgement, but leauing it free to the vnpassionate reader.

The reason why Charles
was reiected.

We haue layd in the second race, that Lewis the 5. sonne to Lothaire, dying without heires males, had buried the royalty with him: for Charles Duke of Lorraine, (whome the Lawe of state preferred to this dignity) had by his actions made himselfe vnworthy of this great honour. He had recourse to the Emperour Otho, and had taken the oath of fealty, to be inuested in the Duchie of Lorraine. So by this homage he had renounced all the interest he could pretend to the Crowne of France. Moreouer hee had aggrauated this error by an irreconcilable hatred, for (being Duke of Lorraine) he had shewed himselfe a passionate enemy to the French, in mainteining the Germane faction against them, who had not long before with-drawne themselves from the obedience of our Monarchie. It is also likely, that many priuate men were moued with the interest of this generall quarrell, by reason of the situation of Lorraine, the ordinary passage from France into Germany, Prouinces of comerce together.

These priuate iniuries, bred in the end a generall discontent, the which was increased by such as had a priuate interest in the wrongs they pretended to haue receiued. The feeling of these bad practises, acted so lately by Charles against France, both in generall and particular, did incense the French against him. But the example and cries of them of Lorraine, added to their experience, confirmed their resolution, to stoppe his entrance to the Crowne: for Charles (being a rash and a wicked man, bearing a Kings minde vnder a Dukes title) did infinitely oppresse his subiects of Lorraine, for the supplying of his prodigall expences: hauing as little iudgement and temperance to intreate them of Lorraine mildly, as hee had reason to gouerne himselfe.

The president of these newe subiects (whome hee enuied but by sufferance,) preuailed much with the French in this newe accident: for what could they with reason conclude of his vlage against them, who should be his naturall and necessary subiects? being yet terrified with the memory of that which they had suffered vnder Lothaire his brother.

This was the preparatiue of Charles his downfall, wrought by himselfe, to deprive him of that authority whereunto God had called him. These were the causes which made the French reioice to withstand Charles of Lorraine with all their forces in his pretension to the Crowne of France. But howe then Charles being rejected, the realme had neede of a King, vnable to subsist without one, no more then a body can without a head.

Equality of command, the name of an estate.

Thus the end of the one is the beginning of the other, and necessary gaue the people this first aduice to change, in trust forward with the only consideration of their quiet and profit. But the Nobility growne great by the disorders of troubles past, had yet more interest in this change, for the preleruation of their goods and honours. They could not live all equall. This equall commande is a plague to the French: they had deuoured one another without a great commander relected of them all, for so many Prouinces, so many petty Kings, which had neuer yeilded oneto another without a Controuler.

He that held the throne of the Crowne.

In this estate they could haue no recourse but to Hugh Capet, being accompanied with all the commendable qualities that might make a man worthy of a great command: with authority, power, vnderstanding, courage, wisdom, equitie, mildnesse, descretion, valour and credit, both within and without the realme.

We

A We haue before spoken of his father Hughes the great, the sonne of Robert Duke of Angers, who was the head of the League against Charles the Simple: shewing, that he not onely maintained himselfe after the death of his father Robert, but also built his desseignes vpon the same foundation, vnder the raignes of Lewis the 4. and Lothaire, Princes hard to bee circumvented. They feared him more then they loued him: yet hee vsed their authorities to his owne good, and did so wisely preuent the practises of these two malicious and reuengefull Princes, as hee maintained his authority firmly by the meanes of his great commands. Being Duke of the French, he had the command of armes. As Mayor of the Pallace, hee held the helme of the affaires of State: and being Earle of Paris, hee had the chiefe credit with the people, who had their greatest trade in the Capitall Cittie of the realme. This was the fruite which the respect of these offices brought him, being well gouerned by his wife dexterity. And although these Kings loued him not, yet the alliance hee had with them, as brother in lawe, but especially vertue countenanced by so great credit, were the cause they not onely made shew to loue him as their allie, but also to respect him as one of the chiefe pillars of the State.

The wife proceeding of Hughes the great his father.

But to these offices and dignities, hee added the friendship of the chiefe Noblemen of the Realme, being very carefull to entertaine their loues. Richard Duke of Normandie was one of his most confident friends, whom hee had gratified, mainteining him in the possession of his estate. Hee receiued requitall of this good turne with interest, in the pesson of Hugh his sonne, to seate him in the royall throne, as our History shall declare. But all these aduantages, were not onely crowned with a goodly and great offspring, but also with a sonne endowed with singular graces both of body and minde. Hee had sixe Sonnes and two Daughters, but his eldest was the chiere heire of his name, vertue, authority, credit, and happinesse, with such successe, as he made perfect the worke his father had begun.

The offspring of Hughes the great.

Hee was named Hughes, and by surname Capet, eyther for that he had a great head, or that being young hee was accustomed to catch at his companions cappes, as a prelude of that hee should do to Kings: Otho and Henry, two other sonnes of Hughes, were Dukes of Bourgonne one after another: his other sonnes were aduanced to Ecclesiastical dignities, the one Archbishop of Tholouse, the other of Rouan, and the third dyed young. One of his Daughters was married to the Duke of Normandie, the other to Frederike Earle of Metz. Hee had taken his first wife from England, the Daughter of King Edward, and sister to Queene Ogina, the wife of Charles the Simple, mother to Lewis the fourth: and although he had no children by her, yet did he carefully preferue the friendship of this allyance, and before his death he chose a wife out of this great house, for Hugh Capet his eldest sonne, the which was Adelais the daughter of King Edward.

He was called Capitofus.

Thus he fortified his greatnesse by all meanes; the which raised his posterity to the royall throne, purchasing credit both within and without the Realme, by all meanes fite to establish a great family. These were the ordinary proceedings which humane pollicie (being the gift of God, and a branch of his wisdom in those that he will blesse, leauing the wretched plunged in their wretchednesse, by their owne indiscretion) doth vsually prescribe to wife and carefull men. But Hughes the great had another benefit, which surmounted all these his great meanes, or the force of his friendships and alliances, hauing a sonne capable of iudgement for great attempts, fite for the time, brought vp and instructed by himselfe.

To conclude, all things were so disposed in France, as they must necessarily receiue him for King. Necessity, the generall consent both of great and small, and a meanes to preferue the Crowne from ruine, the which hee alone could effect. But if the French were forward in seeking to him; Hughes was so much the more encouraged to embrace so great and famous a dignity. And in the execution of this generous desseigne, hee carried himselfe with so great wisdom, moderation, and dexterity, as wee may well say, that God called him, as it were from heauen.

There

987. There remayned nothing but an orderly proceeding to that which reason presented A vnto them.

Hugh Capet proceeding to attaine the Crowne.

Hughes beganne with the greatest, who had a speciall interest to preserve what they held. He treated mildly with them for the common necessitie. The condition was, To leaue them all that by inheritance, which they held of the Crowne by title of office, and they to do homage, and acknowledge him for their lawfull King. Thus was the accord made betwixt the Nobilitie of France, & Hugh Capet, profitable for the great me, necessarie for the people, honorable for Hughes, & beneficial for the realme: for by this meane the realme was maintained in one bodie, vnder the authoritie of one absolute Commaunder. Hughes was well furnished, hauing a sonne capable of the realme which was hereditarie. The better fort had what they could desire for B ing thus disposed on all sides, the Parliament assembles at Noyon, whither they runne from all parts: and both necessitie and desire to winne his fauour to whome reason should assigne the Realme, brought all the cities, and made such hast thither as sought to settle their priuat estates by this publike authoritie. Hugh failes not likewise to call all his friendes, to reape the frute so long sought for, with so great paine and tra- uaille, both by himselfe and his father, and now to imploy them as in a day of battraile.

The assembly was great, by the concurse of all the Prouinces and Cities of the Realme, which repaired thither. It was the more famous, for that in shew the French C offered the Realme to Capet, as if hee had not affected it. As things passe in this sort, Charles Duke of Lorraine, well aduertised of the Frenchmens intent, & the desseignes of Hugh, labours to preuent him: and being resolu'd to imploy all his forces, hee begins first by admonitions, but so ill seasoned, as it made the way more easie for Capet: for hee sends his Ambassadors to the assembly of the States, not to intreat them to receiue him into their fauours, and so to the Crowne, according to his hereditarie right, but to summon them, That if they did not speedily obey, hee would reduce them to obedience by force. The French alreadie incensed against Charles, and hauing placed their hopes in Hugh (being present, and soliciting for himselfe, assisted with his best friends) fell into so great a rage against Charles, by his rough and importune speeches, D as hardly could the law of nations restraine them from doing some outrage vnto his Ambassadors, for their indiscretion.

Charles sends his Ambassadors to the Estates, and

Then the Estates inact by a sollemne decree, That for as much as Charles had shewed himselfe a friend to the enemies of France, and a sworn enemy to the French, so likewise did the French renounce his friendship, declaring him incapable of the benefit of the Law, both for that hee gaue the first cause, as also not being bound to acknowledge him for King: that is an enemy to the State, (their oath binding them to a King which is a father, iust, wise, mild, and temperate.) And therefore, Betweene God and their consciences, without any alteration of the fundamentall law, they renounce him, and declare that their intention is to choofe a King E which should provide for the quiet of France.

They deliver this declaration to Charles his Ambassadors, commanding them to a- noid the Realme presently. Thus Charles his reiection, was the raising of Hugh Capet, for presently the generall estates (assembled in one bodie, and representing all the Prouinces of the Realme) declare by an autentike and sollemne decree, That being ne- cessarie to choofe a King for the preservation of the Crowne of France, destitute as well by the death of Lewis the first, as by the apparent treacherie of Charles Duke of Lorraine, That in equitie, according to God and their consciences, the Estates did choofe Hugh Capet for King, promising to obey him, and his, as their lawfull Kings, according to the law of State. This is the ground of Hugh Capets royaltie. There was no need of any preachers to per- swade the people, nor to send to Rome for the Popes dispensation, as Pepin did. The people were fully perswaded in their mindes, and a fit occasion was offe- red, that without any inuiours change (as that was in the person of Chilperie) they fitable for the common weale. This Act was made at Noyon, in the moneth of May, in the yeare 987. and to giue more authority to this famous decree, the same Assembly goes to assist at the Coronation of Hugh, who was annointed and crowned King the third of Iuly, after his election. Crowned at Rheims.

Hugh Capet being thus chosen and crowned King, he studied by all meanes to let the French vnderstand by the effects, that they had made a good choise, as the successe of his raigne, and of his posterities will shewe in the following discourses. From Rheims he went to Paris, wel accompanied, where he makes his entry, to the great applause of all the people. He imployes his first endeaours, to send them all home well B satisfied, who had giuen him so notable a prooffe, of their affection. But euery one be- ing returned to his house: behold, Charles of Lorraine reiected, assembles forces, and with part of them begins to ouerrun Champagne, shewing all acts of hostility. Within few moneths after, he himselfe comes to field with a great army of Germains, Lorrains and Bourguignons: and hauing taken Rheims at his first approach, hee passeth on to- wards Paris, as to the head or heart of the Estate, and enters into Picardy, where he seizeth on the Cities of Soissons and Laon, al by the practises of Arnalphe the bastard sonne of King Lothaire, and Archbishop of Rheims: a man both cunning and head- strong: from thence he runs euen to the gates of Paris, filling all the country with fire and feare.

C Hugh sleepe not, but knowing howe much it did import, to possesse the people with good conceit of him, and to stoppe the courses and spoyles of Charles, (who of purpose tormented the Parisiens, to breed some innouation) hee gathereth together what troupes he can, attending the rest which he had sent for, and with them he goes presently to field: but it chanced that Charles (being far stronger then Capet) did easi- ly defeat him: so as hauing cut his troupes in peeces, hee had almost surpris'd Hugh in the sight of Paris, where hee saued himselfe with much paine and danger. These begin- nings did as much amaze the people (who had so cheerfully chosen Hugh) as it putt vp Charles already a Conquerour, and a peacefull King in his own conceit: who being D swading them to acknowledge him for their lawfull King, vaunting of this happy be- ginning, as a gage of the felicity which did attend him in his raigne. But he had not cast vp his accounts with him who holds the euent of things in his hand, for the con- trary fell out to that he had imagined.

Hugh is nothing dismay'd at this first repulse, these summonings of Charles make him to vse all hast, and prickes them forward with whom he had diuided the Realme, hauing an especiall interest in his raigne, according to their election. All men flye vnto him: Charles (supposing that Hugh ment to yeeld, and that these assemblies were made to haue the better conditions) had disperfed his army about Laon, and retayned the least part within the city: and with this assurance, that all necessaryes should a- E bound, hee had no care to make vse of his victory, when as sodainly Hugh appears with his army before Laon: (hauing stop't all the passages) hee beseegeth it: all the Lor- rains (small troupes which were found in the villages thereabouts, were easily taken and disarmed, and the city was presently summoned to yeeld in the Kings name, and to deliuer vp Charles of Lorraine, guilty of high treason, and enemy to the French, vpon paine of fire and sword.

Charles flies to intreaties and teares. The inhabitants complayning of him, as the cause of their misery, resolute with the aduice of Anselme their bishop) to obey Hugh Capet, as their lawfull King, and to deliuer Charles into his hands. The which they did with his wife and children. This happened in the yeare 991. and so the controuersie F betwixt Hugh, and Charles of Lorraine for the crowne, was decided in lesse then foure yeares. Hugh being a Conqueror, goes to Orleans, and leades with him, Charles, and the remainder of his miserable family, inflicting no greater punishment on him, then perpetuall imprisonment, where he was well kept with his wife, vnto his dying day, in prison.

99 o. the which he had both sonnes and daughters. There are diuers opinions vpon this point. Some say they died all there, others say, that they reepleopled the State of Lorraine, and transplanted their race vnto the Princes that rule there at this present.

But howsoever: As the Romains had expelled the Gauls, and themselves were afterwards driuen out by diuers nations: and the race of Pharamond which had dispossessed them, was displaced by Pepin: so Hugh Capet expelled that of Pepin, with a better title then Pepin, being lawfully called by them which had the right: and the presumptiue heire was iustly degraded for his fault: so as no man can with reason say, That Hugh Capet was an Vsurper, seeing he had so solemne and lawfull a calling, by a decree of the generall Estates of the Realme. To whom the application of the Soueraine Lawe belongs, as Nangius an auncient writer doth testifie. For what auails it the legitimation of his royaltie, to say, that Hugh Capet came of the race of Charlemagne by his Mother Anoye, daughter to Otho Duke of Saxony and Emperour. In this regard hee could not be of Charlemagnes race (the which without doubt, sayled in Lewis the fourth, the sonne of Arnoul) neither would it auail him any thing to bee the sonne of a daughter of France, seeing the Distaffe may not lawfully succede.

This victory added an incredible reputation to Hugh Capets vertue, the which was most apparent in greatest extremities, and made him an easie way to purchase obedience in his newe Kingdome. He began by homage, as the seale of authority, C To that ende, hee calles all Dukes, Earles, Barons, Noblemen and Gentlemen, to come and take the oath of fealty. They runne on all hands, onely the Earle of Flanders (that Arnould which had bene the firebrand of those warres in Normandy) playes the mutine. Hugh hauing called him to doe homage, and noted his contumacy, goes to field with his forces, to compell him thereunto. Hauing seized on the greatest part of his country, the Earle flies to humility, and by the mediation of Richard Duke of Normandy (whom he had so much wronged in his youth) he makes his peace with Hugh, yeelding him the homage which hee had denied, with promise to obey him.

Hauing thus fortified the authority of his Soueraine command, hee passed vnto D the gouernment of the realme, and to make this voluntary obedience (so well begun) more pleasing to his newe subiects: he calls an assembly of the chiefe of the Realme, and giues them all to vnderstand that his desire was to haue their aduice, for the well gouerning of the State. Necessity spake, and his proceeding did wince the most violent. Hauing renued their homages, he sets downe the order of the twelue Peeres of France, and protests vnto them all, that he will not doe any thing of importance, eyther in peace or warre without their aduice. So as in yeelding, he did aduance himselfe with a wife and victorious modesty. By the most ancient institution, the chiefe charge ouer armes, belonged to the Mayor of the Pallace, to the which Martell added the authority of Duke of France. But these two great changes, gaue a sufficient E testimony, how much this great authority did import, to counterballance and cheeke the Soueraine authority of Kings: and Hughes himselfe was both a witnesse and iudge of that which he had done in the execution of this charge, being in a manner royall.

He therefore resolues to suppress it, and to bury it in an honourable tombe. Hee sees many Competitors, and takes thereby an occasion to discouer his intent, declaring to the greatest of his nobility, how happy he was in his raigne, hauing the choise of so many persons worthy of this great dignity: but finding himselfe bound to al, he knew not to whome he was most indebted: and was so affected vnto them all, as he could not saye, to whome hee wished best. And therefore to satisfie all his good friends, hee had bethought himselfe of an expedient. That his sonne (whome F nature had giuen him, and France had nourished and brought vp for her seruice,) should be the person, to content all his friendes in the execution of this charge, which should be in title of a royalty.

All

A All the Noblemen (which would haue endured it of another impatiently) imbra- ced this speech willingly, the which preuented all ieaousie, and cured the cheefe sore. So with one consent it was decreed, That Robert sonne to Hugh Capet, should bee his Lieutenant generall, and to that end should bee anointed and crowned King: as hee was at Rheims in the year 995, three yeares after his fathers election. A wife Prince, and of a temperate disposition, a well seasoned plant for the fruitfull continuance of this latter raigne, of whome it is sayd, That hee was a sonne without frowardnes, a companion without ieaousie, and a King without ambition. So Hughes effected 3. things by this wife proceeding. Hee tooke away the breeding of future dangers, by restraining of so great a power: he suppressed all ieaousie, and assured his owne estate in the person of his B sonne.

But in burying thus honorable the name and apparent shew of this dignitie, he confirmed another, to reape the same frute: for it is a resolu'd maxime, That in a royalty, the first mouer of an estate, must be fortified with some neere instruments, with whom he may communicate some beames of his authoritie, to impart them to other inferiour motions, according to their order. The Constable in old time, had no command but ouer the horse, either as great master, or as generall vnder the charge of the Maior, as The Constable Maier, hee gaue that authoritie to the other, for the which the maiortie had bene in the Maier. old time instituted, reseruing the frute, and preferu'ng France both from danger and feare of so great power, which might aduance the seruant about the master: yet this C authoritie of Constable is very great, soueraine ouer armes, vnder the Kings good pleasure, to order the men of warre, to take knowledge of their faults, and either to punish, or to pardon offences at his pleasure, to order batailles, to dispose of all things that concerne the souldiars: and finally he keeps the kings sword, for which the Constable doth him homage.

Moreover vnder this dignitie Hugh appointed Marshalls to execute the Constables commands, as his cheefe hands, and so by these two goodly institutions, the charge D ouer armes continued in great credit, vnder the great light of the royall Maestie. Hee likewise fortified by new decrees, the royall homages of Ban and Arrierban, instituted by Charlemagne: and to conclude, hee made all those militarie orders, wherein France surpasseth all other nations, to be reduced to their ancient institution and right vs. And as good lawes spring from bad manners, so Hugh (hauing carefully obserued the errors of former raignes) endeoured to redresse them, and to preuent the like inconueniences. The most dangerous error had bene the multiplicitie of many soueraine masters, one King being sufficient for a whole Realme, as one Sonne is for all the world. He therefore decrees, That hereafter the title of King should not be given but to the eldest, who should haue some raigne, power, and command ouer his brethren, and they should respect him as their Lord and father, hauing no portions but his good fauour, As for the lands which their elder should assigne vnto them for their portions, they should hold them E of the Crowne, to do homage, and to be augmented & diminished at the Kings good pleasure. The aduancements of Kings bastards had much interested the State, hauing bene allowed and apportioned with the lawfull children, yea euen raised to the royall throne, as we haue seene. Therefore Hugh decreed, That hereafter, bastards should not onely be reiectd from the Crowne, but also from the surname of France, the which before was allowed them. To him likewise are due the goodly ordinances of Iustice, and of the trea- for, wherein without doubt France excels, so as they be well executed, according to the institutions of the golden age. Thus by these wise decrees, hee preuailed more then all the armes of his Predecessors, in preferu'ng a great Monarchie vnto this day: F supported with these goodly lawes and ordinances, wherein (without flattering the truth) we may see by the effects that which the most learned Academicke doth represent but in discourse, touching the true and perfect patterne of a well gouerned State, vnder the fatherly authoritie of a King, reuerenced by the hereditarie Law of his race, with the free consent of the people, confirmed by the Estates, counterballanced by the had sent Hugh to restore the French Monarchie, and they avouch predictions, and prophesies of this raigne, as Oracles. Doubtlesse this masse of building, was too huger to continue long against so great a storme. God made use of it for a time, as he had wisely decreed, that is to say, to delivier the west from the blasphemies and furies of Ma- homet, and there to preferue his Church. But it was necessarie this power should bee limited within his bounds, to the end it might be well governed, and in the end, give some rest vnto Christendome. This happened in his raigne, as if the building had then taken a firme and sure foundation.

 Hughs raigne.

War had raigned too long, and ruined the poore subjects to enrich men of warre, who being seized of the strongest places, had without doubt deuoured one another, an ruined the Realme, if a greater authoritie had not shewed it selfe to maintaine eu-ery one in peace, vnder the reuerence of the Lawes, in the bosome of one common Countrie. This confused warlike season, had more need of a wise man to saue what was gotten, then of a valiant man and stirring, to make new Conquests. Such was Hugh Capet, a wise Prince, aduised, experienced, resolute, neither dull, nor a coward, (as he made prooffe in the beginning of his raigne against the rebells.) And whereas he parted with the Crowne-lands so easily, to such as were seized thereon, seeming thereby to haue blemished the greatnes of his State, it was like vnto one which had much land lying wast, and had let it to farmers at an easie rent, yet remaining alwaies master ther-of, and to seize on it againe at his pleasure: else all had bin lost for want of good husbandrie, in so great and confused an abundance. For Hugh Capet leauing to the possessors that which he could not take from them, assured the Crowne-landes by certaine homages, and preserved the royall authoritie throughout the Realme. And that which was profitable and necessarie for the State, proued the most easie, for the gouernours of the prouinces and strong places, hoping to hold that which they had in hand, desired rather to obey a King with any title auailable to them and theirs, then to play the petty Kings at their pleasures, and commaund absolutely alone for a while, & over few, and be in danger to lose all as viurpers. A notable prooffe of the Frenchmens humors, borne to obey a King, and not able to subsist but vnder a royaltie. The French had no lesse power, then the Germains, to make an electiue common weale, as they had done, but their honor forced with an hereditary royaltie, without the which they could not stand. Thus Hugh Capet had settled his raigne with so great wisdom and authori-tie, and was so fortunate in the success, as we may iustly say, he restored the Realme of France, when it was almost ruined. Hee raigned nine yeares, foure alone, and five with his sonne Robert, in great peace, beloued and honoured of all men. France (as after a long and tedious winter) puts on the new face of a pleasant spring. All men honoured him, as the meanes of their assured rest. His most viual retreat was to Paris, the which was greatly augmented and beautified in his raigne, whereas other Kings before him remained in diuise places, at Aix la Chapelle, Compiigne, Laon, Soissons and else where, according to occurrents and their humors. Wee haue sayd, that Arnulphe bastard to Lothaire, was the onely man which had fauoured Charles of Lorraine against Hugh Capet. The historie notes this man to be peruerse, and disloyall, hauing decei-ued both Charles of Lorraine, and Hugh Capet, who had giuen him the Archbishops-pike of Rouan, in recompence of the seruice he promised him against Charles, to whom notwithstanding (contrary to his faith) hee gaue meanes to seize vpon the Cities of Rheims, Laon, & Soissis. Hugh taking this presumption for a prejudice to come, learning by what had passed, how much the name of a bastard of France might import, for a colour to disquiet the State, and what danger there was of trouble, in the beginning of his new raigne, not yet well settled, he therefore resolues to suppress Arnulphe: but respecting his qualitie, hee assembled a nationall Councell of the French Church, in the Citie of Rheims. This assemblee deposeth Arnulphe, as guilty of treachene, and a troub-

Afterwards Hugh confines him to Orleans with Charles, there to end his daies in rest.
 Pope John the 12. very ill satisfied with Hugh, for that hee had not appealed to him for his confirmation in this new royaltie, disannuls this decree of the Councell at Rheims, excommunicates the Bishoppes which had assisted, restores Arnulphe, and deprives Gi- libert of the Archbishops pike of Rouan, and to temper this sharpe and tough proceeding with some sweetnes, he doth inuict Gilbert with the Archbishops pike of Rauennas.
 But wee shall presently see that this was a meanes to raise him to the dignitie of Pope.

Hugh doth not for all this conuend with Pope John, but hauing restored Arnulphe, hee took from him all meanes of troubling the state to his prejudice. It is that Pope John, of whome Platina writes so plainly, as the wise reader may finde in the originall it selfe: where hee shall reade with admiration, not only the depraued manners of that man, raised to so great a dignitie, whome hee disgraceth as a monster, renning him confusions which rained in those times: for wee reade of nothing but partialities and factions, one to expell another, and all to ouerthrowe the authority of the Emperour of Rome. All these practises were not made without sharpe and long intentions: as the history shal note the occurrents: & this my inventory shal be but a simple direction to the Originalls, where as (the pure truth speaking more freely) the reader may peruse it without passion.

The manners
 of Pope
John the 12.

Here beganne the great iarrs and contentions betwixt the Emperours and Popes.
 The ancient custome of the Catholike Church, practised from Constantin the great, the first Christian Emperour, was, That the Emperour should be present in the election of all Bishops, euen of the Bishop of Rome. The Popes would not allowe the Emperour should hold this prerogative ouer them, since the time that Boniface the 3. took vpon him the name & preheminence of vniuersall Bishop: but were chosen without license fro the Emperour. John had held the pontificall sea by vnlawful meanes, & did lead a dissolute life, to the discontent of many: for the rediesse whereof the Emperour Otho comes to Rome, and vpon complaints, (hauing labored to reclaime this man to his dutie whome he found incorrigible) in the ende hee calls a Councell within Rome, where by a decree of this Assemblee John the 12. was deposed, and Leo 8. substituted in his place. But the Emperour is scarce gone out of Rome, when as behold newe factions. Leo the 8. being chosen by his order, is expelled by disorder, and Benedict the 5.
 seated in his place. Otho returns and restoreth Leo, who vpon this occasion made a new decree: That in executing the ancient rule of discipline, which giues the election to the people and Clergie, The power to chose and consecrate the Pope, and to rule things belonging to the Apostolike sea, and to establish and confirme the Bishops, should belong vnto the Emperour, as the head and first moderator of discipline. So the remedy was well expounded, but not well applied: for after the restitution of Leo, they number seauen Popes, John the 14. Benedict the 6. Donus the 2. Boniface 7. Keneard 7. Gregory 5. & John
 15. which were one after another placed and displaced by sedition, eyther expelled, or imprisoned or strangled: vntill that Gilbert Arch-bishop of Rauennas (of whome wee haue spoken) came to be Pope, being named Siluester the 2. He was brought in by so strange a manner, as I haue horror to reade Platina, who saies, it was by diuillish arts.
 But the wise reader may vewe the rest of this troublesome report in the author himselfe, altogether vnreprouable, being a confident seruant to the Popes: and so may eaies vs of this tedious toyle.

Such was the Empire and the sea of Rome, amidst these horrible confusions, Hugh Capet whilst that our Capet labored to reape the breaches of his newe Kingdome. Hauing reigned peaceably nine yeares, he died the 22. of Nouember in the yeare 996. Leauing his sonne Robert, not only successor to the Crowne, but also of his vertues, his happinesse & his credit, in the deuout loue of the French. He had him by Adelais the daughter of Edmura King of England, in whome hee was so happy, as not onely to see him of age, but also crowned King, and well married. He raigned both alone & accompanied with

99 6. with his sonne: beloued and honored of him and his subiects, if euer father and Prince A were. A patterne of a great States man, coming to the extremity of a desperate disease, whereunto he applied such seasonable remedies, as hee might well bee called the Restorer of the French Monarchie. But from him wee must ascend to God, the true gardien of this estate, meaning to preserue it by his care and wisdom, who gouernes changes by his wise prouidence, and giues vertues and successe at his pleasure.

The Monarchy of France of greater continuance then euer any.

Now we begin a new raigne, a wiser, more happy, and longer, then the two precedent, whereof the one continued but three hundred and twenty yeares, and the other two hundred thirty eight: and this vnto Henry the 4. now raigning, continueth 619.
yeares, so as counting the date of it, first beginning from the yeare 420. making of all these particulars one grosse summe, from the yeare of our Redemers coming B into the world, we shall finde in all 1596. yeares inclusive. A terme which no State euer attained vnto. It is true, that the bounds of this Monarchie shall not be so large, as vnder Charlemagne, yet better limited: and although it seemes that Hugh Capet (in yeelding the proprietie of the Crowne lands vnto the Gouernours of places,) did diminish it: yet in effect he did augment it, in assuring the Crowne by this good husbandry, being extraordinary, yet very conuenient in such extreame necessitie. And since, all that which seemed to bee dismembred, is returned from whence it came.
We must therefore set before our eyes, all this great Monarchie, imparted to diuers Lords, and the royall authority ouer all, as the head ouer the whole body, which hath diuers members: giuing life and force to euery part, to exercise his proper function: C we shall see in order (as things haue fallen out,) the greatest part of those Provinces which were made hereditarie by this conuention of Capet, returne to the Crowne again. The which I will labour to effect, so long as the light shall guide me in the diuersitie of these changes.

We shall now enter into a more temperate raigne then the two former. We shall not see so many armies in field, so many victories, nor so many conquests; neyther shall we see so many audacious and infamous outrages, so many murders and parric-ides; so many vnnatural cruelties of children against the father, of bretheren against bretheren, of husbands against their wives, and of wives against their husbands: we may well note and obserue diseases, but neither so dangerous nor so tedious, as haue D bene played on the theater of horrible Tragedies in former raignes. Doubtlesse as the body and minde haue their proper diseases, so hath the estate of mankind. Man cannot be alwayes sound, nor alwayes pleasant: his body and minde haue their passions in their seasons, according to the degrees which God hath prescribed them by the course of nature. Likewise the changes are remarkable in all this Monarchie: but this raigne iudicially considered, we may admire the notable proofes of Gods prou-idence, who would fortifie this estate, for the preseruation of his Church in Europe, whereof France is a notable member, and doth import much to all other nations. The History therefore of this third raigne is most worthy of memory, for the vse whereof E we may obserue three famous parts, to helpe the iudgement and memory.

An order for the vse of this third raigne.

The first from Hugh Capet to Philip of Valois: where began the controuersie of the English against the French, long and lamentable for the pretension to the Crowne of France. The second from that raigne to Henry the third, the last King of that branche of Valois. The third begins at Henry the 4. now raigning, the first of the most noble race of Bourbon. This Inuentary shall faithfully and briefly quote the particularities of these last reignes, to send the Reader to the whole Historie, to the which we leaue him.

ROBERT alone of that name,
37. King of France.

ROBERT began to raigne alone, in the yeare 996. and raigned 33. The raigne of yeares. Hee had three sonnes, Hugh, Robert, and Henry, by his wife Constance, the Daughter of William Earle of Arles. Following the example of his father Hugh, he desired to assure the Crowne in his house, installing his heire in the right purchased to him and his, by a decree of the States. So he crowned Hugh his eldest sonne at Compiegne, in the yeare 1028. But God (who was wiser then Robert) determined to call Hugh to a better Crowne, for soone after he dyed: being dead, Robert continued in the same desseigne, to assure his estate in his house: and obseruing a more royall disposition in the younger, then in the elder, he preferred vertue before the prerogative of elderthip: causing Henry the younger to be crowned in his life time:
decreeing by his will, that Robert should content himselfe with the Duchie of Bourgogne, doing homage for it to the Crowne of France. Robert prefers Henry's younger sonne to the crowne before the elder.

So hauing happily disposed of his affaires, and raigned with the generall content of his subjects, he dyed in the yeare 1031. being three score yeares old. A Prince very fite for the time, being wise, resolute, peaceable and continent. But Pietie was on, the Crowne of all his vertues, and the knowledge of Diuinitie seasoned with learning, one of the flowers of this goodly crowne: for he is commended to haue bene very deuout, and to haue loued both diuinity and humanitie. They sing Hymnes of his in-uention, and namely that which is to the honour of holy martyrs, which begins, O con-stantia martyrum mirabilis, the which bearing resemblance with the name of his wife C Constance, he was wonderfully pleased with the humour she had to be honoured with his writings, being then greatly esteemed throughout the world; experience hath taught in former raignes. So God, who ment to confirme the archie in this Race, gaue a long and a happie life to these first Kings, issued from Ca- pet, without any sudden change from raigeto raigne. For Robert raigned 33. yeares:

Henry his sonne as much, Philip his sonne 49. yeares, Lewis the 7. forty foure, Lewis the 9. called Saint Lewis as much. All wise Princes, moderate, valiant, peaceable and happy. As good houses are settled, euen so Kingdomes are confirmed. As when one good husband succeeds an other, adding welth to welth, newe vpon olde, houses then growe great: euen so the long life of these good and wise Princes, was continued with much happy successe, as we shall see in every raigne.

This in particular is remarkable in the raigne of Robert. We haue sayd, the realme B was diuided, as it were to many masters. As there is small respect among equals, who seeth not what should haue succeeded betwixt so many great lords being equals, and especially in France? but Robert did so firmly gouerne the helme of this great baile in the midst of the tempestuous seas of French humors, as hee controulled all such as sought to free themselves from the Crowne: whose authority by this meanes was great, by the obedience which hee forced all them to yeeld that would plaie the mutines. He enterrayned the amity his father had with Richard Duke of Normandie, confirmed by allyance, and for that there was ialousie betwixt him and Otho Earle of Chartres, he could wisely make his profit of them both.

In the beginning of his raigne one Gautier gouernour of Melun sold the place to C the Earle of Chartres aboue named, according to the manner of confused times. At the complaint of Bouchard (to whom the towne belonged,) the King commaunded Otho to restore it vnto him, who refused to obey. Robert lets the Normand against him, who handles him in such sort, as in the ende the Earle humbles himselfe vnto the King, and deliueys vp both the place and marchant, who was hanged.

Henry brother to Hugh Capet was Duke of Bourgogne, by the deccale of his brother Otho. Henry then died, and so Bourgogne returned to the Crowne. But passion perswading Landry Earle of Nevers to make a benefit of his right of neighbourhood, and time inuiting him to imbrace this occasion to fish in a troubled water, hee seized on Auxerre by intelligence. But hee was deceiued, to thinke this a time wherein all things were lawfull: for Robert goes presently to field with his army, and beseegeth D Auxerre, where this ill aduised Landry was: but the Inhabitants open their gates to the King, and deliuey Landry into his hands. All the Auxerrois obeye, except Au- lon, who after a fewe daies yeelds, and in the ende all Bourgogne. Landry guilty of treason, suffers an easie punishment for his rashnes. Hauing confessed his fault, he obtaines pardon of Robert, promising all future obedience.

Thus Robert being master of Bourgogne, hee giues it to Robert his eldest sonne. But Robert doubtly interested (his younger being preferred, and hee hauing a very small part in the State,) was not pleased with this portion. Bourgogne, was then distinguished into Duchie and Countie, whereof the Countie belonged to the Empire, and the Duchie to the Realme, according to the diuision made by the Children of Lewis the gentle. At that time Henry the 2. Duke of Bauiere, surnamed the holy, held the Empire. Lorraine was the ordinarie cause of debate betwixt France and Germany. Ro- bert (to ende this controuersie) meetes with Henry at a place called Enol, vpon the ri-uer of Cher, and made an accord with him, the which continues to this day. At that time Gothelou brother to the Earle of Ardenne held Lorraine.

Herevpon the hatred betwixt the Duke of Normandy and the Earle of Chartres kindled in such sort, by the yeelding vp of Melun as they assembled their friends & seruants on all sides. The Normand calls his farthest friends to his succors, Logman king of Sueden and Olane King of Normaye his kinsmen. But Robert pacified this quarrell in time, by F his wisdom, shewing by the effect, how much authority employed in time may pre-uail, and that wee must speedily quench a small fire, the which neglected burns a whole forest.

There

A There were great personages in all prouinces with hereditary power, according to the grant made by Hugh Capet. In Normandy Richard the third, in Aniou Geoffroy Grise- gonelle, in Guenne William, of the race of Pepin sonne to Lewis the Gentle, in Languedoc Cout Mathew, in Champagne and Touraine Odo, all great and valiant men, with other worthy personages throughout the Realme: al which were rash men & of high attempts, but the name and royall authority of Robert, conteyned all these men & of high attempts, spirits with in the bounds of their duty and publike respect. And so this raigne passed quietly without any great tumults. Leauing a lesson for Princes, to ioyne wisdom A notable with authority, and valour with mildnes: it being as great a conquest to preferue his raigne, owne, as to get an other mans, and to vanquish mens minds by reason, as by force.
 B A patterne in these two raignes, of the meanes to restore an Estate, dismembred by the disorders of ciuill warres.

HENRY the first, the 38. King of France.

HENRY, being in possession of the realme during the life of his father, succeeded him in the yeare, 1031. and raigned 33. yeares. 1031.
 He had two sons, Philip and Hugh, by Anne the daughter of George, or Gautier the Sclauon King of the Russians, and one daughter, the which was married to Robert Duke of Normandy, sonne to that Richard of whom we haue discoursed.

The beginning of his raigne, was rough and vnquiet, and the ende more milde and profitable. But Henry in the preferuation of his Estate, did nothing degenerate from the wisdom and dexterity of his father. The cause of this hard entrie, was the brothers portion, apparently vnequall and preiudiciall, although a wise father had so decreed it. Queene Constance, mother to these two Princes brethren, nourished this dislike, supporting Robert against Henry, that is to say, the elder against the younger.
 as oftentimes mothers haue the like humours, to loue one more then an other. Contention betweene the
 The

1037 The cause was plausible, that it was against the lawe, vse & customes of France, that the younger should be preferred before the elder in a royalty. The parties were great for Robert, Constance mother to the King, Bauldwin Earle of Flanders, and Odo Earle of Champagne, a busie man and rash. For the King, the royall maiesty, the will of his father, the forces of the Realme, and (amongest all) those of Robert Duke of Normandy. The armies approach ready to fight, when as beheld Robert (for whose interest the question was) being a Prince of a milde and quiet disposition, giues his mother and friends (who had brought forces to his ayde) to vnderstand, that he would not be the cause to shed Frenchmens bloud: and that Bourgongne should suffice him, seeing his father had so decreed. Vpon this declaration of Robert, Queene Constance changed her mind, and sends backe her troups, embracing peace with her children. The armies were dismissed, and an agreement ratified betwixt Henry and Robert, who liued like brethren and good friends: That Bourgongne should remaine to Robert and his successors, with the title of a fealty to France, (which they call Peere) & to be Deane among the Peeres. Thus Robert of France enioyed Bourgongne, and left it hereditary to his heire successiue, vntill the raigne of Iohn, in the yeare 1360.

Robert yields vnto his brother.

But the County of Bourgongne and Normandy were the cause of much trouble in those times, during the which he kept the stakes, not onely as a spectator, but as an v-surper. This Odo Earle of Champagne (who had incensed his brother against him) lookt for a good part in Bourgongne, and had already won Robert to promise him Sens, who euen vpon the accord making had seized thereon: but being easily expelled by the Kings authority, he runnes an other course, to loose both himselfe and what hee had, supposing to vsurpe an other mans estate.

He held vnder the Crowne, Champagne, Touraine and the Country of Chartres. Hee had two sonnes, Stephen, and Thibault: yet he sought to ioyne Bourgongne to his other Estates, which was the cause of great troubles. We haue before made mention of Boson the husband of Hermingrade, daughter to Lewis the sonne of Lewis the Gentle, who had the Realme of Bourgongne and Italy. He had two sonnes, Raph and Lewis. Lewis was ouerthrowne by Beranger Duke of Friul, who easily seized on that, which remained in Italy, & of Prouence, as lying neere, and of easie access. Raph had the rest of Bourgongne, the Couste, Sauoie, & Dauphiné, for the Duchie of Bourgongne remained to the Crowne of France. From this Raph, sprong Lewis, and from Lewis another Raph, who liued during the raigne of Henry, being old, without children, and ill obeyed of his subiects.

He had two sisters, the one married to Conrade surnamed the Salique, Duke of Francy, who was Emperour: and an other to the Earle of Champagne, father to this Odo, who seekes to perswade Raph his vnckle to make him his heyre, as sonne to his eldest sister: and employes the fauour of many subiects, who desired rather a neighbour then a stranger to be their Prince. But Raph preferred Conrade before Otho, and sent him his testament, his crowne, and Scepter, instituting Henry his son and his Nephew his heire general. Conrade made war in Hongary, Odo embraced this occasion, & (seeing him thus embusied) he enters into Bourgongne, where he takes certaine citties: the rest hold at Conrades deuotion, being called to the inheritance: but these desseines were soone cut off. For behold the Emperour Conrad returns with a goodly and victorious armye, who not onely recouers againe the citties of Bourgongne that were lost, but also takes some in Champagne, so as Odo doth with great difficulty hold Troyes: hee is forced to seeke by humble petitions to his Vnckle, who giues him his owne, and forbids him to take from another. The Earle being thus suppressed, Conrad parles with King Henry, and ratifies the ancient accords, for the diuiding of Bourgongne, whereof wee haue spoken.

From that time, the Germane Emperours challenged the right and title of the Realme of Arles, which the Emperour Charles the fift shall alienate, and shal be soone diuided into sundry principalties, as we shall shew in their places. Thus the Realme of Bourgongne had an ende in the posterity of Boson. The Emperour Conrad being forced Odo Earle of Champagne, seeks to seize vpon the County of Bourgongne.

A forced to go into Italy, after all these treaties, to redresse the confusions which grew dayly. Behold Odo reuiues the warre more furiously then before, and enters Lorraine with a strong army, but his enterprise fell vpon his owne head. For Gothelon Duke of Lorraine (confirmed by the Emperour) defeats him, burying his ambition and his life in one sepulchre, and thus much for Bourgongne.

Normandy gaue no lesse cause of employment to Henry. Robert Duke of Normandy, had mainteyned the hereditary loue of his father with the King, greatly relying vpon his friendship. Having resolved a long and dangerous voyage to the holy Land: he intreated him to affect the protection of William his bastard sonne, whome hee had made his heyre, excluding his lawfull children. This testament seemed vnreasonable to all men: but Robert had settled his Estate before his departure, appoynting him good Gouvernours, and putting the strongest places, and treasure into their hands: as William remayned Conquerour after his death, which happened in this long voyage beyond the seas. But this was not without great difficulties, in the which Henry kept the stakes, ballancing both parties with his authority.

William remaining the stronger, Normandy had some rest, being freed from men of warre by this occurrent. A gallant troupe of Warriors, weary to liue at home, and desirous to see the world, led by Robert and Guischard valient Gentlemen, seeking their fortunes, came into Italy: where they are employed in priuate quarrells, and there get so great reputation, as by their example, they drawe many to the same voyage: and an other notable swarme of braue souldiers are led thither by Tamcred, a man very famous for this attempt, the partialities of Italy giue them occasions and meanes to seize vpon Ponille, Calabria, and Sicile, as the history describes at large. This briefly may suffice to note the Estate of this raigne.

Happy success of the Normans in Italy.

Thus Henry passeth his raigne amidst these troubles, being too light to shake the body of an Estate, following the example of his Grandfather, and Father, he causeth Philip his sonne to be crowned King, being but seuen yeares old: and gaue him Baldwin Earle of Flanders for Tutor and regent of the Realme. He liued little after his Coronation, the which he hastened by reason of his indisposition, and so he died 55. yeares old, in the yeare 1061. Beloued and lamented of all his subiects, whom he intreated with much mildnes some yeares before his death: the beginning of his raigne being disquieted with the feare of ciuill dissention, and the end crowned with a plentiful rest.

Robert dies.

PHILIP

PHILIP the first, the 39. King of France.

1061.
Baldwin Regent in Philip's minoritie.

According to King Henries decree, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, A tooke vpon him the government of yong King Philips person, (already confirmed by his coronation,) & of the affaires of the realme with quietnes: hauing the reputation of a good & wise man, although he were not pleasing to them all. For certaine Noblemen of Gasconie did crosse him, charging him with ambition, as if he would make himselfe a King, like to other Regents, whereof the memorie was yet fresh in all Frenchmens mindes. But his integritie and wisdom (preferuing his credit with the greatest part of the French) gaue him meanes to subdue the rebellious Gasccons, who made this their pretence, to fish in a troubled streame, during the minoritie B of the young King.

Baldwin doth not winke at this repulse, neither doth he suffer it to passe unpunished, He armes wisely, with a shew to go against the Sarrazins, which sometimes did overrunne the frontiers of France, bordering vpon Spaine. This zeale hauing moued many to accompanie him, he punished the rebels in Gasconie, and preuented many which began to mutine in sundry places of the realme, as shall appeare in the future raignes. It is the ordinarie ebbing and flowing of worldly things, in the impatience of the French, neuer to lue long in one estate. Vce haue now passed aboue seuentie yeares in peace, in these three raignes: this Prince shall adde fortie nine more of great tranquillitie to this realme. But setting before our eyes the horrible confusions in other C parts, it doth shew vs plainly the occasions, whereby the disease grew in the State, which in the ende bred so long and dangerous a seauer by ciuill warre. For why doth

Baldwin punished the rebels of Gas-conie.

and motiues of these great euent, the which succeed not presently, but by degrees, as a Clocke which carried by contrary motiues strikes the houre at the time appointed amongst all the minutes. This iudgement is necessary for the right vie of what wee reade. The Kings minority passed quietly by the wise government of Baldwin, who hauing accompanied his pupill to the age of 15. yeares, leaues him his temporall realme in peace, and seekes an eternall Crowne in heauen: being greatly lamented of the good, leauing a memorable example of a good tutor to a King, and a wise Regent of a realme. Philip takes in hand the helme of the Estate, beholding from a safe harbour the stormes of other nations, which exceed in pernicious furies, not foreseeing the seeds cast by himselfe in the bosome of his owne realme, & that his example giues liberties to his subiects to the like disorder.

Baldwin dies much lamented.

A wise Prince, but disloyall, taking couetousnes and ambition for his Councillors, The dispositiseeking onely his owne profit, and contemning that plaine simplicitie, which had purchased so much happines to his father & grand-fathers, & to himselfe a respectiue credit withall the French, and immortall praise to his posterity. A looking glasse for Kings & Princes without any deceit, wherein they may vewe the true causes of the happines of their Estates. Flanders, England and Italy, beganne first before that France entred, who shall act a long and tedious part vpon this stage. Baldwin of whom we haue made mention, left two sonnes, Baldwin and Robert, with their mother Richilde. Their Vncle Robert C the Frison preceded the inheritance to belong vnto him: or at the least the guardianship of his Nephewes. Richilde and the states opposed to both his demands; so as they grew to words, and then to warre. King Philip (as their soueraigne) ought to bee ludge to compound their quarrels, but he labors to kindle them, seeking his own profit in the garboiles. Robert the Frison preuentis him, with promises to do what hee pleased. Hee winnes him and gets a promise to be succoured against the right of his Nephewes. But Richilde mother to these pupills, knowing the Kings humour, goes vnto him to crosse
Roberts desseins, who brought nothing but words.

This woman brought money with her good behauiour, and wonne him against Robert, who discontent with the King; assembles his other means, and wonne him against Robert, who discontent with the King; assembles his other means, and goes to field with his D army, and gets part of the Country: Richilde flies to Philip, who comes himselfe with a very great army, and enters Flanders. His meaning was to make a benefit of their common quarrell. But it fell out otherwise, by his prouidence who doth pull downe one & raile vp another, alwaies iustly, although the causes be vnknowne vnto vs. Robert de-feates the King and his Nephewes. After this victory hee is receiued Earle of Flanders, without any discontent of the King for the distressed pupills: who relying no more on him, fled for succor to Thierry Bishop of Liege: who makes an accord. That Robert the Frison should haue the Earledome of Flanders, & giue his Nephewes some recompence.
After this peaceable possession of the Earledome of Flanders, Philip became a decre friend to Robert, forgetting the good offices hee had receiued from his tutor, measuring E friendship by profit. Such was the state of Flanders. England had a greater change:
we haue sayd that Robert Duke of Normandy had instituted William his bastard sonne his heire, and that hee had gotten possession of the Duchie, but behold a greater happinesse attends him. Edward King of England hauing receiued much kinde from him, and knowing him fit for the government of the realme, names him his heire by his testament: by vertue whereof (notwithstanding all the policy and force, that Herould, brother to the Queene could vse) William is receiued King of England, and crowned in a solemne assemble of the English, homage is done vnto him, as to their lawfull Lord:
& this great dignity continued in his posterity. Philip sees this new power impatiently, yet yet can he not preuent it, but God hath prepared it as a rod to correct this realme, by the three sonnes which William left to succeed in his Estates, Robert, William and Henry.
Ambition is the Leuaine of these warres, it shewed it selfe soone after the birth of this new power grown to the Dukes of Normandy, (whose first breeding we haue scene in the second race) by the increase of the realme of England.

1061. Robert and Henry the sonnes of William, come to the King at Conflans vpon Oise. As they play at Chess with Lewis the sonne of King Philip, there fell some contention among these yong Princes, and from iniurious words, they fell to blowes: Lewis called Henry the sonne of a Bastard, Henry struck at him with the Chess-board, and had slaine him, if Robert had not staied him. This blow being giuen, Robert and Henry made all hast to saue themselves in Normandy: where they incensed both heauen and earth with their complaints. From this light beginning, grew all the troubles which disquieted these two Estates during 400. yeares, vpon diuers occasions. Robert & Henry being escaped, the fathers so imbrace the quarrell for their children, as they fall to armes. Philip goes to field, and takes Vernon depending of Normandie. Robert goes out of Normandie and doth seize vpon Beauuouis. King William parts from England, and lands in France, with a great and mighty power, and inuades Xaintonge and Poitou. Behold the first check of a dangerous game. Philip moued with these losses, enters into Normandie with a great and mighty armie: but he cures not one wound in making of another. William on the other side, runnes and spoiles all the Country, euen vnto the gates of Paris, where hee entered not then, but his posteritie did after him. Hee dies soone after, but the quarrell suruiued in his children, who augmented this hereditarie hatred in many forts.

The Leuaine of dissention betwixt France and England.

The English enter into Guienne.

Confusion in Italy betwixt the Emperour and Popes.

The Popes usurpation.

While they began to weaue this web, Italy was in no better estate, being full of horrible combustions, and the cause was so much the more lamentable, for that the mischief came from them, from whom all good was to be expected. We haue formerly spoken of the deuisions growne betwixt the Emperours and the Popes of Rome, for their preheminences. In all ancient times the Popes were subiect & to be summoned before the Emperour, who had authority to create them, & to depose them that were vnworthy of their charges: to call Synods, and to confirme all things which concerned the outward government of the Church. The Pope on the other side maintains, that all this authority was his, as vniuersall Bishop, hauing power to bind and loose, & to iudge of all men, and all causes, as the soueraigne Iudge of the Church, not to bee iudged by any man: and so to dispose absolutely of all matters, as well Ecclesiasticall as Ciuill, as Monarch in the Church, not only armed with power of excommunication to damne rebels, and authority to remit finnes: but hauing also the temporall sword, with soueraigne authority ouer Emperours, Kings and Princes of the earth, to place and displace, and to dispose of their estates.

Hereafter we shall find in euery raigne, some memorable example of this soueraigne authority. This raigne giues a very notable one. After the death of the Emperour Conrad, called Salique, Henry the 3. of that name, (hauing happily gouerned the Empire) left it to his sonne Henry the 4. yet very yong, so as the Popes during this weaknesse of the Empire, had meanes to fortifie themselves: and so embracing this occasion, Gregory the 7. called Hildebrand, did prohibite the Emperour all authority ouer the Clergie, and forbade (vpon paine of excommunication) to haue any recourse vnto him for the collation of benefices, or for any thing else that depended on the Church. Henry moued with so great an affront, lets Gregory vnderstand, that this his decree was contrary to the ancient orders, & the vse of the Catholike Church. Vpon this refusal, he lets him know, that hee will maintaine the rights of the Empire, and complains to the Clergie of Rome in an open assembly. Gregorie calls an other, wherein hee doth excommunicate Henry and all his adherents, and sends forth his Bull into all parts, whereby hee declares him excommunicate and degraded of the Empire, and in his place cauleth Rodolph Duke of Suenia to be chosen Emperour.

Strange confusions betwixt the Emperour and the Pope.

Thus there growes two factions in Italy, and in Germany, one for the Emperour, and the other for the Pope: behold two armies leuied of these factions, ready to shed Christians blood: nine batailles were giuen vpon the quarrell of these preheminences. In the end, Rodolphe the new Emperour is taken and slaine by Godfrey of Bouillon, who followed the Emperour Henry the fourth: who after this victorie, assembled a great Councell at Bresse, where as Gregorie the seuenth is excommunicated, and Clement Bishop of Rauenna appointed to succeed him, they condu& him to Rome with

A with an armie, & take the Citty after a long siege; whereas the new Pope is solemnly installed, and Henry the 4. Emperour restored by the decree of Clement. But this was not all, those which were opposit to the Emperour, chose in the place of Gregory, Urban the 2. and their party growing strong, the confusions increased, opposing one Emperour against another. Herman of Luxembourg to Henry, and after him Egbert Marquis of Saxony: the which were taken by Henry, and slaine one after another. Urban hath other practises against Henry, hee animates his owne sonne by his first wife against him, forcing all the lawes of nature. And as Henry had suppressed the practises of his eldest sonne, Pope Paschall who succeeded Urban the 2. succeeds him euen in the like most filthy practises, incensing his other sonne Henry, whom the father intended to make Emperour, relying on him as on his child, beioued aboue all the rest. So this sonne (bewitched by ill counsell) found meanes to seize on his Father, depriving him first of the Empire, and then of his life. The Pope added to this death a new disgrace, causing by his thundring Bulls, the body of Henry to be digged out of his graue. These were the fruites of their serious controuersies, for preheminance not onely vnknowne to the ancient Church, nor practised by the Apostles, but expresse forbidden by the holy mouth of the sonne of God.

The Pope incenseth the sonne against the father, who takes from him both his Empire & his life.

The Popes malice against the Emperour being dead.

The Popes one after another (troubled with these crosses) had recourse vnto our Philip, so had Henry the 4. being a prisoner to his sonne, but the respect of his common friends, made him to keepe the stakes, and to be a spectator of these lamentable confusions. And yet many orders were erected by the Popes, amidst these disorders, that of the regular Chanoines, for a difference of the secular; the Chartreux, Templers, Benedictines, and Carmes. Thus Philip a witness of others miseries, raignes peaceably, during this age full of confusion, both in Church and State.

The Emperour had reduced the realme of Bourgogne to the Imperiall iurisdiction, distinguished as wee haue sayd: but during these disorders, the whole body was dissolved, and reduced to an other forme; as when one is wearie of an old garment. The industrie of such as held the Citties and Countie in their possession, made foure peeces of this garment. The one was for Otto of Flanders, which is the Countie about Bescancon, with the title of an Earldome, whereof it carries yet the name. The other for Berald of Saxony, who enioyed Sawoy. The third for Guigne the sarr Earle of Grifinaudan, who from little, grew to great in the confusions of times, hauing taken the chiefe Citties of the Country, and in the end, Grenoble the capitall Citty, as he became absolute Lord of all that Prouince: the which hee called Dauphiné, in fauour of his Sonne, who hauing married the Daughter of the Earle of Albon and Viennois, named Dauphin, would carry the same name, holding himselfe honoured by so worthy an allyance. The fourth peece is Provence, one of the goodlyest and richest, both for the fertilitie of the Countie, and commoditie of Ports, most convenient in all the Mediterranean Sea: this was fallen into the hands of Berengers successors, by the meanes before specified.

The beginning of the estates of Dauphiné, Sawoy, Provence, and Franche Comté.

E So the Empire lost the command of these foure Prouinces, which fell to foure diuers Lords, leauing yet in Dauphiné some traces of the ancient name, without any effect, for they yet call it the Empire in their common language, as wee haue sayd elsewhere. But as during the raigne of our Philip these confusions were notable, so voyagers to the Holy Land, is worthy to be carefully obserued. The proiect was to deliuer the Christians of Asia, oppressed by the furious tyranie of the Mahometaines, and to repeople the land, the which God had honoured with the first fruits of his Church. This zeale of Christians was commendable. I would to God they had at this day changed their disordered passions, glutted with their owne blood, into so holy a resolution, vniting their mindes and forces against the common enemy of all Christendome. The occasion was giuen by a French Gentleman called Peter the Hermite, who hauing long traueled in the East, and seene the miseries of the Christians among the Barbarians, the manners of the Leuantines: and the commodities and discommodities of the Prouinces of Asia,

The motive of this enterprise

1061 Asia, nearest to the Holy Land: he laide a plot with Simeon Patriarch of Jerusalem, to A solicit all Christian Kings and Princes, to imploy their forces for the conquest of the Holy land. The event was answerable to the proiect: for being come to Rome to Pope Urban the 2. he did so well lay open the estate and importance of this action, as being satisfied by him, he resolues to inuite all the Kings, Princes, Potentates, States, Comonalties, Lords and Gentlemen of Christendome thereunto. To this end hee calls a Councell at Clermont in Auvergne, where he assisted himselfe, and induced the whole assemblie by his perswasions, with great efficacie, as they resolved neither to spare their persons nor estates, in the execution of so important a worke.

The names of such as went to the Holy Land.

Godfrey of Bouillon, sonne to Eustace Earle of Boulogne upon the Sea, being Duke of Lorraine by his Vncle Godfrey the Crooke-back, the sonne of Geibelon, a great and a B generous Prince, offered himselfe the first to this expedition, and was chosen chiefe of this famous action. The Emperour and all Christian Princes, promised to contribute their meanes, some their persons. A troupe of all the selected Nobilitie of Europe, did willingly consecrate themselves. The most apparent were Eustace and Baldwin, brothers to Godfrey, Hugh the great, Earle of Vernandois, brother to Philip King of France, Robert the Frison Earle of Flanders, Robert the second sonne to William the Bastard, Duke of Normandie and King of England, Stephen Earle of Blois and Chartres, Aimar Bishop of Puy, William Bishop of Oranges, Raimond Earle of Tolose and Saint Gilles, Baldwin Earle of Hainault, Baldwin Earle of Reibel, Bohemond Duke of Apoulie, Garnier Earle of Crez, Hainpin Earle of Bourges, Ysaard Earle of Die, Ramond Earle of Oranges, William Earle of Forcé, Stephen Earle of Aumal, Hugh Earle of S. Pol, Rotron Earle of Perche, and many others, worthy to be registred in this Historie, I haue onely noted such as I could finde out.

All Europe was moued with this voyage, France, Germanie, Italy, England, Scotland, Hongarie, Denmarke, and Sueden: Spain onely failed, being at that time much troubled to keepe their owne home from the Sarrazins, who were lodged euen in their bowels. France did contribute more then all the rest of Christendom. The zeale which moued these generous and valiant men, made them to hazard all, Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, sold and ingaged their Seigneuries, to furnish themselves in this affected voyage, at what price soeuer. Godfrey of Bouillon, chiefe of the D armie, sold the Seigneurie of Bouillon, to Aubert Bishop of Liege, and Metz to the Inhabitants: Robert Duke of Normandie, ingaged all his lands to his brother William King of England: Herpin Earle of Berry, his Earledome to King Philip. A sale farre more honorable for the sellers then for the buyers. There was a quarrell betwixt the children of Tancred the Norman (of whom we haue spoken) who by his valour had conquered Scitile, Calabria, & Apulia (a province from light beginnings. It seemed to be immortal, the question being betwixt wildfull Kintmen; but this zeale did so pacifie their quarrels as they brought aboue twenty thousand braue men to the army, with their own persons. In euery Towne there was nothing but men making their provisions, the wayes were full ofouldiers, horses, & baggage, which repaired to the Rendezuons; the Ports, Harbours, and Seas swarmed with ships and vessels, to transport our generous Argonauts, they being guided with this holy zeale, to settle the State of Christians in the Holy land. The number of the armie is diuersly reported. Some write they were six hundred thousand fighting men, others restraine it onely to a hundred thousand. The first number were more likely, for what were that in Europe, but for our wretched dissensions? But that which they add is to be considered. That many else well affected, were kept back by reason of the dissensions betwixt the Emperours and Popes: so as Germanie (a great nurserie of men of warre,) sent very few: and Italy fewer, being dispensed withall by the Pope, who had ingaged others. See the ordinarie frutes of home-bred quarrels, the which fortifies the enemies of Christendome. Some writers of iudgment adde, that Pope Urban did cunningly vse the Christians zeale, to weaken the Emperour and his Partisans, that hee might preuaile with more facilitie, causing them to marche in this action, and retaining such as were at his deuotion. This is their opinion

A as the wise reader may verifie in their places. The sequell will shewe that this voyage did nothing mortifie the quarrell, betwixt the Emperour & the Pope, the which was renewed after a tragick maner. We follow the traces of truth as euery thing hath succeeded. Here we discourse of the beginnings and motiues of this war, we shall see the end and issue of this great preparation. Let vs reurne to the haue to our Argonauts, the trumpets sound, they are all ready to set saile.

Godfrey diuided his army into three fleets, making the Rendezuons at Constantinople, whether he had sent his Ambassadors to Alexis Emperour of Greece, who entering into ialousie of so great an army, made some difficulty to grant him ports: yet in the end hee yeilded, and gaue him an honorable entertainment. The departure of these Christian Aduenturers was in the yeare 1096, the first day of Aprill. Behold our Latins arrived in safe port, (thus hereafter wee shall call them, to distinguish them from the Greekes being Christians, & friends: & the Turkes Leuantins enemies. They undertooke no small worke, neither went they to take possession of an empty inheritance, The Turkes and Mahometains their enemies, were Lords of Asia, from the realme of Pontus (towards the Mediterranean sea) vnto Hellepont: after they had expelled the Greekes, overthrowne the forces of the Caliphes of Babylon and Egipt, and had seized on Palestina, Iudea, and all the rest of the Kingdome of Israell, from the entry of the holie Land vnto Libanus. Jerusalem was in their hands. Their estate (springing from weak beginnings) encreased dayly. Soliman Belchiaros was their sit Sultan or Emperour, who quickned with so hot a summons of Christians, assembled his forces together, stood vpon his gard, and prepared to fight.

The Malactian, command.

Godfrey (taking the aduice of Alexis, Emperour of Greece, who made shew to imploy all his meanes to aduance the common cause) resolved to passe into Chalcedone, and beginning with the Citties of Asia to make his passage more easie. Hee had sent Peter the Hermit before, the first trumpet of this warre, with Gaultier (who was a better soldier) and some troupes to discover the Country, but both together making scarce one good Captaine, suffred themselves to be beaten by the Turkes: so as Godfrey sends in their place one called Regnaud or Raimond, who makes profession to know the Country, but he speeds worse, suiting himselfe to be beate by the Turkes, and to see his life, herenounced the Christian religion, abandoning all that had followed him to the slaughter. This was a foretelling of ill successe.

The Christiantroupes were defeated by the Turkes.

The army marching by Asia the lesse, first they besiege Nicomedia the lesse, & takes it, then they attempt Nicea a City of Bethinia (famous for the first generall Councell which was held against Arrius). The Sultan had thrust Mahomet into it, one of his braverest Captaines, yet was it taken by assault by the Christians after two and twenty daies siege. The Sultan had his army in field, the which approached to fauour the besieged, and to saue the remainder of this ship-wracke, and likewise to hold the Citties in obedience, which stood amazed. Nicea being yeilded, there were some skirmishes so fauorable for the Latins, as Soliman retires his army to the mountaines, & leaues the plaines E & Citties to Godfrey, who putt vp with this happy successe, and leauing a good gard in Nicea, he passeth through Bethinia and comes to Heraclea, the which yeelds presently, and goes on with such successe, as in lesse then foure yeares he subdued all the goodliest Provinces of Asia, that is to say Lycaonia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Siria, Mesopotamia and Comagene, as the wise reader may see in the Originalls of the whole History without making of any particular relation in this discourse.

Godfrey winnes the greatest part of Asia.

These happy and gamefull conquests strooke as great a terror in Soliman and the Leuantins, as it purchased honour and reputation to Godfrey and the Christians: so as hauing taken Antioche, Tripoly, and other renowned Citties they came into Iudea and Jerusalem with a victorious courage. Thus Jerusalem is besieged with such diligence and resolution, as after eight and thirty daies it is taken by assault, and all the Turkes cut in peeces. The poore inhabitants without armes are carefully preferred, to purchase a double victory to the Latins, of valour in fighting well, and of clemency in Iudea and Jerusalem taken. Godfrey of Bouillon chosen King of Jerusalem.

1109. in sparing the vanquished. The City wone, the Latins assemblen in counceill, & with one comon consent choose Godefrey of Bouillon King of Ierusalem. All the royall ornaments were taken & accepted by him, except the Crowne of gold, the which he would haue of thornes, like to that of our sauour Iesus Christ, to augment the price of gold & precious stones dedicated to his Crowne by a Holy humility, and a religious acknowledgement of the victory, which the Son of God hath gotten by his blood, to giue vs in Heauen the Crowne of immortal life. This famous act chanced in the yeare 1099. in the moneth of March.

Having put Godefrey and the Christians in possession of the Holy Land, let vs returne into France to our Philip, not without grieve to see the dissention betwixt the Emperour and Pope, who were nothing reconciled by the voyage to the holy Land. The increase of this newe power, purchased in England to the Sonnes of William the Conquerour, gaue him no small occasion to looke to his affaires, and the rather, for that this newe King of England had begonneto make a breach in his Estate, taking Xaintonge and Poisou Countries very important, being members of one of the principall Prouinces of his realme, foreseeing also that Normandy would bandy it selfe against France without all respect.

William had leit three sonnes of great hope: William furnamed Rufus King of England, Robert Duke of Normandie (whome wee haue left in the holy Land) and Henry Earle of Maine withall his treasure. Philip therefore to secure his Estate (following the example of his Ancestors) caused Lewis his soune, (whome hee had by Berthe, daughter to C Baldwin Earle of Flanders) to bee Crowned King. There was a scandalous breach in this marriage, for Philip falling in loue with Bertrade the wife of Fouques Earle of Anjou, puts away Berthe, and afterwards (hauing reiected Bertrade), hee receiued Berthe againe, being mother to King Lewis, to whome hauing resigned the crowne at Orleans, hee died at Melun in the yeare of grace 1109. of his age 57. and of his raigne 49. hauing raigned long to settle his Estate, but not without a leuaine of much trouble to come, hauing degenerated from the vertues of his grand-fathers and father. He was disloyall, couetous, louing nothing but his owne profit, pittilesse, ingrate: and one who sowed dangerous seeds of much mischief, which began to bud in the raigne ensuing.

LEWIS

LEWIS the 6. called the grose
the 40. King.

AS wee foresee a storme by the clouds that rise, by the darke mists of the thicke ayre, pierced through with sparkles like the shining of a close fire, and by the motiues of the water, driuen with a violent and sudden wind, euen so there be symtomes & fits in an estate, which foretell the alterations which shall intue: the which fall not all at one instant, but the subiect being gathered together, in proceesse of time, breakes forth when it can no longer hold. There is this difference betwixt naturall things and those which belong to man, for that men can well discern what the wether will be, but he is blind in that which concerns himselfe, and neuer beleeues vntill he feels the blow, falling into the danger which he flies, by his owne fault, neuer wise but after danger. France had inioyed peace aboue a hundred yeares, vnder these forepassed raignes: shee now growes wearie. This raigne is a preamble to a mournfull song, which shall make them to weepe that reioyced in the fruition of so long rest. The name of royall authoritie held all those great men backe which had any interest therein, the wisdom of Capet, Robert, Henry, and Philip, had so bridled them, as they willingly obeyed.

Now they are of an other humor. The Duke of Normandie (who since Capet had bene obedient and affectionate to the Crowne,) seeing himselfe strengthened with the Realme of England, hee frames all his practises to ouerthrow this order, by rebellions and tumults. Lewis had scarce performed his fathers funeralls, before the fire of rebellion kindled in diuers parts of the realme: and (as if the Kings youth had bene a blemish to his dignitie,) every one will play the pettie King. The places neere vnto Paris began these first reuolts, by reason of the many great houses thereabouts.

Corbeil had an Earle, Chartres another, Piseaux in Beause had one, Crecy had his Lord, A Marle his, Pomponne his, and so diuers other Seigneuries had euery one their particular Lord. But as a disease stirres vp all the humors in a weake bodie, so all that were discontented with Lewis, gather together into one head, to afflict him vnder the countenance of the King of England. They were for a time suppressed, yet this was but to open a vaine, and not to cure the feuer. Guy of Crecy, the Lord Piseaux, Landelin Earle of Dammartin, Thibaud Earle of Champagne, and Brye, Pean of Loure in Paris, Milon of Montlehery, and Philippe the bastard of King Philippe, all ioyntly play the martines and rise against their King. At the same instant, Henry King of England goes to field, his priuate quarrell was for the Towne of Gisors, seated vpon the river of Epre, on the confines of Normandie. But this small proceffe was soone ended, for Lewis hauing defeated the English nere vnto Gisors, hee forced Henry to retyre, and afterwaids punished all these rebell's, increasing his reuenues by their confiscations.

Rebe's suppressed and punished.

But the quarrell betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, did hatch a more dangerous procees for France. We haue sayd that Henry the 5. banded against his father Henry the 4. (who had associated him to the Empire) and had cast him into prison by the Popes Councell, where this poore man died for griefe. Henry the 5. wonderfully troubled in conscience, and vexed with daily approches, that hee had violated the Imperiall rights, resolved to haue his reuenge of Pope Pascale, the author of this cruell and vnkind Councell. To conclude, he comes, and that with so great a resolution, as in few dayes, hee assembles three score thousand foote, and thirte thousand horset with this army hee goes into Italie, and hauing taken and spoiled Nourre, Pontremolo and Arrezzo, hee comes a Conqueror to the gates of Rome, the which were opened without any resistance.

The Emperour greets for his victory with a salute.

The Emperour comes to Rome and receiveth the Pope to take an oath.

Being entred the Cittie, and causing the Pope and Colledge to assemble, he makes knowne vnto them the rights of the Empire, as Pope Leo the eight had acknowledged them to Otho the second Emperour, and before him Adrian to Charlemagne, according to the decree of the Councell at Rome, contained in the fixte third distinction: and to conclude, he forced him to take the oath of fidelity, as to the true and lawfull Emperour, and then returns with his army. Pope Pascale extremely moued with this affront, calls a Councell, wherein he protests to haue bene forced by Henry, so by consequence pronounceth, that whatsoever he had promised was of no force, and after all these royles he died. Gelsus succeeded him both in place and hatred against the Emperour Henry: but being too weake of himselfe, neither hauing any such friend as the King of France (according to the triall so often made, time out of minde) he comes into France, but he died at Cluny: and in his place Calixtus, son to the Earle of Bourgonne was chosen Pope. The reputation of the place from whence he was descended was great, so as he being a Frenchman, easily called a Councell in France, to the great satisfaction of the French. It was held at Rheims, where by an ecclesiasticall decree, he declared Henry an enemy to the Church, and degraded of the Imperiall dignity.

The Emperour degraded by the Popes decree, in a Councell at Rheims.

As this ignominious decree did moue the Emperour, so did it minister matter to the King of England his brother in lawe, to imbrace all occasions to annoy Lewis his capitall enemy: for seeing this Councell had bin held in France, and consisted chiefly of the French Church: it was very apparant that the Kings fauour was very prejudiciall to the Emperours affaires. The English sayles not to harpe vpon this string to the Emperour, being already incensed by the thing it selfe: promising him all his meanes, & encouraging him to enter France on the one side, whilst that he came on the other with all the forces of Normandie and England. The party was not small, neither had Lewis small cause to feare, being incountred by two such enemies. But God shewed him the rod, and referred the punishment for another season: for as the Emperour was going to field, the Germaine Princes (foreseeing the misery of a warre vnder taken lightly vpon despight, and weighing the importance of neighbourhood) gaue him to vnderstand that he ought not to attempt warre against the King of France, without declaring vnto him

The Emperour and King of England ioyne against France.

A him the causes of his discontent. Hee therefore sends his Ambassadors to this end. Lewis doth wisely answer him, that hee is exceedingly sorrie, to see the two great Pillers of the Church so shaken by these diffentions: and that it was to bee feared, the whole building would bee ruined. So as being a friend to both, hee desired greatly to be a mediator of concord, and not to carrie coales to increase the fire, too much kindled already, the which ought to be quenched for the good and quiet of all Christendome: This Ambassage was pleasing and preuailed for the good and quiet of all our disames, and was content to make Lewis a mediator for an accord betwixt him, the Pope, to the great griefe of the King of England, who expected a long continuance of this iarr. The composition was made at Wormes, very beneficiall for the Pope, in the yeare 1122. whereby Henry grants him the installing of Bishops, and other benefices: This did ease the fore, but not cure it: as the sequell of the Historie will shew. While that Princes haue leisure to contend, the poore people dye for hunger in many places of Europe. This famine was exceeding great in Flanders, who then had for their Earle, Charles surnamed the good, for his good disposition, and great charitie to the poore. He sought by all meanes to releuee them. But as barrenesse was one of the causes of this famine, for the cruell couetousnesse of the rich, was a great hinderance to the commoditie of victuals: whereby there grew as remarkable an act, as the successe was strange, the particular report whereof, the reader must pardon in the breifenesse of our stile.

The French King and the Emperour reconciled.

Notable troubles in Flanders.

C There were three brethren at Bruges, of the chiefe of the Countrie, the which had gathered together a great quantitie of graine, and would not sell it, expecting a greater death, which might cause a greater price, that is Bertholphe Wendefstrate, Pouost of S. Donna, and Chanceller of Flanders: Lambert and Bouffard Wendefstrate brethren: and another rich Bourgeois called Lambert, one of the chiefe of the Cittie. This dignity of Prouost and Chanceller was so great, as hee supplied the Princes place in his absence. Vpon the peoples complaint, the Earle decrees, that all the graniers of these great houses should be opened, and the Corne sold to the people at a reasonable rate. The Comission was giuen to Thamar, Almoner of the Earles house, as a thing befitting his charge: he caused the graniers of these rich Bourgeses to be opened, the corne is sold to the people, and the money deliuered to the owners. The people being releued by the courageous care of Thamar, commend him. The Wendefstrates and Lambert (greatly discontented with this sale, wherein they held themselves interested) cause many indignities to be done vnto him. Lambert is directly accused by informations, being a very audacious young man, and the Wendefstrates were touched therewith. The Earle offended with these audacious attempts, repaired them by iustice: threatening Lambert that if he continued, he would severely punish him.

There was also another complaint, made by an old Abbot against the Prouost, to whom the Earle spake roughly, commanding him to restore vnto the Abbot what he ought him. These free admonitions of the good Earle Charles, did so alter the proud & trecherous minds of these Cittizens, as they resolved to kill him: his milde facilitie giuing these wicked spirits both courage to attempt, and boldnesse to execute. And the end is answerable to their wicked desseine. As the good Earle Charles went ill accompanied in the morning to his deuotion, to the Church of S. Donna, on Ashwednesday, behold a troope of yong mad men, led by this Lambert, comes vnto him, (being vnarmed on his knees in a Chappell, the Priest attired in his ornaments at the Altar,) the Earle holding forth his arme to giue his almes to a poore woman, & without any warning they beat him downe with their swords, & kill him, and so forcing all to giue way, they seeke for Thamar, whom they find & massacre, with so great a furie, as they leaue him vpon the place hewed into many peeces. Their troope increaseth, and they flie to the Pallace, where all are amazed: and finding it without gard, without keyes, & without any gate shut, they enter it with horrible cries, they kill, sack, and spoile: and running from thence into the Cittie, they commit the like in those houses which they knew best affected to the good Earle Charles. This furious crueltie was accompanied with an ouerweening indiscretion, as if they had made some goodly conquest, they braue 1117. braue it, and play the maisters without feare of any punishment. The people exceedingly grieved to see these barbarous cruelties against their good Prince, whom they loued as a father, durst not speake a word during this surye, whereas this troupe of murderers commaunded absolutely. But the wisest Citizens fled to Lewis, as to their Soueraigne Lord. Lewis comes to Bruges with great speede: these butchers attending their misery, shut themselves into the great Tower of S. Donas. Lewis doth first bury the body of this good Earle honourably, (the which had lien without sepulchre) and then doth punish the murderers and their complices rigourously.

Lewis King of France punisheth
the rebells.

But this is not all. He must prouide for the Earledome, remayning without a Lord, by the death of Count Charles deceased without children. There wanted no pretendants, William of Ypre sonne to Philip of Flanders, the second sonne of Robert the Fri-son. King Henry of England (who desired greatly to ioyne this goodly Countie with his Normandy) Stephen of Blois Earle of Montreuil and Bologne: Baldwin Earle of Hainault, and William the sonne of Robert called Count-house brother to the King of England, but his sworne enemy, hauing vied his father ill and kept him prisoner.

Lewis was soueraigne Iudge of this controuersy, Flanders depending on the crowne of France. He assigned all the pretendants of the City of Arras: signifying that his intent was to do him iustice, but in effect he inclined to fauour: adiudging this Earledome of Flanders to the last, that is to William of Normandy, to binde him with more strict bounds against his kinsman. On the other side the Flemings assemble at Ypre, and chole William of Lee Lord of Ypre. The King aduanceth with his forces to Ypre, to preuent this popular election, where he enters the stonger, and forceth William to renounce it. From thence he goes to all other good Cities: where by his authority, he causeth William of Normandy to be receiued for lawfull Earle, and puts him in solemne possession by a publike act. But his fauour had ill bestowed this goodly inheritance of an vnworthy man, whose fury depriued him presently. Lewis hauing installed him, returns into France. William instead of winning his new subiects by equity and mildnesse, begins to oppress them after a rigorous and imperious manner: by instringing of their priuileges, ostentations of his authority, taxes, subsidies, newe impositions, and by all other meanes which Princes (that seeke to loose their Estates) hold to torment their subiects. He had so far exceeded, as the Cities without any waunting resolute to provide a better Earle, and to this intent they seeke a head.

The memorie of their good Earle, makes them to cast their eyes vpon him that hath most right to this inheritance, as the neere kinsman, which is Thierry son to the Duke of Alsacia, and of Gertrude daughter to Robert the Frison. The Flemings inreat him to come into their country, promising him all assistance to conquer the State. He comes, and is receiued with an extraordinary ioy by all the people. All the Cities assemble, to acknowledge him by order, and dismisse William of Normandy, who seeing a flat repulse by this people thus freed, repayres to Lewis for succour in this extremity. Lewis sayles him not, his army marcheth with great speed: hee himselfe comes in person, and is receiued into Arras: from thence he adorne Thierry, to come and answer before him as his soueraigne, by what warrant hee carries himselfe for Earle: this commons is made vnto him at Ypre, whether he had retired himselfe. Hauing condemned him by default, he approacheth his army to Ypre, to vex the inhabitants. Thierry sallies forth with a notable troupe of men: they ioyne, the fight is fierce, but the check fales vpon Thierries forces, who with much a doe, saues himselfe in Alost.

But he was not aduised that one with a Crossebow, shot an arrow at him, and pierced him through the arme. Behold hee wounded and within two dayes he dies. Thierry and the Flemings send presently to Lewis to beseech him to receiue them into fauour, whereby he may be assured of their faithfull seruice. Lewis consents, and confirms him: and hauing caused him to take

A take the oath of fidelity, and receiued his homage after the manner of his Ancestors, he returns into France. But Flanders continued not long in quiet, as we shall see hereafter.

Bourbonois.

To these stitres of Flanders, were added some garboyles in Bourbonois and Auuer-gne. Archibauld Earle of Bourbon was deceased, leauing one sonne of the same name, but a young man: and a brother called Hamon, who abusing the time in the weakenorie of his Nephew, would make himselfe Maister of Bourbonois, pretending the Earledome to appertaine vnto him by the death of his elder brother, to whom hee must succeed in order, as the yongest of the house. The mother and friends of Archibauld, opposed against Hamon, the right of representation (inuiolable in France in great houses) which is, that the sonne of the eldest brother, represents the Father, and without doubt succeeds in all his rights, to enioy them, as if he himselfe liued; for that the Father reuiues in the Sonne. Hamon building his chiefe interest vpon force, would not admit any reason that made for his Nephew: so as the matter was brought before the King: who by the aduise of his Councell, declares Archibauld the lawfull heire, and puts Hamon from his pretensions, commanding him to leaue the possession of Bourbonois free to his Nephew. This Archibauld did afterwards marrie his daughter Beatrice to Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuois, sonne to the King S. Lewis, and of this marriage by the royall stemme, is descended the most famous race of Bourbon, the which at this day doth happily enioy the Crowne and realme of France.

C But Hamon (who held some places in Bourbonois) would not leaue the possession, refusing to obey the Kings commandement, relying vpon the fauour of Enslache Earle of Auuer-gne, who sought to free himselfe. There was a priuate subiect of complaint against him, hauing displaced the Bishop of Clermont against the Kings will. These occasions drew the King into Bourbonois, where hauing besieged Hamon, he ended this controuersie in fauour of Archibauld. The affaires of Auuer-gne were more difficult, by reason of William Duke of Guienne, who imbraced the cause for the Earle of Auuer-gne, pretending that he was his vassall. This quarrell seemed to take a long course, but it was pacified by this meanes.

Lewis had six sonnes, Philip, Lewis, Henry, another Philip, Peter, Robert, and one Daughter, Constance. He had crowned his eldest sonne Philip, who dyed by a strange accident: going to take the aire on horseback, a Hog passed vnder the bellie of his horse, the which being scared, did shake this young King so violently, as he threw him downe, and so bruised him, as within few dayes after hee died. This vnexpected death hauing much troubled Lewis, made him to provide for the rest of his children: and the libertie of the time among so many of his subiects (which did check his authority by their greatnesse) moued him to looke more carefully therevnto, to make him great, whom he had appointed his successor in the realme about the rest. Lewis was his second sonne, whom he resolved to crowne King in his Brothers place, and to many him.

E Guienne is one of the worthiest members of this estate, the Dukes were yet of the remainders of great Charlemagne, as we haue seene. William was then Duke, and had but one Daughter to bee heire to this great and rich Countie. Lewis resolves to take this Daughter for his sonne, and so to end all strife. This Daughter was called Ellenor, she was given in marriage to Lewis, which was called the yong: to distinguish him from his father Lewis, with whom he reigned. Lewis expected a great aduancement by this alliance, but the event wil shew that he had not reckoned with God above. As for his other children, he leaues them to the discretion of the eldest, whom he had resolved to make their superior, both in authoritie and power, that they might depend onely vpon his fauour. He made Henry his third sonne, Bishop of Beauuois, the other Philip Archdeacon of Paris: Peter Earle of Courteney; Robert Earle of Drux, and married his onely daughter Constance to Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles and Tholouse; which shewes that it was a great house; as we shall note in our Theater of Langudoc: but the course of the historie shall make vs see plainly that this alliance did not war-

1137. raunt Raimond from the miseries that fell vpon him after this raigne. Lewis the Groſſe A hauing thus provided for his estate, dyed, aged 61. in the yeare of grace 1137. the 25. of October, leaving one Sonne seiled in his Realme, with an apparent peace, yet breeding great troubles for the State, hauing reigned twenty and nine yeares.

LEWIS the 7. called the yong, 41. King of France.

The State of
this raigne.

He began to raigne in the yeare 1137. and reigned 43. yeares. This A long raigne was nothing happy, and contained nothing in it that was memorable, but that the foundation was laide for a long calamitie for France. The subiect was the more notable, for that the mischance came from thence, from whence good was to be expected, which was from the heire of Cusene. In hope and expectation of rest: but in effect a lesson of lamentable confusion. He had almost ruined the Monarchie, and transported it vnto Strangers. The estate of France being thus seiled, and some muriners suppressed (who in the beginning of this raigne had seiled the sunne) France continued in great quiet, and the accord made betwix the King, Henry the 5. Emperour, and the Popes had pacified the dissentions, which had troubled all Christendome. But the affaires of the Christians in the East, were not any waye able to their happy and victorious beginning, so as all the Kings and Princes of Europe were called by extreame necessitie vnto their succours. Such was their estate, as all things fell out happily in Asia to Godfrey of Bouillon, and that the taking of the Holy Land and Ierusalem, did seeme an absolute conquest to the Christians: but the Turkes on the other side slept not: they enter Palestina with an armie of six hundred ans affaires in

A hundred thousand men (as the Greece Historie of those times doth witness) Godfrey 1137. fights with them, the combat was great, and the issue happy for the Christians, if the death of that great and famous Prince had not followed soone after, and too soone for the affaires of Christendome, which began greatly to decline by his decease.

Baldwin his brother was chosen in his place. A Prince valiant enough, but vnfortunate. At his first entrie, he very indiscreetly charged a great troupe of Sarraxins, where he was beaten with so great dishonour, as euen then he lost both courage and authority: although during his raigne (which was seuen yeares) Tyre & Apamea, (which they call Raphanea) notable Cities, were added to this new Kingdome of the Christians. Fouques Earle of Anion, his sonne in law, succeeded him: but hee was scarce in possession, when as he was slaine a hunting with a fall; leaving two children, Baldwin and Amalry, and the affaires so dismembred, as they could no longer stand: pressed within by deuisions, and without by a dangerous warre: so as all these goodly Provinces gotten with so great facilitie, were through these ciuill dissentions among Christians, lost within few dayes. Behold new Ambassadors from these yong Princes, and all the great States in Asia: To the Pope, Emperour, and King of France, imploring their aides, elsie they were vndone, to the shame of Christendome, and triumph of those miscreants. Lucius the 2. was then Pope. Conrad of Sueuia Emperour. And Lewis King of France. S. Bernard (whom they called the Mellifluous Doctor, for his sacred & diuine eloquence) liued then, hauing wonne great reputation with the French, for his doctrine & holinesse.

The Christians looke all in the East.

C The Pope imploied him much, to perswade the King to embrace this action, and to succour their afflicted bretheren. Lewis resolues easily, his zeale being strengthened by the perswasions of this holy man. Conrad of Sueuia tooke the like resolution, so as they are both well affected, to employ all their meanes to crosse the complots of these miscreants, and to settle the Christians affaires in the holy land: when as behold a great mischance which had almost hindred all their resolutions.

The Emperour
and King of France resolue to succour the Christians.

Alberic Archbishop of Bourges being dead, the Pope without the Kings priuie, (to get footing in France of his absolute authority, which he had so much disputed with the Emperour) advanced to the Archbishopricke of Bourges, a favorite of his named Peter, and sent him with his Bulls to take possession of the place. Lewis (who had alwayes supported the Sea of Rome in all their quarrels; who had seene his Father ready to enter into a deadly warre with the Emperour vpon this occasion: who moreover prepared himselfe at the Popes perswasion, to employ, not onely his treasure, but his owne person, in a voyage to the East, for the common good of all Christendome:) seeing this act of the Pope directly contrary to the liberties of the French Church; was mightily discontented with this his proceeding, as if he purposely meant to braue him at his owne doore. It is a priuilege time out of minde of the Kings of France, that they admit not any Ecclesiasticall dignities, preferred by the Pope, or chosen by the people, if he be not agreeable to themselves. The reason is apparent, to auoide either disloyaltie, ignorance or ill life, in such as are advanced to these dignities: our Kings hauing right to be soueraine ouer-seers of the Church. The King would not allow of Peter thus advanced to this dignity, although the Chapter of Bourges had given their consent to the Popes decree. Peter (being reiectcd) had recourse to Thibaud Earle of Champagne, & to the Earle of Blous, men discontented with the King, and onely fit to be opposed. But to this dissent there was added a greater at the same instant. Raoul Earle of Vermendois had put away his wife Gilbert, the daughter of Roger Lord of Chasteau-briant, vpon suspicion that she had bene prodigall of her honour, without any proofes to conuince her. But iealousie made him to see that plainly, which was concealed to others: so as he put her away, and tooke Peronnelle, the Bastard Daughter of William Duke of Guienne in her place, being aduowed sister to Queene Elenor, and her deere friend. Gilbert complaines to the Pope, being reiectcd (as hee pretended) without cause, and demands Iustice. The Pope commands Raoul to receiue his wife againe, and to put away Peronnelle, as vnlawfull, and (for not obeying) doth excommunicate him. The King intreats the Pope for Peronnelle, but he preuailes not: for hee sends Tues into France as his Legat,

143. to reuieue the first censure, not onely against the Earle, but also against the Bishops A which had consented to the diuorce of Gilbert, forbidding them any more to exercise their charges. The Earle Thibaud had vnderaken to haue the Pope obeyed; to the great dislike of the King, as it were attempting it of purpose to offend him. Lewis moued with this affront, went against Thibaud: And at the first takes Vitry, and not onely sackes the Towne, but in disdaine of the Pope, caused the Churches to bee spoiled: and many being fled out of the villages, to saue themselves from the furie of the disordred troupes, had retired themselves into a Temple, as to a place of safetie: Lewis giues such libertie to his Souldiers, as they set fire of the place, and burne fiftene hundred persons, men and women. The horror of this Massacre offended all good men, but especially Lewis, who was so much grieved as hee could not bee comforted. Misfortune is good for some thing. Lewis loathing the voyage to the East, for the fore-sayd occasions, was easily confirmed by Saint Bernard, who had perswaded him to yeeld all succours to the afflicted Christians, for a reparation of so execrable a fact, committed by his commandement, vpon so many poore innocents: And likewise he imbarcked Conrad the Emperour and the Germanes. These two great Princes, carried with one zeale, and ynitied in one will to this worke, make great preparations for the voyage. Conrad armes three score thousand horse, and an infinite number of foote, and hee himselfe is chiefe of this goodly Armie, taking the way of Hongarie to Constantinople, through the Countrie of Alexis his brother in lawe, Emperour of Greece: hee arriued some moneths before Lewis; for the Emperour parted in Februarye, and Lewis went to field in Maye, and takes the same course the Emperour had done.

The Kings Armie was nothing inferiour to the Emperours: and so much the more remarkable, for that Queene Elenor desired to accompany her husband in the voyage: so as after the King and Queene's example, all France thought to flie into the East. They sent a Distaffe and a Spindle to all those that were fit for Armes, if they marched not with this troupe of braue Warriors. Conrad arriued first at Constantinople: And so he returned much sooner into Germanie. Hauing passed into Asia by the Bosphorus of Thrace, it was likely that all should yeeld to so mightie an Armie: but it tell out otherwise then he had desigined. All the Citties wonne at the first voyage were almost lost; and the Christians ill gouernment was so well knowne, as the Turkes made head in all places. The Emperour measuring his triumph by the number of his men, contemned the enemy, and was negligent in his proceedings: Hauing referred the prouision to Alexis Emperour of the East, his brother in lawe, he found little Bread, and store of enemies in all places. So as what by Hunger and the Sword, scarce the tenth part of his men come to his friends in the Holy Land, where hee found them all amazed.

Lewis (warned by Conrad's example) did somewhat better in the beginning: for being refreshed at Constantinople, and other Citties of Greece: he passed the Chaneil into Asia happily: where hauing beaten the enemy, hee came without losse to Athalia and hauing caused his Fleete (which was at Rhodes) to come to the friends Ports of Palestina, he arriued by land safe with all his troupes at Antioche, where hee was honourable receiued by Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles his brother in lawe: In the meane time the Emperour besiegeth Ascalon alone, but preuailes not. Lewis arriues at Ierusalem, whether Conrad comes likewise. After they had visited the places of deuotion, they resolute to besiege Damas in Siria, a Cittie very important for the commerce of Iudea; but after a long and fruitlesse siege, all are dispersed. The Emperour who came first, retournes first. The King stayed not long after him. There were foure yeares spent in this fruitlesse voyage, with much paine and cost, and not onely without fruit, but it also tooke away the terror of Christian armies in these miscreants, and left the affaires of Asia in faire worse estate, then when they came. There was yet another inconuenience. The Emperour Alexis (a friend at their entrie) shewed himselfe an enemy to them both at their departure. Conrad saued himselfe as well as he could, more fearing the

A horrible massacre committed by the soldiers of Lewis, and by his consent.

The Emperour and Lewis go into the East.

The Emperours voyage to no profit.

The Emperour of Greece deals treacherously with the Emperour & King.

A the treacherie of the Greekes, then the crueltie of the Turkes. Lewis prouides in time to haue the Fleete of Sicile come for his conuoy, else had hee lost both himselfe and his treasure, the which had bene a meanes for the Greekes to make their peace with the Turkes, and open warre against the other Christians, being better then themselves. This shamefull and preiudiciall departure, was hurtfull to the whole Christian Church. But there was a greater losse for Lewis, very trouble some to himselfe, and preiudiciall to all France: for Queene Elenor his wife, (who made profession to go visit the holy places,) suffered her eyes to be abused with an vnchaste and filthy lust, which tainted her honour, and the King her husbands heart, with an ourragious ielousie. This woman accustomed to the liberties of Time and Place, had so abandoned her selfe to the pleasures of the East, as the stenche of her incontinencie was publike to the whole world, before her husband had any notice thereof: her impudencie did so farre exceed, as shee would dishonourable haue stayed in Antioche, and left her husband: presuming to cloake her shame with a shew of Religion: saying without blushing, that she could be no more the wife of Lewis, to whom shee was Cousin in the fourth degree, preferring the loue of a Iester, named Saladin, of the Sarrasin race, before the greatnesse of a King of France, her lawfull husband. Lewis being much disquieted, perswades this woman to returne, (a heauier burthen to his minde, then to his ship,) being returned to his house, hee frees himselfe with all the speed he can. And whereas hee should haue cast this insatiate woman into the Riuer, being no more his wife, and retained her Dowrie iustly gotten, she playing bankerout of her honour: hee calles a Councell at Baugency to haue her diuorced, the which was granted, vnder colour of this farre fetcht consanguinitie. But his desire was to bee freed from her. So retaining two Daughters, borne vnder the vale of their marriage: hee restores vnto Elenor all her Countie of Guienne, that is, he puts into the hands of his furious enemy a Torche to set his whole Realme on fire: for so soone as shee sees her selfe freed from the subiection and feare of a husband, shee stayed not long to acquaint her selfe with Henry King of England, and Duke of Normandie, the greatest and most capitall enemy that Lewis had. So hee obtained Guienne by the voluntary cession which Lewis made, to haue the better meanes to annoy him and his whole realme.

Moreover, Lewis payde deere for so great a discomoditie, for the Pope would not giue him a dispence to marrie againe, without a great summe of money, to be employed in the warres of the Holy Land: and to finish this worke, hee tooke to Wife Constance, the Daughter of Alphonso King of Galicia, being a weake friend, and farre off. This marriage was not greatly conuenient, neither for his owne quiet, nor the peace of his subiects. This subiect of deadly rancor, encreasing the hatred of these two neighbour Monarkes of France and England, burst forth soone by dangerous effects. The benefit of the new purchase of Guienne, was the cause of that perillous warre, the which had so long, and so lamentable continuance. William Duke of Guienne, Grand-father by the Father to Queene Elenor, had married: the onely Daughter of the first Raimond Earle of Tholouse, who had ingaged the sayd Countie to Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles, who since also called himselfe Earle of Tholouse, being seized of the sayd Countie, and enioyed it quietly vnder the Kings obedience. Henry King of England offers the money to Raimond, to redeeme it, and demands the Earldome as his Wives right: Vpon his refusal, he armes, enters into Quercy, takes Cahors, spoiles the Countie, and besiegeth Tholouse. Lewis (intreated by Raimond) for the Earldome of Tholouse, comes to quenche this fire: Being arriued, and the two Armies readie to ioyne, a peace was made betwixt the two Kings, by the marriage of Marguerite the Daughter of Lewis, with Henry the eldest Sonne of Henry King of England: But for that shee was very young, and not yet marriageable, shee was deliuered into Henry the Fathers hands, vntill shee were of fitt age to marry.

Lewis had now buried his wife Constance, who left him but two Daughters, without any heyres male: so as being desirous to haue a successor, hee made no delay to marry, and tooke to his third Wife, Alix the Daughter of Thibaud Earle of Champagne.

The Emperour and King of France make a shamefull returne from the East.

Queene Elenor vnchaste.

Lewis pretends a cause to be diuorced from Elenor, and restores all her Countie.

Elenor marries with Henry King of England.

Lewis marries againe.

The first war between France and England, takes its rise from the Earldome of Tholouse.

The two kings reconciled by a marriage.

1151. pagne, his vassall, and newly reconciled, but not greatly affected vnto him, vnill that A time. Hee had a Sonne presently by her, whom hee called Dieu Donne, or giuen of God, as an acknowledgement that God had sent him, at his and his subiects praers, This is hee that shall succeed him. I should begin to descibe his raigne, but order commands me to relate what happened, during the raigne of Lewis, in the neighbour nations of England and Italy, wherein Lewis had great crosses.

Henry King of England had two sonnes by Elenor: Richard and Geoffrey; and by his first wife hee had Henry, who was made sure to Marguerite of France, of whom wee haue spoken. The Father caused him to be crowned, to settle him in his life time, and tyed the English vnto him by homage. A young Prince, ambitious, audacious, ill aduised and rash, who cannot long containe himselfe with the taste of this new authoritie, but will play the King with his Father. And although his Fathers admonitions restrained him for awhile: yet this ambitious humour still burst forth: So as the Father from milde admonitions came to threats, the insolencie of this young Prince increasing dayly: Some yeares passed whilest this fire lay smothered, very long for young Henry, to whom the Fathers life seemed too tedious, and the children of the second wife grew by the care of Elenor their Mother. Henry the Father, discontented with his Sonne, and fearing that in consummating the marriage betwixt him and the Daughter of France, the young Prince would grow proud, augmenting his traime and State, and (through the fauour of King Lewis his Father in Lawe) attempt something preiudiciall to his authoritie: Hee delayed the accomplishment of this marriage, although the Virgin were of more then sufficient yeares to marrie. To this mischief was added another more shamefull, for that Henry the Father caused this Princeesse to be carefully kept, the which should bee his Daughter in Lawe, fearing least his Sonne should violently take her away, and marry her. Elenor falls into ialousie, as if Henry had abused her: And it was easie to settle this conceit in her sonne in Lawe Henries head, who had the chiefe interest in this delay: And to publish this scandalous report vnto the people, to make the old man more odious vnto the whole world. A malicious and importune woman, borne for a great plague to both these Estates. As men doe commonly adore the Sunne rising: so there wanted no Sicophants in Court to flatter the eares of this young King, and likewise to incense the two Kings one against the other, in flattering their passions.

Thus Henry transported by these occasions, complains to Lewis of the double wrong his Father did him, both in the delay of his marriage, and deniall of his authoritie. And as Lewis at his request had giuen some admonitions vnto Henry, in the end this passionate young Prince came to Paris, where beeing well receiued, hee enters League with Lewis, to make warre against his Father, and to disquiet him in diuers parts. William King of Scotland is an associate, vpon condition that Henry shall giue him the Countie of Northumberland adioyning vnto Scotland, for his charges in the warres. Henry the father (aduertised of all these preparations) moues not, hoping that reason should reclaime his Sonne, and to this end hee sends an honourable Ambassage to Lewis, and to his Sonne, being in France: the which made them more resolute, an vsuall thing in such as are fought vnto. Elenor adds more to this dissention (great enough of it selfe,) to crosse the affaires of her old husband, with whom shee stood in vey bad termes. Shee doth bandie her two Sonnes Richard and Geoffrey against the Father, causing them to ioyne with their Brother Henry, who is puffed vp wonderfully here-with, hauing his bretheren for companions of his furie. The warre breakes forth amongst them, the Kings Armie enters into Normandie, the which obeyed the Father. Henry the Sonne takes some places, and ingageth some men of warre with great promises, and by great assurances of good, the which was not in his power to performe. Henry the Father (hauing provided for England against William King of Scottes) passeth into Normandie, where laye all the burthen of the warre and Armes with great speede: The coldnesse of his age was chafed by the liuely apprehension of so many indignities. The greatest part of his subiects detested the presump-

A presumption of this Sonne, neither could they allowe of Lewis his proceedings, who had done better in casting Water then Oyle, into this home-bred fire. Lewis besieged Vernueil, and fearing to be forced to raise the siege, vnder colour of a parley with Henry, he takes the Towne, and sends forces from other parts into England, to cause new broyles. Richard Duke of Guienne by his Mothers right, makes warre there: but all these vnlawfull attempts haue no successe. The French that passed into England are beaten: & Richard preuailes not against his Father, to whom most of the Citties yeeld daily, & leaue the Sonne. Richard drawne to his duty by the respects of Nature, which cannot be denied, & forced by necessitie, desires to parley with his Father. He is receiued into grace, and deales with his brother Henry for the like reconciliation. Lewis finding Henries disposition, allowes of it. They send Ambassadors of either side. This vnciuill & vnlawfull warre was ended by this accord. That the Father should remaine alone in the Royall authoritie: acknowledged and obeyed of all his sonnes, that he should giue honorable allowances to eyther of them, according to their degrees: That the marriage of Henric with Marguerite the eldest Daughter of King Lewis, should be consummated: and that Alix his other Daughter, should be giuen in marriage to Richard, the other Sonne of Henry, to make an absolute accord. Thus this Tragedie seemed to end with a Comedie: But there shall be change of subiects vpon another Scaffold.

As these things passed in England, Italy was nothing quieter, by the dissentions that were reuiued betwixt the Emperours and Pope. After the death of Conrad: Frederick surnamed Barberousse, is created Emperour, of whom Histories yeeld an honourable testimonie of his wisdom and valour. Hauing pacified Germanie, he came into Italy, to repaire the confusions bred both by long absence, and the death of Conrad. The Emperour hauing punished the Veronians and the Milanois, had incensed Pope Adrian, who supported them, (the factions of Guelphes and Gibelins beeing confusedly spread throughout all the Citties) so as hee was ready to excommunicate him, when as death stayed this storme, leauing it ready to his successors. The Schisme which grew in the Sea of Rome by these factions, stayed the blowe, some hauing called Victor, as most affectionate to the Emperours partie: others Alexander, as his sworn enemy. To remedie this deuision, Frederick calles a Councell at Pavia, and sends to both the Popes to come thither: Victor comes, and offers to performe what should be decreed. Alexander on the other side makes the old answer (these be the words of the Historie.) That the Pope was not to be iudged by any man liuing, and that hee neither ought, nor would appeare. The Councell being thus dissolued, without any good conclusion; the Emperour for the making of an accorde, intricates Lewis King of France, Henry King of England, and the Kings of Scotland and Bohemia, to meete in some conuenient place for a parley. Dijon was appointed, as bordering vpon the Empire: They meete, but their conference did aggrauate the quarrell. Lewis was wholly for Alexander, who had likewise gained the Venetians, and the greatest part of Italy. The issue of this parley was open force, the which Frederick employed against the Milanois, being the principall cause of this dissention: whome hee did punish seuerely, hauing taken, spoiled, and sackt their Cittie, ruined it utterly, causing Salt to be sowne there, & punishing the authors of this rebellion capitally. Alexander not able to resist Frederick, retires himselfe into France, from whence he planted his battery against the Emperour. The Milanois (sauing what they could in this shipwrack) begin to build their City, vnder the fauour of Pope Alexander, & to make new desseignes against Frederick, who returns into Italy, makes himselfe maister of Genoa, from whence their means came, defeats the Romaines in a pitched field, takes Rome, & causeth another Pope called Calixtus, to be created in the place of Alexander the 3. Alexander saues himselfe at Venice. Otho the sonne of Frederick folows after to take him with 75. galleis. But the chance turned, for he himselfe was taken by Cian Generall of the Venetians, and carried prisoner to Venice. The Frederick grew more mild, & accepted of such conditions of peace as Alexander had prescribed. That he should craue absolutions on his knees, and himselfe should lead his armie into Asia. So as Frederick comes to Venice, and being prostrate at the Popes feet 1171. in a sollempne assemblie, he asketh pardon. The Pope sets his foote vpon his neck, and cries with a lowd voyce: Super aspidem et basiliscum ambulabis. The Emperour moued with this disgrace, answers. Non tibi sed Petro. The Pope replies: Et mihi & Petro. This brauado of Alexander seemed so strange to some of his traine, as Theodore Marquis of Misnia, trembling and gnashing his teeth with choller, was held back by the reines of respect: yet hee runnes to the Emperour and takes him vp. The Pope fearing least these Germanes should offer him some violence, being amazed, casts himselfe about Fredericks neck, whome euen now hee held vnder his seete, beseeching him to preferue him from his traine. The Emperour giues him his word, for hee was the stronger both within the Cittie and without, hauing humbled himselfe for no other respect, but for the reuerence of Religion, and the zeale of publick peace.

This famous acte happened at Venice, in the yeare 1171. in the presence of the Ambassador of the Kings and Princes of the greatest States of Europe, that were Mediators of this Accord. From Venice, Frederick went into the East with a goodly Armie, according to his promise: And the dissention was well pacified by his humilitie, but not altogether suppressed in Italy, for it reuiued afterwards, as wee shall see in the continuance of this Historie. Thus the Christians liued, whilst their enemies preuailed dayly in Asia, to the great and shamefull losse of all Christendome. Such was the estate of the Church and Empire, vnder the raigne of Lewis the 7.

1179. Lewis caused his sonne Philip to bee solemnly Crowned at Rheims, at the age of foureteene yeares, in the yeare of Grace 1179. Hee betrothed him to Isabel the Daughter of Baldwin Earle of Hainault, and hauing thus disposed of his affaires, hee dyed the yeare following 1180. An vnwise Prince, and vnhappy with all his pollicies, leauing a Leuin of great miseries to his posteritie. Doubtlesse the greatest pollicie is to bee an honest man. This assured peace caused the Vniuersitie of Paris to flourish, as farre as those obscure times would permit. Gratian, Peter Lombard, and Comestor, learned men liued in that age. The inexcusable confusion which raigned in the Church, was a iust subiect of complaint to the good, as appears by the writings of Peter of Blois, Thon de Saraburck Bishop of Chartres, and Bernard Abbot of Cisteaux, great and worthy men, Their Bookes liue after their deaths, wherein the wise Reader may see, an ample and free Commentary of this Text, the which the Historie suffers me not to dilate of.

PHILIP

PHILIP the 2. called Augustus, or Gods Gift, the 42. King
of France.

A He title of Augustus giuen to Philip, is worthy of his person and raigne: who not onely preferred the French Monarchie, amidst so many sorts of enemies and difficulties: but enlarged it with many Prouinces, (diuided to diuers proprietaries by Hugh Capet) and vniited them to the Crowne: for this cause hee was also called Conquerour. The beginning of his raigne was a preface of happiness, for there appeared in his face a great shew of a good disposition, inclined to pietie, iustice, and modestie, being strong, quick, vigilant, valiant, and astute. Hee did consecrate the first frutes of his raigne, to purge the corruptions which raigned among the people: Blasphemies, Playes, Dicing houses, publicke dissolutions in infamous places, Tauernes and Tippling houses. Hee made goodly lawes which our age reads and scornes, doing the contrary with all impunitie, but whilst hee raigned they were duly obserued.

B The Iewes were mightily dispersed throughout the Realme, who (besides their obstinate superstition, yfessed excessive Vsurie, and were supported for some great benefit, by the Pope and other Princes and States, where as they haue liberty at this day, to liue after their owne manner. Philip expelled them, although they obtained a returre for money: yet in the end they were banished out of all the territories of the French obedience, and so continue vnto this day. This was a small apprenticeship, and an entrance of much more happy paine, the which hee should vndergoe, both within and without the Realme, in great and troublesome affaires, as a famous subiect worthy of his valour. England, Flanders, and Asia, provided varietie and change of worke to employ his raigne, the which continued fortie foure yeares: but the change of his ans (stake in Asia very miserable.

In the beginning there was emulation who should be neerest to gouerne him. Philip Earle of Flanders, and the Duke of Guienne were competitors. The one as Vnckle to the young Queene Isabell his wife, and named by his Father Lewis: The other as his neerest Kintman, and both the one and the other had great meanes to preuaile: but Richard was the stronger, as well by the Kings fauour, as by the forces of England, of whence he was an Infant, and well beloued of Henry his brother, who then reigned. Behold the King is imbarcked against the Earle of Flanders, by the aduise of his Council: The subiect of their quarrell was for Vermandois, which the Earle enioyed, the King demanded it, being no longer his, by the decease of Alix dead without child-
B dren, and therefore must returne to the Crowne: From wordes they go to armes. Their troupes being in field and ready to fight, a peace was made, with this condition, That Count Philip should enioy Vermandois, during his life, and after his decease it should
C returne to the Crowne. But this peace continued not long among these Princes. The King could not loue his Wife Isabel; It seemes this was the cheefe cause of the dislike the King had against the Earle of Flanders her Vnckle. In the end hee put her away, in the year 1188. from which time Philip loued Richard Duke of Guienne.

But this good agreement continued not long, by reason of another controuersie betwixt him and the English. Marguerite the Daughter of Lewis the 7. sister to Philip, married to Henry of England as we haue said, dyed then without Children. Philip doth pre-C sently redemand his Sister, dowrie, which was the Countrie of Vexin. The King of England is loth to leaue the possession, so as they fall to Armes, and the mischiefe increased by this occasion. Henry, first sonne to old Henry dyed. Richard Duke of Guienne his brother, (who might haue compounded this quarrell) being called to the Crowne, embraceth the action with all eagernesse: And to crosse Philip by an important D distinction, (like to olde Henry) auoides the blowe in Normandie, and enters Languedoc by Guienne into the Countie of Tholouse, renewing the old quarrel he had against Count Raimond. Philip being assailed in two places, is nothing amased: Hauing leuied an Armie with all celeritie, hee enters the English pale. Where he lodenly takes Chastelcaux, Buzareis, Argenton, Leuonx, Montrichard, Montsoreau, Vandosme, with other
D Townes: and passing on, hee batters and takes Mans: and hauing waded through the Riuer of Loire, he presents himselfe before Tours, which yeelds at the terror of his forces. Old Henry amazed at the sodaine valour of this young Prince, faints, and oppressed with grieue, dyes at Chison, in the year 1190. leauing his Realme to his Sonne Richard, but not his Malice: For presently after his Coronation, hee concludes a peace with Philip vpon a cause very honourable to them both.

The Christians affaires in Asia declined still. The Pope perswaded the Kings of France and England with many reasons, and the zeale of the common interest of Christendome, made them resolute. They became good friends, with an intent to make a voyage together to the Holy Land, to the incredible content of all their subiects. But E whilest they prepare for this voyage, let vs passe into Asia, to visit the afflicted Christians. After the fruitlesse returne of the Emperor Conrad, and of Lewis King of France, things went from bad to worse, hauing caused the Christian forces to loose their reputation with the Turkes, being growne proud with this vaine shew of Armes. Baldwin dyes after the fruitlesse attempts of these great Princes: Amaury his Brother succeeds him, who toyled himselfe in Egypt, against Sultan Sarracon, and Saladin his successor: Hee was releued by the coming of Fredericke Barbarosse, who failed not to performe what he had promised to Pope Alexander. But the Christians found small comfort in his coming: The forces of the Empire (which were great) being dispersed by the death of the Emperour. Amaury likewise dyes, who leaues one Sonne named Baldwin, both young and a Lepar, so as hauing voluntarily resigned the charge, finding himselfe vnfit, he did inuest his Nephew Baldwin, the sonne of William Longsword, Marquis of Monferrat, and of Sibell his Sister: and considering the weaknesse

A of his age, he appoints Raimond Earle of Tripoli for his Tutor. Hence sprung a horrible diffention among the Christians: for Sibille (by whom the right came to Baldwin her sonne, after the death of Marquis William) was married to Guy of Lusignan, who was seized of the young Infant. Hee is now his Tutor by force, the child dyes, and B Guy of a Tutor becomes a King, (not without great suspition of treacherie against the Infant) and in the end they fall to warre. Euery one doth strengthen himselfe for this goodly realme; and they are incensed with greater fury, then when they ioyntly made warre against the Infidels. Guy seekes for succour of Saladin Sultan of Egypt, who embraceth this occasion, and runnes with a great Armie to besiege Tiberiades. The Christians assemble and are defeated in a set battaile. The Crosse is taken by Saladin and C carried in triumph. Then was Tripoly deliuered into his hands, and the Earle Raymond found dead in his bedd, when as hee should haue reigned; to teach all men how to trust Infidels. Saladin passeth on, hee seekegeth, takes and sacks Ierusalem, and in this amazement, Pioloimais, Azot, Barneth and Ascalon yeeld vnto him. These victorious conquests of Saladin, were accompanied with great mildnesse to the people whom he had subdued, that by this wise course, the Miscreant might encounter the Christians disorders, by a notable example of vertue. Moreouer, there happened another tragical confusion: Alexis a young man of fifteene yeares, sonne to Emanuel the Emperour (issued from that Alexis, of whom wee haue spoken in the beginning of this Easterne warre) was cruelly slaine by his Tutor Andronicus, and he himselfe afterward, by Isaac, and the people of Constantinople, who had called him to the Empire. Such was the sick estate of the East, when as our Kings were sollicked to go and visit it, in the year 1190.

Philip calles a Parliament at Paris to settle his estate: they dissuade him from the voyage, but zeale transported him, and made him fight with impossibilities: So great efficacy this resolution had to go to this warre, which seemed to be the gaine of their soules health, as the Historie saith, great charges were imposed vpon such as went
D north the voyage, to pay the tenth of all their reuenues, both spirituall and temporall, called for this occasion the Saladins Tenths. Richard King of England came with manie Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, great Lords, and an infinite number of young Gentlemen. The Kings sweare a brotherly and inuolable League: but the continuall and private entrecountre by the way, bred a familiaritie, and this familiarity engendred a contempt, and contempt hatred, as the course of the History will shew. A notable
E lesson for Kings and Princes, to teach them how farre they should conuerse familiarly. Hauing crossed the Seas with some difficulties, in the end they come into Syria. The loss of the Crosse made them to besiege Acon, the which they take very valiantly, after great losse of their men: but the Crosse would not bee found, As the Originall saith.

The plague fell among their troupes: euery one talkes of returning. Philip speakes
F of a returne, and Richard made some diffentie, least that Philip in his labours should attempt some thing in his territories of France. Philip hauing assured him by other returns, and passing by Rome, comes sa'e into France: Hauing left the greatest part of his forces in the East, vnder the command of Odo Duke of Bourgonie. Richard remaining alone, was better obeyed of the Armie, and atchieued great and memorable exploits against Saladin, being already amazed by the taking of Acon. Hee defeated Ozzer and Tassa, hauing repeopled them with Christian Colonies, and G hee was kept from this enterprize by reason of the Winter, so was hee forced to leaue Asia vpon this occasion, and returne into England. During his voyage and Philips, there had passed some kinde speeches, by reason of Alix Sister to Philip, and the wife of Richard, who in great diffidence said: That he had neuer toucht her: & that she should neuer come neere him, blaming her, as if shee had bene prodigall of her honour, by a monstrous Incest with his Father. Notwithstanding all shewes at their parting, 106 I. yet this did sticke in Philippes stomake, who at his returne found his Sister Alix at Saint Germaine in Laie, whether she was retired, expecting his returne, who failed not to seeke all means of reuenge: Richard had left his brother John in England to gouerne the State in his absence. Philippe solicitts him and promisseth him all his meanes, with his Sister Alix (being vnworthely reiecte) for a gage of his loue. But Elenor the mother of these Princes, kept John in awe from ioyning openly with Philip against his absent brother, yet could she not restraine John from giuing his word to Philip, who failes not to seaze courtely, seing his faith plighte and the reuerence of the cause which held Richard from his house would not suffer him to worke openly. So he takes Gisors by intelligence, and all the other Townes of Vexin, which were in controuersie. These newes gaue Richard iust cause to resolue vpon his returne: but it cost him deere, for

Richard makes a truce with Saladin vpon vnreasonable conditions.

Richard King of England staied by the Emperour, & mact to pay a ranome.

Strange marriages of Philip.

An Aduocate vnknowne pleads against the King for his wife Gelberge.

Philip relents and takes Gelberge againe.

Saladin (whom he had kept in awe sence the taking of Acon,) well informed of his necessity & resolution, makes him to buy a truce for five yeares at a deere rate: yeelding him vp all that had beene taken sence the comming of the two kings into Asia, and so the Bloud, Time and Cost, spent in this conquest, were lost in an hower by the ill gouernment of our Kings.

Richard hauing left the absolute comande of the affaires of Asia, to Henry Earle of Campegne, takes his way for England; but as he came to Vienna, in Austria, he was knowne and staied, first by Leopold Duke of Austria, and then by Henry the Emperour, for some discontent he had against him. Thus Richard was retained 22. monethes, and not deliuered but for a ranome of an hundred thousand pounds sterling, which was then a great and notable summe. This was the successe of that long and dangerous Easterne voiage, crossed with so many toyles, takings and yeeldings vp; and with such troublesome consequences for both Kings and both Realmes: for the quarrell ended not vpon King Richards release out of prison as we shall see. Richard being returned into England, he sought all meanes of reuenge for the wrongs he supposed to haue receyued vnworthely of Philip in his absence and calamitie. But let vs returne to Philip, he had put a way Isabel, & taken Alix the daughter of the King of Hungary, who liued not long with him. She being dead, he tooke Gelberge sister to the King of Denmarke, whom like wise he put away, and in her place married Marie the daughter of the Duke of Moravia. After a long and bitter controuersie vpon the repudiation of Gelberge, the king remaining obstinate in his resolution, yet in end he receiued her againe beyond all hope and ended his daies with her, sending backe Marie with honorable meanes to liue in this kind of solitary life, in manner of a widow. But our Inuentry may not excuse it selfe vpon the breuitie of the stile, without reporting the manner which Philip held in receyuing Gelberge after so long and obstinate a sute. The King of Denmarke pursued vehemently in the Court of Rome; for the honor and quiet of his sister reiecte Philip not able to auoid the decision of the cause: And yet resolute not to receiue Gelberge, prepares his Aduocates to shew the reasons which had moued him to put her away.

The cause was to bee pleaded before the Popes Legate in the great Hall of the Bishops Pallace at Paris; thertier they runne of all sides. In this great and sollemne assembly, Philippes Aduocates pleaded wonderfullie well for him against his wife, but no man appeared for her. As the Cryer had demanded three times if there were any one to speake for Gelberge, and that silence should be held for a consent: behould a yong man vnknowne, steppes forth of the presse, and demands audience: It was granted him with great attention. King Philip assitting, euery mans eares were open to heare this Aduocate, but especially Philippes, who was toucht and ranshed with the free and plaine discourse of truth which he heard from the mouth of this newe Aduocate, so as they might perceiue him to change his countenance. After this yong man had ended his discourse, hee returnes into the presse againe, and was neuer seene more, neither could they leame what he was, who had sent him, nor whence he came. The Iudges were amazed, and the cause was remitted to the Councell. Philip without any stay in Court, goes to Horfe, and rides presently to Bois de Vincennes, whether he had confined Gelberge: hauing imbraced her, hee receiues

A receiues her into fauour, and passed the rest of his dayes with her in nuptiall loue. By Isabel he had Lewis, the 8 of that name, whome (during his life) he employed in affaires, and left him the Crowne. But the peace of his house was blemished by these crooked changes, whereby we may obserue by the disquieted mind of this worthy Prince, that there is nothing absolutely perfect in humaine affaires. He which could surmount the infolencies of his enimies, could not vanquish his owne passions. He that could get elie, where, could not preferre that which was most pretious, that is, the peace of his howie and of his bed: and which is more of his soule: who could not liue quietly a midst these comynual debates bred and nourished in his bosome. This was the banker which was prepared for him at his returne, after so many broiles passed in the voiage of the east.

B Flanders and England ministred him matter of troubles all his life time, and he requited his enimies with the like, ouer whome he had victorious aduantages, Balauine Sonne to Baldwin Earle of Huinsault and Namur, called the fourth, and of Marguerit of Alsacia the Heire of Flanders, by the deccasse of her brother Philip, (dead of late in the East,) was then seased of these goodly Seigneuries: whereunto he had added Vernandois, the which he pretended to belong vnto him by a certaine agreement: but in effect it was by the right of conueniencie: the which he had seazed on in Philips absence. who at his returne recouered it from him by force, with the countrey of Artois; the which he gaue to his Sonne Lewis being now growne great, who tooke possession and receyued homage from them of the Country. Moreouer Philip caused Baldwin, to doe homage (as his vassal,) for Flanders and other Lands of the Low countries, noted by that name at Paris, according to the sollempnities required: from thence he marcheth into Normandie, takes Gisors and the Countrey of Vexin, giuing it for a dourie to his sister Alix being put away by Richard; whome he had married againe to the Earle of Ponthieu. But soderly there are complaints from England. That Philip did breake his promise. He replies. That seing his sister was nothing to Richard, there was no reason he should enioye her dourie. But this quarell must proceed farther, Richard, receiues his brother John into fauour, and pardons what is past, so as he will serue him faithfully against Philip, and be no more seduced by his practises. It chanced moreouer that Otho of Saxony, the Son of Richards sister, was chofe Emperour, in his absence, being then in England, fro whence Philip had sentry wares against the King of England: the Earle of Flanders.

D he presently departs, assisted with his Vncles meanes, the which hereafter shall import him much. Richard seing how much Tholouse did import him for his countries of Guienne, enters into a strict League of friendship with Raymond Earle of Tholouse, the a widower by the death of Constance, Aunte to Philip, giuing him Joane his sister in marriage, the widowe of William King of Sicilia.

At these were preparatiues of great warre against France. And could Baldwine Earle of Flanders be well satisfied being intreated as we haue seene Richard ioynes with him. They resolue to make warre against Philip in diuers places, Hauing assembled forces their, Baldwine enters into Artois, Richard into Vexin (contries then in Controuersie) whereby realso the warre should begin, seing the processe was bred there, Philip without any amazement prouids for Artois, sending forces thether vnder the command of his Sonne Lewis. He him selfe marcheth in person against Richard, who beseegeed Coreceile, the which he releued in despite of him. Richard not able to hinder these succors, takes his way into the Contrie of Beauuogin and ipoyles it, Philip doth the like in Normandie. All tends to trouble, by the willfulness of these two Princes: when as the Pope (some say Celestin others Innocent 3.) sends his Noncio to exhort them to peace. This perswasion staied it not, but only made a diersion of their armes: for Richard supposing that Philip could not abide the blow, being engaged in Normandie, he marcheth into Berry, and being assisted with all his forces of Guienne, beseegeeth Yssoudun, hauing wasted and ipoyled all the country. Philip beseegeed Vernon (although the name be diuersly coared Vernon Vernueil or Aumale) he leaues the Towne and flies to Richard to draw him to fight: who finding himselfe to weake retyres to his towne & Philip returnes to his seege, and wins the Towne not withstanding all the attempts of Richard, who now takes breth to seeke his reuenge; but God had otherwise disposed, with whome all Princes ought to account

Warres with Richard King of England.

1223. coumpt for their actions, who laughs at men when they vex themselves most. A During his abode at Limoges, hee was aduertised that one of his men at armes had found a great treasure in the ground. This Souldiar fearing to bee ill rewarded by Richard, flies to a small Towne of Limosin, which the Historie called Caillac or Castin, held by the French: although it were of the Province of Guienne, then belonging to the English. Richard besiegeth it, but as hee approached too neere the walles, hee was wounded with an Arrow in the left arme. His desire to follow this siege, makes him to neglect his wound, which impaires not being drest: He takes the Towne, but the man saues himselfe, hauing hidden his treasure, so as Richard tooke not the treasure which hee hunted after, with a desire so vnseemely for a great Prince, but insted of taking gold, death surprised him, who leauing his lite vpon so light an occasion, leaues a notable example of the vanitie of this world, in the lightnesse of humane spirits, who suffer themselves to bee transported with couetousnesse, a miserable councillor both to great and small. This death did somewhat temper the bitternesse of their dissensions, but it did not quench it betwixt France and England.

Richard King of England dyes.

John succeeds Richard, and makes peace with Philip.

War betwixt John King of England, and Arthur his Nephew.

John murders his Nephew Arthur.

The cure of a cruell warre.

John declared guilty of murder & felony by the law.

Voce Innocentius: reproth his ambicity.

John had right to succeed in the Realme of England, as brother suruiuing the King deceased; but Arthur Duke of Brittanie, sonne to Goffrey the other brother: as wee haue said, pretended the Crowne to belong vnto him, as the sonne of the elder, Eleanor their mother being yet liuing. John was reueined by the English, so as being in possession, he had the better and stronger title. Philip fauoured Arthur, but hee meant to make his profit of the Brothers diuision, and to keepe the stakes. Being fought vnto by John the new King of England, (who had then nothing of greater import then his friendship.) hee concludes a peace with him, vpon condition: That John should yeeld vp all that his Brother had taken in Berry, and neuer pretend any thing of that which Philip had taken Vexin in these latter warres: and that Eleanor (Mother to John) Duchesse of Guienne, should doe homage to the King for that Province, as depending of the Crowne of France. This accord is ratified by a new alliance, the which created no loue. Lewis the Sonne of Angiers, takes to Wife Blanche the Daughter of Alphonse King of Castill, and of Johns Sister, being his Niece. In the meane time Philip fauours Arthur vnder hand, who (assisted by his meanes) takes the Citie of Tours to his great content. Arthur doth him homage presently for the Countries of Touraine, Anion and Maine, and so passeth on and takes Mirabeau, where Eleanor his G and-mother was, resolving to proceed on further, but the Almighty GOD stayed his course. For John comes, besiegeth and takes Mirabeau againe, and Arthur his Nephew likewise.

Eleanor exceedingly afflicted with these diuisions, dyes for griefe, and John puts his Nephew Arthur (whom he held Prisoner) to death, to extinguishe all controuersies, for the title of the Realme: although this death were cloaked as accidentally false out for for. w. Hence springing a cruell Warre: Constance the Mother of Arthur Duchesse of Brittanie, demands iustice of Philip, as her Soueraigne: Philip adiores John, and (for not appearing) hee condemnes him as guilty of the crime imposed, and of felonie, in disobeying of his commandements. Hee proclaimes him an enemy, and doth confiscate all hee held of the Crowne. This sentence is seconded by open force, to make the execution thereof more easie: The Brittons and Poitouins, (wonderfully grieved with this cruell fact) arme and come to Philip. So John abandoned of all, flies to Pope Innocent the third, accusing Philip of the breach of his faith, in making Warre against him. Innocent the third declaring that the breach of faith belonged properly to his authority, and so by consequence carrying himselfe for Soueraigne Iudge of the controuersie betwixt the two Kings: commands both the one and the other, to lay aside Armes, and to suffer the Churches in peace: threatening to curse his realme that should disobey his authority. Philip shewes, that hee hath neyther broken his faith nor peace with John: But that hee being his vassalle, had slaine his Nephew, in the territories of his obedience, as it appeared by good proofes, so as it was not reasonable the holie authoritie of the Church, should serue as a defence or support for

A for his impunity in so detestable a crime, seeing the punishments of subiects and vassals, appertained to the Prince by all diuine and humane Lawes. But there were new complaints to the Pope against Philip: that finding himselfe oppressed with war, he imposed certain tenths vpon the Clergy, to ease the people, who complained of their burthens. He did not exact this of the Church by his owne decree, but had assembled a Nationall Councell at Sossons to that end. The Pope said, this was done against his authority, and not only threatned Philip by his Censure, but also all the Clergy that had assisted at this Assembly. Philip lets him vnderstand; That (touching the Clergy of the Realme) it was necessary that out of their abundance they should helpe to beare the charge for their common preservation: the which hee would discharge when as the necessity ceased. And hauing thus sent backe, the Popes Nuncio, he pursues John, so as in fewe dayes he becomes master of all Normandy, the which had bene deuoted from the Crowne since the yeare 883, as we haue said.

Normandy being thus reduced to obedience, with an admirable celerity. Poitou doth likewise yeeld vnto him. John vpon this Alarm comes to Rachelle, and from thence passeth into Anion, but in vaine. He takes and vnpeoples Angers, and seekes to seize vpon Brittanie, being well garded through the care of their Duke Guy; so as hee knows not which way to turne him: when as sodainly behold new occasions in Flanders, the which he feedes all he can to kindle new troubles, whereby he hopes to finde some rest: but his death shall seale all these toyles, as due punishments for his blind couetousnesse and horrible parricide. He seekes all meanes possible to trouble Philip with the tune of France: Flanders ministers matter by this meanes. We haue formerly spoken of Baldwin Earle of Flanders, after he had done his homage to Philip, he resolves to passe into Asia to succor the afflicted Christians. Hee had two Daughters, Joane and Marguerit, the which hee left in the gard of Philip Earle of Namour their Vncle, with the Kings good lyking; who required the eldest to giue her in marriage to Ferrand of Portugal to the dislike of the Flemings; and in the end he tooke her himselfe, when as he hoped for profit. John employing all his meanes, he first vseth this instrument to oppose him against Philip in his ayde. Otho the Emperor his Nephew ioynes with him in such sort, as France was in great danger of ruine, by so great forces, in so resolute an Enterprise.

Great enemies against Philip.

D Philip takes counsell for his passage into England finding so good successe in his atayres. Ferrand hauing openly in Counsell dissuaded this attempt, shewing it to bee both vniust and impossible, he made many of the cheefe to wauer, ouer whom Philip commanded with great respect, and among the rest, Reginold Earle of Bullen, of whom he had great neede, for his descent into England. Holding him in suspence, he sought to make triall of his faith, offering him a French Garrison, the which he refused; whereupon Philip comes to Bullen, where the people giue him entry, and Count Regnauld (defcouering himselfe) retires into Flanders to Ferrand. The league was great against Philip, being incoumtered by two so great enemies, neighbours and vnitid: but Otho the Emperor swaid most, hauing promised to assist John his Vncle with all his meanes in this warre. But the issue of this great League was not answerable to their desseigne. Philip foreseees this storme, and resolves to prevent it. Hee goes to field, seizeth vpon Cassal, Ypre, and Lisle, and takes assurance of the Cities of Gand and Bruges, employing his sonne Lewis in these exploits, hauing meanes thereby to be in sundry places, by so faithfull a Lieutenant. On the other side, Count Ferrand falls vpon Tournais, and hauing taken Tournay, he crosseth Philips disseignes, John hauing sent an Army to Sea-defeats the Kings Fleete at Dan, and hauing passed into France, he recouers Poitou. In the meane time, the Emperor Otho comes downe with a great and mighty army, in the which they number a hundred and fifty thousand foote, and a notable troupe of horse not specified. There were great Captaines on eyther side. Against the King were Ferrand and Reginold resolute men, who had fury and hope to encourage them. Otho the Emperour brought his Honour with the Imperiall Eagle in the view of all Europe. John hauing intelligence of some stirres in England, retunes with speede, leauing his

A dangerous league against Philip.

1215. army to his Confederats, and providing to send vnto them vpon all occasions. On A Philips side, his greatest aduantage was in his owne person, which did shine like the Sunne. Lewis likewise was there; Odo Duke of Bourgonne, and the Earle of S. Paul held the first ranks. The common souldiers were nothing inferiour to their enemies in courage. Yet the surmounted them in number and expectation of victory: for who would doubt, but the greatest number should vanquish. But the soueraigne Iudge of victories had otherwise decreed; whom Philip had called on, in this extreame danger. He fought to encounter his enemies a part, but God had prepared him a greater triumphe in a greater Combate. The Armies were betwixt Lisle and Tournay, where there was a Riuer to be passed by a bridge. Philip takes it, and whilest the Army passed in their ranks, he sleeps; being awaked, they giue him intelligence, that the Emperor had passed the Riuer at a Foard, meaning to charge him behinde. Philip when he had prayed vnto God (a circumstance very profitablie obserued in the history) meaning to preuent him; he causeth those troupes to turne head which had passed the Riuer, and that with such celerity, as they came vpon their enemies backes. The Combate was furious on eyther side, vnder the most famous Ensignes of the world. On the one side, was the Eagle holding a Dragon in his Talents: on the other side, the Auriflaine or standard of France. The Germaines, Dutch and English, shot at the King, the French at the Emperor. the King was in extreame danger, ouerthrowne vnder his horse, the which was slaine, and rescued by Hugh of Marueil. The fame of which fact, is more honourable to his posterity, then the Lordship of Ville-bois which C was giuen him by the King, in recompence of so worthy a seruice. The Emperor Otho hauing fought valiantly, was in great danger, and had fallen into the Kings hands, as the Earles Ferrand and Reginald did, hauing performed as much as Great and Valiant Captaines might do. But God would punish (both in the Emperour and in them) the rashnesse of an vnecessary war. The slaughter was great on either side: bloud vnjustly spilt through ambition and couetousnes were reprochfull causes of a voluntary losse. The signes of an absolute victory remayne to our Augustus. The Field, Ensignes yea and the Imperiall Eagle, (the which was torne in steed of tearing) the chiefe commanders, the Campe and the dead bodies. Philip added Clemency to this victory of his valour, dismissing all the baser prisoners, and honouring the Nobility with good D vltage, and their liberty. He retained Ferrand and Reginald prisoners, whom he accused of ingratitude and rashnes, to haue rebelled without cause against their Lord and benefactor. he led them in triumphe to Paris, where he made a stately entry, drawing them chayned in Litters, and condemned them to perpetual prison. Reginald to Pyronne and Ferrand to the Loivre at Paris. All France made Bonfires, for this happy successe: and Philip built a Temple in honor of the holy Virgen which de called Victory, nere vnto Senlis. By a decree of the Parliament at Paris, the Earledome of Flanders was adjudged vnto the King as forfeited who gaue it againe to Jane the heyre of the sayd Earledome, being not guilty of her husbands trechery.

This memorabill victory called the battell of Boyuens chanced in the yeare 1215. the 25. of Iuly. To make his triumph absolute, Philip gaue free passage to the Germaines; and Otho the Emperor being returned to his house (willingly resigned the Empire, & died of a pining griefe, which neuer left him after that shamefull flight, hauing willingly fought his owne misery: in supporting wrong against right, and serching danger, to perish in danger. A notable example which shewes; That victories come from the Eternall, that mortall man dies before his time by his owne rashnes, and that no vnjust warre can bee successefull.

But what shall become of John the onely motiue of this warre? while the Emperour, and the Earles of Flanders and Bullen (great Princes whom he had imbarcked) be at warre; hee remains at home free from blowes attending the euent. Seeing his Confederates thus defeated, hee feares the whole storme will fall vpon him, what doth hee? hee playes at Double or Quit, and flies to Innocent the fourth as to his Sanctuary. And being forced to saue his Estate in this extremity, he resolues to giue him

Philip in danger of his life in the battell.

Philip's victory at Boyuens against the Emperor.

Ferrand and Reginald prisoners in triumph.

The Emperor dies for griefe of his losse & disgrace.

A him a good part. The Popes hatred, with the power of France, was the last end of his downe fall. The Pope had excommunicated him, not onely for the parricide of his Nephew Arthur, but for the ill vltage of his Clergie. To purchase to discontinue an absolute, there needed a great satisfaction. He therefore sends confident men in all haste to Innocent 4. humbly beseeching him to pittie him in his calamity. That if it would please him to receive him into fauour, and protect him against the King of France, he would bind the realme of England and Seigneurie of Ireland, to hold of him and his successors, and in signe of obedience to pay him a yearly tribute of a thousand markes of silver. This ranke offer caused John's Ambassadors to be well entertained. Innocent lends his Legat presently to absolute him, to passe the contract, and to receiue the homages of fealty, as well of him (as of his subiects) John is absolved, & hauing laid his Crowne, Scepter, Cloake B Sword and Kings (the royal ensigns of a King) at the Legats feet, he doth him homage for his realme of England, kissing his feete as his tributarie; and binds the English to the like duty by a sollemne oth. He was also willing to discharge that which he had taken from his Clergie. This shalbe the means to make him loose both his estate and life. This hapned in the yeare 1215. These things performed in England, the Legat returns into France, and denoneth vnto Philip in the Popes name. That hee should suffer John to enioyne his realme of England in peace, and freely to possesse the lands which he held by homage of the Crowne of France. Moreover that he should satisfie the great complaints which the Clergie of his realme had made against him, restoring that which he had exacted C from them during the warres, vpon paine of excommunication, if hee did not presently obey. Philip promisseth to submit himselfe: and before the Legats departure, hee frees the Clergie of his realme of the tenths which he had exacted for the charge of the warres, according to the decree of a Nationall Councell held at Soissons.

John liues at peace in England, for that which concerned Philip: but see, hee is the instrument of his owne misery. Being exhault of meanes, through the long and chargeable warres, wherewith England had bene afflicted, hee had bound himselfe to the Pope, to restore vnto the Clergie, all such summes of money as he had extorted from them, during his troubles: and for want of payment, he sees an excommunication ready, the which was reuoked, but vpon condition of obedience. Thus freeing the Clergie, hee surchargeth the people: and pressed by the Pope to satisfie his command, hee oppresseth his subiects, by extraordinarie impositions, and tyrannicall exactions, adding force to his commands. So as it fell out, that as hee could not helpe the one without hurting the other, and that the people hate him commonly, that wrongs them: behold the English make strange complaints in Parliament against John, who doth incense them the more by his rigorous answers. The English seeing themselves reiecte by their King, flie to extraordinarie remedies: and being denyed iustice by him that should giue it they seeke it else where, chosing a King in the place of a Tyrant. France was their onely refuge in these extremities, and therefore they send the chiefe Noblemen of the realme to Philip, to offer him the Crowne of England, promising to obey E him as their lawfull King. Philip (who desired nothing more) makes shewe to refuse it: pretending both the truce made with John, and his worde passed to the Pope, but vnder hand he sends them his sonne Lewis, his faithfull Lieutenant, giuing him a traine fit for his person in so great an exploit.

Lewis hauing taken hostages of the English, (for assurance of their faith,) hee passeth into England, being receiued of them all with great ioy, as the Prince from whom they attended their health and quiet: Hee makes his entrie into London, which was the Rendezvous of his most confident friends, and by their example many Cities come and offer him obedience. In the meane time, complaints come to Philip from Pope Innocent, as if hee had broken his faith: and threats, if hee did not repair it. Philip denies any breach of faith. They bee (sayd he) the discontents of the English against John, whom they accuse to haue slaine Arthur their lawfull King: and hauing treelied to make a new election, they repaired to his Sonne, who was of age to gouerne himselfe, for whose errors hee was not answerable. But attending the end of this sute, let

John makes the realme of England tributarie to the Pope.

John doth homage to the Popes Legat.

John oppresseth his subiects, the cause of his ruine.

The English reiect John and offer the realme to Philip.

Lewis of France receiued by the English.

The Pope sends to Philip for John.

1217. The Pope lends to Philip for John.

let vs returne to England. John held strong places; Winchester (whether hee had retired himselfe) Windsor or Windsor, Norwich and Dover, hee had likewise factions in other Citties. Lewis (having received homage from many of them) commandeth his Armie to marche, to reduce the Citties to obedience, who for the most part receiued him willingly. Norwich yeeldes without any dispute: from thence hee goes to Dover, (having attempted the Captaine by meanes of his brother, whom hee held prisoner,) hee resolues to take it by force, and in the meane time hee beseegeth Windsor by some Noblemen of his partie. John sleepe not, hee makes a vertue of necessitie, employing all his meanes to leue men, and to keepe what remained. But behold an accident which ends both his sure and his life. One of his Capitaines brings him certaine troupes to releue Winchester, where hee attended the siege. but they were charged by Lewis his men. John seeing his people to perish, some by the Sword, and the rest drowned, flying to saue themselves, oppressed in his confidence, not able to endure the reuenging furies of his Nephews blood vniustly spilt, hee falls to adesparring griefe, and shortly after dyes, suffering the punishment of his iniustice and crueltie. Leaving a notable example and president to all men, neuer to hope for good by doing euill, although the offender growe obdurate by the delaye of punishment. This was after eightene yeares patience, during the which John reigned with much trouble, a slave to his furious passions, the which is a cruell and insupportable commander.

King John dies for griefe.

The English change their opinion.

Thus the decree of Gods iust iudgement against John the parricide, was put in execution in the yeare 1217. But this death of John did not settle Lewis in his new royalty, as it was expected. The discontent of the English dyes with John, and the loue of their lawfull Prince reuiues in his Sonne Henry. God limits the bounds of States, which mans striving cannot exceede. The Sea is a large Ditch to deuide England from France: the Pyrenei Spaine: and the Alpes Italy, if audacious Ambition and Couetousnesse would not attempt to force Nature. The English (pleased with his death that made them to languish) cast their eye vpon their lawfull King. The Pope interposeth his authoritie for Henry against Lewis; Who desirous to preferue what hee had gotten, prepares his forces, when as the losse of his Fleete (comming from France to England) makes him to change his resolution, yeelding to reason and time: restoring another man his right and estate, to keepe his owne at home the surer and safer.

The English receive Henry the sonne of John, and dissmile Lewis of France.

Thus Henry the third, the Sonne of John, was receiued King of England, and Lewis returned into France, but Johns posteritie shall bee reuenged of the Children of Lewis, with more and greater blowes then hee had giuen. Lewis (being returned into France) findes worke at home, to imploye him in Warre, which hee fought beyond the Seas. The occasion was to make head against the Albigeois, of whome wee will discourse in his life, and not interrupt the course of this raigne. It is now time to finish this tedious relation of Philips actions, and to shew the conclusion of his life. Hee did confiscate the Earldome of Auvergne, and vnitid it vnto the Crowne, taking it from Guy, being found guilty of Rebellion, this was his last acte. All the remainder of his dayes were consecrated to make good lawes, for the well governing of the Realme. At Paris hee did institute the Pruiost of Marchants, and the Sheriffes, for the politike gouvernement thereof, hee caused the Citie to bee Paued, being before verye noysome, by reason of the dirt and mire: Hee buile the Halles and the Louvre, being beautified since by Henry the second with a goodly Pavilion, and the rest of the new Lodging: Wherevnto King Henry the fourth that now reignes, doth adde a Gallerie of admirable beautie, if the necessitie of his affaires suffer him to Crowne the restauration of his Estate, by the finishing of this great building. Hee walled in Bois de Vincennes, and replenished it with Deare and with diuers other sortes of wilde Beasts: hee finished that admirable and sumptuous building of our Ladyes Church, wherof the foundation was onely layde vnkowne by whome.

Hee

A Hee made lawes against Vsurie, Players, Iuglers, and Dycing houses. An enemy to publicke dissolutions, and a friend to good order and iustice. Hee releued the people ouer-charged by reason of the Warres. Hee restored vnto the Clergie all the reuenues hee had taken from them during his greatest affaires. And thus hee employed this last acte of his life to gouerne the Realme, to the which hee had vnitid a good parte of that which was alienated by Hughe Capet. That is all Normandie, a good part of Guienne, the Earldomes of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, Vermandois, Cambresis, Vallois, Clermont, Beaumont, Auvergne, Ponthieu, Alençon, Limosin, Vandomme, Damartin, Mortaigne, and Anmale. Wee shall hereafter see, how the rest of the Crowne Landes returned according to the diuers means which GOD gaue by the good gouernment of our Kings.

Landes vnitid to the Crowne.

Philip imployd his peaceable olde age in this sort, when as God did summon him to leaue his Realme to take possession of a better. Hee was verye sicke of a quartaine Ague, which kept him long languishing in his bed, giuing him meanes to meditate vpon his death, and to provide for the Estate of his Realme; leaving a good guide, whom hee had leasure and meanes to fashion: yet could hee not make him the perfect heire of his Vertues and Happinesse. Although Lewis his Sonne were not vicious, yet had hee nothing excellent to make him apparent among other Kings. He would not Crowne him in his life time, being taught by the late and neighbour example of the ill gouernment of England, betwixt the Father and the Sonne, finding his forces to faile him by the continuance of this Feauer, hee made his Will. In the which hee delt bountifully with his Seruants, according to their deserts; hee gaue great Legacies towards the Christians Warre in the East, and to the Templers, who were then held in great reputation, to bee verie necessarie for the garde of Christendome: Hee gaue new rents to Hospitalls and to very many Churches.

And so hee died in peace, the yeare 1223. the first of Iulie, in the age of fiftie and nine yeares, beloued and lamented of his subiects. Hee was fiftene yeares old when hee began to raigne, and gouerned forty and foure yeares: hee left two Sonnes, Lewis and Philip, and one Daughter called Marguerite. Vnhappie in his house, and verye happy in his raigne. His minoritie was reasonable good, but his age was verie reuerend, Crowned with all the contents a mortall man could desire in this mortall life, hauing left many testimonies of his Vertues, to make his memorie deere and respected of his posteritie. His estate peaceable: his heire knowne and beloued of his subiects, and of age and experience to gouerne himselfe, and to force obedience. A Prince rightly called Augustus, whom wee may number among the greatest. Hee was most Religious, Wife, Moderate, Valiant, Discreete and Happy, a loue of Iustice, of order, and of policie, friend to the people, enemy to Disorders, Dissolutions and publicke Violence: Charitable, Liberall, and Iudicious to giue with Discretion. To conclude, the Pattern of a great King, by whome our Kings should take example, to learne how to gouerne the Helme of an estate, in the tempests and stormes of manie toyles and confusions, and by the managing and successe of his raigne, to gather this goodly Porcfe, or rather to take this passport for the confirmation and greatnesse of Kings: That a vertuous King is in the ende happie, howsoeuer hee bee compassed in with difficulties. But before wee enter into a new raigne, order requires that wee obserue the estate of the Church and Empire. Fredericks humilie to the Pope, had somewhat calmed the violence of these factions, and his voyage to the Holye Land, to performe his full obedience, seemed to bring a perfect peace to Christendome: when as behold a newe cause of troubles.

Lewis his conditions.

Estate of the Empire.

Frederick going for Asia, had with the consent of the Princes of the Empire, confirmed his eldest Sonne Henry Emperour, but hee being dead, and his Sonne Henry to succede him, Pope Innocent opposed an other Emperour, which was this Otto, of whome wee haue spoken, and did excommunicate Henry in hatred of his Father Fredericks. Otto ambitious of commande, caused Henry to bee murdered in his Chamber. But it chanced, that hauing committed this fact, hee went to receiue that disgrace him.

The Pope opposed against the Emperour.

The Emperour was killed by Otto who succeeded him.

1223. disgrace in France, which was his death: and Frederick the second succeeded him, for as A
Of Italy. he lived when as our Augustus left the Crowne to his Sonne Lewis.

In the meane time the Guelphes maintained the Popes factions withall vehemencie, and the Gibelins that of the Emperour. The Cities swelled with these humors, which distracted their mindes into sundrie factions, whereof grew those cruell contentions, euen in their owne bowels, the which haue continued long with irreconcilable hatred. At Rome, the Vrsins and Sabelles against the Colannois, Frangepans, Cesarins and others. At Florence, the Medicis, Ricci, Bondelons, Amidees, Cerehis, against the Strossi, Saluati, Passi, Albicci and Donati. At Genoa, the Elisques, Grimaldi, Fregoses, against the Spinoles, Adornes, Dorics, and so at Bologna, Milan, Ferrara, Mantona, Luques and other Cities, which by these dissensions haue lost their liberties, and are fallen into the hands of diuerse Princes: Venice was wise in these deuisions, preserving her libertie against both factions, whilst the rest dismembred, and ruined one another. The Popes had still an eye vpon France, to confirme their authoritie there, as they had done in Sicilia and England, not ceasing vpon euery light occasion to censure it, or to threaten it with their censures. But our Kings by the wise Councell of their Parliament at Paris restrained them: not suffering them to vsurpe any thing ouer their royall prerogatiue, and the libertie of the French Church. But howsoeuer (the Imperiall State being made subiect to the Pope) the way was easie to draw all the Kings and Princes of Christendome to obedience: and to aduance their throne about the rest. Their great reuenues, and the shew of their stately and sumptuous traine, kept the people in obedience: but the deuoute respect of religion (the strictest bond to tye soules) was the fundamentall support of this soueraigne authoritie: the which not being limited within the bounds of mortall life, without doubt struck an vnauoidable terror into mens consciences, ouer which it had power. So as the Pope gaue lawe to all men, and who soeuer obeyed not what they commanded, he was excommunicated by this spirituall authoritie of the Keyes, which they say doe open and shut Paradice, binde and loose sinnes. This beleefe setled in the mindes of Christians, bred a great deuotion and respect in them, and did minister daily new meanes to encrease it. At that time sprung vp many orders of religious Friars and Monkes, and out of S. Bernards Schoole (very famous in those times) from this streame grew two branches. One was called The poore in Lions, the other the humble of Italy: which hued of Almes, and conuersed with other men, expounding the Scriptures, and reproving the abuses of the Church, with the like zeale and libertie as we see at this day in the writings of S. Bernard.

This free and plaine reprehension displeased the Pope, who suppressed these two orders with his censures: and confining the disciples of S. Bernard to Cisteraux, he confirmed 4. new orders of religions. The Franciscans instituted by Francis an Italian, the Iacobins by Dominick a Spaniard: Carmelites by Albert Patriarke of Ierusalem, & the Augustines by Innocent the third. The Vniuersities of France, Germanie and Italy, were carefully entertained, by meanes of the great reuenues of the Church, to settle and augment the Popes authoritie, the which was mightily encreased, by the diligence and dexteritie of such as instructed the youth, easie to receiue such impressions as were giuen them, especially their teachers, hauing great power ouer their soules. Such was the estate both of the Empire and of the Church, when as Lewis the 8. entred the royall throne, after the decease of his father Philip Augustus.

Lewis the eight, Father to Saint Lewis the 43. King of France

A LEWIS was thirty yeares old when he beganne to raigne, in the year 1223. & was crowned with his wife Blanch being then the mother of many children. Hee diid in the year 1226. hauing reigned but three yeares, neither noted for his vices, nor comended for his vertues: only famous in that, He was Sonne to an excellent father, & father to an excellent Sonne: bearing his name, not being famous inough of himselfe. His father employed him confidently but with small successe. He desiqueted England, but reaped no benifit. That which is most remarkable in his raigne, Languedoc (one of the goodliest and richest Prouinces of the French monarchy) began to returne to the Crowne, fro the which it was dismembred by Hugh Capet, and left as an inheritance to the Earles, the means was by the ruine of Coût Raimond chiefe of the Albigensis. B The Albigensis take their name of a diocese in Languedoc, whereof the head is Alby the Bishoprike of this large Prouince, but this name was common to the whole party. for that a priuate impressiō (deuided from the common beleefe of Christians, which hath caused them to be held for heretikes) tooke its beginning with this people of high Languedoc, and so was dispersed into other Prouinces. In this difference of religion we may obserue diuers humors, iudgements and censures. In so great an vn-certainty I will report plainly what is written by the most approoued Authors, not giuing any iudgement (the which belongs to the reader) neither will I shew my selfe passionate in a matter which I report as an interpreter, or truthman. Platina the Popes Secretary. In those daies (saith he) sprong up an heresie at Tholouse, the which (by the care of Pope Innocent) S. Dominik suppressed, with exceeding great diligence, with the helpe of Simon Montfort, in the raigne for they were infierced not only to use disputation of words, but armes also, so great credit had this heresie gotten. Paulus Emilius sayth. The vertue of Dominik was very apparet, in beating downe the heresie of the Albigensis. This infection tooke first footing in the Earldome of Tholouse (of whō the Albigensis depend) & had infected the neighbor Cities. They called our Popes the Bishops of the wicked, & our Church the Synagoge of hel. They contemned mariages, & held that for holy, which is execrable. To ioyne theselues carnally with women without order. They are held enemies of all goodmen: Pope Innocent decreed a holy war against the and sent his Legats 1223. Legats into all partes to exhort them to make war against so execrable a sect. But the Lord of A Haslan (to who this history is much indebted) saith. Although they held bad opinions, yet that did not so much incense the Pope & great Princes against the, as the liberty of their speech, blaming the vices and dissolutions of Princes and of the Clergy, yea taxing the Popes life and actions. This was the chiefe point which made them generally to be hated. King Augustus incensed by the Clergy of his realme (who charged the Albigeois with all kinds of heresies, for that they blamed & detested their vices) intreated Pope Innocent to interpose his authority.

The Earle of Tholouse was the head of this faction of the Albigeois, but hee was not alone. The Earles of Foix and of Comminges, Gaston of Foix and Roger of Comminges, (very renowned men in their time) were of that partie: and Alphonso King of Arragon had ioyned in the same cause with them. The Countreies of Languedoc, B Dauphiné, Guienne, Gascony and Provence were full of them. Tholouse, Carcasonne, Alby, Castelnaud and Castres in Albigeois, Narbone, Beziers, Saint Gilles, Arles and Auignon, are directly noted in this history. The first subject of this tumult was the discontent the people had against the Clergy, discontented with their leude & disordered life: from discontent grewe contempt, and in the end a quarrel, and so open warre.

The occasion of this warre.

The Clergy thus contemned fled to Pope Innocent the 3. who sent the Cardinall of Saint Maria in Porticu, and Nicholas Bishop of Tusculum with Preachers, who went through all the Country but preuailed nothing, for that the Earle did visibly fauour this contempt of his subjects, being transported with the like humor. Vpon the Legats report, Pope Innocent decrees a sentence of excommunication against Count Raymond, C and sends Peter of Chasseauneuf his Legat to publish it, but he was slaine. Innocent wonderfully displeased with this murder, sends Gallon for his Legat, and by him doth command King Philip to arme against Count Raymond and his subjects, as against hereticks and sworn enemies to the Church, and doth likewise command Odo Duke of Bour-gogne and William Earle of Neuers to ioine in this warre. The assembly was held at Paris, whether repaired a great number of the Clergy, and there they resolved vpon a Croisade as against infidells. The Arch-bishoppes of Tholouse, Roan and Sens: the Bishoppes of Lisieux, Bayeux, Chartres, Comminges, Coferans, Lodeux, Beziers, and many Abbots contributed first great summes of money, to quench the fire before it passe farther, Simon Earle of Montfort were vnto Paris a braue and valiant Capitaine, issued from a bastard of Robert King of France) is chosen generall of this army, this was in the yeare a thousand two hundred & ten. The army enters into Languedoc, where the Kings name was respected as their Soueraigne, but the Citties would not open their gates to their enemies army, who (they sayd) abused the Kings authority. Vpon their refusal all Simon threatens to beseege them; Beziers was first attempted, and with such cruell successe, as hauing taken it, the blood flowed by the losse of threescore thousand persons: and in the ende it was spoiled, sackt, burnt and made desolate. All other Townes being terrified, yielded at first summons. Carcasonne held out, but it was taken by composition. That the Inhabitants should depart all naked, onely their priuy partes covered, and halters about their neckes. Castelnaud likewise would not obey, yet in the end it yielded, and Simon caused fifty men to be burned aliue. Alby obeyes without force. E Lauaur by the resolution of Gerarde the Lady of the place, did resist, but the Towne was taken by force, and this woman cast into a well: Amaury a gentleman of the Contry, (who had maintayned the seege against Simon,) was hanged. By these fearefull examples, Castres, Rabastens, Gaillae, la Cause, Puy Laurence, Saint Antonin, and Saint Marcell yeeld; Cahors followes, but Moissie beeing obstinate, was taken and spoiled. This sodaine execution amazed Count Raymond, who hauing excused himself, touching the Legates death, and beeing so neere allied vnto the King his Brother in Lawe, hee attended nothing lesse then an army against him: yea hearing of the Le- uie, and seeing it to march, hee feared not that which was put in execution against his subjects. He conceiued it had been onely to countenance the sermons of S. Dominike who accompanied the army with a notable number of Clergy men. Beeing awaked with so great a losse, hee seekes out all his meanes and friends to oppose them against Count Simon of Montfort, who was wonderfully feared by reason of so victorious a suc- cesse.

Strange executions done by Simon of Montfort.

A cesse. King Alphonso of Arragon, and the Earles of Cominges and Foix, bring him great I 2 r s. troupes. Incouraged by these examples to their preservation, Raymond employes all hee can, his armie (as they say) consisted of a hundred thousand men. As this armie of the Albigeois led by Count Raymond, goes to field to recouer their lost Townes. Simon opposeth himselfe courageously with farre lesser forces, and yet ouerthrew these great numbers with little losse. Alphonso was slaine in this defeat, the taking & sack of Tholouse followed, where there died twenty thousand men by the victors sword. I he Citties of Rouergue & Agenois (terrified with this seuerer proceeding), yielded obedience vnto Simon. I his hapned in the yeare 1215. the place of the bataille is diuersly reported, at Muret or at Mirebeau. After this strange & ruinous defeat, Count Raymond, seeing himselfe spoiled of his possessions, retires into Spaine to the Estats of K. Alphonso, attending means to repaire his affaires in better season. In the meane time Simon doth promise himselfe the property of all Raymonds estates, the which he had gotten with his Sword: but for that it was apparent, that the King of France would hardly grant so goodly a Prouince, taken from his kinsman to one of his subjects. Simon therefore flies vnto the Pope, by whose authority this war was chiefly engaged, & from whom he attended his chiefe recompence, hauing laboured for him. Innocent the 3. finding that Philip (who would not desist in his pursuit against John King of England, notwithstanding his interdiction) would not be moued now by his simple authority, to leaue so important a peece: he assembles a great Councell, meaning to force the King to yeeld vnto his will. The Patriarkes of C Ierusalem and Constantinople were there in person, and those of Antioche and Alexandria sent their deputies, there were 70. Archbishops, 400. Bishops, and 1000. Abbots & Priors. The Emperors of the East & West: the Kings of France, England, Spaine, Ierusalem, Cipres, and other Kings, Princes, and great estates had their Ambassadors. By a decree of this notable assembly Count Raymond was excommunicated with all his associates, & his lands adiudged to Simon of Montfort, for his seruice done (and to do) to the Catholike Church. Philip could not gain say this decree, confirmed in a manner by the consent of the whole world. He therfore receiued Simon to homage, for the Prouince of Languedoc, where hee tooke peaceable possession: but he did not long enioy it: for seeing himselfe inuelted, he began to oppresse his new subjects. An Ele is lost with ouer griping. The D people of Languedoc finding themselves oppressed with this insupportable burthen of Simon, they resolve to call home their Count Raymond, who was retired into Spaine, to seeke some meanes to recouer the possession of his estate. His case was not desperate, for hee enioyed the Earldomes of Vinareiz, Venaisan, and the City of Auignon, places kept by his subjects during these occurrences, whether Simons forces were not yet come. Raymond (being called by his subjects) retunes into Languedoc, accompanied with a notable troupe of Arragonois, being discontented for the death of their King Alphonso. The whole Countrey banded against Simon, hauing him as a vsurper, and detesting him as a tyrant, for doubtlesse vniust & violent things cannot continue. Whilest that Simon seekes to bridle the Citties of his new conquests, leaping from place to place, with an infinite toile, behold Raymond is receiued into Tholouse: by intelligence, & with great ioy of the inhabitants. Simon abandons all the rest, and flies thither: but he finds a stop, for coming to the gates of the City, as he approached neere the walles to parley, he was hurt in the head with a stone, wherof he died. The example of Tholouse made the grea- Simon of t part of the subdued Citties to reuolt. Simon of Montfort left two sonnes, Guy and Amaury: vpon the reuolt of Tholouse, the one seizeth vpon Carcasonne, the other of Narbonne: but Guy was slaine in Carcasonne by the Inhabitants, who were the stronger. Amaury hauing fortified Narbonne, repaires to Philip Augustus, beseeching him to succor him in his necessity. Philip had the Wolfe by the eare: for as on the one side he desired this goodly Prouince for himselfe, rather then for the children of Simon of Montfort, so hee was also restrained by the authority of the Pope and Councell. He therfore sends his sonne Lewis into Languedoc, to reduce the Countrey to his obedience. But he had scarce taken any one Castell, when as his fathers death calls him home. So as Count Raymond & his subjects of Languedoc had time to reuiue their spirits, & recouer many places gotten by Simon. The King of England would neither assist nor send to the coronation of Lewis, although 1223. though he were held as Duke of Guienne. This occasion moued Lewis to warre against him; whereby he got Niort and Rochel: and Sauary of Mauleon Gouvernour for the English, retired to his seruice. This losse made the warre more violent. Richard Earle of Cornwall, brother to Henry King of England, passed into France with a goodly armie; and hauing taken S. Maure, Langon, and Reolle (Townes seated vpon the Riuer of Garonne) and defeated some French troupes, he made way for a truce, which was fauourable for both parties: But especially for Lewis, being desirous to settle matters in Languedoc, the which troubled him, for the daily proceedings of the Albigois: yet was hee loth to labour for another. For this reason he treats with Amaury Earle of Montfort, touching the right he had to that Countie: with whom hee preuailed the more easily, for that hauing lost the greatest part of the Prouince, he was not able to hold the rest with the Kings dislike, to whom hee resigned it, by order of a decree, made by the Pope in the Councell of Latran: and in recompence hee made him Constable of France, with the consent of Pope Honorius. Hauing compounded with the Children of Simon Montfort, hee resolved to winne Count Raymond to his deuotion, and to perswade him to lay aside armes, whereof hee did see the euent to be very doubtfull. His intent was to vnite this rich Prouince of Languedoc to the Crowne. But reason which saith that no man thinks his owne too much: the respect which great men do vsually beare one to another, and the alliance which the house of France had with the Countie of Tholouse, were great restraints for the courtousnesse of Lewis. But how soeuer, he determined to make him selfe the stronger, & to prescribe them a law. To this end he leuied a great Armie, furnished with his Edicts, by the which hee thunders against these poore Albigois, as Heretikes and Rebels. These Edicts were of force, whereas his authoritie was respected. Count Raymond (considering with him selfe the cruell beginning of this warre, and the continuance of the like miserie in these second armes, fearing to imbarke him selfe the third time with a people against his King) is easily perswaded by Lewis to reconcile him selfe to Pope Honorius. Thus Raymond leauing to oppose him selfe, yeelds to Lewis, and perswades the Earle of Cominges (the chiefe agent of his designes) to the like obedience. Thus both of them abandon the people, & go to Rome, they make their peace with the Pope, and leaue the Albigois to the mercie of Lewis, who seeing them without a head, imbrace this occasion to their ruine. High and base Languedoc was wholly in his power, by Raymonds departure. Auignon remained with many other places in the Countie of Venaisin, and in Prouence. He besiegeth Auignon and takes it, from thence he passeth into Prouence, where as all yeelds to his will. The Countiees of Vinaret and Die yeelds without blowes, and many families were made desolate, by the rigour of these Edicts, which did forsake both bodies and goods. The house of Montfort, one of the greatest of Vinaret, hauing followed the Albigois partie (being cursed) makes his peace, by meanes of the Towne of Argentiere, giuen to the Bishop of Tuilers, who enioyneth it vnto this day. These poore miserable people were disperied here and there, and such as remained in the Countie, were forced to acknowledge the Pope, as Soueraigne pastor of the Church. This heat was for a while restrained, but the seeds were not rooted out: as we shall see in the following raignes.

Lewis hauing thus subdued the Albigois, gaue order to suppress them, if they should rise againe: appointing the Marshall Foy of the house of Mycpois, to command his forces, and leauing the Lord of Beauieu for Gouvernour and Lieutenant generall of Languedoc, he tooke his way towards France. But coming to Montpensier in Auuergne, hee dyed in the year 1225. the 27. of October, leauing foure sonnes by his Wife Blanche. Lewis which succeeded him: Robert Earle of Arthois, who dyed in Mores. Alphonso Earle of Poitiers, and Charles Earle of Anjou, who shall be Earle of Prouence, and King of Sicilia and Ierusalem. In this year the Flemings were much disquieted by meanes of an Impostor, who said he was their Prince: but hee receiued condigne punishment for his rashnesse, and by his death this error vanished, wherewith many had bene bewitched. Lewis the eldest sonne of France, succeeding his father, goes now to sit in the royall Throne.

Lewis the 9. called Saint Lewis, the 44. King of France.

HE piety and good disposition of this Prince, consecrated to the happy memory of his posterity, represented vnto France goodly first fruites: but his age (not yet capable to gouerne the helme of this Monarchie: (suffred him onely to take the first and most precious gage of his lawfull and hereditarie right: for being but twelue yeares old, he was crowned at Rheims, but his mother Blanche (a wise and couragious Princessse) tooke vpon her the gouernment of his person and Realme: according to the decree of Lewis the 8. who knowing her capacitie, had appointed her for Regent.

He began to raigne in the year 1227. Blanche had much honour in the education and instruction of her Sonne, the which purchased her the free consent of the Estates assembled at Paris to be admitted Regent: but this was not pleasing to the Princes of the bloud: who pretended this prerogative to appertaine vnto them; and not to a woman and a stranger borne. From these discontents, sprung two warres in France, in the beginning of this raigne, the which were suppressed, not onely by the discretion of Blanche, but also by the wisdom and valour of young Lewis, who then played his parte with so good successe, as he purchased great credit in his youth.

The heads of this faction were Philip Earle of Bologne, Vncle to the King by the Fathers side: Robert Earle of Champagne: Peter of Dreux Duke of Brittanie, and Robert Earle of Dreux his Brother: Princes of the bloud, valiant and factious men, who had imbarke many of the Nobility, vnder a goodly pretext. That it was not reasonable a Spanish woman, (abusing the Kings minoritie,) should gouerne the Realme at her pleasure, and by the Councell of Spaniards, whom she aduanced, reiecting the Princes, keeping back the Naturall French from all preferments. But that which was most to be feared, Blanche regent of the King and Realme.

A Faction in France for the Regent.

1227. feared in this occurrent of affaires, was that Raymond Earle of Tholouse, who had so a great a subiect of discontent against the King (being spoiled of the greatest part of his estate) should ioyne with that partie, and drawe his cousin the Earle of Prouence into the same quarrell: Men which were neither dull witted, nor goutie handed, and who were nothing altered in minde, although they had made a good shew, yeelding to necessity: the which Blanche preuented happily, winning Count Raymond (who now began to rise in Languedock) by the mariage of Isaone his only Daughter with Alphonso the Kings brother, and Earle of Poitiers, vpon condition that Raymond should enioy it during his life, and that after his death the said Alphonso should succeed in the right of his wife, and if they had no issue, the Earldome with all the dependances, should returne to the Crowne as to his first beginning. Thus Languedock shaken at the first by Armes (as we haue said) was honourable vnto the Crowne of France, by this accord, as the Historie will hereafter shew in the raigne of Philip sonne to our Lewis. By the like meanes she drew Robert Earle of Champagne vnto her, a very factious man, and did not onely thereby weaken the party of these discontented Princes thus disioyned, by withdrawing the most sufficient man they had, but also shee employed him against them. There remained a Triumvirate, the which shee deuided. They made a good shew, but Blanche did cunningly countermine them, discovering their actions euen within their Cabinets, where shee found access by money. In the end their practise must breake forth. The Earle of Bologne fortified Calais, and the Duke of Brittaine with the Earle of Dreux, did purposely demand some of the Crowne lands, which they knew well, that Blanche would not yeeld vnto, as Inalienable; whereby they might pretend some colour to rebell. They now go to armes, and at the first seize vpon Saint James of Beiron and of Belesme. Blanche flies to the Maiestie of the King, and threatens these armed Princes to proclaime them rebels, and guiltie of high treason, if they obey not. The confederate Princes answer: That they most humbly beseeche his Maiestie to giue them free access to complaine of his Mother, who abused both his name and his authoritie: Blanche admits them, being well aduertised by the Earle of Champagne, that their intent was, (vnder colour of this parley) to seize vpon the Kings person. Their desire was to haue this meeting at Vendosme, but they had layde their ambush neerer to surprise him by the way. They had advanced their troupes to Corbeil, when as the King parted from Paris: being attired at Mont-leher, newes came that the troupes marched to surprise him. The King retires to the Castell (then being of some strength) and Blanche giues it out that the King is in a manner besieged, The Parisians arme speedily, and goe in great troupes to fetch their King, to make the Leaguers thereby more odious, and to confirme the Queenes authoritie.

These Princes being thus discouered, depart from Corbeil, and enter Champagne in hatred of the Earle, who had forsaken them to follow the Kings partie: But Lewis taking him into his protection, and marching towards them with his men at armes, all their desseignes came to nothing: And yet they had imbarcked the Duke of Lorraine and the King of England in this quarrell. Lewis hauing expelled them Champagne, follows his course, takes Angiers without any contradiction, belonging then vnto the Brittens, and from thence hee marcheth into Brittaine. Terror opens the Gates of all the Cities. The Earle of Dreux leaues his Brother, who (seeing himselfe abandoned of them all (but first of iudgement) confesseth his fault, and doth homage to the King for Brittaine: and by this rebellion, he gets the name of Mauclerc, hauing so ill employed his time, as to suffer himselfe to bee vanquished by a Child and a Woman. These troubles thus pacified (to the dishonor of the Authors) the young King wonne great reputation, and his Mothers wisdom was generally commended, who thought it fitt that her Sonne should see scene of all his subiects. As hee went this progresse, hee receiued homage from all his Nobilitie, and ordained many things according to occurrents. It chanced that hauing erected Poitou to an Earledome, and giuen it to Alphonso his brother: Hugh Earle of Marche, (which lyes within Poitou,) would not acknowledge Alphonso for his Lord: His Wife Isabell, Mother

A Mother to King Henry of England, (who had bene first married to King Iohn) was the motiue; scorning to subiect her selfe to an Earle of Poitou. This ambitious passion was the cause of great Warre: First shee drewe in the Earle of Luignan, vnder the same pretext, (for that there had bene Kings of Ieruusalem and Cipres, issued out of this Noble house) and afterwards the King of England. The first tumult not preuented, had almost surprisid Lewis within Saumur, and this Woman transported with pride and hatred, sought to make him away eyther by poison or sword, kindling the Warre in England by hired Preachers. In the end, after the two armies had made great spoile in Poitou, Xantonge and Angoulmois, both of friend and enemy, a peace was concluded with the English, vpon condition, that La Marche should remaine in France. This was the end of that feminine rage, ridiculous in the issue, but lamentable for the poore people, who alwayes pay for the folly and malice of Princes. Prouence was gouerned by the Berengiers (as wee haue sayd) since the ouerthrow of Lewis the Sonne of Boson: and then in the hands of Raymond Berenger, a fierce and cruell man: who had so incensed his subiects, being impatient and turbulent of themselves: as they had recourse to Raymond Earle of Tholouse his neere Kinman, to install him in their Earles place, with whom they would haue no more correspondence. Being ready to arme, the felicitie of Lewis pacified all. Raymond Earle of Prouence had foure Daughters, Marguerite which was wife to our Lewis the ninth, and Queene of France. Elenor which was married to Henry King of England: Sanchia to Richard his brother Duke of Cornwaile, and Beatrix which was to marry: Daughters of great hapines: hauing had three Kings, and a Royall Prince. The Earle of Prouence would hardly haue bene comprouled by Lewis, but GOD (who meant to plant a generall peace in France, by the hand of this good King) buried Raymond with his rage in one Tombe, taking him out of the world, whome a whole world could not containe. Lewis after the decease of Raymond, pacified the Prouencals, in marrying his brother Charles the Earle of Aniou, with Beatrix the Daughter of their Earle, to their great content: adding (in fauour of this marriage) Marne to Aniou: And since this Charles was King of Sicilia, Robert the younger brother was Earle of Arthois. By this meanes his bretheren remained satisfied, Alphonso being Earle of Poitou and Tholouse, by his portion and mariage. Charles Earle of Prouence and Aniou, and Robert Earle of Arthois, and the Realme continued in happy peace. These things thus happily performed by Lewis, hee employed his care in the reformation of the Realme, beginning first with himselfe and his household: then did he plant Religion and Iustice (the principall Pillers of a State) for the good and ease of the people. Hee lead a life worthy of a King, louing and honoring Religion with much zeale and respect, taking delight in the reading of the holy Scriptures, the which hee caused to be Translated into the French tongue, which I haue scene in a Gentlemans custodie, carrying this title. Hee did great honor Clergie men, being worthy of their places, and was a seuerer censor of them that did abuse it, whom hee charged to liue according to their Canons, and to shew themselves patternes of good life to the people. That they should bee preferred to Ecclesiasticall dignities according to order, in all libertie, and should enioy their reuenues without lett. That the exactions and insupportable charges imposed by the Court of Rome (these are the words of his Edict) on the realme of France, by the which it was mightily impouerished, and which hereafter might be leued, should not in any sort be leued without apparent cause, his expresse command, and the approbation of the French Church. He had a good soule, being iust, sober, modest, temperate in his eating and drinking, in his talke, habits, and conuersation, neither melancholic nor exceeding merry: circumspect, of a good iudgement, staied, charitable, moderate, vigilant, and seuerer in the obseruation of that hee had decreed. And as the Prince is the rule of his house, hee either chose seruants of his owne humor, or else his seruants framed themselves vnto his disposition: so as his Court was like vnto a well ordred Church. His traine was royall and stately, according to the times: but there was nothing superfluous nor lost: so as hee had his Treasurie replenished to giue to such as deserued.

1227. He paid his seruants wel, yet he gouerned his treasure in such sort, as his officers could hardly steale from him, and such as offended he punished with so exact a seruitude, as the rest feared to commit the like. The orders for his treasure are registred in his Ordinances, where you may see them at large. He loued learning and learned men; and delighted to read and heare good workes: tauturing his Vniuersitie of Paris, and drawing the Parisians to loue Schollers: so as in his time the Vniuersitie of Paris had great prerogatiues, as the eldest Daughter of our Kings. The realme was corrupted with the iniustice & extortion of former raignes, by the sale of offices: being most certaine, that what we buy in grolle, we must sell by retails. He did therefore expressly prohibite these sales, and supplied such places as were voide, according to the merits of persons, after due examination, to draw good men, and of vnderstanding, to apply themselves to studie. He punished the abuses of Iudges feuerely, as appears by his orders made to that end. And that which caused him to be much honoured, he gave free audience to his subiects complaints, and especially at Bois de Vincennes, where he tooke delight, and often times (being set vnder a Tree very simply) like a Father giuing his Children counsell. He was a capitall enemy to sutes, commanding the Iudges expressly to doe speedy Iustice; so as sutes were then laide aside, and compromises did end an infinite number of controuersies. But his chiefe care was in sparing, for to ease the people: abating the taxes and subsidies imposed on them by his Predecessors: and he did so husband the publike revenues, as he had sufficient for his taine and his great affaires, and yet a surplusage to releue poore Widowes and Orphelins, to feed and instruct Children, marry their Daughters, cure the diseased, and the remainder was to build Churches. There are many in this great City of Paris and about it, built or repaired by him. But he said, that the chiefe Stones of Gods Temple were liuing, and they must rather beautifie the Church with good manners then rich wallies: words which he had learned out of S. Bernard. But these Christian-like vertues were lodged in a royall brest, fit for the gouernment of this royall estate, Heroike, Valiant, Wise, and A true. Yet Lewis was more inclined to peace then Warre, louing better a good and fruitfull rest, then the doubtfull and turbulent euents of Waire. God likewise sent a greater peace to his Realme, then vnder any King that euer liued: and with so great authoritie and obedience, as there was neither great nor small, but held himselfe most happy to obey so good and happy a Prince. Hee was likewise well garded, for all his Subiects were his garde, and hee enjoyed the peoples hearts by good vsage. The people called him Father, the Nobilitie their Head, Religion her Defendor, the Church her Protector, the Lawes their Gardien and Tutor: and Armes their Atars, by the terror whereof he kept the most rebellious in awe, both within and without the Realme: For after the pacification of the former troubles, suppressed in the Spring. There was not any tumult within the Realme, neither durst any one mutine against him.

But to crowne these blessings of GOD, the peace of his house was ioyned to the publike. Blanche his Mother had her humours extremely louing the sweete of command: but shee resigned the Regencie to her Sonne, when as hee came to age, and discharged her selfe in open Parliament, to the great content of all men. Lewis and his subiects loued and honoured her much, being generally well respected for the good education shee had giuen the King her Sonne, and the happinesse of her wife gouernment. Queene Marguerite (the Wife of Lewis) was much beloued and respected of her husband, but not so by her Mother in Lawe Blanche, being zealous of the loue which Lewis did beare her, and of the credit shee had in his fauour, and generally throughout the Realme: but shee could wisely beare with the humors of her Mother in Lawe, for the loue of Lewis, a wife and a milde Pinceesse, wholly of her husbands humour, whose Continencie is commended to haue loued none but this woman, by whome hee had fise Sonnes, and foure Daughters, the gages of their inuolable loue. To this good gouernment was added, the strict loue and amitie hee had with his Brethren, and the respect they bare vnto him. Worthy considerations of our Historie, and considerable in our corrupted age.

A The manuscript of these miserable Albigensis adds, That euen as the Pope would haue continued his persecution against them, and that the Marshall de La Foy (so called for that he was as it were the cheefe Champion of the immortall war decreed against the Albigensis) prepared for a new search to roote out the remainders. Lewis would not allow of it, saying, that they must perswade them by reason, & not constrain them by force, whereby many families were preferred in those Prouinces. They called them Valdenses, either for that the greatest part of the retired into the Vallies & Mountains of Sauoy, Vinaretz, Dicis, & Prouince, where the chiefe seed was preferred at Merindol, Lormarin and Cabrieres, or of the name of Peter Valdo, one of their most renowned Doctors, or that the Valles of Piedmont haue preferred the families, from father to sonne vnto this day.

In those times also liued Gulielmus de Saint Amore a Doctor of Paris, and Chanoine of Beauvais, exclaiming both by word & writing, against the abuses of the Church: and namely against this planting of Monks. Pope Alexander pronounced him an heretike, and armed Thomas Aquinas and Bonauenture (men of violent spirits, & well read in Aristoles Philosophie) against him, but hee prevailed against these reprobates. The writings of either part make mention, and the issue of their controuersie is apparent. France enjoyed a perfect and plentiful Peace, when as Italie and Germanie were afflicted with cruell and tragicall dissensions, by the implacable quarrells of the Popes and Emperours, as if they had beene hired to multiplie the miseries of Christendome by

C their importune hatred. The subiect of the old quarrell continued: the Popes would haue Italie, and the Emperours would not yeeld it. Rome (which had beene the head of the Empire,) was then the seat of their Pontificall authoritie, belonging wholly to the Pope, the Emperour hauing no more command there. This vsurpation had beene gotten by degrees, but they pretended the like of the whole Countie, first they would seize vpon what lay neerest vnto Rome, then vpon Calabria, Appulia, and Abbruzzo, euen vnto Lombardie the which they left to the Germanes, French, and Venetians, to contend for, hoping in the end to carry it, after a long strife of the Contenders, who should leaue the possession more easie to their successors. To conclude, in the end the Imperiall foueraignty being banished out of Italie, it was dismembred by diuers Lords, &

D the realme of Naples & Lombardie were made the subiect of long & bloody wars, betwixt the French, Spaniards & Venetians. This raigne was a witnes about thirtie & three yeares of these disorders, by Excommunications, Depositions, Armes, taking and sacking of Cities and Countie, vnder the Empire of Frederick the second, who opposed himselfe against Innocent the third, Honorius, Celestin, Innocent the fourth, Gregorie the 9. Popes, with such Pollicies, Trecheries, and vnkind cruelties, as I am ashamed to set to viewe these scandales of Christendome, whilest that our dissensions doe settle a free Empire for the blasphemies of Mahomet in the East. As the Popes proiects were to become absolute masters of Italie, so their ordinarie course was to flie vnto France when they felt themselves the weaker to vse their meanes in necessitie, and to vsurpe vpon them by all occasions, as wee haue seene, and shall see by that which followes.

To Otho the Emperour (who wilfully went to seeke his owne ruine in France) succeeded this Frederick the second, grand-child to Frederick Barbarossa, of whom we haue spoken: a Generous, wife, and Learned Prince, who being scarce seated in the Empire, (hauing giuen Innocent the third the Earledome of Fondi in the realme of Naples, to bee proclaymed Emperour) when as Honorius successor to Innocent the third, caused a part of Tuscanie and Apulia to bee surprised by certaine Noblemen of the Countie, esteeming the conquest the more easie, for that Frederick was newly aduanced to the dignitie, hauing neyther courage nor power to oppose himselfe against his surpris, and euen in the fresh memorie of so many affronts which the Popes had done to his Predecessor Frederick. But he was ignorant of his disposition, being resolute not to suffer the Imperiall dignitie to be any thing blemished by him. Frederick goes into Italie, with an army, recouers what had beene taken, and punisheth the rebels.

He did first excommunicate Frederick; then he flies to France, and doth stirre up Henry the Sonne of Frederick against the Father. Frederick begins with the most dangerous, for being seized of this disloyall Son, who would have taken and depriued him of his dignity, he confines him to perpetuall prison, by a decree of the Princes of the Empire.

The Pope draws the French to his succor.

The Popes hatred against the Emperour irreconcilable.

He had happily made a League with Lewis the eight, father to our Lewis, and had renewed it with himselfe, on whose faith hee relied much; but Charles of Anjou Earle of Provence his brother, would bee doing, being desirous to get something. He was easily persuaded with the hope of these goodly Realmes of Naples and Sicilia, which the Pope offered him as the fruites of his labours: so againe the end hee shall come to his ayde, and being King of Sicilia shall expell the race of Frederick. This Tragedie must continue long, they vie craft vpon craft, and whilest one is preparing an other is put in practise. The zeale of the holy Land was the Popes ordinary colour to continue these stormes rayfed by the Emperors; and in sending them farre off, to haue better meanes to contrasie their designs at home, without controule. John of Breyne King of Ierusalem comes, and preuailes so much, as Pope Honorius, promiteth to absolue Frederick the second, so as hee will make a Voyage into the East. Frederick accepts thereof, and presently makes leuiues in Germany for an Army: whilst that he assembles the Estates of the Empire at Cremona, to assure the affaires of Italy in his absence. The place and subiect of the Assembly displeased Pope Honorius, who acculeth Frederick that by his delays hee suffered the Christians to go to rume in Asia, whether he had promised to go, and doth excommunicate him againe. This doth hasten Frederick; hee parts with his army (but without taking leaue of the Pope) and arriues suddenly at the holy Land; where hee strooke such a terror into Sultan Saladin, as he demands a Truce, and obtaines it vpon condition; That he should restore Ierusalem and the holy Land to Frederick, and all the Christian prisoners without any rancome. These conditions duly performed, Frederick victualleth Nazareth, fortifieth Ioppa, and the other Citties of Iudea, being in a good way to settle the Christians affaires. As he labours thus with a commendable successe; the Pope displeased at Fredericks departure without his blessing, and holding it done in contempt of his authority, proclaymes him Excommunicate, and sorte is his Estates. He presently seizeth vpon the Realme of Naples, and rayseth factions in all the Citties of Italy, to cause a reuolt against the Emperour. Frederick, moued with these newes, leaues Asia; and being returned into Italy, he employs the Princes of the Empire to make his peace with the Pope, forgetting the priuate wronges he had done him, and obtaynes absolution, giuing him eleuen thousand markes of Gold to pacifie him. But this accord lasted little; yea it turned into an implacable hatred, which augmented the factions; shed blood, made Citties desolate, buried Frederick and his posterity, and in the end, banished the Imperiall authority quite out of Italy.

Vpon this Accord Honorius dies, and leaues Gregory the ninth, his successor in the same quarrell against the Emperour. Frederick (hauing satisfied the Pope for his priuate interest, and payed very dearly for his authority) sayd, that he could not passe away the rights of the Empire: beseeching Pope Gregory to leaue things, as they had bin before his going into the East, that the Citties of Italy (which had freed themselves by this occasion) might acknowledge the lawfull authority of the Empire. Gregory the ninth, is wonderfully moued with this proposition, and forbids Frederick vpon paine of a newe Excommunication to make any more question thereof, but to leaue the Confederate Citties in their liberty. This was to giue a Lave to the Emperour: to subiect his authority to the Popes command: to giue leaue to the Imperiall Citties to rebell, and to authorise their Rebellion. Frederick much discontented with this answer, and seeing playnely that this was the last farewell of

At the Imperiall authority in Italy, (as without doubt it was) he employed his wit and all his means to prevent the practises of Gregory the 9. who without any dissembling, ought to suppress the Imper all dignitie, in those parts Frederick tries all meanes to cross the Pope, hee sollicit the Gibelin faction throughout all the Citties of Italy, hee leuiues a mighty armie in Germany, and enters into Italy, with a horrible wast Taking, Sacking, and Spoyling the reuolted Citties, and filling all places with fire and blood: Milan, Genoa and diuers Townes of the Duchie of Spoletum, were thus strangely spoyled by violent force, without any mercy, wherein Frederick exceeded the bounds of a iust punishment, the which must bee in the Maiestates hands, as therod in the Fathers, and the rator in the Surgians, to chastise and not to ruine, to cure, and not to kill. Hee shall soone receiue his reward, by his hand who strikes two strokes with one stone, and doth alwayes well when men doe ill, Gregory stood at gaze at Fredericks first entrie; not much moued with the shedding of so much blood, and the sacke of so many Citties ruined, for his quarrels sake, But when hee sees Fredericks conquests to increase, hee straines his witt to find out remedies to stoppe so dangerous a deluge. Hee rayseth some troupes which he calleth holy, but they were to weake to withstand so great a force. Hee therefore sits to Councells (the firme bulwarke of his authoritie,) hee makes a Bull of excommunication; proclaymes him a capitall enemy to the Church, and layes open the causes by a publicke declaration. Frederick continuing his answes, answers the Popes writing by an Advocate of Capua, called John de Vignes: and so giues words for words. But Fredericks forces had preuailed without a better remedie. Here vpon Pope Gregory dies. Celestin succeeds him, who within fewe daies after his election dies, and leaues the Chaier to Innocent the 4. with this quarrell not yet determined. Innocent in the life of Gregory was a Gibelin, and by his death (being chosen Pope) hee becomes a Guelphe as great an enemy to Frederick, as hee had beene a friend, a cunning and circumspect man: who politickly wrought the meanes to vnder doe Frederick. After his election hee sends his Nontio into France, to exhort our Lewis to succor him, according to the ancient proofes of the most Christian Kings to the Holy Sea, and to assure him the better, hee giues him to vnderstand that hee is resolved to come into France, as the most safe retreat of Christendome nowe afflicted. He comes & calls a Councell at Lyons, whether he cites Frederick, but vpon so short a warning, as hee could not appeere. Frederick (hauing sent his Ambassadors to the Councell, to require a lawfull time, and to aduertise the Pope of his comming) begins his journey to performe his promise.

Being arriued at Thurin, he hath intelligence giuen him that the Pope had condemned him as contumax, excommunicated him, and degraded him of the Empire. But this was not without the consent of the Princes electors of the Empire, who after nature deliberation proceeded to a new election.

The thundering Bull of excommunication and depostion is no sooner published, but the Princes Electors choose Henry Landgrane of Thuringe for Emperour: vpon the receipt of these newes, Frederick staies at Thurin, and hauing sent to sound the Germanes mindes, hee findes strange partialities, the greatest part of the Nobility banded against him and resolved to reiect him. Thus hee felt the force of the Popes powre. The proote of this resolution was at hand, for as Henry of Thuringe (the newe elected Emperour) approached to Vlmez, to force them to yeeld to his obedience, and that the partisans of Frederick would not receiue him, hauing besegged the City, hee was wounded with an arrowe, whereof he died shortly after: wherevpon the Princes Electors of the Empire did presently choose William Earle of Holland for Emperour, & at the same times the faction of the Guelphes of Pavia being banished, found meanes to reenter the City, where they made a horrible and bloody massace of Gibelins, with more then ordinary fury in Ciuill mutinies.

He beseegeth Pania, and for that he would not hazard his forces (whereof he might stand in neede, if Germany sayled him) hee resolved to block it, and builds a Fort which he calles Victoria, but hee reckoned ill without him that giues victories; measuring the issue too confidently by the proiect. Thus God confoundes the enterprises of men, when they attribute that to themselves which belongs to his power. This done, Frederick leauing his Bastard Encius to command the seege) takes his way to Lions, where the Councell was yet remaining: with an intent to repayre his affaires, but he is not farre gone, when as newes comes vnto him, that the Inhabitants had made a great fallie, and forced and razed his Fort of Victoria, with great losse of his men.

He returnes to Pania, takes it by force, and did execute that which the outrage lately committed, might moue a Choloricke man vnto, being halfe desperate. But this surpris repayed not his Estate, for in all the cheefe citties of Italy the Guelphs faction was the stronger, through the authority of the Councell of Lions, which had wonderfully disgraced Frederick: first by Excommunications, and then by a ciuill Deposition. Frederick seeing himselfe distressed of all sides (as in great afflictions one mischief calling another, the greatest is to be faint hearted) he suffered himselfe to be so oppressed with griefe, as he falls into a burning feauer and dies, burying in one graue, his Life, his Desseignes and his Imperiall dignity, whereof at that time he was deprived.

Thus Frederick dies: leauing Italy and Germany in great confusion: and Conrad his Sonne, the Successor rather of his miseries then of his enheritance, for seeking to effect that which his Father could not doe, and to preserue the Realmes of Sicilia and Naples to his successors, he lost his Life and both Realmes, hauing trusted Manfroy his Fathers Bastard too much: who poisoned him, notwithstanding hee had appointed him Tutor to his Sonne Conradin, not knowing by whose hand he died. Manfroy seeing himselfe in possession by this Title, giues it out that Conradin was dead, and vnder this goodly title to be the nearest kinsman of the lawfull Lordes. He tooke possession of these two Realmes. The stronger alwayes preuailes in an Estate. Manfroy was master of Naples and of Sicilia, although Conradin had the right, and to assure the possession of what he had gotten, he allies himselfe with James King of Arragon, giuing his daughter Constance in marriage, to Peter his eldest sonne. This was in the yeare 1255. D a remarkable date, for so long a quarrell. Manfroy could not bee heire to Fredericks Estates, but he must withall succed in the hatred the Popes did beare him; the subiect of discontent remaining in those Seigneuries which he enioyed vnder his name. Pope Urban the 4. (who then did hold the Sea of Rome) did excommunicate Manfroy, as a disturber of the Church and of Italy, but finding himselfe too weake for the execution of his decree, he cast his eyes to the place, from whence his predecessors had alwaies drawne assured & timely succors. Lewis our good King of a contrary humour to their turbulent passions, was a spectator of these disorders: but so indifferent, as although the councell of Lions had bene held by his consent: yet had hee done his best endeauor to quench this fire kindled betwixt the greatest persons of Christendom. He could not be moued by the authority or perswasions of Pope Urban, to take away another mans estate, being well content with his owne. But Charles Earle of Provence perswaded by his owne disposition, thrust on by his wife Beatrex (desirous to be called Queene like to her other sisters) & drawne headlong by the shewe of these goodly Crownes, suffereth himselfe to bee easily transported at the Popes intreaty. Hee armes, drawes vnto him a great number of French Nobility; comes into Sicilia, giues battell to Manfroy; defeats and kills him, making him to suffer the punishment of his cruell and wicked purchase, the which he enioyed not full ten years. For Charles Duke of Aniou became maister of these two Realmes in the yeare 1265. and Manfroy was confounded in his vniust desseignes. After the death of Frederick the 2. & the violent elections of Henry of Turinge and William of Holland, (feare retaying some, and fury thrusting on others) the Empire was in effect without an Emperour, being without a guide, by the furies of ciuill confusions, like to a great ship at sea beaten with the wind

A and waues, without Sailes, without Helme and without Pilot. Pope Urban pretended then, that in the vacacion of the Empire, the gouernment belonged to the Sea of Rome. He created Charles of Aniou Vicar of the Empire, and gaue him Tusane, vpon condition to succour the Sea of Rome against the Gibelins and Suenians. So at one instant Charles of Aniou was possessed of the two Realmes of Sicilia and Naples, and the gouernment of the whole Empire. But these two great dignities purchased by the Popes bountie, must be countenanced by his vertues, and this was the meanes.

Conradin the Sonne of Conrade was not dead, as the Imposter Manfroy had giuen it out: but hauing bene patient during these tempests, he had so well managed his hereditarie meanes, as finding himselfe strong, he sought to recouer his Realmes vsurped by Charles Duke of Aniou. Hauing incensed the Gibelins throughout all the Citties of Italy, to drawe them to reuolt: hee leuiues a goodly Armie, with the helpe of his friends, and comes into Italy, hauing in the meane time bred an alteration in Sicilia, where many Citties were taken, and Nocera in the Kingdome of Naples. Conradin accompanied by many Noblemen, which hunted after his doubtful fortune: but the chiefe were Frederick Duke of Austria, and Henry the Sonne of the King of Castile, Charles of Aniou besieged Nocera, where Conradin resolved to charge him. Hauing provided for the siege, he goes to encounter Conradin, and hauing drawne him to fight by a stratagem, hee defeats his Armie, takes him prisoner, and with him Frederick of Austria, and Henry of Castile, with a great number of the Nobilitie. This goodly and C absolute victorie, leading the Commanders prisoners in triumph, should haue beene seasoned with the wise clemencie of our Lewis. But Charles of Aniou his Brother had no portion with him in this excellent vertue, whereby we haue seene, that Philip their Grand-father, (in well vsing a victorie,) did purchase the name of Augustus, and did consecrate it to the honourable memorie of his posteritie. For Charles (hauing these great Princes in his power,) by the Councell of Pope Clement the fourth, beheaded the two first, barbing the Scaffold with the blood of twelue of the greatest Noblemen of the Armie: and coopt vp Henry of Castile in a Cage of Iron, to make him die hourly, causing him to be carryed through all the Citties of Apulia and Beneuent, in a most ignominious sort. D Euen-long. But wee haue wandred enough in the confusions of Italy; Let vs now returne into France, and to our Lewis. Lewis beheld the tempestuous estate of Christendome a farre off: which was the more incurable in Germanie and Italy, for that the sick refused Physicke, and that darkenesse came from them, whence light should haue proceeded. Hee carried himselfe very coldly in the heate of these deuisions, the which he could not redresse; But seeing his realme in peace, and his authoritie firmly settled in the loue of his subjects, and the amitie of his bretheren: fore-seeing also, that by the wisdom of his Mother, hee might salue the inconuenience of his absence, he resolved to succour the Christians afflicted by the miscreants, both in Affrike and in the East. Philip Augustus with the Emperours (which had passed thether one after another) had nothing repaid: their decayed Estate: and the mischief came from the Christians themselves, one opposite to another, the which gaue great advantage to their enemies, as if they had purposely sought to fortifie them. The Empire of the East was in a horrible confusion, dismembered by home-bred deuisions, which drew in the French and the Venetians. One Alexis Ducas called Murziphile, hauing himselfe strangled another Alexis called the young, and caused one Nicholas another Compeitor in the Emire to bee slaine, in the end hee is strangled himselfe. The Theoderis, Ducas and Lascaris being the greatest families) contend for the Empire. In the end Constantinople is taken by the French, and Baldwin Earle of Flanders (of whome wee haue spoken) is chosen Emperour: so as the Empire of Greece is transported to the French, and denided with the Venetians, who at that time carried away the Isle of Candia. So as at one instant there were three Emperours in the East: Baldwin Earle of Flanders at Constantinople: Theodore Lascaris in Natolia in the Cittie of Nicea: and the third was Alexis Comenene at Trebisonde, commanding ouer Cappadocia and Colicida.

1258. All this shall bee a prey to the enemies of Christendome: But let vs returne to our Frenchmen, who leaue the certaine, to runne after the vncertaine. They scarce held this shadow of the Empire three score yeares. Baldwin of Flanders was slaine: Henrie his Brother dyed soone after: Peter of Auxerre his Father in lawe succeeded, rather in his miserie, then in the Empire: For going against Theodore Lasaris the other Emperour, hee was taken and afflicted with the imprisonment of two yeares: In the end he lost his head vpon a Scaffold, leauing the shadow of the Empire to his Sonne Baldwin, too young to gouerne a masse of affaires so confused: So as by the aduise of Pope Gregorie, John of Breynne was giuen him for an assistant. This John of Breynne (of whome wee haue spoken) was a French Gentleman of meane calling, who by his valour (hauing taken the Citie of Tyre) became a Prince, and after in the confusion of times (as the most sufficient of these poore afflicted Christians,) was chosen King of Ierusalem: the which was not yet in his possession: So as finding himselfe too feeble for so waighie a burthen, hee allyed himselfe with this Fredericke the second, Emperour, who hath filled some leaues in our discourse, and made his peace with the Pope, vpon condition. That hee should succour and ayde the Christians in the East. Fredericke hauing recouered Ierusalem, by the truce hee made with the Sultan, (as we haue sayd) left it to John of Breynne his Father in Lawe, and returned into Germanie, to make the end which wee haue before set downe. On the other side, as Christian Kings and Princes laboured what they could to repaire this their decayed estate. Andrew King of Hungarie (the Sonne of Bela) assisted by the Dukes of Austria and Neuers (whose names are not specified) went into the East with a goodly Armie, and (to make worke for the Christian enemies) hee besieged Damiette in Egypt, where being succoured by John of Breynne, after a long siege hee takes it, but it was soone after recouered by the Mammelucks.

Lewis therefore vnderooke this voyage of the East, when as extreame necessitie called him to succour the afflicted Christians. The Popes, Innocent the third, Honorius and Gregorie, had one after another vehemently perswaded him to this voyage: but the affaires of his realme had stayed him from attempting rashly, to settle the generall estate, and ruine his owne particular: Yet being fallen extreamely sicke, hee resolved to delay it no longer, preparing for this expedition vpon his recouerie. Hee assembled his Estates, and by their free consent, left the Regencie of the Realme to his Mother Blanche, who was gladly receiued of all men, vpon the conceit of her first gouernment. Hee parts, accompanied with Alphonso Earle of Thulose and Poitiers, and Robert Earle of Artois his Bretheren, Hugh Duke of Bourgonne, William Earle of Flanders, and Guy of Flanders his Brother, Hugh Earle of Saint Paul, and Gautier his Nephew, Hugh Earle of Marche, the Earles of Salbruke and Fandosme, of Montfort, of Dreux and Archibauld of Bourbon, (very renowned in the course of this Historie, being Father to the Mother of our King now reigning,) the Lord of Toinville, (who hath worthily written this Historie,) Hugh Brun and his Sonne: Gauberd of Apremont, William Morlet, William of Barres, men of great esteeme in their times; the Lordes of LaVoute, Mont Laur, Turnon and Crusol, men of account in the Countrie of Finarez, intould with Count Raymond, who dyed vpon the point of their departure, and the rest passed on. This was in the yeare 1258. about the twentieth yeare of the raigne of Saint Lewis. The Armie consisted of two and thirty thousand fighting men. Queene Marguerite his Wife bare him company in his voyage, but more faithfull then Elener was to Lewis the seventh, the Countesses of Tholouse and Artois did also goe with their husbands, after the Queenes example.

Blanche his Mother bare him companie to Lyons, where Innocent the fourth attended him. From thence hee went to Marfeilles, where hee embarked with the Genoises that were hired by him. His departure was the 25. day of August, to the best voyage vnder heauen. Hee arriued happily in the Island of Cipres, held by Guy of Lusignan, where (attending the rest of his Armie) the plague waisted many of his men, euen of the chiefe of his Court, Archibauld of Bourbon, John of Montfort and others dyed.

A The fame of his Holinesse moued the King of Tartaria to send his Ambassadors vnto him, to offer him his friendship, and to acquaint him with the desire he had to become a Christian. Lewis sends him Preachers to instruct him in the Christian religion: But the Tartarians vnderstanding that the Christians liues were not answerable to their profession, they returne without any better fruite then the shame of their ill life, whose doctrine was so famous. At the releefe of Cipres, Lewis had conference with the Christians of Iudea, where they resolved to recouer the Citie of Damiette, as most riche, and very important for their state. The Mammelucks sought to hinder Lewis his discent, but to their great losse, and also of their Commander the Satrape of Canope.

B Behold Lewis is now landed, and from thence he goes to Damiette, the which hee speedily besiegeth, yet not with so great foresight, but the stranger garrison (hauing made shew to yeeld at the first summons) had meane to make a hoale in the night, and to saue themselves. This happy taking of Damiette, gaue sundry Councels both to Lewis and to the Mammelucks: To Lewis to pursue his victory: to the Mammelucks to defend themselves, and the rather, for that soone after the losse of Damiette, Meledin Sultan of Babylon died, leauing his Sonne Melexala for his successor: a young man of great hope. The proiect of Lewis was to pursue his victory, & to keepe his enemy busied in attempting Caire, the capitall City of Egypt, anciently called Memphis, but the ignorance of these strange places where he was, not onely deprivied him of the fruite of his first conquest, but gaue Melexala meane, not onely to preferue himselfe, but to defeat Lewis his armie, and to take him prisoner. Whilest they attend Count Alphonso his Brother with new forces, and spend too much time vpon the passage of Nilus, behold the miscreants forces flie into Egypt from all parts, to succour the yong Sultan, from Arabia and Siria. The ieaiousies betwixt the Satrapes of Halape & Damas, were by this occasion conuerted into vnion and firme loue, to expell a common enemy, whose victory would proue their generall ruine. Lewis ingaged beyond Nilus, in an enemies country, where he must either vanquish or die: behold a great and mighty armie of enemies against him assembled from all parts. Lewis a braue and resolute Commander, desired nothing more then to employ the first furie of the French in bataille, incouraged by the happy successe of Damiette. But Melexala (who was within his owne Countrie, and prepared rather to defend himselfe then to assaile) resolved to weary Lewis his forces, the which he knew would be more anoyed, by the foggie aire where they were lodged, and by the want of all kind of victuals, then by his sword. The successe answered his desseigne: the Campe is presently full of diseases, & those contagious. The common souldiers, the Nobles, and in the end the King is sick: all is disordered with this infectious sicknesse. The Gards and Sentinels stand in feare, all are amazed. Melexala well informed of their estate, surchargeth them with an other discomodity, he takes from them the passage of Nilus, by the which victuals came from Damiette to the Christians Campe. And to braue these poore sick men (who had neither hands to fight, nor feet to flie) he sends troopes hourly to their trenches to prouoke them, and cuts them in peeces that go to forrage. Lewis who lay in his bed extreamely sick, had nothing but courage to maintaine life, & zeale to die in this holy warre, in the which he had imbarcked himselfe very inconsiderately. And not to giue his enemies all aduantages to braue him thus daily, he makes choise of such as were least sick, being resolute to dye vnder the command of Alphonso and Robert his bretheren.

This poore maimed troope was easily beaten by a fresh and strong enemy. The Kings bretheren were taken. Lewis being then prest daily by Melexala to yeeld, hee giues out hope of recouerie. The conditions were very hard in so great an extremitie. That Damiette should bee restored to the Sultan, all prisoners freed, and eight thousand pounds of golde payed to the Mammelucks to redeeme his life, the which they held as it were in their hands. Lewis payes foure thousand presently, & hauing left the Hostie & the Pix (as a most precious pawne) he was deliuered: but before he returned into France he 1250. he paid the Summe and tooke his pawne, herof it comes that in the Tapistry of Egypt you shall alwaies see the Host and the Pixe for a memoriall of this worthy victorie. Attending the paiement of this summe (verie great for that age) Lewis fortified the Cities of Judea and redeemed prisoners and reliques, being loth to returne into France with empty hands. But these newes were presently brought thither with an incredible celeritie. All things seemed to invite fooles and ambitious men to innovations: but God had leded so great a loue in the hearts of the French to their good King, as they come all jointly to his mother, wonderfully perplexed for her Sonnes losse, (a greife which caused her to die) with as great obedience and respect, as it he himselfe had bene present in his greatest prosperitie. Priuate houses, publicke places, and especially Churches were full of sorrow, teares and vowes, for the distresse of their good afflicted Prince, for the which all found ded out with praiers and deuotion. Their purses were as open, as their hearts, to furnish what soeuer was needfull for their Kings ransom, or his returne, so much was he beloved and wished for of all men. The money is speedely provided, sent and deliuered to theemie, and Lewis returnd into his realme five yeares after his departure, bringing with him Marguerite his deere spouse with the conceyt of the same chastitie he had before. But after his absence he neither found his realme so well ordered as he had left it, nor his neighbour State in any better peace. He began by the reformation of his owne, making constitutions concerning the Church, Iustice and the releefe of the People, against publicke dissoluition, Blasphemies, Stewes, Dicings-houses, Playes and other enormities. He made orders for Marriages, Debts, Impositions, Offices, & benefices the which are containd more at large in the originall Historie, this was in the yeare 1251. The fruits of his voyage and affliction, was that he became a better man: hauing increased in zeale, modesty, wisdom and diligence, better beloved and respected then before his departure: and generally had in great admiration, for his good life and constancy in the midst of greatest dangers, as a miracle among kings: he found his mother Blanche wanting in his house, being dead a litle after the imprisonment of her Sonne, furcharged with age and the greefe of so great an affliction. Lewis hauing ordered the confusions sprong vp in his absence, he imploied the rest of his time and authoritie, to pacifie quarells growen among his neighbours, as the Generall Arbitrator among Christians.

The English rebell against their King.

Lewis reconciles the English to their King.

Division in Flanders pacified by Lewis.

England did offer a notable occasion: The English were revolted against King Henry, vnder the command of Simon of Montfort, a man of great credit, for some discontentments touching their preiudges. By the countenance and conduct of this commander, their complaints are converted into open warre, in the which Henry and his brother Richard are taken prisoners. Lewis exhorts the English to concord, and doth not seeke to nurrish these diuisions for his owne benefit, as his father Lewis had done: Edward Sonne to Henry that was prisoner, giues them an other battaile, in the which Simon of Montfort was slaine, yet his faction dies not, but the warre was reuiued vnder the commande of Guy the Sonne of Simon. Lewis employed his authority so happily, both with Guy and the people (who held his pietie and wisdom in great respect) that hauing perswaded his brother, Charles King of Sicilia to make Guy his Lieutenant (and as it were companion in the conquest of Tuscanie) he was a meane to restore King Henry to his authority, and the people to their liberty with a generall content. Flanders presented him an other subiect, Marguerite Countesse of Flanders (issued from Baldwin father to Jane the wife of Ferrand as we haue said) had children by diuers men. Two by one bed which were held vnlawfull (hauing bene abused either by William her scholemaster (who was a preest) or by Pessard of Auvergne her gouernor, or by both of them, hauing voluntarily yeelded to eyther of them) and three in lawful matrimony, by Guy or Dampierre a Gentleman of Champagne. The two first were the eldest and strongest in credit, whereby must needs growe great troubles among a stirring people, as we haue seene a great combustion of a smaller fire.

Lewis pacified this quarrell without force as the soueraigne Iudge: assigning the Earldome of Hainault to the first, and Flanders to the last, and so ended a sute which in

A shew seemed infinite, and should immortalize a dangerous dissention: holding those children for legitimate, which could not bee reiectd without troubling the lawfull equitie of the cuntry. According to the rule, that a common error makes a iust title. But Languedoc was ready to rise vpon the controuersie of the Earles of Tholouse and Rossillon, both parties were strong, his brother Alphonse on the one part, and James King of Arragon on the other: The question for those lands was the cause. This great familie had diuers branches, and by this occasion diuers diuisions, and so diuers names were giuen to this Prouence, now called the Earldome of Tholouse, sometimes S. Gilles, sometimes Beziers, and other whiles Narbonne, as we shall declare in the Theater of Languedoc. Lewis decreed, that James King of Arragon should enioy the County of Rossillon, and all the rest should remaine to his Brother without controuersie, the which was obserued by them and their successors. Thus this good Prince laboured happily to compound controuersies in notable actions, being carefull to pacifie all sutes among his subiects, and happily hee might haue preuailed in reconciling that great deuision, betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, if zeale to releue the afflicted Christians, had not made him to abandon his owne quiet, with all his good workes, to transport his treasure and life into Affricke, and there to leaue them among the Barbarians. All declined in the East, Mahomet preuailed so, both there and in Affricke, as Europe was threatned by their neighbor-hood. Spain as the neereft, and Prouence and Languedoc by the easie aboard of the Mediterranean Sea. Lewis not able to lye without seeking the aduancement of the Christian religion, resolues a voyage into Barbarie, against the aduise of his estate, and contrary to his owne experience: A zeale which shall succeed ill for himselfe and his whole realme, whom we cannot excuse of indiscretion. Thus he inrouled himselfe the second time, and his Sonne Philip likewise which shall succeed him, with Peter Earle of Alanson, and Iohn Earle of Neuers surnamed Tristan. He left the Regencie to Simon of Neelle, and Mathew of Vendosme, of whose fidelitie he relyed much. Before his departure he made a league with the King of England, to whom he had done many good offices in his great necessity. It was agreed: That the English should pretend no interest to Normandie, nor to the Earldome of Aniou, Maine, Poitou, and Touraine, and as for Guienne, hee should enioy the Countreies of Quercy, Limosin and Xaintronge, vnto the Riuier of Charenton, all which Countreies hee should hold by homage of the Crowne of France, and in this regard he should be Vassall and Leige-man to the King of France. For confirmation of this accord, Edward his Sonne enters into societie of Armes with Lewis, for the voyage of the Holy-land, to marche at the same time. This accord was made in the yeare 1269. and their departure was the yeare after 1270. the first day of May. He parted from Aigues-mortet, and not from Marzeilles, as some haue written, & for that there was no good port vpon the Mediterranean Sea, hee caused the Citie of Aigues-mortes in Languedoc to bee built, and compassed it with goodly Walles, which speake yet of him, and with Channels for the commoditie of the shoare, the largest is called The great Lewis, by his name. Edward takes his course for Asia, and Lewis for Affricke: the French armie consisting of forty thousand fighting men: that of England is not specified. The voyage was short & vnhappy for them both, but especially for our good Prince. Lewis had scarce lost the sight of shoare, and discovered the Iland of Sardinia, when as both he and his whole Fleete had almost perished in a storme. A preface of a mountfull successie. In the end he lands in Affricke (A Countrey worthy to loose that ancient name among vs, and to be called Barbarie, for the barbarous and vnfortunate successie it brought.) Lewis resolues to take Carthage, a new Citie built vpon the ancient name, and held for a strong garrison of the Barbarians. He takes it, but with great paine and losse. From thence hee goes to Thunis, a strong and well garded Citie, resolute to haue it at what price soeuer. But man purposeth and God disposeth: For as Edward, Sonne to the King of England, turned backe from his voyage of the East, hauing passed but to Malta: and Charles King of Sicilia going to ioyne with him, to set vpon the Barbarians of Affricke altogether. In a manner at the same time as they arrived all at Thunis, the plague had deuoured a great part of the French armie, and taken away many Noblemen. And to encrease the mischief, it enters the Kings pavilion, and strikes Lewis, although some say it was a Flux. But whatsoever it be, our Lewis is extremely sicke: and feeling it deadly, hee calls for Philip his eldest sonne, whose age and vertue preferred him to the Crowne. Having given him goodly admonitions, and exhorted him to serve God, to live ver. uouly, and to gouerne his people fatherly vnder the obedience of his lawes, which hee himselfe must first obey: hauing recommended vnto him the loue of his brethren, and intreated all the Nobilitie about him to obey Philip, he yeelded vp his soule to God, to take his true rest in heauen, leauing all his followers in great heauinesse: being the most perfect patterne of a good King, that euer was read off in Historie. He only wanted the happinesse of a good writer, although these small gleans which wee finde in the writings of the Lord of Iouinille make his vertue admirable.

A Prince borne for a testimonie to that obscure age, and for ours which is corrupted: to be a President to all Kings and Princes of Religion, Equitie, Clemencie, Wildome, Valour, Magnanimie, Patience, and Continencie: to Loue, Pietie, Iustice, Order and Peace: to ioyne the loue of holy things, and the modestie of manners, with armes and State. Hauing shewed, that it is very fitting for a King; To be a good Christian, a good Warriour, a good Husband, a good Father, a good Gouernour, a good Iusticer, and to know how to make Warre and Peace. That it is very necessary to ioyne vnto the Maiestie royall, Pietie, Clemencie, and Authoritie, to gaine the Loue, Respect, and Obedience of all men. And to conclude; That the best gaine, and most assured renew of a Prince, is the loue of his subjects: worthy of that venterable name of Holy, wherewith posteritie hath iustly honored him.

He was twelve yeares old when he began to raigne, and gouerned 44. yeares. So hee died in the 56. yeare of his age, hauing received this mortall Crowne in the yeare 1226. and the immortall in the yeare 1270. the 25. of August. Of Marguerite the Daughter of Raymond Earle of Provence, hee had foure Sonnes, and foure Daughters, A Princess worthy of so great a husband, the sole Wife of one husband, and hee the onely Husband of one Wife. His Sonnes were Philip surnamed the Hardie, King of France, Peter Earle of Alanson, Robert also Earle of Alanson (succeeding his brother Peter deceased without Children, and he likewise died without any issue,) and Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauvoisin. His Daughters were Blanche Queene of Castile, Isabell Queene of Nauarre, Marguerite Countesse of Brabant, and Agnes Duchesse of Bour- gogne. So as of his foure Sonnes there survived but two, Philip and Robert. From Philip the 3. called the Hardie, his eldest Sonne, are issued successively cyther from Father to Sonne, or from brother to brother, or from the nearest kinsman, to the next of bloud, Philip the 4. called the Faire, Lewis the 10. called Hutin, Philip the 5. called the Long, Charles the 4. called the Faire, Philip of Vallois, John, Charles the 5. Charles the 6. Charles the 7. Lewis the 11. Charles the 8. who dying without Children, the lawe calles the children of Lewis Duke of Orleans, the sonne of Charles the 6. to raigne one after another. Charles Duke of Orleans, and John Duke of Angoulesme, for Lewis the sonne of Charles raigned vnder the name of Lewis the 12. who dying without issue male, the lawe takes the other branche of John of Angoulesme, so as it sets the Crowne vpon the head of Francis the 1. his onely sonne, and from Francis the 1. to Henry the 2. his sonne, and so in order to Francis the 2. Charles the 9. Henry the 3. his children successively from brother to brother. This direct line ending in Henry the 3. the last King of the house of Vallois: the law calles the second sonne of S. Lewis, named Robert, who giues the royall branche to Bourbons: Out of the which is issued Henry of Bourbon, the fourth of that name, King of France and of Nauarre now raigning: but we will set downe his genealogie distinctly in the end of the royall race of Vallois. It sufficeth to haue noted the order of the following raignes, returning to the course of our Historie.

Thus S. Lewis the 9. liued, and thus he dyed, the honor of vertue in our Kings, leauing Philip his eldest Sonne for his successor.

PHILIP.

PHILIP the third, called the Hardie,
the 4th King of France.

HE authoritie of Lewis was so great, as neither his absence nor his death, could alter any thing in the estate of France. Being dead, Philip his eldest Sonne was proclaimed King in the Armie, and (as much as the time would permit, was received with a generall applause of all men: as hee in whom the Fathers vertue and authoritie was yet shining. The Armie in the meane time is fortified with the Fleetes of England and of Sicilia, so as the Barbarians seeing the whole Countrie in Armes and on fire, they demand a truce, and obtaine it vpon condition. That they should suffer the Christians (which were dispersed in diuers parts of Affricke) to liue in peace. But that which did most presse Philip, was his returne into France. So as hee gathers his troupes together, the remanet of the plague, and of the viciuill vface of that barbarous Countrey, and parts from Affricke into Sicilia, where his losses encrease: for his Wife Isabell dyed there. And his Vncle Alphonfus, with his Wife the Countesse of Tholouse, dyed soon after at Bologne, without any Children, so as according to the contract of marriage, the Earldome of Tholouse should be incorporate to the Crowne. Another sinister accident chanced to Richard the Sonne of Henry King of England (to the end the English might likewise reckon their gaires in this voyage:) for being arrived at Viterbo a Cite of the Popes, walking in Saint Lawrence Church, suspecting no enemy: behold this Guy of Montford the Sonne of Simon (of whom wee haue spoken) kills him in the presence of all his followers, and drawing his Sword, hee makes his way to the Church doore, where finding a Horse ready, he flies into Tuscane: where neither the Pope, Philip nor Charles, were any thing moued. This murder thus neglected

1270. neglected, shall bleed hereafter. But these were not all the occurrences which Philip A had in his returne home. Pope Clement the 4. (borne in Languedoc) being dead, the Cardinals loth to yeeld one vnto another, disagree in the election of a new Pope, and continued in this contention, two yeares, nine moneths, and one day, as Platina reporteth. Our Philip and Charles his Vncle, intreate the Colledge of Cardinals to make an end of so scandalous a discention. The respect of their admonition was not frutelesse: For the Cardinals resolute, that not any one of the Colledge that had assisted at this tedious controuersie, should be Pope. Thibaud of Plaisance Archdeacon of Lege, (being absent in the voyage of the East) was chosen, and called Gregorie the tenth. In the end Philip returnes into France, to the great content of his Subiects. Having interred the dead, his Father, Wife, Vncle, Auncle and Cousine, hee disposed of the affaires of Iustice, according to the instructions and example of his Father Saint Lewis, famous amongst all our Kings. And then hee married with Mary the Daughter of Henry Duke of Brabant: having three Sonnes by Isabell his first Wife, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. But here wee shall not finde the happinesse of our Saint Lewis, for this second marriage was blemished with a sadde and foule suspect. Lewis the eldest Sonne of King Philip, dyed with apparent signes of poison. This mischiefe encrease by the ialousie had of Queene Marie his Mother in Law: and Peter de la Broche (chiefe Chamberlaine to the King, and principall Intendant of his Treasure, being the Queenes fauorite) is accused for this fact, and being prisoner, he confesse the crime, and accute the Queene, as hauing poisoned Lewis by her command. Moreover as one mischiefe commeth not alone: La Broche is found guiltie of Treason, by his owne Letters giuing intelligence to the King of Castile, of the estate of France, being then no friend to this Crowne. This crime alone was sufficient for his death, being hanged: leauing Mary in trouble by his accusation, and by the strange euent: a notable example of the inconstancie of the Court, and the vanitie of the world. Marie denies the fact by othe. The King desirous to bee satisfied, proceedes strangely. For want of common prooffe, hee resolues to learne the truth by a Sorceresse: to whom hee sends a Bishop and an Abbot. This Witche remained in Holland, and was Subiect to the Duke of Brabant the Queenes Father. The Bishop and Abbot at their returne, faile not to absolve the Queene by her report, but they free her not from the generall ialousie of the French, nor in the Kings conceit, who after this accusation, did neuer enioy any rest in his house. These were the beginnings of the raigne of Philip, whose progresse and end shall bee nothing better. His Vncle Charles King of Sicilia, shall crosse his life with many toyles, and end it with perplexitie. But let vs obserue euery thing in order.

The Countie of Tholouse annexed to the Crowne.

As by the decease of Alphonfus and Joane his Wife (being dead without Children) the Countie of Tholouse came to the Crowne: so Philip failed not to take possession thereof, as one of the most important peeces of his Estate: but hee found some alterations there, through the priuate quarrels of his Subiects. The Earle of Foix hauing a notable quarrell with Girard of Casabonne, had taken his house from him by force, Girard fled to the King for Iustice, but the Earle trusting to his Fortes and the mountaines, deluded the Kings commandements, who knew well how to hunt him out of his Rockes, and to send him prisoner to Beaucaire with his Wife and Children, there to digest his felonie, and to teache more mightie Vassalls and Subiects, what it is to dally with their Soueraigne. Having tamed him with a whole yeares imprisonment, and drawne from him proofes of a serious confession of his fault, hee grants him libertie, his Earldome and his fauour, making good vse of him in his affaires. But the quarrell of Nauarre was of greater consequence. Henry King of Nauarre Earle of Champagne and Brie, had married Isabell the Daughter of Robert Earle of Artois, brother to Saint Lewis, and at that time dyed, leauing one onely Daughter his heire named Jane, with his Widow, to whome hee had appointed the regencie of his realme. After the decease of Henry (which was in the yeare 1274.

Troubles in Nauarre.

At Pampelune) the Nobility were greued to bee gouerned by a Woman, shee flies to Philip as to her neere Kinsman. The King sends Eustace of Beau-mais a Knight to assist her with his Councell, the which encreased the discontent of the Nauarrois, who take Armes and beleage the Mother, the Daughter, and this newe Councellor in the Castle of Pampelune, hoping to become Maisters thereof, and to settle the gouernement at their pleasures. Philip hastens thither, releues the Beleeaged, punisheth the Rebels, setleth the Gouernement, furniseth the Forts, and sends Joane the Heyre of Nauarre into France, with the good liking of the Nauarrois, by the assurance which Philip gaue them to make her Queene of France in marrying her to his eldest Sonne. Nauarre continued thus without any alteration wholly at Philips disposition, whose authority was confirmed in all those Prouinces, and his Name grewe great throughout all Spaine.

This worke thus easily ended, an other taske began, which brought much misery to this raigne. The French affaires succeeded not well at Constantinople; we haue shewed into what extremity the successors of Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople were brought, and now behold the last act of this borrowed Empire. Baldwin the sonne of Robert, in the life of John of Breyne his Father in Law, made head against his enemies; so as hauing employed all his meanes, and exhausted his treasure, he flies to Frederick the 2. his Brother in Law, but in vaine: and this was the period of his ruine, for his absence gaue his enemies meanes to attempt, and his fruitlesse labour was a prooffe of his weakenesse at his returne. Michel Paleologus a Lord of the Country, great, both in meanes and courage, after the death of Theodore Lascaris, (of whom we haue spoken) had so managed this occasiō, as Baldwin could scarce enter into Constantinople, to provide for the safety of the City, when he was beleaged by Paleologus, and so hardly prest as he saued himselfe with difficulty in the Ile of Negrepont, and from thence went into Italy, leauing Constantinople with all this imaginary Empire; threescore yeares after the taking thereof by Baldwin the first. Thus the Greeks are repossessed vnder the gouernement of Michel Paleologus who in the end seized on the Empire of the East. But the coming of Baldwin into Italy, was the cause of a long and painefull taske, wherein our Philip was so farre engaged, as he shall leaue his life there, and cause much trouble to his subiects. His Vncle Charles King of Sicilia, shall be the motive, but his owne disposition shall thrust him forward. Philip was a great vndertaker, & oftentimes of other mens affaires; as the whole discourse of his life will shew; whereby it seemes the Title of Hardy was giuen him. Not so discreet therein as his Father, who carried himselfe alwayes coldly and neuter in his neighbours dissentions, but when hee found meanes to reconcile them with mildnes. Let vs now returne whence we parted. Baldwin thus dispossessed of Constantinople, flies to Charles King of Sicilia, a Frenchman to a French: but he had a more strict gage, his Daughter Bertha whom Charles had married after the death of Beatrix Countesse of Prouence. Moreover he addressed himselfe to one, whose spirit was neuer quiet but in Action. A strange man, hee was Earle of Prouence, King of Naples and Sicilia, Vicar of the Empire & Senator of Rome, holding Tuscanie at his deuotion, & almost all Italy: in as great reputation as any Prince of his time, & yet not satisfied. Baldwin arrived presently after this shipwracke, perswading him to hope for better; he tryes all meanes to leuy a goodly army to go into Greece, and to restore him with the rest of the French Nobility to their Estates and Seigneries, whereof Paleologus had dispossessed them: not foreseeing how much more necessary it was for him to gard his newe conquests of Sicilia and Naples, and to keepe his credit in Italy, in well intreating his new Subiects, and imbracing polletikely the Italians loue. As Charles deuised the meanes to attempt, so his enemies sought the meanes to preuent him. They were not small nor fewe in number. Pope Nicholas, Peter King of Arragon, and Michell Paleologus Emperor of Constantinople, but there wanted a Soliciter. There was one found out, proued a notable instrument. John Prashite, one of the greatest men of Sicilia being dispossessed; he employed his whole study to recouer his Estate, by expelling of Charles his capital enemy.

Pope Urban a Frenchman, borne at Troyes in Champagne, had called Charles to these goodly Kingdomes; and contrary wife Pope Nicholas an Italian, borne at Rome, plotted this Tragedie to dispossesse him, although his successor Martin borne at Tours, did fauour him, seeking to restore him againe to his possessions, but it was too late. Such is the ebbing and flowing of the fauour of the Sea of Rome, subiect to receiue diuers persons, and by consequence diuers humors. Peter of Arragon had married the daughter of Manfroy whome Charles had dispossessed of Sicilia (as we haue sayd) and therefore had reason to attempt any thing against Charles for the recovery thereof, holding his title, better then the Popes guift. Michel Paleologus sought to preuent this storme which Charles prepared against his new purchase, and therefore had reason to employ all his forces against him. But that which did most preiudice Charles, was his carriage, and his officers, towards the people of Naples and Sicilia, whome hee discontented by all kindes of excesse, impositions, rigorous exactions of money, intolerancies against their wiues and daughters, and outrages against their persones.

A party made against Charles
King of Sicilia

This vniust and vncast libertie which exceeded in the manners of our men, bred a iust chollier against them, in the mindes of this poore Captiue people, which made them to seeke all meanes to shake off their yoke, and to be reuenged. But they had chiefly offended the Soueraigne Iudge of all the whole VVorld, who neuer suffreth such iniquities unpunished, although hee forbear for a time. Behold the partie is made against Charles from manie places, and executed with incredible celeritie.

John Prochite hauing priuate conference with Peter of Arragon, and knowing the secrets of his heart, goes to Constantinople to Paleologus of whom he was well enter-tayned, and obtayned what he desired, for the King of Arragon: which was the charges of the Army the which was presently to be employed. This plot was layd by Pope Nicholas, a Capitall and open enemy to Charles, from whom he had taken all he could. By the aduice of Pope Nicholas, Prochite (attired in the Habit of a Fryar,) goes into Sicilia, (being well acquainted with all the passages) to incense the Sicilians mindes the which he performed to cunningly as there wanted nothing but force. The designe was to murder Charles with all the French; and to seize vpon Sicilia and all the rest for the King of Arragon; the euent is answerable to the proiect. The King of Arragon leues an Army in the viewe of all the VVorld, but with this supposition, that it was to succour the afflicted Christians in Asia and Affrick, especially after the death of S. Lewis, who had but stirred vp and not suppressed the Barbarians. Philip who was then at Tholouse sent to Peter of Arragon, to know his intent, and to offer him his meanes. He answers, that it is to follow the steps of S. Lewis, a Prince of immortal memory, and to helpe the poore afflicted Christians, resolving to set vpon the Affricans as the neereest: but that his meanes were short, and therefore he desired him to succour him in this great necessity. Philip prouides, with an affection worthy of the publike zeale, and sends him money, vn furnishing himselfe to supply his enemies want. In the meane time Peter of Arragon, and John Prochite loose not an houre, but they employ all instruments and meanes. His Army arriues vpon the Coast of Bon-ne in Barbary, called in old time Hippona, and hauing burnt all the Country neere the Sea coast, he takes Port in the Island of Corsica. John Prochite sleepe not, hauing layd his plot with the principalls of Sicilia, at Palermo and Messina, where the conclusion was of the whole practise and made a conspiracy throughout the whole Country, very attendue to their deliuey; he begins the game in seizing vpon Charles his Gallies and Ships, which lay disperced in the ports of Sicilia, all was easily effected without paine or danger, and this was a signall to the Army.

In one day and one houre all Sicilia riseth in Armes against the French, both Cities Townes and Villages. All are massacred, Men, Women young and old, all ouer-flowes with bloud. This popular fury armed with a shewe of iust reuenge, spares nothing of the French name. This was done in the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand two hundred eighty two, on Easter day at 5. of the clock, when as euery one

As was sitting at supper on this sollempne day, Charles was wanting (being the cheefe ob-lation of this sollempne sacrifice,) but the vndertakers had changed their first resolution, to watch a time to kill him with the rest, fearing least his presence should hinder the execution of their desseine. He was in Tuscane, doubting nothing of this rebellion, which at the first brute must needs amaze him, but hee recalled his spirits, and sought for remedie. Pope Nicholas his great enemy was dead, during these preparatiues. Martin the fourth borne at Tours, held the Sea after him, of an other disposition French by Nation and Humour. But it was too late, the last scale was rong to the Sicilian e-uen-song, he could not preuent it. This misfakel thus performed by the Sicilians, a signall being giuen, behold Peter of Arragon appears in the view of Sicilia, to behold the sport more couertly, giuing daily sonne aduise to Prochite, and to the cheefe of the Sicilian tumult, yet loath to imbarke himselfe rashly with the humor of a people as soone pacified as moued. But being assured that the people (hauing cast the chance) grew daily more resolute, and that they wished for him as their deliuerer, not to loose their good will, and to giue way to his enemies practises, he casts himselfe into the Port of Palermo, where he was attended by all the Sicilians in great deuotion. Charles in the meane time doth what he can; he doth aduertise Philip his Nephew of what had happened, assembles forces in his neere territories, sends into Prouence, to gather what hee could together in all his ports, and beseegeth Messina by sea and land. The fortune of the French is great in their first heat, and had preuailed, if the Sicilians only had withstood them. But the Arragonois was so strong and resolute in his first credit, and the Sicilians in their desire to be freed of the French. So Charles is forced to leaue the Island to keepe the maine land, and Peter of Arragon was ioyfully receiued by the Sicilians, & crowned King of Sicilia in Palermo, in the yeare one thousand two hundred eightie one, the eight of May.

Charles of Si-

at Messina.

Behold the beginning of a tedious quarrell which shall continue long betweene the French and the Arragonois, and shal cause many widows & Orphelins, bringing nothing but miseries to them all. A proceffe betwixt Kinsmen, and Allies, for Isabel the first wife of Philip King of France, was sister to Peter of Arragon, with whom he had liued in great loue, and had three goodly gages, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Oh miserable ambition, and cruel couetousnes, the roots of all mischeefs, which make men vnkind, deprives them of reason, reares out their bowels, and fills the world with a deluge of all sorts of calamities! Two great Kings and old, which should and might liue in peace, now entering into their graues, they lay the foundation of a new life, by their new Conquests, as if they should liue hundreds of yeares, and not content to bee sicke themselves, they infect our Philip with their contagious disease, who imbarke both himselfe and his Children in this quarrell. But the yeare shall not passe before they bee all mombred, and Pope Martin with them, who in stead of casting Water, brought Wood, and Oyle to this Fire, hee shall bee bound vp in the same bundell, to bee cast with the rest into the graue, but let vs returne to our discourse. The quarrell betwixt the two Princes, begins by reproches. Charles complaines of Peter. That during the Peace, hee had against all the rights of neighbourhood, affinitie, honestie and friendship, against the Law of Nations, and dutie of Kings, vsurped and inuaded by detestable Fraude, by Theft, and Treacherie, vnworthie of a Prince, and an honest man, the Realme of Sicilia, giuen him by authoritie of the holy Sea, as a holy gage of the Church. Peter answeres. That Charles is the vniust vsurper, hauing violently rauished the Lands of the Empire from Manfroy the lawfull heire. That hee could not bee ignorant of his right, hauing married Constance his daughter, by whom hee had Sonnes, to whom he could not denie the dutie of a Father, without wronging of Nature.

Peter of Arra-

King of Sicilia

The fruits of ambition and couetousnes.

Thus he opposeth the authoritie of Nature to the Popes power, right to wrong, and reason to passion. Moreouer to this law of nature he ioynes faith, the ground of humane societie, being called and desired by a people vniustly wronged in their goods, liues, and honors. Should hee then contemne their teares, being bound to succour them?

1286. The brute of Peters death makes Giron to yeeld presently, being a very strong City, A and promisseth Philip an assured possession, not onely of the realme of Arragon, but also of Sicilia, where in shew they could not resist: when as behold other occurrents, which mans reason could not prevent. Philip assuring himselfe thus of the peaceable possession of the realme of Arragon, minding to free himselfe of a needlesse charge, he dismissed the Gallies of Genoa and Pisa, the which hee had hired, and for that the plague was crept into his Campe, he had dispersed his forces about the Cities of Genoa and Perpignan, whether he retired himselfe very sick, with an intent to pacifie the whole Countie, hauing recovered his health, and taken some breath. Roger Admirall of Arragon, (of whom we haue spoken) ignorant of Peters death, was parted from Sicilia, with an intent to bring him succours against the French Fleete. Being arrived at Genoa (a newwre Citie, and of free access for both parties) he is informed both of the death of his Master, and of the estate of Perpignan, and being there (of this new accident, he takes a new aduise. In steed of returning into Sicilia, hee hires the Gallies of Genoa and Pisa, dismissed by Philip, and resolves to enter the Port of Perpignan, where he had intelligence, that Philip remained without any great garde, and the Port to bee without defence. He arrives so happily, as without any opposition he giues a signall to the people of his arrivall, who suddenly rise and kill the French in the houses & streetes. Philip lay sick in his bed, and the French Souldiers had no thought of Roger. The King made a vertue of necessity, he encourageth his men with a sicke and feeble voice, and they behaued themselves so valiantly, as they expell Roger out of Perpignan, and Philip held the City, who was so distempered with this alarum, as his sicknesse encreased dayly, and he died the 15. day of October, hauing suruiued Peter but two moneths, in the same year 1286. and in the same moneth dyed Pope Martin the 4. to shew vnto great Princes the incertaintie of their great desseignes.

Philip set vpon what was and danger.

The death of Philip.

His children.

Thus liued, thus reigned, and thus dyed, Philip the 3. surnamed the Hardie, hauing reigned 15. yeares, and liued fortie, a great vnderaker, leauing no memorable act to his posteritie, but a good example, not to deale in other mens affaires. Of his first wife Isabel he had Philip and Charles remaining. Charles was Earle of Vallois, of Alanson, and of Perche, Father to Philip of Vallois, who in his course shall succeed to the crowne. Philip his eldest Sonne was King of France: of the same marriage he had one Daughter, Marie who was Duchesse of Austria. By his second wife Marie, he had Lewis Earle of Eureux, and Marguerite Queene of England. The estate of the Empire (after a long confusion of diuers Emperours, and the interregne) had some rest: the Popes being buried in the warres of Sicilia. Raoul of Auspourg a good and a wise Prince, was chosen Emperour after these disorders: imp'oying himselfe carefully to cure the wounds of Germanie, and held the Empire from the year 1273. vnto 93. The estate of the Church appeares by that which hath bene spoken in this raigne. This onely is particular. That a Councell was held at Lions by Gregorie the 10. where it was Decreed. That to auoide the tediousnesse of the Popes election, the Cardinals should assemble at the Popes death, and keepe the Conclauie, neither going forth, nor conferring with any one, vntill the Pope were chosen. The which is practised at this day.

In those dayes dyed Thomas Aquinas, a very subtill disputer, Bonaventure, Ihon Duns called Scott, and Gabriel Biel (famous men in those dayes) suruiued him.

Philip

PHILIP the fourth, called the Faire, the 46. King of France.

HE found his authoritie respected within the Realme, as well for his age, as hauing gouerned the State with dignitie vnder his Father Philip. A good Prince, Iudicious, and of a noble minde, and (the which was not the least point of happinesse in this life,) he was well married with Joane Queene of Nauarre, whereof he tooke the name of King, before the decease of his father, enioying her as a sweete companion of his complexions. He had three sonnes by her, goodly Princes of body, and excellent spirits, Lewis, Philip, and Charles, which shall bee Kings successiue one after another, but all so ill matched, as it was his greefe to see his childrens houses infected with three Strumpets, and put away without all hope of issue: he hauing severely punished the corrupters of his Daughters in lawe, and confined these infatiate maisties into Monasteries. He had also one Daughter of the same bed, named Isabel, who was married to Edward King of England, leauing vnto France, a heauie and dangerous Leuaine of horrible confusion, by the meanes of her sonne, a fatall scourge to this realme. Philip after the decease of Joane, married Constance the Daughter of Charles King of Sicilia, a faire and a young Princeesse, whom he left great with a sonne, the which was borne eight dayes after his decease, and suruiued him but few dayes. He began to raigne in the year 1286. and dyed in the year 1315. hauing reigned twenty and nine yeares. The entrance of this raigne was goodly, but Flanders, Guisenne, and the Pope, gaue him (vpon diuers occasions, and at diuers times,) many great and painful crosses. He loued Iustice and Learning, wherein he was well instructed for that age: so as he did consecrate the first fruits of his raigne, to honor both the one & the other:

1287. as also the Muses did honour him with a goodly Oration which is read in the Originall of this Historie, for a commendable memorie to posteritie, of the vertues of this great Prince. The Parliament was not tyed to any place, but changed according to the necessitie of Prouinces. Sutes were most commonly iudged definitiue by the Bayliffs and Seneschals, and the greatest causes were decided Soueraignly in the Kings Council, who gaue free audience to their Subiects.

The Parliament of Paris erected.

Philip hauing obserued (by the experience of former raignes,) that it was very necessarie to haue iurisdiction distinctly limited, left a Soueraigne power to his Parliament at Paris (a part of his royall authoritie) in ciuill and criminall causes: and the better to gouerne it, he appointed a sufficient number of Presidents and Councillors, with his Advocate and Proctor, (which number hath bene since augmented according to occasion) and for the greater countenance of this dignitie, hee placed it in his chiefe Citie of Paris: and to that end he caused that great Pallace (one of the most admirable buildings vnder the coape of Heauen) to be built by the meanes of Eugene-rand of Marigny Earle of Longueville, Superintendent of the Treasurie of France. Hee first ordained but two sittings of the Parliament in the yeare, the which necessitie hath made ordinarie vnder Leuis Hutin his Sonne, who also erected an Exchequer at Rouen.

The Palace built.

Colledge of Reauette.

Other Prouinces had their Parliaments at diuers times, and vpon diuers occasions: With like affection he fauoured his Vniuersities of Paris, with all manner of priuiledges: hauing his Wife Joane a companion of the same humour, whom he suffered to build in her name that goodly Colledge of Nauarre, where at this day in this Iron Age, wee may behold with admiration, the great bountie of our Kings in commendable and vertuous actions. These goodly beginnings (in shew the first frutes of a found peace,) were crossed with many difficulties, both within and without the realme. Flanders gaue the first subiect. This Countie is one of the chiefe Seignuries of this Monarchie, and in the yeare 1225. this lawfull subiection was acknowledged at Melun by the Earle of Flanders. In the beginning of this raigne, Guy Earle of Flanders came to do his homage to Philip, who required to haue the Citie of Flanders to ratifie this peace of Melun, the which was performed, but vnwillingly by this riche people, who still complained vnto Philip, that his Parliament at Paris did infringe their Priuiledges, for the which hee wisely provided: but the great securitie of these rich Citie must needs be the cause of their own afflictions, as it chanceth oft, that a rich people, being too farre, seeke wilfully their owne ruine. Guyenne did likewise much trouble Philip, and these two quarrells were intricate one with another, like vnto diseases which come together, according to the times and occasions when they chance. The King of England was Duke of Guyenne since the marriage of Elenor, as wee haue seene: but many difficulties haue fallen out. the accord made by the King S. Lewis, specified by vs, had limited the Seignuries of Guyenne to the English, the which hee should hold by homage of our Crowne: but he could not limit his desire, being watchfull vpon all occasions, to free himselfe from the subiection of France. Let vs follow by degrees, the actions and the order of times, in the combersome report of these new stormes, falling out diuersly, and in diuers places: like as in a time inclined to raine, a Cloud dischargeth it selfe by Planets in diuers parts. The force and neighbourhood of England increased the quarrell, and caused a continuance by diuers accidents. Edward the first of that name, Sonne to Henry the third, liued then in England, and Count Guy in Flanders. Edward came likewise into France, and did homage to the new King for the Duchie of Guyenne, and other lands which he held of the Crowne, as Guy had done for his. It chanced that certaine English Ships scouring along the coast of Normandie, made a great spoile of the subiects of France. Philip vpon their complaints, intreates Edward to cause restitution to be made of that which had bene vniuistly taken by his subiects. Edward neglects it: so as Philip causeth him to be adiourned, to yeeld a reason of this attempt, as vassall to the Crowne. He appeares not, and so by sentence he is declared guiltie of felonie, and of high Treason, and to haue forfeited his interest in all his Seignuries of France. For the execution of this decree, Arnoul of Neele Constable of France is sent into into Guyenne with an armie, in the yeare 1293. a notable date to coate the first letter in this Inuentarie of a very long procelle, although with some intermission, yet so violent, as it had a most ruined France. The Constable doth his exploit, hee taketh Poitiers the thiete Citie of Guyenne, and then most of the other Townes doe willingly yeeld obedience vnto the King. Rions and some other Castels well fortified by the English hold good, to serue as a Leuaine of this waite.

Occasions to renew the war with the English.

Philip sends an armie into Guyenne.

Edward seeing himselfe thus assailed, aimes by Sea and Land. By Sea hee sends an Armie vnder the conduct of Robert Tiptot: By land hee sends some forces vnder the command of John Breton, to preserue that which remained in Guyenne: and to fortifie himselfe with friends in the doubtfull euent of so important a cause: hee makes a

A League betwixt Edward of England & Guy of Flanders, the Emperor and Duke of Bar against Philip.

League with Guy Earle of Flanders, and for confirmation thereof, hee demands his Daughter Philip for his eldest Sonne the Prince of Wales, the heire apparant to the Crowne of England, which the Earle accepts willingly. And to omit nothing that might auail him, hee enters league with Henry Duke of Bar, giuing him Elenor his Daughter in marriage, and with Adolphe of Nassau Emperour, both hauing pretensions against France. The Duke of Bar demanded Champagne of the King, by the rights he pretended, and enters it with forces. Philip sends Gualter of Crecy the Lord of Chajillon vpon Marne against him with a goodly Armie, who on the other side (entering into Barrois) makes a diuersion, and forceth the Duke to returne. to defend his owne against Gualter.

The Emperour brauely giues notice vnto the King, that he will make warre against him, to recouer the Lands belonging to the Empire. Philip makes no other answer, but sends him a packet well sealed vp, in the which was a white Paper folded like a Letter, without any writing. This scoffe was a great desie, as indeed the braueries of Adolphe had no successe. The Earle of Flanders was the neerest and most dangerous enemy to preiudice Philip who had ioyned himselfe to the King of England, by so strict a bond as the marriage of his Daughter. Philip hauing three great enemies in front, tryes his wittes to staye them. The most dangerous was hee that dealt vnder hand, that is the Fleming: who made a good shew to Philip, and yet treated with his most dangerous enemy, but pollicie did circumuent pollicie. The King findes means vnder hand, to giue him notice that hee would gladly see his Daughter, whome hee had Christened, and was called Philip by his name, before he led her into England. Guy brings her with him to Paris, being arrived, he is committed prisoner by the King: The cause is made knowne vnto him by such as had commandement to arrest him. That being his Vassalle, hee had presumed to allye himselfe with a capitall enemy to the Crowne, giuing him so precious a gage as his Daughter. Guy obtaines leaue to speake with the King: Hee excuseth himselfe, but his Daughter remains as a pawne with the Queene, to bee married at the Kings good pleasure. His Daughter (although kindly entertained by the King and Queene,) was full of greefe, lamenting dayly, as if this honourable gade had bene a most cruell prison. The Earle intreates Philip to send him his Daughter: hee answers him plainly, that hee tooke her not to restore her. Herevpon Guy takes occasion to complaine of the great wrong hee pretended to bee done him by Philip, who detaines his Daughter forceably without reason.

Philip seizeth vpon the Earle of Flanders Daughter.

The English in the meane time make open warre in Guyenne. Philip foreseeing that this was the beginning of a greater storme (meaning to lay the burthen vpon him that might doe him most harme) sends a goodly Armie into Guyenne against the English, vnder the conduct of two great Commanders, his Brother Charles Earle of Valois, and the Constable of Neele, to molest the enemy in diuers places. Rions and Ponacac, Townes vpon the Riuier of Garonne, (then strong, but now desolate) are besieged, and after many difficulties, yeeld vnto the King, and in the end Saint Sener, but with more paine. Edmond, Brother to the King of England is defeated at Sea, and retu'ning into England, repaires his Nauie. But strining afterwards in vaine to besiege Bordeaux with new forces, hee goes and dyes at Bayonne, then belonging to the

He flies to the Emperour Adolphe, the chiefe instrument of his hope: and sends him money to leuie an armie. To Pope Boniface the eight, beseeching him to remenber the priuate bond he had to the preseruatiō of England, whercof he was protector. Guy Earle of Flanders ioynes openly with the English in this societie, to make warre against Philip with all his forces. But from these light beginnings sprung diuers occasions which troubled these great Princes. The Fleminge is the chiefe aduancer of this Tragedie, and shall haue his share in it.

A great assembly of Princes against Philip.

Hee calls a great assemblie in the Citie of Gramont, in the yeare 1296. at the feast of Christmas, where Adolph the Emperour, Edward King of England, the Duke of Austria, John Duke of Brabant, the Earle of Tuliers, William of Tuliers his Sonne, John Earle of Holland and of Haynault, Robert Earle of Neuers, William, Henry and Guy of Flanders, John Earle of Namur, and many other great personages meete, and with one consent resolve to make warre against Philip. The colour was to maintaine Guy Earle of Flanders, vniuersally afflicted by Philip, who had violently taken and stolne his Daughter against the right of Nations, and detained her: refusing obstinately to restore her to her Father. It was decreed that Guy should begin by force, and bee well seconded by the Emperour and the English, in case of necessitie. But before they come to Armes, Pope Boniface should make the first point by the luster of his authority. All things threatned Philip with much trouble, but the end will shew that the attempts of man are all but vaine. Boniface (according to the intent of their league) C sends his Nuncio to Philip, which was James Bishop of Metz, to exhort him to doe Iustice, both to the Earle of Flanders and to the King of England, protesting that hee desired nothing more then peace betwixt Christian Princes. Hee sent the same Nuncio vpon the same subiect into England, but with an other intent then hee made shew of vnto Philip, casting Wood and Oyle into this fire, in steed of Water to quench it. But for that this Pope must appeare in many acts of this Theater, wee must obserue his disposition, by some sufficient and not suspected testimonie.

Pope Boniface enters vnto Philip.

Platina in vita Boniface octauus.

Platina the Popes Secretarie: Being (saith hee) a Priest, Cardinal of Saint Martin of the Mount, hee affected the Pontificall dignitie with such vehemencie, as hee omitted neither ambition nor fraude to compasse it, and moreover hee was puffed up with such arrogance, as hee contemned the whole world. Hee reports also, that hee vied a notable policie to circumsent Celestin, being chosen to the dignitie of Pope, a simple man and vnfit for matters of State, hee suborned some one to talke to him in the night like an Angell, perswading him to leaue this charge if hee would be faued: hee preuailes by his practises, and wrought so by subtil deuises, as hee was chosen Pope in his place. Being Pope, hee desired nothing more then to kindle the warre betwixt the Guelphes and the Gibelins, then called Blacke and White, by a name and marke of a faction. Platina coates a singular proofe of his disposition, nothing inclined to procure peace among Christian Princes. Prophet Archbishop of Genoa, affected to the Gibelin faction, kneeled at Boniface seete on A Wednesday. As the Priest is accustomed to say: Memento homo quia cinis es, & in cinerem reuerteris, he sayd (changing the wordes.) Memento homo quia Gibelinus es, et eum Gibelinus in cinerem reuerteris, calling the Ashes into his eyes, where as they are accustomed to cast them on the head, in signe of humilitie and submission. Boniface thus inclined to the peace of Christendome, that is to say (as the Lord of Haillan writes) more puffed up with glory and vanitie, then good zeale to the peace of Christian Princes, hee commands Philip by his Nuncio, to restore to the English and Flemmings what they demanded, and for not obeying, hee cites him to appeare at Rome vpon paine of excommunication. Philip a wife and a valiant Prince, although hee were discontented with this course, yet hee sent an Honorable Ambassage to Rome, by the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Earle of Saint Paul, to lay open his right before the Deputies of the King of England and the Earle of Flanders, who were then at Rome to complaine as being wronged. All parties being

A being heard, Boniface decrees that Philip (as the fountaine and cause of all the miseries and inconueniences which had happened) should yeeld to Edward and to Guy. The Pope makes a decree against Philip. all they demanded, both in Guienne and Flanders, charging the Archbishop of Rheims to signifie this Bull vnto the King, vpon paine of excommunication for not obeying. This was the first blowe giuen by Boniface against Philip: The other Scaene of this Theater shall represent an other acte. But what doth Philip after these great threats? He prepares for deeds, not suffering himselfe to be daunted with words, and tries his witte to finde out meanes to maintaine himselfe against so mightie enemies, not holding it fite nor worthy of a King of France to be terrified with these Cominations from Rome, employed without reason against his lawfull authoritie. So seeking for all helpees, B he resolves to be ready for all euents, holding words insufficient to calme this storme. He layes great impositions (which they call Maletost) vpon his Subiects for the leuying of Souldiars, and imposeth great teuths vpon the Clergie. But in the search of this remedie, hee was incountred with two difficulties: On the one side, his Subiects, charged with the exaction of these great summes, being almost in dispaire, were ready to rebell in diuers places, especially in the greater Citties: And on the other side, Pope Boniface thundred against him by new Cominations and Censures: forbidding the Clergie to contribute any thing. This Prince crossed with these difficulties, continues his course resolutely, as a great worke requires a noble and vndanted spirit: But before he enters warre against Guy Earle of Flanders, he sends the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishop of Sens vnto him, to aduise him not to enter into a C voluntarie warre. That the King was as carefull of his Daughter as himselfe, to marrie her honorable according to her qualitie: That hee did nothing vnworthy of a good King, or a good God-father, in not suffering his subiects to alie themselves to his capitall enemies: the which hee spake not for feare of the Earles forces, or of his friends, but for the care hee had of his Subiects, not to see them runne headlong into ruine, and therefore he presents him the choise of Peace or Warre. Count Guy answers, that hee is resolute to recouer his right by force from the King, seeing hee might not haue it by reason.

Philip prepares to defend himselfe.

The French mutine being furnished.

Philip admonishes the Earle of Flanders of his duty.

Philip invades Flanders and defeats the Flemings.

He seizeth vpon all Flanders.

The Earle of Flanders forsaken by his confederates.

Philip hauing tryed mildnesse in vaine, comes to force. Hee had a goodly Armie, D whercof hee takes the one halfe, and giues the other to Robert Earle of Artois his cousin. Hee turns the head of his Armie against Lisle, and besiegeth it, whilst that Robert defeats the Flemings at Furnes, and takes the Earles of Tuliers and Albmont, with many other of great accompt, and sends them prisoners into France. So continuing his victory, hee takes the Townes of Cassel, Bergues, Saint Winoc, Furnes, and all the West part with an incredible celeritie. The King hauing taken Lisle, hee enters victoriously into Bruges. At this sodaine check, all the rest of Flanders stands amazed. This happy beginning did shake the desseignes of the confederate Princes, so as without any more delay, they sue for peace. Ambassadors come presently vnto him from the King of England, demanding a truce, the which hee granted, comprehending the Earles of Flanders and Neuers: vpon condition they should put their controuersies to compromise: And so he returned into France, leauing Raoul of Neele his Constable, Gouernor of the Countrie of Flanders. This was the first voyage of Philip into Flanders, in the yeare 1297. All things seemed to bee thus mildly pacified, but the progresse will soone shew, that Philip had no meaning to receiue the Earle of Flanders into fauour: For the truce being newly expired, Charles Earle of Valois enters into Flanders with the same victorious Armie, where hee takes Bethune, Douay, Courtray, and all the rest of the Countrie of Flanders, except Gand: whether the Earle Guy was retired with his Children, being disapointed of succours from his allies and confederates. England is quiet, and the Emperour Adolphe is no more to be scene, who had made this poore Earle to wear the Bable. And the Gantois make their peace with the King, keeping their Priuileges. But what shall become of the Earle? hee yeelds himselfe absolutely into the hands of Robert Earle of Artois, with promise, that by his intercession he should be restored into the Kings good fauour, and so 1299. into the possession of his estate. Vpon this promise of Robert, Guy (accompanied with his children, Robert, William and Guy, and his Nobilitie that were most confident vnto him, comes to Paris, but his hope was soone turned into a languishing sorrow: for both himselfe, his children, and all his followers, were disperfed into sundry places vnder sure gardes, as the Kings prisoners: from whom they could draw no other answer, but that he had passed no word to his Brother, and that they were his prisoners by a iust warre. Philip without any further delay passeth into Flanders with a goodly troope, to take possession of the Earledome, as Proprietarie and chiefe Lord, and to vnite it to the Crowne, by vertue of a sentence; whereby the person of Count Guy was found guilty of high Treason, and his Lands were confiscate to the King, as to his Soueraigne Lord. Hee comes to Gant, where hee is receiued with pompe, as Prince and Lord, hee receiued their homage, and makes many goodly lawes for the gouernment of the Countrie, appointing James of Chastillon, Lord of Leuse and Comé, for Gouernour and Lieutenant Generall, and so returnes to Paris. Then were garrisons presently placed, and Cittadels made in all the Townes, as conquered by the Sword, they are charged with contributions, taxes, and impositions one vpon another, to finish the buildings, and to nourish the Souldiars, with such other things as depended thereon: Such was the libertie and confusion of militarie discipline. On the other side, there were complaints and popular mutinies for the exactions made by the Kings command. These popular discontented did fodenly cause a new confusion. A people ought to be intreated with much mildnesse, be they either newly conquered, or reduced to their old obedience. This ill vsage gaue all the better Townes occasion to reuolt. Bruges began, and is followed presently by the rest, but they must seeke meanes for their preliuation, to maintaine themselves against the forces of Philip, which vndoubtedly would fall vpon them. They assemble at Bruges. The first difficultie is to provide a Comander. John and Guy of Namur bretheren (sonnes to Guy Earle of Flanders) were ioyntly chosen by a generall consent, and come to Bruges. There all the Citties (Gant excepted) make an offensive and defensive league, against the King of France for their Earles deliuerie. The Dice are cast, all breakes out into a furious seditiō. At Bruges the French are slaine by their hosts, Count S. Paul (who went thither to pacifie these troubles) escaped hardly: furie had found them out Commanders fite for their humors. A wretched Weaver, suborned and counterfeited, mutinous and full of words (named Peter) is one of their chiefe Colonels, accompanied with like Ruffians, & the other Commander a Butcher of like qualities to this Tribune. But as the baser sort begin these rebellions, so great men end them. Philip of Flanders (sonne to Guy) being a prisoner, flies from Apinille (where he was well appointed) to succour his Father and Countrie, being ready to suffer shipwrack. The Nobilitie of the Countrie (who feared the furie of this mad enraged multitude) ioyne easily with him. The popular state (seeing how needfull the armes and direction of Gentlemen was for them) seeke all meanes to haue their fauour. The cause is plausible, the deliuerie of their good Earle, & the liberty of their Country. Flanders being thus on fire, Philip was in no lesse perplexitie, resolving to imploy all his forces, to suppress this mutinous nation. In few daies he leues an armie of 40000. men, with exceeding diligence, and he himselfe is in field as Generall. And yet all this dies like a fire of Toae, & breeds euents not foreseene by him, who in shew was the stronger, but in the end he proues the weaker, and beares the blowes: for he was scarce entred into Flanders as farre as Boisledue, but he talks of his returne, pretending the vnseasonableness of the time: yet the cause was apparently knowne to be otherwise: and some thought that he feared a reuolt at home. So this great shew preuailed little in Flanders, and bred an infinite charge to France. This was the successe of Philip's second voyage into Flanders, with much brute & no fruite. This his sodaine retreat incensed this mutinous people more, and gaue courage to their Commanders, to be the more resolute against Philip by the renewing of a mutuall alliance: and made Philip seeke to repaire the error which he had (in his owne conceit) committed, in not imploying so goodly an armie against the Flemings: He raiseth another armie of forty thousand

Guy put into prison.

Flanders vnited to the Crowne.

The people of Flanders being oppressed reuolt against Philip.

And kill the French.

The Nobility ioyne with the people.

A thousand men of the companies already leuied, vnder the command of Robert Earle of Artois his Cousin, accompanied with Arnoul of Neele, Constable of France, and many great personages. The diuers humors of both parties, were a foretelling of the issue of these Armies; for the Earle of Artois marched against the Flemings, as against a base people, easie to be vanquished, and this humor of the Generall, crept into the Souldiars mindes, as going to an vndoubted victory, and not to a doubtfull combat. Contrariwise the Flemings marched carefully to defend themselves against great warriors, for the defence of their liberty against them that were greatly incensed, and vnder a Wise and Graue Commander. They choole for their Leader John of Namour, with his bretheren Guy and Philip (sonnes to the Earle Guy prisoner) accompanied with many Noblemen, that were good souldiars, and sworne enemies to the French, leading a people very resolute for their owne preseruations. The armies meet nere vnto the Towne of Courtray, in a place called Groeninge. The Earle of Artois would by all meanes drawe the Flemings to fight; who sought onely to defend themselves, and therefore had chosen a place, for to campe in, which was strong both by nature and arte, lying close, with their battallions. This their countenance not to fight, made Robert of Artois the more resolute to force them contrary to the Constables aduice. The great numbers of the French did at the first terrifie the Flemings, but (their mindes seasoned with the former considerations) they were encouraged by their Leader John of Namour. Robert therefore hauing commanded his Horse to charge their Squadrons furiously; the Flemings withstood them as corragiously, and hauing disordered them, they forced them to retyre vpon their owne foote; who were placed with so great a contempt of the enemy, as if they were not to fight, but to gather the spoyle of vanquished men. The Horse-men thus disordered, passe through their bands of foote, the which thus diuided, abandon their ranks, and then their Armes. Some fight heere, others flie there; but the horse and foote being in route, they could not ioyne againe. The disorder was generall; some defend themselves courageously, but there remaine no Squadrons to fight in grosse. Their multitude is a hindrance vnto them: the Flemings incouraged with this successe, are the more eager in killing, for that this defeat of our men was vnexpected, and this multitude being victorious is fished vpon the French, (as vpon dead carca'es) without any mercy, glutting themselves vpon the, whom before they feared. Of this great army there hardly escaped three hundred, all are past together great & smal. Not one Comander escaped, & very few Noblemen. Robert Earle of Artois cosin to the King of France, General of the army; Arnoul Lord of Neele Constable of France, James of Chastillon, Gouernor of Flanders, John King of Maierica, Godfroy of Brabant & his Son the Lord of Viezon, the Earle of Eu, la Marche, Damartin, Aumale, Auge, Tancarville & many other great personages which were the offerings of these cowardly spirits. They number 12000. Gentlemen slaine in this battell, by this enraged multitude. A notable president, not to contemne an enemy, which teacheth what a furious people well led may do: and especially that victories come fro heauen, for here the lesser number vanquished, the greater, & the weaker the strong. This victory called of Courtray or Groeninghe, was followed with an absolute reuolt of all Flanders against the French. It happened in the yeare 1302. the 11. of Iuly. John of Namour remaining their gouernour in the absence of their imprisoned Earle. Philip receiued a great check in this battell; but he had more botoms to vntwist. At the rears of Edward King of England, & of the Emperor Adolphe vanished; only Pope Boniface the 8. shewed himselfe obstinate in his hatred against Philip. A discourse worthy to be carefully described. In the hottest of these Flemish affayres, Pope Boniface did excommunicate Philip, & curle his Realme vpon this occasion. The Christians estate was lamentable in the East, the Turtarians encreased dayly. Cusan King of Tartars, allyed with the King of Armenia a Christian, made a great professiō of loue to the Christians, and for that the Mamelus held Iudea & Ierusalem, he desired to drawe the Kings and Princes of Christendome to their ayde. To this end he sends an Ambassage to Pope Boniface the 8. and to Philip King of France, to intreat them both to imploy their authorities and meanes in so good a worke. Boniface failes not to imbrace this occasiō, Philip sends an other army, which is defeated by the Flemings.

Battell of Courtray famous for the great defeat of the French.

A wonderfull defense of the French.

An enemy is not to be contemned howe weaker soeuer.

A notable affront done by Pope Boniface to Philip.

1302. he not onely exorts Philip to succor the Tartar, but also commands him proudly and A imperiously vpon paine of excommunication. This Bull was giuen to a sufficient man named Stephen an Arragenois, (whom he had made Bishop of Amiers, a Cittie in the Countie of Foix, which they commonly call Pamiers, and had erected this new Bishoprick in the Archbishoprick of Tolouse, without the Kings priuie or consent) who acquitted himselfe of his charge so stoutly, that when as Philip represented vnto him the greatnesse of his affaires, so as he could not obey the Popes command: he answered with a bold face, That if the King would not obey the Pope, hee would deprime him of his Realme. The subiect, the manner, and the person (aduanced thus against his will,) did so moue Philip (griued with this late losse, as if the Pope would insult ouer him for this bad successe) that hee imprisoned this Bishop. Boniface transported with choller, sends to him againe one Peter a Romane borne (Archbishop of Narbonne) with sharper Bulls, to summon him to vndertake this voyage of the East: to command him not to touch the reuenues of the Clergie: to reprehend him sharply for that hee had presumed to lay hands vpon the Bishop whom he had sent; & to inioyne him to send him presently back in full libertie. His charge extended to no other censures in case he disobeyed not in the principall. The Archbishop executed his charge boldly. Philip shewed him with great modestie, the impossibilitie of this voyage: the reasons which had moued him to leaue this tenth of the Clergie, and so to intreate the Bishop, hauing spoken vnto him without any respect. The Archbishop replied with more arrogancie.
That he was ignorant of the Popes authoritie, who was not onely the Father of Christian soules, but also Soueraigne Lord and Prince in temporall things. And therefore by that authoritie he did excommunicate him, declaring him vnworthy to raigne, and his realme forfeited to the Church of Rome, to inuest whom he pleased. Moreouer he brought another Bull, directed to the Prelats and Noblemen of France, by the which he did acquite and dispenace all Frenchmen from their oath of obedience to Philip. And a third, by the which he did cite all the Prelats and Diuines of the French Church, to ap-peare before him at Rome: disanulling all indulgences and priuiledges granted to the French, by any Popes his predecessors. The Earle of Artois disdaining this affront, takes the Bull and casts it into fire, saying, That no such dishonor should euer befall the King, to submit himselfe to any such conditions. Philip amazed at these bold affronts, refers the whole matter to his Councell, who conclude to send back the Popes two Nuncios to Rome, and to forbid the Prelats of France to goe, or to send any money to Rome: beseeching Philip to proceed in the affaires of his Realme, and not to lay in fo-goodly a course. This done, Philip raiseth new & great forces to returne into Flanders.
At his entry the Flemings were defeated at Arques neere to S. Omer, in a straight passage. Guy of Namur beseeching Xirixé, was ouerthrowne by the Kings Nauie, assisted by 16. Gallies of Genoa, vnder the command of Renier Grimaldi: and being taken, is carried to the King, being in his armie betwixt Lisle and Douay. After this fortunate beginning, many Citties yielded to the French, the rest fearing the euent, stood amazed: the fume of their victorie being evaporated; so as the first heat being coole, they intreate the Earle of Sauoy to be a mediator to Philip for a truce, whereby they might obtaine a peace, after so many miseries. Philip of Flanders & Iohn of Namur brethren, were great persuaders thereof, for the naturall desire they had to free their poore father so long time a prisoner. But Philip thirsting after reuenge for his losse at Courtray, refused it.
He aduanceth and defeats the Flemings at Aire and at Tournay. There chanced in the end that notable encounter at Mons in Penelle, where they were wonderfully beaten, to make them looke the tast of the battaile of Courtray, yet Philip was in danger of his life, and bought this victory dearly: and the Flemings (like men in dispaire) assembled together from all parts, although vnder-hand they did sue to Philip for peace: the which in the end they obtained, at the instance of Iohn Duke of Brabant, vpon these conditions.
That the Soueraignty remaining to the King, and the Flemings enioying their liberties, the Earle Guy & all other prisoners, should be set at libertie, without rancome: and the Flemings should pay eighty thousand pound sterling, for the charges of the war, & the Castles

Arrogance of the Popes Nuncio.

Philip subdues
the Flemings.

Philip makes peace with the Flemings.

A Castles of Lisle & Downay, Cassell & Courtray, should be deliuered into the Kings hands, as a pawne, vntill the end of the paiement, and he might bear downe what he had built in the Castles of Lisle & Downay, deliuering them to the Earle, as to their lawful Lord. That the Flemings should raze the walls and Forts of fise principal Citties, Gannt, Bruges, Tpre, Lik, and Downay, and neuer to build them againe. That the King should make choise of 3000. men at his pleasure, in Bruges and thereabouts, that were culpable of the seditions and murders committed, a thousand of them to bee employed beyond the seas, and two thousand on this side, and that the Flemings should furnish 600. men at armes, to serue the King one whole yeare, where hee pleased. And for the performance hereof, the Citties should bee bound, and should forsaite threcore thousand Liures for non-payment, for the effecting whereof, Deputies should bee appointed.
 B During this treatie, the Earle Guy and his daughter Philip, (the subiect of this trouble some reuolt) died, to the great great grieefe of Philip, who sees himselfe frustrate of all meanes to shew his clemencie and bountie. But when these Articles were brought vnto the Citties, the people did mutine with great impatiencie, so as the Deputies perswaded Philip to moderate those which were most greuous. The demantling of the Townes, (except Bruges, where the reuolt began, and the banishment of the men, conuerting it into a pecuniary fine, and a great summe to an annuall pension prefixt to easie payments.) Thus the accord was made. Robert, William, and Guy brethren, the sonnes of the Earle Guy of Flanders, were deliuered with all the prisoners, but we shal see that in the execution thereof there was much trouble. During these hard & rough proceedings, Edward King of England hauing received a check in Guienne, was quiet, fearing Philips resolution in greatest dangers: whereof hee could wisely free himselfe:
 in the end an accord is made by the marriage of Isabel, the daughter of Philip, with Edward the 2. who (in regard of this marriage) recouered all he had lost in Guienne, & in the taking of Isabell, he left to his posteritie, a heauy pawne to pretend a title to the whole Realme. Philip had his reuenge of this Emperour Adolphe, who had so boldly braued him in the beginning of this quarrell, vnder colour of demanding the lands of the Empire, lying in the Countries of Bourgogne, Dauphiné and Proence, being in old time the realme of Arles, but then in the power of diuers Lords, (as we haue sayd) vnder the Kings authority. The King of England, and Earles of Flanders had great cause to complaine of him, hauing receiued two hundred thousand Crownes to make war against Philip, the which he employed in the purchase of Thuringe, & taking possession of that goodly Land, so vniustly gotten, being solde by an vnaturall Father, who would disinherit his Children. This filthy traffick (agruated by the complaints of the King of England, and Earle of Flanders), made Adolphe of Nassau very odious and contemptible, being issued from a noble and worthie race, but this Aet against the poore Children, made him vnworthy of the Empire, from which he was deposed by a decree of the Electors, & Albert of Austria seated in his place who pursuing him with war, slue him (as they write) with his owne hand, in an encounter neere vnto Spire. But Pope Boniface the 8. (Philips greatest enimie) remained yet vn pacified, who stil continued his chollor against him, in a season when as he thought him to be drawne drie, both of men and money: for they write that this warre of Flanders had wasted aboue three hundred thousand Frenchmen in eleuen yeares, during the which it continued. We haue seene how he vsed him by his Nuncios: this last Aet will not onely shew the continuance of his spleene, but shal also represent a bad Catastrophé in this Tragedie the which shall light vpon the head of Boniface, fought for by himselfe. Albert of Austria was no sooner chosen and installed Emperour by the Electors, but Boniface applyed his wit to winne him against Philip, supposing to preuaile against Philip, as Gregorie the ninth had done against Frederic the second. Hee proclames him Emperour, & in-uests him King of the realme of France, giuing him both the title and armes: and taking occasion to sowe deuision in the heart of the Realme, by meanes of the Clergie, who by reason of their reuenues, had great power in the State, and for the interest thereof great will to preferue them, Hee did also write his letters to Philip in this manner.

He writes arrogantly to Philip.

Boniface Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to Philip King of Frenchmen. Ecce A God, and observe his commandments; wee wil thee to understand, that thou art subject to us, both in spirit uall and temporall things, and that it belongs not to thee to giue any prebend or benefice. If thou hast the keeping of any of them being vacant, thou must reserve the profits of them to the successors. If thou hast giuen any wee iudge thy gift to be void, and do reuoke all that hath bene done, and whoseuer beleueth otherwise, wee iudge them hereticks, giuen at Latran, the fourth of the Nones of December, the 6. yeare of our Popedom. The King answers him thus.

Philip arrogantly to the Pope.

Philip by the grace of God King of France, to Boniface calling himselfe the soueraigne Bishop, little or no health. Let thy great follie and rashnes be aduertised, that in temporal things we acknowledge none but God for superiour, and that the gift of prebends being void, belongs to us by our royall prerogative, and the fruits that grow thereby, the which wee will defend by the sword, against all them that shall seeke to hinder our possession, esteeming them fooles and without iudgement, that shall thinke otherwise. These are the very words drawne out of the originall. But Philip, to preuent the plots of Pope Boniface) asbled the Prelats of his realm at Paris with all speed: & hauing repressed vnto the wrong which Pope Boniface had done him by his decree (from the which he had appealed as erroneous,) he makes them to renew their oath of fidelitie. Hee thanks the King of England, in that he yielded not to the perswasions of Boniface: who would haue incited him against him; and in the end he seekes to stay the violent course of his furious practises. There was a Gentleman following the Court whose name was Felix of Nogaret (borne in Senennes, a mountaine Countrie of Languedoe, of the familie of the Albigeois as in that Countrie there were many referred from father to sonne, since the grant made them by Saint Lewis) whome Philip held fit for the execution of this charge: there was likewise a guide found out very fit to accompanie him. Boniface had ill intreated the Colonais; one of them named Sciarra (flying the Popes furie, and seeking some rest) had bene taken by Pirats, and redeemed by a friend of his at Marseilles, and so brought into France. They could not choose a more fit instrument to tame his arrogancie, who presumed to controul Kings, and to deprive them of their Estates (as Platina saith) The pretext of Nogarets voyage to Rome was apparent, to signifie Philips appeale from the Pope vnto a Councell, & to find the means to leuie mē vnder hand, D for at that time the Realme of Naples obeyed the French, whicher Philip had conueyed 60. thousand Crownes, by the bank of the Petrucci, Marchants of Florence, to furnish this leuie. The Pope was retired from Rome to Anagnia, a Towne of Abruzzo, (where he was borne) by reason of the troubles at Rome, whereas the Gibelin faction was growne the stronger. There were likewise in Anagnia many corrupted by the filuer of France, by such meanes as Sciarra gaue vnto Nogaret, so as hauing drawne in 300. Frenchmen well armed, and woone many of the Citizens vnto him, the Castell (whereas Pope Boniface was lodged) was seized on, and at the same instant the Cittie gates (with that terror which doth visually amaze men) surprised.

Anagnia seized on and taken by the French.

Then the French crye, the Cittie is wonne: No man dares appeare. In this confusion the Castell gates being seized on by French souldiars, Felix of Nogaret being armed, (accompanied with Sciarra Colonais and many others) enters the Pallace-hall with their naked swords, Boniface is not much amazed, but hastily attyes himselfe in his Pontificall robes, and presents himselfe vnto his enemies. Nogaret begins to say vnto him. The good and noble King of France hath sent me hither, to tell thee that hee speaks from thee to the Councell. But the Pope hauing not the patience to attend the end, Thy Grandfather (sayd hee) condemned for the heresie of the Albigeois, was iustly punished by fire: a worthy reward for his wickednes before God and man. I doe not therefore wonder if I see thus traitorously surprisid by thee an heretike, but I willingly beare what happened to that good Pope Siluerius. Nogaret replies, I will lead thee then to Lions, where a Councell shall iudge of thy abuses. But as Boniface would haue replied Sciarra more hardy then Nogaret, gaue him a great blow with his gantelet on the face, which made him to bleed much. The Pope cried, and he stroke againe, so as Nogaret (hauing no commission

A commission to proceed so farre,) drew him out of the Colonais pawes, add hauing 1394. retired him into his Chamber (howling and blaspheming like a desperate man) he led him to Rome. But Boniface through this accident entred into so cruell a frenzie, as hee gnawed and eate his owne hands, and so died pitiously the 35. day after, to whom the common report registred in Histories made this Epitaph.

He entred his Popedom like a Fox, he reigned like a Lion, and dyed like a Dog.

Platina addes this Commentarie. Thus dyed Boniface, who laboured to keepe the consciences of Emperours, Kings, Princes, and generally of all men in awe, more by terror then by religion: who sought to giue and take away Kingdomes, to expell and restore Princes as his pleasure: most greedie to gather gold by what meanes soeuer. I. et Princes therefore both spirituall and temporall learne to gouerne their Clergie and subjects, not arrogantly with insolencie and outrage (as this of whom we speake) but holily and modestly, as Christ our King, his Disciples and followers, who desired to be loued not feared, whence iustly proceeds the ruine of tyrants. Hee writes also of him: That hee nourished deuisions among the Italians, and especially betwixt the Genoeis and the Venetians. Behold the testimony of Platina, and the Catastrophe of the Tragedie which Pope Boniface the eight had plotted to ruine the King and his Realme. Philip aduertised of the heauie end of him who had practised to ruine both him and his estate, presently lendes his Ambassadors to the Colledge of Cardinals, being much amazed with this accident: protesting that hee gaue no such commission to Felix of Nogaret, (to whom notwithstanding he gaue in recompence the Baronie of Caluiffon in Vauage neere vnto Nismes) but onely to intimate to Pope Boniface, his appeale from him vnto the Councell, desiring them to expect all friendship and succour from him. The Cardinals reuiued from their great amazement by this kinde message from Philip, stood yet long irresolute in the election of a new Pope, fearing to do any thing vnpleasing vnto the King. In the end they choose one Nicholas a Cardinall, who had assisted Philips Cosins in the voyage of Hungarie (famous among the Popes by the name of Benedict the 11.) He reuokes the excommunication giuen out by Boniface against Philip and his people, and restores the priuiledges of the Vniuersitie of Paris, whereof hee had deprived them in disdain of Philip: but hee liued not long, and the Cardinals desire was to accomodate themselves wholly to the Kings will: they therefore by a generall consent choose Clement, borne at Bazadois in Gifsonie, of the house of the Vicounts of Tartas, and Lord of Vesse, where hee built a goodly Castell called Villandrant, as the Lord of Haillan doth testifie (an vnreproueable witnesse) being of that Countrie. This Clement was the first of seuen French Popes which held the See one after another, vnto Vrbaing the 6. vnder whom the Italians recovered it againe with much trouble. These seuen Popes were Clement the first a Gelson, Iohn 23 of Cohors in Querey, Benedict the 12. a Tholousin, Clement the 6. Innocent the 6. Vrbaing the 5. Gregorie the 11. all foure Limosins one after another. Such power had this proceeding of our Philip. Clement the 5. being chosen Pope, he came into France, and the King receiued him at Lions, accompanied with the Kings of England and Arragon in great pompe. The Pope was on Horseback, and the King with his two brethren on foote, holding the reynes of his horse. Hee was Crowned in the Temple of Saint Iust, where they had built a great Theater for so goodly a spectacle: but the presse of people was so great, as the scaffold brake, and the multitude fell one vpon another. The Pope, Kings, Princes and Noblemen were all on a heape, and the Scaffold fastened to an old wall pulled it downe, so as the King was hurt in the head, the Pope in the foote, and the Duke of Britaine slaine, with a great number of Noblemen and comon people that were smothered vnder these ruines. The Popes Crowne fell from his head into the presse, where he lost an Carbonele valued at sixe thousand Florins of gold: but the life of men was inestimable. Thus this feast gaue no cause of Joy but was famous to posteritie by this notable accident, and by the translation of the Popes seat from Rome to Auignon, in the yeare 1305. vnto the yeare 1379. vnder Vrbaing the 6. This was the first acte of Clement the 5. being arrived in France. In the meane time the Flemings practise new troubles, refusing to performe the conditions

Boniface dyed like a made man.

1305. ditions of peace, and their Earle Robert gathered together men and money on all sides A for the warre: Wherevnto Philip (tyred with the long miseries which had waisted his Realme) was unwillingly drawne. Yet he giues charge to Enguerand of Marigny Earle of Longueville, Superintendant of his treasure; to finde meanes to leuie an Armie, appointing Charles of Valois his Brother for Generall, accompanied with Lewis his eldest Sonne, and a great number of the Nobilitie. But the difficultie to recouer money was so great, as the King was forced to grant a truce to Robert Earle of Flanders, the which was more auailable for him then for France. This did greatly displease these two Princes (who had the chiefe places in the Armie) complaining of Enguerand, as if hee had purposely crossed this leuie, with a pretext of want of money: when as hee himselfe was rather corrupted by the Flemings. They smothered this dislike vntill Philip B the death, who countenanced Enguerand (as his good and faithfull seruant) against the ordinarie complaints of these Princes of the bloud. But after long delayes, Flanders continuing still more obstinate in their rebellion, and Robert seeking but to gaine time, necessitie forced Philip to the Warre, and want of money held him backe: yet both the one and the other were apparent. For the redresse whereof hee finds an expedient, to call an assenbly at Paris of all the Cities of his Realme, and there to represent vnto his Subiects the great necessitie of his affaires, to induce them thereby to contribute meanes for so important a Warre, being both necessarie and honorable. The assembly was held in the Court of Parliament, (a solemne place) where the King C assisted with all his Councel. Enguerand of Marigny made the speech, as the man which had the managing of his affaires. The Prouost of Paris made offer of any thing the Citie of Paris could doe, that the example of the capitall City might draw on the rest, who made the like offer. They grant a new imposition of ten Deniers vpon the Luer or Franke, of all marchandise & wares: but when it came to the execution, there were daily seditions and mutines, in Picardie, Normandie, Orleans and Lions, whither Philip sent Lewis his eldest sonne to pacifie them. But oh the vanitie of this world! Philip had liued with much paine, hee had passed his apprenticeship in his fathers troubles, crossed with the warres of Guienne and Flanders, he had giuen and receiued infinite losses, shaken with the pricking thornes of Pope Boniface, who sought to ruine both body and soule, in excommunicating him & seeking to spoile him of his estate. Was it not then D time to rest after all these royles? and yet behold he is more ready then before to imbarke himselfe in new troubles, by the enterprise of a new and dangerous warre, whereof all his posterity could neuer preuaile. But God more wise then himselfe, did cut off his long discourses (cast in the mould of an infinite life,) in this life so soone ended. So he dies when his troubles began to lue, and goes to seeke rest in heauen, the which he could not find on earth. He died at Fontainbleau in Gastinois, in the yeare 1314. hauing reigned 28. yeares, and liued 58. His disposition and his children, are noted in the beginning of his raigne, and the estate of the Empire and the Church, throughout the whole discourse thereof.

The estate likewise of the Christians in Asia and Affrike, and of the French in Sicilia, E Naples and Arragon, must necessarily be described, both that which was past, and that which is to come. The Popes had imbarked all Christendome in this action, goodly in shew, and very hurtfull in effect, for those voyages beyond the Sea, haue consumed an infinite number of men throughout all Christendome. Our France hath a great share, yea of our Kings. Many houses were cast away vpon this shelle, whence grew infinite lutes. And from thence likewise came the corruption of fees, by meanes of the sale of Lands made by Gentlemen to peasants. To conclude, they employed 200. yeares to purchase much paine & infinite losse. We haue hetherto scene how things haue passed fro raigne to raigne, from the yeare 1096. the day of the first departure of the Christian armie into the East, vnto the yeare 1315. The ordinary practise of the Popes of Rome, F was to free themselves of Kings and Emperours, the more easily to settle their authoritie ouer them, as the wise and vnpassionate Reader may verifie, by all the circumstances and order of the true Historie. I speake onely in termes of State, and

A and as mildly as truth will permit me. In those times, the Tartar (who had vndertaken the protection of the Christians) (the better to settle their affaires, obtained of Pope Clement a new Croysado. to the which Philip had vowed two Sonnes, Philip and Charles, but it had no successe, although Clement did what hee could to further the action. But a Dog that is feard feares the colde water. And experience is the mistresse both of wisemen and fooles. So all these great shewes in the end came to nothing. The Countries to valiantly conquered by the Christians, were seized on by the Infidels, so as after infinite toiles, there scarce remained any reliques of this shipwracke, one'y some Ilands to the Venetians, and Genoies, Cypres, Candia, Gorsu, Chio, and to all the Christians ioyntly, Rhodes and Malta. The Templers (placed for the garde of Christendome) became so disloyall and corrupt, as they must be rooted out, the which Philip did in France, in whose place were instituted the Knights of Rhodes and Malta, the which continue vnto this day. Behold the end of the voyage of our Argonautes, which made so goodly a shew vpon this Theater in the first Scene: But the Catastrophe was so miserable, as the Countries where the Gospell had bene Preached, remained a shamefull prey to the enemies of Christendome, and the Christian Church at his mercie. As for Sicilia, behold the estate: Charles the Lame (heire to his Fathers misfortunes, taken by Roger Admirall of Arragon, and heid prisoner foure The estate of Sicilia. yeares) in the end was released, vpon condition he should relinquish all his interest to the two Sicilies. And all which Philip had taken in Arragon, returned presently after his death to James of Arragon, the lawfull heire of that Realme. Naples continued longer in the French menspower, but in the end all was lost, as we shall see hereafter: so as the Arragonois retained to himselfe the possession of these goodly Estates, and left vs in our voluntarie losses, the gages of our accustomed rashnesse, and an appatent testimonie, that the Popes gifts to our Kings, haue not greatly enriched the poore realme: as appears by infinite examples. After that of Naples, Hungarie was in no better estate, being giuen by the Pope to Charles Adairtell, Sonne to Charles the Lame, these two quarrels hauing drawne all Europe into a strange confusion. So there was euery where vanitie for truth, brute without suite, and shewes without effect. The originals are my warrant for this truth, the which I ought to the honor of the Historie without dissembling.

Lewis

Lewis the tenth, called Hutin, the 47. King of France.

1315.

The Minors, or Lions Hutins.

HIS raigne is short and of small fame, as the actions of this King are not greatly commendable. He began to raigne in the year 1315. and dyed the year after, the 16. of June, and so hee scarce raigned a year and a halfe, which time was full of trouble and confusion according to his turbulent and stirring disposition, whereof he bare the name, for a blemish to his posteritie, for Hutin in old French signifies Mutine. A Chollerick Prince, Ingrate, Insolent, Outragious, defacing his royall Authoritie, by the insolent abuse of his power, countering his mortall passions with the vale of his authoritie. Hee first married with Marguerite the Daughter of Robert Duke of Bourgonie, being detected of incontinencie, she was confined to Chasteau gaillard vpon Seine, where she dyed in her ignominy. After her death, he married with Clemence the Daughter of Charles, brother to Robert King of Sicilia, pretended King of Hungarie. Hee made a great preparation against Robert Earle of Flanders, but could not passe with his Armie for Waters. He discharged his choller vpon Enguerand of Marigny Earle of Longueville, Supercendant of the treasure, whome Philip had imployed long and confidently. Charles Earle of Valois, brother to Philip the Faire, accused Enguerand of extortion and robbing the Treasurie: making him odious to the people, for that he had long managed the treasure of the Realme to his maisters good liking: but Lewis and Charles had hated this hatred against him, to the losse of his life. Hee had caused the Pallace to be built, and he disposed of the publike treasure, during the long warres of Flanders, the which had wasted much, to the peoples oppression and hinderance. And therefore it was a pleasing spectacle, to see Enguerand of Marigny hanged by a solemne sentence vpon

Enguerand of
put to death.

A vpon the gallows, which he had caused to be made at Montfalcon, beating downe his image in the Pallace, where the place is yet to be seene, with this inscription by it:

Let euery one rest content with that he hath,
For he that hath not sufficient, hath not any thing.

This iudgement was very famous, yet afterwards it was reuoked, but the bodie was not taken out of the graue, although he were freed from the ignominy of so shamefull a death. The Earle of Valois was soone after taken with a languishing discafe, which consumed him by degrees, and King Lewis Hutin died suddenly, as he scarce lay sick one day. These were the workes of heauen, which made the foolish people change their opinion, of whom it was rightly spoken. What the people sayes, a foole speaks: for euery one tooke these extraordinarie deaths, as witnesses of Gods iustice, who punisheth great Princes which abuse the ordinarie power which hee hath giuen them, to serue their owne passions. And it is to be obserued, that this iustice of God continued in the posteritie of Lewis Hutin, for he left his wife Clemence with Child, who was deliuered of a Sonne, an imaginarie King, hauing liued but eight dayes: and though he were royally interred with Kings, yet is he not numbred among them. Moreouer hee left one Daughter by his first Wife, called Iane, for whom Eudes of Bourgonie her Vncle by the Mother, caused great Tragedies against the fundamentall Law of State, to haue her admitted Queene of France, wrongfully and vniustly, for that women are excluded by the law, whereon the French Monarchie was grounded, as we haue sayd. So this miserable raigne was begun and ended by confusion and iniustice. A notable example to obserue the vanitie of the Court, in good seruants vniustly afflicted: of the people, in their false and passionate iudgements, rendering euill for good, and suffering themselves to be transported with the ebbing and flowing of their passions, speaking good and euill of the same action, and the same man, without rule, without measure, and without truth. And of the vanitie of great men, which thinke it to be the chiefe fruite of their greatnesse, to abuse their power insolently, to the ruine of their inferiours: not remembring (being blinded with their passions) that they haue a superiour ouer them, to make them yeeld an account of their vniust proceedings, forcing them to make restitution with interest. All that Lewis Hutin did worthy of commendation, was that he made the Parliament of Paris ordinary, which had but two sittings in the year, although this commoditie of pleading hath bred many sures, to the hindrance of the publike and priuate good. He was called King of France and of Nauarre, and left the two realmes to his successor, who disposed thereof as we shall see.

Philip

PHILIP the 5. called the Long,
48. King of France.

1316.
Corrouer-se for the Crown of France.

Philip crowned.

HE controuersie touching the Crowne was easily decided, by the euident of reason (and also for that Jane the Daughter of Lewis Hutin, remaned by the Will of Philip her Vncle, Queene of Nauarre, and Countesse Palatine of Brie and Champagne,) and yet for the discontentment of some Princes of the bloud, Philip went to Rheims with a strong Armie, to bee appointed there, where he was installed, the doores of the Church being shutte and well garded. He began to raigne in the yeare 1316. and raigned fixe yeares. Hee had foure Daughters by Jane the Daughter of Orhelin Earle of Bourgonne and no Sonnes. By meanes of his Daughters hee made his peace with his discontented Princes: For hee gaue the eldest to Odou Duke of Bourgonne, (who had supported the Daughter of Lewis against him) and gaue in dowrie the Countie of Bourgonne, belonging vnto her by her Mother: and to Lewis Earle of Enreux his other opposite, hee gaue Jane with the Kingdome of Nauarre, and the Counties of Brye and Champagne, whereof he afterwards carried the title.

His disposiō. A Prince of a very tractable disposition, and by consequence easie to bee corrupted, rather inclining to ill then good. There is nothing memorable vnder his raigne, but that through his facilitie all was tollerable to his bad seruants, who vnder his name laid great exactions vpon the people, the which caused them to mutine in many places, neither did he (being great of body, and therefore called Long, but little of witte) vse his authoritie. Vnder colour of a voyage to the East, two seditious men, a Priest and

A and a Monke of the order of Saint Benedict, assembled a multitude of mutinous people, which committed a thousand insolencies where they passed, calling themselves Shepheards, but in the end they were defeated in Languedoc. 1322. Rebels calling themselves Shepheards.

The Iewes expelled before, were now admitted to returne for money: a wretched nation, giuen to all kinde of wickednesse, and therefore odious to the people, who exclaimed against the disorders growen vp by the facilitie of Philip. This generall hatred bred such a rage in the licentious mindes of the Iewes, as they brought the plague into diuers parts of the realme, vsing the helpe of Lepars. Many were greediously punished by Iustice, and the rest banished out of the dominions of France. Flanders seemed ready to fall into new troubles, but in the end they were pacified, by the marriage of Marguerite the Kings second Daughter, with Lewis Earle of Flanders, Neuers and Rethel, and the payment of certaine summes due by the sayd accord. An artificiall plague. Flanders pacified.

These are the most famous acts of that raigne, for to what end serues it to relate that priuate Iustice was done vpon a Prouost of Paris, who was hanged, for that he had put to death a poore innocent, for a riche man that was guiltie, and condemned to dye? Or that Philip would make one waight and one measure throughout his Realme, but he could not maintaine his authoritie by the rule of reason. These things either too common, or not effected, are not worthy of a Historie. Thus Philip the fift died with small fame, the fift yeare of his raigne, in the yeare 1322.

Charles

CHARLES the 4. called the Faire, the 49. King of France.

1322.
Charles crowned without opposition.

His disposition.

His issue.

Charles panified disorders without respect.

Philip the Long had succeeded Lewis Hutin his brother, with a some dispute: to Charles brother to Philip, (the last of the Sonnets of Philip the Faire,) succeeded without any difficulty, the question being formerly decided. He was Crowned King with great solemnitie, the Princes of the blood and Nobles assisting, in the year 1322. and reigned six yeares. A wife and a temperate Prince, louing Iustice, and yet unfortunate in his familie. He was thrice married. His first wife Blanche was accused and convicted of Adulterie, during his fathers life, and was confined to Chasteau-gaillard by Andely vpon Seine. His second Wife was Mary the Daughter of Henry of Luxembourgh Emperour, by whom he had one Sonne, who died as he was borne, and his Mother se one after at Yssoudon in Berry. His third Wife was Marguerite the Daughter of Lewis Earle of Eureux, by whom he had Daughters onely, leaving her with Child, as shall be said. But let vs make a collection of his life, which is not long. The facilitie of Philip the Long, the time of Lewis Hutin, and the long warres of Philip the Hardie, had perverted all, and given libertie to every man to do what he pleased, especially the Nobilitie: who being armed, committed many insolencies by this libertie and impunitie. Charles being annointed, he held a great Sessions in his chiefe City of Paris, to heare all mens complaints, and causeth many Gentlemen to be punished. Among the rest Jourdain of Lisle a Gascou, who vnder colour of being Nephew to Pope John the 22. then resident in Auignon, (having had his pardon for eightene crimes, whereof the least deserved death) continued still in his wickednesse. In the end he was taken and brought to Paris. The remitting of what was past, made him presume of Impunitie: But the Iustice of God (which comes in time,

At the turn when the insolent and obstinate sinner dreames not of it) prevented him, Charles laying all respect aside, caused him to be hanged, as a memorable example that respect is an enemy to Iustice, which must bee executed without sparing of any one that is guilty of any notable crime.

Edward the second King of England, stood vpon termes for his homage of Guienne, and had sent his wife Isabel, the Daughter of Philip the Faire, and Sister to the King, to be married with him. Charles brought him to reason by his authoritie, and as Hugh the Lord of Montpesat in Agenis, would haue fortified his house without his permission he forced him to obey, razing the Castell of Montpesat, whence the quarrell new and made him to give hostages for the assurance of that hee had promised. Amongst these generall quarrels, there chanced a iarre betwixt Edward and his wife Isa- bel discontented with her husband, for that both she and her Sonne had lost their credence with him, by the pernicious counsell of Hugh Spencer. Yet was he so supported by King Charles, as he sent her back into England without any countenance, commanding her to apply her selfe to her husbands humors, the which she endeouored to doe being a wife and a couragious Princes: yet being assisted (as it is likely) vnderhand by the meanes of her Nephew Charles the Faire, she preuailed in her desseignes: causing Hugh to be apprehended and punished as the Leuaine of all their breach: and having brought her Husband vnto reason, she confirmed her Sonne Edward the third a Prince who shortly shall be the cause of much trouble to this Monarchie. Charles likewise reduced Lewis Earle of Flanders to obedience, although he were husband to his Aunt:
and having called and condemned him by Court of Parliament at Paris, he restored him to his estates, the which he had forfeited by felonie, shewing in one subiect, both his severitie to punish offences, and his clemencie to remit the due punishment. The same Earle being fallen in some dislike with his chiefe Townes, & seeking to reclaim them by force Charles aduised him to winne them by mildnesse. a true remedie to reconcile subiects which are accustomed to oppose themselves against rigour, and in resisting to know their owne forces, the which belongs to their Princes by obedience.
Thus he pacified these discontents betwixt the Earle and the Cities of Flanders, by a common reconciliation, vpon condition: That the Earle should bee acknowledged D in his degree, and the King as Soueraigne.

Isabel complains of her

The subiects

by mildnesse.

This is all that chanced worthy of obseruation, in the raigne of Charles the Faire.
A Prince worthy of the French Monarchie, and to bee numbred among the greatest and most famous men of State. His life was very short, in regard of his great sufficiencie: yet with more order and authoritie then his brother Philip the Long, who left none but Daughters, (whose names are buried in the confusion of times: troubled by the pretences of Males and Females) and his wife with Child, as wee haue sayd.
A wombe which shall breed many long and perillous controuersies. Charles died in the year 1328. leaving the Crowne to the second royall branche of Capets, wherevnto the order of the fundamen-tall law did lawfully call them.

royall branche.

From the yeare a thousand three hundred twentie eight, vnto the yeare a thousand five hundred eighue eight.

He doubtfulnesse of the issue which was expected from the royall wombe of Lane, (widow to Charles the faire) held the beginning of this raigne in great suspence and perplexitie; euen for the regencie it selfe: for Edward the 3. King of England, (the sonne of Edward the 2. and of Isibell of France, the daughter of Philip the faire, and sister to the three Kings last deceased,) pretended it as his right; and in case the child died (whatsoeuer it were) the realme also, by the title of royall consanguinitie, according to the lawes of England.

Controuerſie for the realme beuixt Edward the 3. King of England, & Philip of Valois.

Contrarywise, Philip of Valois (the first Prince of the blood of France) maintained, that all the tercie of the male (if any were borne) as the realme, (if it were a daughter, or the sonne died,) belonged directly vnto him, without all controuerſie; holding the first place among the Princes of the blood after the decease of the three brethren, who had bin one after another. For Philip the hardie had left two sonnes, Philip the faire, and Charles Earle of Flanders: of whom it is said, That he was the sonne of a King, brother to a King, father to a King, and yet no King.

For Philip and Charles, had succeeded to the Crowne one after another: so as, after their decease, the right came to Charles and his children, according to the fundamentall law of State.

To decide this controuerſie, the generall Estates were called at Paris, with great solemnity: where they decree, That Philip of Valois should be Regent of the realme (if Queene had a sonne,) and King, if it were a daughter.

Lane was deliuered of a daughter, the first of Aprill, at Bois de Vincennes, the which was called Blanche. This quarrell thus decided; Philip of Valois was saluted and proclaimed King of France, and within few daies after, was annointed and crowned at Rheims, according to the vsuall custome. And then (being well accompanied with his Princes, Peeres, Officers, 1328. Officers, and an infinite number of his nobility, he made his entry into his chiefe City of Paris, with an incredible ioy and pompe: this was in the yeare. 1328.

Philip settles his affaires in France.

Being thus in possession of the Realme, he studied to settle his estate, much disordered by the ill gouernment of the forepassed Kings: and likewise to satisfie the daughter of Lewis Hutin, in regard of the Counties of Boye and Champagne, lying too neere to his good City of Paris, to be diuided from the crowne. So he treated with her, and held them by his prerogatiue, giuing vnto her as much in exchange as the said Earledomes were worth, lying farther off in the counties of la March, Rouergue and Languedoc.

But Flanders troubled him much more: the Earle and his subiects were greatly incensed one against an other, by reason of some exactions of money made by the Earle, for the payment of his old debts due by the accord, so as they made warre against their Earle, and tooke him prisoner.

He suppresseth the Flemings.

Being the stronger, they controlled their Lord: but soone after they payde for their folly: for the Earle (being deliuered) had recourse vnto Philip, as to their soueraigne. Philip takes the Earles cause in hand, rayseth a great armie against the Flemings, takes, sacks and burnes Cassel, where they had made the body of their army, after the defeat of two and twenty thousand Flemings in a pitched field. Hauing subdued this mutinous people, hee aduised the Earle to vse that aduantage modestly: to win the by mildenes, & not to thrust them into errors by despight or dispaire, the which are sooner preuented then repayed in popular tumults.

A notable fure of the Parlements against the cleargie.

Being returned from this voyage, Philip found newe worke at Paris. The Courts of Parliament, and all the Soueraigne Iudges, (assembled from all the Prouinces) made a general complaint against the Clergy of France. they accusethem of sundry abuses, & namely, that against the due of their charges, they intermeddled with the politike iurisdiction. The fure was vehement, & famous for the greatnes of the parties. The King, to reconcile this quarrel calles a general assembly of his whole realme, at Paris. The cause was pleaded before him, with great liberty, by Peter of Cugnerie (this is he who by detision they called M. Peter Cugnet who at this day they finde in the great Temple at Paris noted with a little Monkeys head, placed betwixt two pillers, to put out the candles, being odious by reason of his pleading,) and as coldly defended by Peter Bertrand, both famous Aduocates in those times. The issue was doubtfull, but Philip foreseeing the euent of so importaut a busines, after that he had seriously exhorted the Prelates to reforme themselves, & in reforming the abuse, to auoide these popular complaints, he referred the matter to a further hearing. But he had other worke in hand.

Edward King of England doth homage to Philip.

Edward the 3. King of England (for that he was not receiued King of France;) practised great and new deuises against him, studying onely vpon reuenge. He had purposely refused to assit at his coronation, & makes no shew of any intent to do homage for Guienne, wherunto Philip did cal him. Edward hauing no colour to refuse so apparent a duty, came to Amiens, with to great and extraordinary a traine, as it seemed plainly, not to be done to honour the king, but rather to strike some feare or admiration into the French, of his great forces. To check this bold brauado, Philip shewed himself a King at his first enteruew with Edward, who euen then champt vpon the bit, and smothered his choler. Edward appears at the place and time prefixt, royallie attired, with a long roabe of crimson veluet, pouldred with Leopardes of gold, a crowne vpon his head, a sword by his side, and golden spurs on his heeles. He presents himselfe standing before Philip sitting in his royall throne, attyred with a long robe of violet coloured veluet, pouldred with Fowers-de-luce of gold, a crowne on his head, and the scepter in his hand, holding a royall Maiesty, accompanied with his Constable, Chauncellour and great Chamberlaine. The Vicount of Melin, great Chamberlaine of France, comands Edward to take off his crowne, sword, & spurs, & to kneele downe: the which he doth.

The oath of Edward King of England to Philip.

Then hee tooke both his hands, and hauing ioyned them both together, hee G spake vnto him in this manner, You become a Lege man vnto the King, my Lord, who is here present, as Duke of Guienne, and Peere of France: and you promise to be faithfull vnto him & loyal. Say yes. And Edward answered, yes. In like sort he did him homage for the countie of

A of Ponthieu intreating Philip to restore him all those places in Guienne, which his Predecessors had inioyed, Philip answered him with great grauity, that he would consider thereof. This was the homage which Edward King of England, did vnto Philip King of France: the which I haue particularly noted, as the first act of a notable Tragedy. The euent will shew, that Philip had done farre better (without preiudice to his authority, lawfully purchased by the law of State) to pacifie Edward by all ciuill meanes obseruable betwixt Kings, and not to braue him vpon an inferiour quality, the which is no blemish to the other, for in the end he shewed himselfe his equall in dignity. A furious bayte of hatred among Princes which cannot be reconciled.

Philip's error in receiving homage.

Edward departed discontented from Philip, resolute to attempt all meanes to crosse him, and to ruine him. Hee seekes out all instruments fit for this designe, both in Flanders, Brittaine, and Germanie, wherof followed mournfull euent, both for the King and his Realme. I will note euery thing in order, reseruing the Estate of the Church and Empire to the end of his raigne, least I should interrupt the order of this discourse.

The cause of Edwards discontent against Philip.

Philip was otherwise affected then Edward, (as commonly desire makes shewe of that which is not, pleasing men with vaine imaginations) for supposing that he had tamed Edward with his imperious homage, he presumed that he had well settled his affayres, to be obeyed by him without any contradiction, and to haue his realme enioy an assured peace, without any annoyance, vnder his command. Vpon this conceipt he intends a voyage to the East, desirous to be nothing inferior to the glorious and renowned zeale of his Predecessors. In this deuotion he easily yeelds to the perswasions of Pope Benedict. XI. borne at Tholouse, then resident at Auignon.

Philip resolves to go into the East.

His fleet was then preparing at Aiguemortes, (a sea Towne of Languedoc) whilest that he prouides for the regencie of the Realme, giuing it to John Duke of Normandy his eldest sonne, being foureteeen yeares old, leauing him a graue and learned Counsell. And seeing the example of his Predecessors, hee learns by certaine intelligence, that he watched his departure, to invade France.

This new occasion gaue him a reasonable subiect to change his resolution, and not willingly to expose his new inheritance to his cuini. But this satisfied not Pope Benedict, who grew so bitter vpon this alteration, that (exclaiming generally of Philip as disloyall,) he sought all meanes to annoy him. There was a capitall hatred betwixt the Emperour Leo of Baviera, and the sea of Rome, hauing excommunicated him as an heretike. Benedict absoules him, and becomes his friend, seeking to oppose him against Philip: who (disliking of this proceeding) sends Entragues a gentleman of Vinarez to Auignon, to let Benedict vnderstand, that if he did not forbear to speake ill of him, he would force him to silence, after the example of that his Predecessor, whose name he bare, and who had left so famous a remembrance of his rashnes to posterity.

The Pope discontented with the King.

Edward being returned into England, sleepe not. A Prince of an excellent iudgement, great courage, and of a resolute and actiue spirit, high minded, and a fatall instrument to challenge France. His repulse, his homage, and his great meanes, were both the baite and the lure to this generous resolution, which thrust him on to disquiet the possession of that by force, which he could not obtaine by reason. But for so great a proiect he needed a great Counciller, to direct and fortifie him in the execution of an enterprise of so great import. Robert Earle of Artois, a Prince of the blood of France, (descended from an other relation to Lewis. 8. and brother to S. Lewis), had a great suite with his Aunt Mahauld Counciller of Burgongne, for the Earldome of Arthois. Robert had laboured much for Philip in his great question for the crowne, against Edward King of England before mentioned, assuring himselfe, that Philip would requite him in his vniust pretention: but Philip preferred the countesses right, before Roberts wrong: so as leauing the course of iustice free, the County of Arthois was adjudged to Mahauld, by a decree of the court of Parliament of Paris. This losse did so discontent Robert, as he presumed to brag openly, that he would dispossesse Philip of the crowne, by the same meanes that he had raysed him vnto it. But this presumptuous threat, deliuered rashly before many witnesses, cost both the realme and himselfe

A new quarrel for the Duchie of Brittain.

Advised to Edward against John of Montfort.

She resolues to imploy all her credit (as a Sister and Mother in lawe) with Philip and Edward, to keepe them from so dangerous abattaile. She runnes to the one, and to the other, but finds them both so resolute in their desseins, as shee is often reiecte: Yet is she nothing daunted. In the end she incounters their violent passions with such patience and dexteritie, as she obtaynes a day and place for a parle: although James of Artenille (a dangerous fle in a State) tickled Edwards eares, to crosse for comendable a resolution.

An example of a woman worthy of eternall praise, euen in this iron age, whereas women haue become miserab instruments of ciuil dissensions, and hellish fier brands to consume France with the fier of confusion and miserie.

A parle being concluded, deputies were chosen on either side, to treat: and by them a truce was made. Tournay is deliuered, and the armies dismissed, and so the storme preuented for this time, the which threatned both realmes. All good men reioyced, none but James of Artenille & his faction were greeued. So as (not able to auoide it) yet to feed Edwards humour, he aduise him to take vpon him the name of King of France: by the which both he and his complices should auoide the infamie of rebellion, and the punishment of high Treason: as hauing done nothing, but by the comaundement of their soueraigne. The date of this title of France was in the yeare. 1337. The which England holds to this day, and our Kings the realme in effect.

Edward left his wife at Caen, to keepe the Flemings at his deuotion, being a wife and a vigilant Princesse: & he himselfe returned into England, extremely greeued, for being unable to satisfie his Germans, for want of money, who expected a great bootie by this warre, from the which they scarce returned with their pay.

There sprang vp a newe combustion from this discontent, the fier being onely smothered in the embers, but not quenched. Philip makes his profit of the Germans discontent, and by the means of Lane, the wife of Lewis of Buiers, Emperour, being his nece, he wins them to leaue Edwards part, and to imbrace that of France.

Edward in like sort, strives to haue his reuenge on Philip. But to what ende serues all this, but to disquiet their estates, the which they ought to maintaine in peace? Thus the passions of Princes are bad counsellors for the good of their subiects.

This was the occasion of this newe breach betwixt the two Kings. Arthur Duke of Brittain, sonne to that John, Duke of Brittain, (who as we haue said, had bene slaine at Lions at the coronation of Pope Clement, 5.) had two wiues, and by either of them children, of the first named Batris, vicontesse of Limoges, he had two sons John and Guy, & of his second wife Yoland, countesse of Montfort & Amuray, he had John of Montfort, who contended for the duchie of Brittain.

John 3, the sonne of Arthur, dying without issue, hee made his niece Lane the daughter of his brother Guy, (who died before him) his heire in the succession of the said duchie.

In regard of this prerogative giuen to Lane, Charles of Bois nephew to King Philip married her, vpon condition, That those children which should be borne of this marriage, should bee lawfull heires to the duchie of Brittain, whereof Charles was inuested after the consummation of the marriage: all homages done vnto him, and hee was put in reall and full possession of the said Countrie, in the life of John.

After whole decease, behold John of Montfort, halfe brother to Lane (as we haue said) pretending to the said duchie, surpriseth Nantes, & then Rennes, Fannes, Brest, the Castile of Aulroy with many other places: & hauing receiued the homages of the Brittons he comes to Paris, to do his soueraigne homage to the King for the said duchie, and to be inuested therein. Charles of Bois opposeth in the right of his wife, and hereupon they are both sent by the King to the Court of Parlement of Paris, to do them iustice.

The Court with the Kings authority, sitting in his seat of Iustice, and in the presence of many Princes, decrees that Charles of Bois, in the name of Lane his wife, the lawfull heire of the duchie of Brittain, as succeeding the second son of the first bed, should be receiued by the King to fealty and homage, for the Countrie of Brittain, and John of Montfort the third son of Arthur, of the second bed, should be acknowledged in his degree, to enjoy

A his right when it should fall vnto him. John of Montfort disdaining this order, resolues to win that by force, which he could not recouer by reason: and in this humor he goes into England, crauing aide from Edward, who receiues him very graciously: but from thence he returnes into Brittain. Philip aduertised of these practises, pursueth John of Montfort with such successe, as hauing taken him prisoner with the Castell of Nantes, (whether hee was retired, he confined him to the Loure.

While these difficulties fall out in Brittain, there growes a newe trouble, by a strange accident, at Naples, in the familie of our Princes of France, of whome we haue spoken. We haue said, that Charles the Lame had manie sonnes, Charles, Robert, Lewis and Philip, Robert after this losse of Sicilie had for his part the realme of Naples and the Earldome of Provence: and left one sonne named Charles, who had two daughters, Lane and Migdale. Lane by the death of her sister, remayned sole heire of these two great Estats: and was married to Andrew the sonne of Charles King of Hongarie. The subiect of our discourse will not suffer mee to speake of the other children. Philip the yongest sonne of Charles the Lame, had one sonne, named Lewis Prince of Tarentum, verie faier, but of a violent and bold spirit. Lane began to loath her husband, and preferring the filthy loue of her Cousin before the honour of marriage, shee caused her husband Andrew of Hongarie to be slaine, cloaking this horrible and tragike acte with an impudent hypocricie: for she takes vpon her the habit of mourning after the death of her husband, whome she her selfe had slaine: and writes letters to Lewis King of Hongarie, brother to Andrew, full of lamentations.

Lewis knowing the detestable dissembling of this maistie, prepares his forces against these fayned teares: and without any dissembling, hee marcheth towards Italie, with a mightie armie, resolute to take an exemplary punishment of these wretched heads: but Lane and Lewis fle into Provence, before the storme.

Lewis (faured by the reuenging iustice of God) takes the Realme of Naples easilie, with Charles Duke of Durazzo, left for the gard thereof, and Lewis, Robert and Charles, Princes of the blood. The first hee beheads, the rest he sends into Hongarie to perpetuate punishment: and leauing Stephen Vaynoida gouernour of his newe conquest, hee returnes victorious to his realme.

In the meane time the hatred betwixt the two Princes growes violent, both by forme of force & by open force. Philip makes diligent search, both in Normandie, Picardie & Guienne, for the nobility which faured Edwards faction. He caused Oliuer of Cliffon to loose his head, (whose sonne shalbe Constable vnder Charles, 5.) with Bacon, Perffy, and Grosfroy of Artois. Grosfroy of Harcourt was sommoned, but in steed of appeering at Paris, he returned hither to London, to kindle the fier in France.

Yet in these preparations for warre, Edward gaue scope to his loues, for in the beginning of this warre, he instituted the order of the garter, with this motto, Hony soit qui maly pense, in honor of the Countesse of Salisbury, honoring in her the chastitie which he could neuer receiue by all his amorous practises. He armes on both sides, in Guienne and Normandie. The Duke of Lancaster, general of the army in Guienne, takes Villefranche of Agnois, Angoulême, S. Byle, with many other townes & Castells, to whome Philip opposeth his son John duke of Normandie, who recouers Angoulême & Villefranche fro the English.

By the greatest burthen of the warre fell vpon Normandie, whether Edward led the flower of all his Nobility, landing in the Countrie of Cotantin, with about a thousand saile. Arthur sent his heires all to fier and sword, takes the Towne of Carentan, by force kills all hee found armed or disarmed: spoiles, burnes and razeth the Towne. In the champion Countie he puts all to the sword, saying, that he did offer those sacrifices, to Bacon, Perffy & his other seruants, being vniuilly massacred by Philip. The reason was, for that the heads of these men stood vpon the cheefegate of Carentan. Then he takes and spoiles, S. Lo, and (after a great fight) he becomes master of Caen, with such a terror, as Filaife, Lisieux & Honfleur fled vnto him without any resistance. These townes being taken, he marcheth into the Ile of France, to drawe Philip to battaile, proclaiming generally that he called him

1346. to fight in the view of all France, at the great Theater of his chiefe cittie of Paris.

At the same time, by the like practises, Flanders rebelled, by means of James of Armentille, who was more then a passionate partaker of Edwards. So the disordered passion of this desperate seditious man, was a trappe for his owne ruine. For as he not onely laboured by all meanes to shake off the French yoke, but also grew so audacious, as to perswade the Flemings to leaue their naturall obedience to their Earle, and to receiue a new Lord, such a one as the King of England should appoint: the Flemings much displeased with this insolent proposition of Armentille, (as the bloud of a faithfull subiect can neuer denie his Prince) they fall furiously vpon him in open assembly; and without any further proceffe, they kill him, reuenging vpon him the mischiefs they had committed by his pernicious counsels. Thus in the end, this Tribune receiued the guerdon due to such as abuse the furie of an enchanted multitude, making them the instruments of their passions against their superiours. This iust execution crossed Edwards designs in Flanders, and gaue the Earle meanes to repaire to Philip with his forces, and to consecrate his life to him, the which he lost in this voyage.

Philip slept not during these proceedings of Edwards. he had gathered together one of the goodliest armies that euer was seene in France, consisting of French, Lorraines, Germains and Genouois: he which he led towards Meulan, where Edward said, he attended to fight with him. Edward retires vpon this alarm: They imagined that he fled for feare, but the issue will shew, that the great God of armies had appointed his victorie in another place. He retires, and Philip followes, who in the end ouertakes him at a village called Armentille: a remarkable name, to shew that all the trust of humane forces, and all the desseignes of mans pollicie, are like vnto a quicksand. Philip's great armie hauing the aduantage of being at home, presumed of an assured victorie. Edward retired to get the riuier of Somme at Blamquetaque, but he must fight for the passage. Philip had already seized thereon by Condemar of Eure, with a thousand horse, and 6000. foote, the most part of them Crosbow men: yet Edward resolved to passe or dye. With this resolution he leapes into the water, and cries out; He that loues me, let him follow me. At this speech they all plunge into the riuier, without any stay, so as presently the English recouer the bankes. Condemar troubled at this gallant resolution, amazeth his men with his terrified countenance. All giue way to the English, who (incountering out men in disorder) charge the rereward; but the retreat was neere, at Albenville, and S. Riquier, places vnder our obedience. The losse was not so great as the disgrace, yet was it a preface of a greater mischiefe which followed France. These poore men arrive at Albenville in a throng, all distempered with the amazement of this shamefull and vnfortunate flight. Philip exceedingly transported with this disgracefull retreat, resolves to be reuenged of Edward, to follow him, and to drave him to battaile. His counsell aduised him rather to rest his troopes some time, to take breath, that they might recouer their spirits, and in the meane time to let Edward alone, and to obserue his countenance: but hardly had he the patience to stay one day at Albenville, to repaire the bridge, ouer which his armie was to passe; but his drummes found a marche, going to seeke Edward (like a Strange that flies) and to giue him but life at what price so euer; puffed vp with a certaine hope of an infallible and triumphant victorie. But he had not made his account with God, who is not called the God of armies in vaine, who rules combats, and disposeth of the victories of great Monarkes, notwithstanding all their counsels, desseignes, courage and endeauours.

The armies were in view one of another. Edward had lodged his armie, and stood vpon his guard, with a wonderfull care, being in the Countie of Ponthieu, (a countie belonging vnto himselfe, by the right of his mother) incamped in a village named Creey: the which he intrenched and fortified carefully, both with trees cut out of the neighbour Forrest, and trenches wherewith he had strengthened his campe. His armie was about thirty thousand men, but their order, industrie, and resolution made them double. He gaue the foreward to Prince Edward his sonne, being yet very young, and for a guide, that Geoffrey of Harcourt, who (as we haue said) was retired vnto him; to whom he had giuen the office of Constable of England. The battaile he giues to the Duke of Suffolke, and reserved the rereward

A to himselfe, hauing placed his crosbowemen in front, and next ranked his horse, putting in the foremost rankes his battell axes and maces, and behinde his Lances: so as euery parte of the armie should fight, when as they came to ioyne, to their best aduantage. So much may order and foresight doe vnder that great God of battailes, without whome it is in vaine to order armies.

Philip's armie was farre greater, of a goodlier shewe, and more aduantage: consisting of about three score thousand fighting men, well armed with an infinite number of noble men, as Charles Earle of Aranson, brother to the King, Lewis King of Bohemia and duke of Luxembourg, Charles Earle of Blois Nephew to the King, Raoul Duke of Lorraine, the Earles of Flanders, Neuers and Sancerre, the Duchesse of Viennois, and many Barons, and gentlemen, in number about three thousand, who were come at the call of this new King, to the first fruites of his new possession: against him who contended for the Crowne.

His aduantage was far greater then that of Edwards, who fought in another mans countie. But in truth the commodities and titles hee had in France, did balance this aduantage, but with a different consideration. Vpon the Eve of this battaile, Armentille Earle of Sauois arrives with a thousand men at armes; as if all things had conspired to make Philip a conquerour.

Philip full of hope of an assured victorie, desires to fight, placing his armie in this order.

C He giues the foreward to his brother Charles Earle of Aranson, the rereward to the Earle of Sauois; and hee himselfe commands the battaile. But his desire to fight was so great, as he held euery little stay for a great delay. They gaue it out in the army, that the English fledde: so as they now vaunted of a victorie, euery one disposing of the English, according to his humour: but in searching out the reason of this brute, Philip thinks it good to discourte his enemies countenance.

Behold suddenly he receiues a contrary aduise. His scouts report, that Edward had already taken the field, & ordered his armie, attending the battaile. Then there was no hold Philip will needs fight, hardly can they hold a counsell standing about him, to aduise what they had to doe in so notable an occurrent: and euen halt (the stepdame of better affaires) would not suffer them to resolve. For at the last, instant, as the King had aduerisement of Edwards readinesse to fight, Philip (without any breathing) would haue led forth his army to battaile.

The King of Bohemia aduised him to refresh his men before the fight, and that his foete (consisting of crossebowes, and a good part of them Genouois, which were held to be resolute men) should make the front, and the horse should followe according to the appointed order. At the last they obtained so much respite of the King, as to seele their men speedely.

This done, they all prepare to another feast. The foreward made the first head, where Charles Earle of Aranson the Kings brother commaunded. But behold presently an vnfortunate occasion of a ruinous disorder. The Earle of Aranson (against the order decreed in Counsell) mistook that the Genouois foote men were in the first ranks, and makes them to change their places with some disgrace, saying, that it belonged not vnto them: and yet on this push depended all on their side. The Genouois discontented with his repulse, not onely fainted in courage, but also fell into a rage, so as changing their places, they cried out for anger, as giuing a signe to the enemy of their bitter discontent. This was seconded with another accident, as if Heauen had fauored the English. Suddenly there fell a great shower of raine, and then the burning Sunne appeared out of a cloud with a rainbowe.

In this forced and despitfull changing of places, the Genouois couered not their bowes, so as the strings being presently wet, they yeilded: and to increase the mischiefe, this alteration made them to change the order of their battaile, so as the Sunne lay in the Frenchmens faces and on the English mens backs: and to make their misfortune absolute, euery one was more incensed against his commander then against the enemy,

Description of the battaile of Creey.

Remarkable circumstances in this great battaile.

1346. as a signe of some check at hand. Dangerous imaginations, they being ready to fight. Philip A was sufficiently aduertised of the armies disdaine against his brother, yet must hee needes fight: he held himselfe lost, if all were not lost.

Edward (who stood vpon a high eminent place, as it were in sentinell, to discouer with iudgement the countenance of the enemy) sees this change; heares the shout, and markes the place: resolving to charge it at the weakest part. The euent fauours his desseigne, he embraceth this occasion, not suffering them to take breath, or to repayre this error: he sends forth a troupe of crossebow men, chosen out of the foremost rankes: they sodenly discharge a shoure of arrowes, so thicke and violent, as at this first charge the Geneuoi (who were transported with choler, and surprised with this sodaine storme) brake their rankes and gaue way to the enemy: their wet strings beeing vnfit to serue, and their mindes not yet pacified, could not resist so great a force.

The battaile
of Crecy.

The Earle of Alanfon, incensed much against the Geneuoi for thus giuing backe, doubting his choler against them, crying on, like a desperate man. Go go (sayes he) my friends, let vs charge these English horse, making our way ouer the bellies of these Geneuoi, who do but hinder vs. And without any longer stay he gallops through the Geneuoi foote, who began to gather themselves againe together, according to their discipline.

The Geneuoi finding themselves wronged with this new affront, crie out againe, like desperate men, being impatient of any disgrace, so as strining to breake their bowes in a rage, they make way for the horse, who passe through them.

The Earle of Alanfon (being followed by the Dukes of Lorraine and Sauoy, and by the Dolphin of Viennois) ranne with such fury and haste, as they were out of breath, before they came to charge the enemy: whom they found in better order, his horse being flanked on the one side, with a good troupe of foote, with bowes and crossebowes, whose strings had not felt the raine like to the Geneuoi.

This troupe of French horse (being very violent at the first charge) was to be feared: but they were sodainly stayed by a storme of English arrowes, which gaue both horse and men and for a supply, behold a newe troupe of English comes, to succour them that were engaged in the fight, and to increase the mischief. Yong Edward chargeth the French with another band of horsemen, and his crossebow men in flanke, being placed on the one side to fauour their horse, and to ioyne their arrowes (which played continually) with the cotes, telas, matles, and lances of their horsemen.

The which, not onely prolonged the parle, but also encreased the losse of the French, being charged on all sides. The Combat growes hot, being very equal in valour and courage, but not in force, by reason of the troupes of rescue, which Edward kept for the last charge.

Philip seeing his brother engaged among so many enemies, runs to his rescue. At his arrival the fight is doubled, the English bending their forces against Philip, and the French against yong Edward.

Philip is ouerthrowne vnder his horse (the which was slayne with many arrowes); but he was presently rescued, by John Earle of Beaumont: and then all the French crye out, that the King should retyre himselfe out of the Combat.

This crye (proceeding from yoll and well affected Frenchmen) gaue courage to the English being in fight, seeing the King in this danger.

Yong Edward was in no lesse perill, being compassed in on all sides, by the French, and assisted by his owne, so as they (fearing the euent of this charge) send to his father to succour him: who presently demanded of the messenger, What blowe, what wound hath my sonne receiued? hath he bene ouerthrowne? But vnderstanding that there was no such danger, and that they onely feared the worst. Returne (sayes he) unto him, with this charge. Let him either vanquish, or die: and I will be a witnesse of his valour, to second him when neede shall require.

A noble speech of Edward.

Prince Edward and his men encouraged with this message, doubled both their courage and their blowes, and behold they are relieved with a fresh supply. Then the party be- came vnequall, these men being fresh and lusty, charge the wearied, and tyred, who see no

A hope of succours, but discovered a great groue of horse of rescue: wherein Edward the fa- 1346. ther beheld the sport, and kept the stakes.

Despaire should haue made our French troupes resolute to hazard all (as it hath chanced in other times) but their hearts fainted with their bodies. For this last battaillon (where Edward remained), coming from the hill, and charging our men without any great resistance, gaue the last blow, as checke and mate to our men already much disordered.

Then they all giue way, all are disordered, all disperfed. The slaughter is generall without respect of persons, the butchery is so bloody, as in the ende Edward (hauing compaission of so great effusion of blood) cries out to spare the rest: yet he was not able by these first cries to stay the souldiers from so easie an execution; who cut in peeces those poore runaways here and there, like scattered sheepe.

In the end Edward founds a retreat, and riding vp and downe, he doubles his command to kill no more, although in effect, the night and the wearinesse of the victors made an end of this execution.

So all were not slaine, but all overcome. Some troupes saued themselves in this general ouerthrowe, hauing neere places for a fauourable retreat. King Philip after this vnexpected defeat of so goodly an armie, being fallen from his hope, followed with a small troupe, saued himselfe at Bray: whether coming by night, and approaching neere the walles, the gouernour (being in armes vpon so notable an occasion) cries out, Who is there? Philip saues himselfe. Philip answers, The Fortune of France. Being knowne by his voice, the gates were presently

fect of the French.

Philip saues himselfe.

C ly opened, but not without terrible cries and lamentations of his poore subiects, flocking about him like his poore children. Shall it in like sort be lawfull for mee to weepe in the remembrance hereof, being moued by the bitter apprehension of our present losses? O my country, it is not at this day alone that we mourne for thy miseries. King Philip then comforts them with a resolute countenance, and intreats them to hope for better. Hee was to be commended in this, that he despaired not in the apparent despaire of his affaires. He is resolute in this great calamity.

Hauing stayed at Bray some howre to take breath, he retires withal speed to Amiens.

The number of the dead was great, they hold for certaine, that there were slaine about thirty thousand men vpon the place: and the flower of all the French Nobility died or was takē there: as Charles Earle of Alanfon the Kings brother, Lewis of Luxembourg King of Bohemia, Charles Earle of Blois the Kings Nephew, Raoul Duke of Lorraine, Lewis Earle of Flanders, James Dauphin of Viennois the sonne of Imbert, the Eatles of Sancerre and Harcourt, with many Earles, Barons and gentlemen to the number of fifteene hundred. This miserable defeat happened in the yeare 1346. the 26. of August. A moneth famous by the euent of many miseries within this Realme.

The number of the dead.

Edward King of England had all the markes of an absolute victorie: as the place of battell, the enseignes, many of the greatest commanders his prisoners, and in a manner all, except the Soueraigne (whom the bounty of God reserued for this Realme) the campe, the spoiles, the bodies of the vanquished, which could not be buried but by his mercie.

Some examine the causes and motiues of this great defeat, the which they attribute to the choler, hast and rashnesse of the King and his Brother. Truly hasty & rash heat is the stepdame of great actions, especially in warre, where the Captaines iudgement is more auaileable then the souldiers force. But why ascend we not from these second causes (true in that which doth concerne vs) vnto the first and soueraigne cause? The arme of the Eternal, purging this Realme full of vicious and corrupted humours, letting it blood, but not suffering it to die, this bloud letting shalbe the beginning of a stronger medicine prescribed by the same Phisition; & ministred vnto France, in the following raignes, but in the end we shal finde the operation, to the recouery of our estate. Let vs now see the progresse of our miseries.

The causes of this losse.

Edward did all he could to manage this victory wisely, & Philip to preuent him, Edward without any stay passeth on, & without attempting the great Citties of Amiens & Abbeuille, although neerer, he makes shew to set vpon Monstreuil & Bologne, but he posted to Calais a fit place for the passage of England, John of Vienne Marshall of France, & with him the Lord of Andreghan, great personages in those daies commanded there, with a strong French gar- nison

mon, being assited with the faithfull resolution of the inhabitants. So, presently after the battaile of Creffy Edward did besiege the Towne of Calais. A long siege, painfull and of remarkable successe.

Philip amazed with these sharp crosses fallen out beyond his hopes of ease, slept not, although it were with much paine and lesse fruite. But his whole care was not for the overthrowe at Creffy. He had a further reach, following the trace of this vnfortunate losse. Hee was entred into a newe inheritance: this newe losse was to him a newe checke. Affliction is a great crime both in great and small, and opens their mouthes which haue their hearts ill affected. The people of France were in extreme pouertie: and yet the necessity of the Kings affaires forced them to a new charge. The ill gouernment of the publike nature: the falsehoode of the Treasurers (who enriched themselves by the pouertie of the miserable people,) the fall of money imbafed, the decay of trafficke, the increase of taxes, imposts & subsidies, were the causes of this general want: the which drew the people into dispaire, in this surcharge of troubles falling vpon the King. This burthen grewe the more heauie by a great famine, being followed by a strange generall plague, throughout the whole realme, as if heauen and earth had conspired to the ruine of France.

Philip inuironed with so many, and so great difficulties, continues constant, with a valorous resolution against them all. He prouids for the gard of the Citties of Picardy, lying neereit vnto danger and (to driue off the time vsit for armes,) he calles a great assembly of his estates, to take Councell, aide and comfort in the perplexity of so many dangerous occurrents.

In this assembly it was decreed, to call the Treasurers to an accompt, and to refer the gouernment of the treasure to Clergie men, & to the Nobility. Therby to free the people from all iealousie of ill employing it. The Abbots of Marmouster and Corbie, are chosen for this Intendancie: and to assist them, there are ioyned foure Bishops and foure knights. Peter of Eflurs Treasurer of France is committed to prison, & condemned in a great fine to the King. Many treasurers being condemned (iustly or vniustly) yeeld that at once which they had bin long in gathering, the sponge being then pressed by necessity. The Bankers, Lombards & other vsurers are then called to a strict accompt, by reason of their vnust exactions. The interests are proued to exceede the principall, the which is fortaired to the King. The interest is remitted to the debtor, which payed the principall. But the chief fruite of this assembly was, that the whole body was well inclined to succor the King in so vrgent a necessity, without any alteration for the new difficulties of State.

Thus the winter was spent without any memorable acte on either side. In the spring Philip goes to field with a great army, and approcheth neere vnto Calais, to drawe Edward to fight: but it was in vaine: for Edward contenting himselfe with his victorie, and not willing to run the hazard of a second battaile, kept himselfe within his trenches, and to manifest his resolution vnto Philip, he built houes about Calais to lodge his army drie, & sends for his wife, professing publicly by a solemne oth, not to rise vntill he did see an end, and make the inhabitants pay for their obdurate resolution.

On the other side Philip labored to crosse Edwards desseines, but with small successe. To worke a diuersion of this siege, hee makes war in England, by the King of Scotland meanes, and in Flanders, by his sonne John, then Duke of Normandy, and afterwards King of France: but all succeeded ill.

David King of Scotland (hauing by Philips perswasion, entred and spoyled England) was defeated, taken & brought prisoner to London, through the happinesse of Edwards fortune, and the diligence of his officers, John Duke of Normandie, hauing left Guienne by his fathers command, comes into Flanders, beseegeth the Towne of Cassel, held by the English faction: but he is forced to rise, by the within the Towne: Then he falls vpon Lisle, where, he hath a newe repulse, so as hardly could he retyre himselfe to his father Philip, who sees his subjects in danger of shipwracke, yet could he not releue them.

Guienne abandoned by John, for the action of Flanders, suffered much: for Henry of Lancaster Lieutenant for Edward in Guienne, (seeing the Country left weake by Johns departure) issues out of Bordeaux with an army, and finding no enemy, he doth easily surpris

many

A many Townes of Xantorge and Faitou, and laden with spoile he returnes home.

In the ende Calais yeelds to Edward, standing to his mercy, after a long and cruell famine, and almost a whole yeares siege (for the siege began the 30. of September. 1346. and the Towne was yeelded vp in August. 1347.

The French garrison was put to ranfome, and to set at liberty: the Inhabitants were worse intreated, the baser sort onely were suffred to depart with what they could carrie about them: and in their steed Edward sends a Colony of English, to whome he distributed all the goods of the vanquished, and fortified the Towne, especially towards France: to leaue this place hereditary to his posterity, who held it 200. yeares that is from the yeare. 1346. vnto the raige of Henry the 2. father to the King last deceased.

B The integrity of these poore inhabitants is remarkable in their extreme affliction, Edward had referred six of the chiefe Cittizens, to be at his disposition, for the satisfiing of his oath: hauing vowed, to make the blood to flowe in Calais. He demands them to this end, a cording to the conuentions. This charge being deliuered in the Towne house (where these miserable Bourgeois were assembled, by his permission, to giue their Countie their last farewell) they gaze one on another, terrified with so pittifull a condition. As they all stood in this common calamity, one of the troupe breaking this mournfull silence: Seeing (saith he) I haue so often employed my life for my Countie's good, should I nowe feare to sacrifice it for my last obligation? O my Countrymen I doe cheerfully offer my head to the King of England's service, and will liue no longer in my Countie's miserie. This hee spake without

C traires, and with so resolute a countenance, and a browe so manly big, as hee moued the whole company. so as all with one generall voice crye: Let vs go to the death; it is the last duty we can performe to our poore Countie. Immediately there was pressing among this great multitude, who should be of the six, to carry their heads to Edwards triumph. They were chosen out, drawn, bound and led to execution. The Queene hauing notice thereof, desired to see them; who were brought bound in the executioners hands. This spectacle moued her to weepe, and compassion caused her to beg a pardon of the King, beseeching him to giue life to these men worthy to liue after so constant a loyalty. She obtayne her request, and leaue for them to remayne still in Calais, esteemed to continue faithfull to their deliuerer, who had shewed themselves so constant in the faithfull leue of their last countie. The history did owe this digression to so commendable an act. The same Sonne brought Edward a wished successe in Brittaine: touching the quarrell for

D the Duchie, Philip had taken John of Montfort, and Edward in exchange tooke Charles of Blou, whome he led into England, and still weakeneth Philips authoritie in Britain, and settles his owne. Thus passe the affaires of this world, euery one hath his turne. The two Duchesses of Britain, Ioane the wife of John of Montfort, and Ioane the wife of Charles of Blou, did wonders in keeping those places they had in their possession, during the imprisonments of their husbands: without entering farther into the discourse of the female wars of these Amazons, worthy yet of eternall memory, hauing so courageously releued the afflictions of their imprisoned husbands, and neuer yeelded to necessity.

E Flanders likewise grewe mutinous, by Edwards practices, being then greatly respected for the successe of his victorious armes. The Flemings receiued their Earle Lewis of Malle without any opposition, being soune to that Lewis which was slaine at Creffy, but the Kings of France and England contended who should winne him. Lewis was in heart a Frenchman: The Citties were generally affected to England. The marriage of this young Prince was great: Edward desired him for his daughter; but especially the oportunitie of this rich Countie, for his affaires. He comes himselfe to Gand, to compasse his desire, but the count was not answerable: for although the Earle made shewe to embrace this alliance, at the great instance of his subjects: yet his heart was otherwise affected, who (vnder colour to goe to the Heron, goes out of Gand with a smal traine, & flies to Paris, to his wife, who hauing receiued him gratioisly, perswades him to espouse Marguerit the second Daughter of the Duke of Brabant, thereby to cut off all hope of marrying with England.

Thus the hatred of these two Princes continued: which in the ende must breake forth into hostile effects. Picardy was the stage of their lamentable tragedies: & from thence the 1348. miserie was disperfed ouer the whole Realme. Philip giues the gouernement to Geoffry A Earle of Charny, & the Lieutenancy to Anthony of Montmorency. They fortifie the Towns and bridle Calais, being allifted by a great number of voluntary Nobility, louing the command of thefe two great captaines, as a fchoole of military difcipline; to fhewe that the French did not faint in their afflictions.

Thefe loffes were then repaired by the gaine of the country of Daulphiné, one of the nobleft and goodlieft Prouinces of this Realme. And this was the occafion. Imbert of Vmber Daulphin of Viennois, hauing loft his eldeft fonne in the battell of Crefly (as I haue faid) and his yongeft being two or three yeares old, by a ftrange accident (they fay that he himfelfe let him fall out of his armes, as he plaide with him at a window, thinking to feare him) & moreover hauing Amé the 6. Earle of Sauoy, an irreconcilable & fpitefull enemy, being too weake to refift him, nor able to make choife of a kinfman to repaie his eftate (being weane of the world and decayed in iudgement) he refolues to caft himfelfe into the King of France his protection, to oppofe him againft his enemy, and to put this goodly inheritance into his hands, thereby to preuent the Eales greedy defire. Forthwith hauing aduerted Philip of his intention, and being graciously intertayned by him, he giues all the Countie of Daulphiné to him and his fuccellors Kings of France: vpon condition, that the firft fon of the houfe of France fhould carry the name of Daulphin of Viennois, & the armes of the country of Daulphiné fhould be quartered with the armes of France; & that the Nobility & whole country fhould be receiued with their priuileges. Amé Earle of Sauoy, otherwife a deare friend to Philip, fends his Embaffadors to make his benefit of this exchange, but it was not for him: all that he could obtaine, was to exchange fome land with that which laie intermixt within his territories adioyning, the better to lue in quiet afterwaris.

Daulphin incorporated to the crowne.

Daulphiné was thus incorporated to the Crowne of France. For we cannot with any reafon doubt, but in old time it was a member of this our Monarchy, as likewife Sauoy was. but in thefe diuerfities of portions, vnder the children of Lewis the gentle, as we haue noted before, the Realme and Empire, fwallowing vp both the clefett & the name of the Realme of Arles (in the which thefe Eftates were comprehended) haue maintayned themfelves by a remarkable diftinction: and fo vnder the authority of the Empire, they haue fince held their fouerainety, not acknowledging any Emperour but their Princes, Daulphiné is returned to his firft original, and Sauoy maintaines it felfe vnder the obedience of his foueraigne Prince vnto this day.

As for the name of Daulphin, giuen to the firft fonne of France, the execution of Prince Imberts will was not put in praftice, before Charles the fitte fonne to John then Duke of Normandy, in the life of his father Philip, and not giuen to John in the yeare 1348.

The yeare following, the City of Montpellier, one of the goodlieft of the Prouince of Languedoc, was purchafed by Philip, of James King of Majorca to whom it belonged. The obferuations of this firft authority of the Kings of Majorca are yet remarkable in the priuileges of the commonaltie of this goodly City, delectable for the fertile fiteuation & famous being the goodlieft Theater for Phifick in Europe. Thus in the affaires of this world, there is time to loofe, and time to win, that men might feafon their fpirits with this temperature, neither to be dioued with aduerfity, nor drunke with profperity.

The towne of Montpellier purchafed to the crowne.

Queene Isabe of France dies

In the flowing and ebbing of thefe gaines and loffes, one balancing an other, Isabe Queene of France wife to Philip died, leauing him two fonnes, for gages of her loue, moft worthy to be noted in the marriages of our Kings, John Duke of Normandy, and Philip Earle of Flanders, whereof the firft (already of yeares) gouerned the affaires of the Realme in his fathers life, and fhall fucceed him in the Crowne, and Philip fhall be Duke of Orleans. This ifue might haue contented Philip, being very old and broken: yet before the yeare was ended he married Blanche the Daughter of Philip of Eureux, King of Nauarre, who had an other Daughter, Margaret, married to Gafcon of Foix, from whom fhall fpring Charles King of Nauarre, the fcouge of this Realme, in the fucceeding raignes.

But Philip did not long enioy this vnneceffary marriage: the which was a fecond burthen to his yeares and toyles, fo as he fell extremely ficke at Nogent. and hauing recommended concord and the care of his Realme to his 2. fons, leauing the crowne to John his eldeft

John hee yielded vp his foule to God, the threescore and fiftie yeare of his age, and of grace. 350. in the moneth of Auguft, hauing raigned. 23. yeares. A Prince whole great vertues were balanced with great vices: for he was deuout, quicke, hardy, valiant, refole in danger, couragious in affliction, louing order, iuftice and the people. But the pretumption of his valour, and his refolution often inclining to rafhenefle, choler and impatience, intercepted thefe vertues, and were the caufes of great miferies, both to him and his fubjects.

1350. Philip dies.

His difpofition

Truie he could not auoide it, but in taking poffeffion of fo great and enuied an inheritance, and hauing fo ftrong an aduerfary in front, he muft indure many croffes: but thofe inexcufable imperfettions caufed him to fuffer much more then he had done, if he had befted his authoritie with iudgement and patience, and incountred his aduerfary already vanquifhed, with modiftie and wifdome.

During the forepaffed raignes, fince the yeare. 1300. Neither the Empire nor the Church of Rome, were in any better Eftate: by the ftrange alterations of diuers changes, which happened in thefe two States: feeking to ruine one an other vnto the ende of this raigue. We haue left this difcours at the Empire of Albert the x. Duke of Auftria, to whom Pope Boniface. 8. gaue the title and the armes of France in difdaine of Philip the faire, who caufed him to bee inuefted after an other fort, by Felix of Nogaret, then hee would doe the Emperour of his realme. Albert liued not long after the imagination of this new royaltie, for hee was flaine foone after by his Nephew John Duke of Suenia, whome he had fpoiled of his Duchie, vnder colour that (being too prodigall,) hee could not gouerne it as was requifite.

Eftate of the Empire and Church.

Henry. 7. Duke of Luxembourg fucceeded Albert, being chofen with great affection of the German Princes, who feared leaft Philip the faire fhould feize vpon the Empire, by the Popes fauour being then a Frenchman, both by nation and difpofition, and refident at Auignon. But hauing vexed himfelfe with thofe inueterate diffentions of Guelphs and Gibbelins, in the ende he was poisoned by a Monke called Bernard, a Iacobin, vnder colour of giuing him the Sacrament in the Communion, at Beneuent in the yeare. 1313. To increafe this confufion, Lewis of Bauiere and Frederic of Auftria the fonne of Albert, contend for the Empire by open force: but they agreed to hold it by equall authoritie. Yet this diffention was foone reuined, by the meanes of Pope John. 22. borne at Cahors in Quercy, refident at Auignon: who (feeking to hold a foueraine authoritie ouer both, and to difpofe the Empire to whome he pleafed, entertayned this hatred betwixt thefe two Princes, the which burft out into open warre. Frederic was taken by Lewis in the yeare. 1323. who (fuppofing to bee now abfolute in the Empire) fodenly fallies into new troubles by the fame Pope John, who did excommunicate him, for that he would not refigne the Imperiall Popes dignitie into his hand to difpofe foueraignely thereof at his pleafure.

An Emperour poisoned very ftrangely.

Two Com-petitors for the Empire.

Diffention betwixt the Emperour & Popes.

This new affront gaue Lewis of Bauiere occafion to examine the Popes authoritie, by the learned, and to raife a mightie army to fuppreffe him. So hee came into Italie to oppofe the force of the Empire againft the Popes excommunications, and to giue a Lawe to the Sea of Rome, which fought to controule him. John fled at this alarum. The Colledge of Cardinalls affemble, and vpon the Emperours complaint they depofe John, as a fugitiue, and create Nicholas 4. in his place. But there followes a ftrange alteration. John returnes and doth difpoffeffe Nicholas, but in the ende death furprifeth John, whome Benedict. 12. doth fucceede a Tholoufane, and to Benedict. Clement. 6. a Limofin, who begins more violently againft the Emperour then his Predeceffor John: for he caufed Charles Marquis of Morbaw, to be chofen in his place, being fonne to Lewis King of Bohemia and Duke of Luxembourg, of whome wee haue fpoken in this raigue. So all the world was turmoyled with a generall confufion in this age, the which drawes after it a long traine of ftrange calamities.

From 1308. to 1350.

1350.

He difficulties falling in the raigne of Philip of Valois (the which we haue represented) are but trifles in regarde of the horrible tragicke confusions, wherewith the following raignes haue bene afflicted, vnder John, Charles the 5., Charles the 6., and Charles the 7. I will adde also vnder Lewis the 11. vnto the warre of the common-wealth it selfe, the last fit of this intestine disease, the which shall cease for that time. So we will reckon a hundred and twelue yeares, of the most wretched time, that ciuill warres could breed in the bowels of this miserable State. The which begins not in our time onely to doe penance, cyther for the weaknesse of Kings, or the folly of subiects, or by the malice of such as haue abused both the one and the other; to serue their execrable passions. By the effects, we shall obserue what a good King is in an estate, and how pernicious the command of many is in a common-weale, who (hauing power in the loueraigne authoritie) abuse the people with a shew of the common good, an ordinarie cloake for such as fish in troubled waters. We shall see, by the vnruly euent of the contempt of royall authoritie (the King being eyther a prisoner, or sick in iudgement) what a body is without a head, a realme without a King well obeyed, and a multitude gouerned by it selfe. A subiect susceptible of all impressions (but of bad rather then good, though alwaies couered with a shew of good) an instrument of all mischiefs in an Estate, when as (transported, by violent and disordered passions, couered with a shew of common good) it is not restrained with the reynes of a lawfull authoritie: I meane a multitude, a dangerous beast with many heads, doing commonly more harme then good. We shall see heere what counsellours of State, the ambition and couetousnesse of great men be: especially when women entermedle, armed with the shew of publike authoritie: and to conclude, we shall confesse by a sound iudgement of this discourse, that all things done in our age were done before.

A briefe

51. King of France.

17

A A briefe preface for the greatnesse of the subiect, yet necessary for that which is represented in these raignes, the which we will note according to their occurrences.

The raigne of John.

John the eldest sonne of Philip of Valois succeeded his father in the yeare 1350. and reigned fourteen yeares. He had made a long apprenticeship in managing the affaires of the Realme vnder his father Philip; but he neither ruled better nor more happily. His manners shall be known by his actions. He had for sonnes by Joane Countesse of Boulogne, Charles, Lewis, John, Philip, and one Daughter named Joane. Charles his eldest sonne was Duke of Normandy in his fathers life, and Duke of Normandy, and after him King of France. Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, and Philip called the hardy, first he was Earle of Touaine, and after (through his brothers fauour) Duke of Burgogne, and Earle of Flanders, in the right of his wife. Joane was married to Charles King of Nauarre and Earle of Eureux: Princes which shall play their partes vpon this Theater, in euery scene of the Tragedy that I am to represent, and for this reason they are to be obserued in the beginning.

His children and the most remarkable personages in this raigne.

This Charles King of Nauarre was sonne to Lewis Earle of Eureux, and of Joane daughter to King Lewis Hutin, who by the sufferance of Philip the long, her vnckle, succeeding to the Crowne, remayned Queene of Nauarre, and by this right Charles her sonne carried both the title and effect of the Realme, with many other great inheritances: A Prince of the blood royall both by father and mother, and sonne in lawe to King John, hauing married Joane his onely Daughter. A man of a subtil spirit, eloquent, active, vigilant, but ambitious, vnfaithfull, malicious, reuengefull, armed with the prerogative of his blood and the great meane he inioyed, to be a pernicious instrument to trouble the King & his Realme, beyond all measure, but in the end he shall receiue a due reward for his actions, by a death worthy of his life.

Charles King of Nauarre, the source of this calamity: The humours of Charles of Nauarre.

After *John*s coronation at Rheims, with his wife Joane, being returned to Paris, he began his raigne by a famous act of an vnfortunate preface: for he caused Raoul Earle of Eu, and of Guines to be beheaded in prison, vpon light accusations, as hauing intelligence with the English, and that he betrayed his affaires, for that he had passed and repassed into France vpon his faith giuen during his imprisonment. He was Constable of France.

A mournful beginning of his raigne.

John aduanced Charles of Spaine to his place, grand child to the King of Castile, and son in Law to the Earle of Blois, and so allied to the King, and exceedingly beloued of him amongst all his greatest fauourits. He shalbe the first frutes of many miseries, when as this raigne promised some rest, vnder a King of age and experience, fit to gouerne a Realme. For as John was busye to institute the order of the Knights of the Starre (in the ende growne so common, as it remains a badge for the Knight of the watch and his Archers vnto this day) there chanced a great misfortune to this Constable.

Charles of Nauarre complained, that the King detayned fro him the Counties of Champagne and Frie, belonging to his mother by the same title that the kingdome of Nauarre did. This was true, but by reason of their neerenesse vnto Paris, the Kings counsell had vnto these Earledomes vnto the Crowne, and giuen in exchange the Townes of Mintz and Meslan, with a pension answerable to the reuenues of the said Earledomes, without any pretence to the Nauarrois. But he sought an occasion for a cause, smothering some mischief in pretence in his hart, the which he discovered by many effects. Not daring to complain directly of the king, he quarrelled with the Constable, as the chiefe of the Council, of whom he was exceeding iealous, for the priuate fauour the King did beare him. Hauing taken Council with his passio, he caused the Constable to be slaine in his bed, at Aligle in Normandie, but with so great a presumption, as he himselfe came vnto the place accompanied with his brother Philip of Nauarre, John Earle of Harcourt and his brethren, and with many Gentlemen his followers. This murder thus audaciously committed, he retires himselfe easily to Eureux (whereof he was Earle) from whence he writes to the good Counties of the Realme, auouching this murder as done by his command, and iustifying it as lawfull and reasonable.

Charles of Nauarre discontented.Charles of Spaine Constable of France slaine in his bed by the King of Nauarre.

King John found himselfe much wronged, but not able then to redresse it, he promised to remit the fact, so as he would aske pardon with the reuerence due to his royall maiesty.

An imagined pardon.

The

The which Charles is content to doe, but vpon good gages holding the Kings word A insufficient to secure his person. So as John giues him Lewis his second sonne for hostage.

The Nauarrois comes to Paris, he presents himselfe to the Kings Councell, and seeks to giue some reason for this murder: yet the Councell condemnes him as guilty of high Treason, & decrees that he should be committed to prison. James of Fourbon Earle of March (newly advanced to the office of Constable) laies hold on him, and puts him in gards; but all this was but for a shewe, to maintaine the publike respect: for presently the three Queenes go to the King. (Jane daughter to Lewis Huttin his mother in law; Blanche widow to Phillip of Valois, and Jane daughter to King John, Queene of Nauarre, his wife) Charles likewise came himselfe, and falls vpon his knees before the King: both he and they B seeme to weepe, and to sue for mercy of King John; who had already granted his pardon, vpon good assurance: John grants his request, yet could he not command his heart to leaue this malicious ialousie, the which made him to seeke new occasions daylie to crosse his father in Lawes actions.

He then offers his seruice to the King of England, who failes not to imbrace this occasion, hauing the heart and hand of a Prince of the bloud, whose power was great in the State. Vpon this assurance he sends Edward his eldest sonne Prince of Wales into Guienne, with a goodly armie: a yong man of an exceeding hope. And giues him for counsell, John Shandos, Robert Knowles, Francis Hall and John of Arondel, great men in their times, and which shalbe famous in those actions which shall follow.

He attended the end of truce, the which being expired he enters Guienne, and passeth in to Lamendec, to Thelouise, Narbonne, & ouer al he spoiles, takes, kills, and finds no resistance, and returnes without difficulty to Bordeaux, being loaden with spoiles.

At the same instant another cloud of English men breakes out of Calis, and spoiles the Country of Picardy: but John by these skirmishes foresees the tempest of a greater warre, measuring the forces of England by the will of King Edward his assured and tryed enemy.

He therefore seekes a remedie by an ordinarie course: he calls a generall Parliament, to take Councell and comfort from them in these newe occurrents.

Charles of Nauarre assists: but with an intent to crosse the Kings proceedings by indirect practices, and to withdrawe the subjects attentions from assisting the King with their meanes in this necessitie: but it was in vaine, for in regard of Johns promise to better the coyne, they granted him a reasonable aide to raise and intertaine a great armie. This faithful resolution of the French did for that time suppress the violence of the English, but not the furious malice of the Nauarrois: for hauing labored in vaine to disswade the people from their promised succours, and hauing raised, by these practices, seditions in diuers parts of the realme, he lands at Cherebourg with two thousand men, robs and spoiles the country, and takes the Castel of Coches in Normandie from the King. An intollerable presumption, of a subject against his Prince, after the murder of a Constable. But John dissembles this assault, and by the mediation of his sonne Charles, Duch of Viennois, he remits E this second taule, and receiues the King of Nauarre his son in Law, againe into fauour: but in effect he doth it to frustrate his purposes, and to punish such as had assisted him.

John did then giue the Duchie of Normandie to the Duch of Brittain for his portion: so as hee must take possession thereof. An apparent cause to drawe him thither: but in effect Johns intention was to drawe the Nauarrois into a place of easie surpris, to make him and his adherents to giue an accompt of their wicked actions, and to preuent them hereafter. The new Duke of Normandie arriues at Roan, whether all the good Townes of the Countrie runne to do him homage. The King of Nauarre (who held Eureux and many great Lordships in the Countrie, with one of the greatest dignities in the realme) comes to do F him honour, well accompanied, but better receiued by Charles his brother in law.

The King aduertised that the Nauarrois was at Roan with his sonne, goes speedilie from Paris, accompanied with his Brother Philip Duke of Orleans, Lewis his second sonne Duke of Aniou, the Earle of Tancarville, and Arnoul of Endregham Marshall of France, and

A and ranne to Roan with this great traine.

Arruuing about dinner time, he presently goes to his sonnes lodging, where he findes him at table, accompanied with the King of Nauarre, and the most of them which had assisted him at the Constables murder, where (without any more deliberation or delay) he caueth them all to be apprehended. And then (not pausing longer) he made choise of fouer out of this number, the two Brethren of Harcourt, the Lord of Maubue, and Colinet Douillet, chiefe actors in the foresaid murder, and without any other forme of proceeding, as a matter long before determynd) he caueth their heads to be cut off, setting the B vpon stakes, and drawing their carcasses to the gibet. The next day he made choise of prisoners, and sends the Nauarrois with Friquet and Bontabu, his domestick and most trustie seruants, to Arras, vnder saueguards, and presently dismiseth all the rest to their houles, enioyning them expressly vnto fidelitie and loyaltie to his seruice, bynding them by a new oath.

This vnexpected execution amazed the whole Countrie, like to a cracke of thunder: but it routed vp the Nauarres faction: especially Philip of Nauarre, brother to Charles, and Cecily of Harcourt Vncle to the two Brethren beheaded, the which opened the gates to a strange confusion, which shal cast John into miserable captiuitie, and drawe the Nauarrois out of prison, with a flaming torch in his hand to fier the whole realme. Behold Philip and the house of Harcourt presently in England, crying out against murder. They inuocate Edward to stretch forth his hand to bee reuenged of so notable an iniustice and disloyaltie. They offer him their hearts, persons, goods, Townes and hauens, to land in C Normandie without any difficultie, and there to make warre comodiously against the trecherous and cruell a Prince.

Edward a wife and vigilant Prince, who had his eyes open to all occasions that might annoy his enemy, imbraceth this offer: hee assembles his troupes to send them speedily into Normandie. And, to do nothing by halues: hee imployes all hee can to leuie a great army, the which he sends into Guienne, to make worke for John in diuers places, and not to suffer this first heat of the discontented frenche to coole, hee then without anie delay sends the Duke of Glocester into Normandie with 4000. choise men, who lands easily, and ioynes with Philip of Nauarre, and so they ouerrune and spoile the Champion Countrie. The terror of these newe forces spreads presently ouer all. The Towns of Lizieux D Orbes, Belchelo and Pontean on the sea, yeeld presently. And (not staying to beseege any great Cities, he goes to Bretueil and Tuillieres, and from thence to Vernueil in Perche: the which he takes easilie, giuing it out in all places, that it was to reuenge the wrong done to the King of Nauarre and his seruants: a dutie of humanitie which Kings ought not to refuse one to another in their greatest necessity.

King John hasteth thither with his armie, and recouers Bretueil and Tuillieres, and had easily repossessed all the rest, if a new occasion had not drawn him else where, and the secret decree of God, to his owne ruine.

Edward Prince of Wales, the eldest sonne of Edward King of England, was then in Guienne E to gouerne the Countrie vnder his Fathers authoritie. Edward lends him two thousand horse and 8000. English Archers, with commission to assemble all he can in the Countrie of Guienne, vnder his obedience: where hee was followed by a great number of the Nobilitie, and houses of marke. The cheefest were Capitall de Buch and the Lord of Grailly; (some thinke that out of these two houses vnited, the race of Candale is issued) with the Lords of Esparre, of Mucidan, of Montferrat, of Duras and of Segur. All prepares for a great hurlyburly John hauing leuied a goodlie armie, turnes head to the place, whether the greatest burden of the warre did call him. Hauing therefore lefte sufficient forces in Normandie to make head against the Duke of Glocester, he marcheth towards Poitou, whether the Prince of Wales was nowe come.

F Pope Clement the 6. a Limosin, resident at Auignon, sends the Cardinal of Peregrin his legate to these two Princes (being ready to fight) to calme this storme. But the preparatiō of Johns great forces, was the chiefe motiue to make Edward willing to giue ouer: who began to flay and to thinke of his retreat, and of reasonable composition by the Legats meanes:

in comes, who goes from one to another to make this accord. John demanded That Edward should giue him fewer hostages, and at one vanquished should remaine at his mercy and discretion. Edward was content to yeeld vp all that he had taken from him, but without any blemish to his honour, whereof he said, he was accomptable to God and his country.

John would not accept of this offer (notwithstanding all the intreaties and perswasions the Legate could vie) finding himselfe farre stronger then his enemy: saying, it was his aduantage to prescribe him lawes. But his Fathers experience, so decerely bought, should haue taught him wit, and not so willingly to runne into a mischiefe. Oh miserable France which art neuer wise but too late.

This King shuts his eyes to Presidents, stops his eares to all admonitions of reason, seeing his owne ruine wilfully, as if the time had beene too short for his perdition. He desired at any hand to fight presently, to whip this yong warriour, hauing forgotten that he had plaid his pive at Cressy; and learned not to be rash in a matter of so great consequence, but what followed?

The onely meanes to preserve the vanquished, is to hope for no helpe. So Edward seeing himselfe reduced to this extremity, either to loose his honour or his life, he resolues to imploy his life courageously, to saue his honour vertuously, & the euent fauored his resolution.

John had all aduantages ouer Edward, both of number force, shewe, country, and content (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall the choise of all his horsemen, (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. Being well adueritied of the number and estate of the Englisch armie, (which consisted for the most part of footemen) his meaning was to draw him to battell presuming easily to defeat this troupe of Englisch bowmen with so great a number of Lances and battell axes well armed. So as putting all hope of victory in his horse, he makes the forme of his battell according to this dessein. But he had forgotten that neither horse nor horseman saues the man in the day of battell. He resolues therefore to charge onely with his horse, and to giue his Nobility the honour of the victory, the which he held confidently in his hands, before the battell.

Vpon this project, he arrangerh his foote apart in one battalion, and deuides his horse into three squadrons, whereof he giues the first to his Countable (some name the Duke of Athenes the stemme of the house of Tremouille: and some vnto, that he was of the house of Breant, accompanied with two Marshalls of France, Arnould of Encreghen, and John of Clermont.

The second was giuen to Charles his eldest sonne, and the third with his sonne Philip, hee reserves to himselfe. In this confidence of his horsemen he bathes himselfe of a new stratagem: out of euery squadron he chooseth a hundred horse, and so made one body of three hundred, meaning therewith to breake the first ranks of the enemies army, which for the most part were foote.

The Prince of Wales prest by necessity, had another dessein. Standing vpon his defence, he resolues to encourage himselfe, and by courage to animate his army with an obstinate resolution, to fight desperately agaynst so great and strong an enemy, and so to giue his forces as the combat might proue difficult to the enemy, whom hee sees ready to charge. He lodgeth his armie in a place of aduantage for the defence against the horse, hauing both behind them, and on their flanks, Vines, Bushes, Hedgerowes and vnderwoods, all of hard approach for the horse. But hee adds industry and makes the place more inaccessible, causing the souldiers to cast vp great trenches with wonderfull expedition. Hauing provided for his campe, he doth place his Archers vpon the approaches so politely, as they might succour the horse and berelued by them, and likewise resist the enemy when they should be charged. But about all her labors to animate his Souldiers, so as the courage of this small troupe did equall the number of the greater, in this firme resolution, eyther to vanquish or to die together, to maintaine their honours and good fortunes, & in this order the Englisch attend the French army confidently, whom they see preparing to fight.

W

Whilest that Edward provides thus for his defence, there befell a great contention in the French armie, the which swaies much in this dayes fight. For comming to make choise of a hundred horse out of euery battaillon, there were some discontented; (the places being giuen rather by fauour then merit) so as such as were left behind, finding themselves grieved, as with a repulse, were more ready to double their despight, then their courages to fight. Impressions which import much in these great occurrents, when the minde must still be present with that we doe, and not be distracted with any other affections: but they are now ready to fight. Behold this troupe of 300. horse departs, commanded by Englische of Ribemont. The trumpets sound to battaile, they all runne to the easiest approach of the Englisch trenches, to drawe forth their footemen, and to prouoke them to fight.

This was another error of Johns, that being stronger then Edwards, beseeing him in the Vines, and cutting off his victuals, in few dayes he might haue vanquished him without blowes. But ouer-weening, impatiencie, and hast, drew him to his ouerthrow. This great squadron forceth into the Vines, and enters fight with the Englisch foote: but the issue of Johns new stratagem was contrary to his expectation: for in this first charge they find resistance.

The Archers planted in the Vines with aduantage, galled them in the first ranks with their arrowes, whilest that others (lying vnscene in the rowes adioyning) aime at them at their pleasures, shooting forth a dangerous storme of arrowes, and vpon their flanke riseth another showre, which passeth through these horsemen, whereas neither Lance nor Bartleaxe could preuaile. Hauing made this first charge with so great losse, they seeke to retire, and to charge the enemy in some other place; but they fall into a greater perplexitie, for the horses sinck in this mirie ground, and are intangled among the stubbes, stakes and trees: some fall, some rise againe, all are in confusion; they lie plunging in the ditches and trenches, and the Englisch arrowes flie from all sides. This troupe hauing drawne downe the rest by degrees, like to a current of water which disperseth it selfe by a channell, the more men, the more disorder. Our Frenchmen grow amazed at this repulse.

The Englisch seeing them giue back in confusion, crie victorie, and follow their aduantage, sinking on all sides, as they lay wallowing one vpon another. King John runnes to repaire this disorder. He performs the dutie both of a good Captaine (in gathering together his disperfed men) and of a valiant Souldiour, in fighting courageously: but the blow was already giuen, all was lost. The Duke of Athenes Countable, and Thom of Clermont Marshall, were slaine at the first charge. The Standard royall appeares no more, by the fall of the Earle of Charnie, who carryed it in this dayes fight. The greatest part of the commanders, and of this braue Nobilitie (who sought to be in the front) are vnhoised.

This rampart ouerthrowne, and the rest shaken & broken in peeces, the Prince of Wales preuailes the more easily. King John is farre engaged in the conflict. The Englisch crie; ta the King, to the King. Being charged on all sides, he defends himselfe admirably, and his sonne Philip (being neere him) surmounted the ordinary courage of the most resolute Souldiers, in shielding his father from blowes. (This generous valour did first purchase him the name of Hardy, and the course of his life did confirme it in diuers worthy actions) but in the end they are both prisoners.

There was some controuersie, (not without extreme danger to his person,) for hauing yeelded vnto Denis of Morbet his owne subiect, (borne in the countrie of Arthois, banished for some fact) he was halld by other souldiers, who pretended an interest in this prize. But the Prince of Wales vnderstanding therof, sent him an honorable gard, of some of his most trusty seruants, whilest that he made the victory absolute. The head being taken, all are surprized with feare: all are disperfed, and the slaughter is generall without resistance. Edward content to haue the head, sounds a retreat, and forbids them to pursue the victory. Many saue themselves in Poitiers: which stands vpon her garde, least the enemy should enter with them that fled.

The

King John taken prisoner since Edward receives him with great respect.

The victorious Prince remayning vpon the place of battell, sendes a troupe of Noble A men Gascons, to receiue the King prisoner, and to conduct him to his pavilion, the which they do with great respect. Edward seeing him approach, meetes him with great reuerence, honours him, comforts him: entertaines him with a louing discourse, and promisseth him all the good vsage a great King could expect in his aduersity. A young Prince twise a conquerour, hauing vanquished his enemy, both by valour and courtesie, leauing an honourable trophie of his humanity and wisdom in his misfortune. A notable example for Princes shewed a couragious minde in his misfortune. A notable example for Princes to shewe an inuincible constancie, against the most dangerous losses, amongst which the losse of liberty holds the most mournfull rancke, and is of the bitterest digestion.

Our losse was then very great and the sequele very pernitions. They number seuen-hundred Gentlemen slaine in this battell, amongst the which there were fifty two Lords.

The number
of the dead.

The chiefeft of marke were Peter of Bourbon the Duke of Athenes Constable of France, John of Cleimont Marshall of France, George of Chemy great Chamberlaine, Renauld of Chailons the Bishop of Chailons, the Lords of Pont, and Fayette, and of the common sort five or six thousand. A hundred ensignes were brought away in triumph, the spoyle carried away, the place of battell free, the dead bodies at the conquerours mercie. The King was taken (the chiefeft part of the victory) & with him was led into the same prison Philip his fourth sonne (afterwards Duke of Burgogne) James of Bourbon Earle of Ponthieu, John of Arthois Earle of Eu, Charles of Arthois his brother Earle of Longueuille, Charles Earle of Tancarville, John of Melun, and his sonne Archibishop of Sens, the Earles of Vendosme, Salbruch, Nassau, Dampmartin, la Roche and many other men of accompt. This ouerthrow happened in the year 1356, the 19. day of September, continued with many confusions, whereof I tremble to discourse.

The prisoners taken in the battell.

But let vs continue the order of our history. John (falling into his enemies hands) is brought to Bordeaux, and fro thence safely conducted into England to Edward, who shewed himselfe as courteous to his capitall enemy being his captiue, as glad of his Sonnes victory. Some say he commended him more to haue receiued John with humanity, then to haue conquered him by his valour. A lesson for great Princes to learne, that vertue doth quall valour, and that he is rightly a conqueror that can vanquish himselfe.

A lesson for great Princes.

He doth lodge him honourable in the City of London, in the Duke of Lawcasters house, with his son Philip, vnder a sure gard. The other prisoners are dispersed into diuers places according to their qualities, to drawe a reasonable rancome from them: the which as they payed, sent them free to their houses with much honour, and at that instant he gaue liberty vpon the kings word, being captiue, to all such as he would answer for.

In this great calamity, God looked vpon France with his eye of pity, willing to chastise it, but not to ruine it. For he reserued (during the Kings captiuitie) royall heads, to saue this estate from shipwracke, being almost ruined, both by the great afflictions passed, as also by the imprisonment of their soueraigne head, and the death of many great personages necessary instruments for the preservation & greatnesse of the State. As Charles eldest son to John, Dauphin and Duke of Normandy, Lewis Duke of Anion, and John Duke of Berry escaped in this defeat. Charles was of so wise and temperate a spirit, as he seemed capable to gouerne this great barke, in the most horrible stormes of confusio, which happened in this Realme, during his fathers imprisonment.

The admir-

of this estate.

John continued five yeares a prisoner, for he was taken in the year 1356, in September and was deliuered in the year 1361, in the moneth of May. But let vs describe in order the disorders which chanced in his captiuitie.

As soone as the Dauphin (so called vntill he be regent) came to Paris, he imployes all his wits to procure his Fathers liberty, and to maintayne the Kings free authority in the Realme: the which was as much restrayned as the Kings person. But in this good and commendable resolution he found strange difficulties. He presently calls a generall assemblee of the Estates at Paris, in October following: an expedient remedy for the greatest affaires of this monarchy, profitably practised in the most vrgent causes of our Kings.

There

A There Charles laith before them, not onely the miserie wherevnto the King his father was brought; but also the whole realme in his person; he intreats them to giue him counsell and assistance in this so great an extremitie.

1356.
Charles
before the Parliament
at Paris.

The cause spake of it selfe; his person was an excellent Orator. Moreover, he failed in no point of his dutie: for his mournfull countenance exprest his sorrow naturallie, and he could well vrg the necessitie of the prooffe, with so wise & modest an eloquence, as it would haue moued and dissolued euen the hardest Rockes of the Pyrenean mountains. But the answer which was then made him, and the long continuance of cruelties giuen him in so commendable an action, shew well what an ill counselled people is, and how dangerous it is to let slip the reines of restraint to so furious a beast; which growes then most outrageous, when there is greatest need of mildnesse and modestie. Without doubt there had bene many disorders in the former raignes: and in this new contropertion the Crowne, Philip had made great breaches. But is it now time to complaine of the likes, when he lyes at the point of death, and to represent vnto him his forepassed errors, in stead of applying fit remedies for his griefe? So doe the people (being wittie and eloquent) complaine of the errors of their superiours, and are more ready to increase the crueltie, by remedies worse then the disease it selfe, rather then to cure it; as shall appeare by the popular actions, during the raigne of King John, who from complaints haue exceeded to audacious seditions: and in the end to cruell and tragicke massacres: not onely to tread vnder foote, but to ouerthrow the lawfull authoritie of this Monarchie.

C The Parliament consisted of all the best cities of the realme: but as Paris is the chiefe, so haue among the rest the first degree and greatest meanes, it was also the chiefe in credit. So as when order is well obserued, it brings the greatest benefit to this estate: but when as disorder raignes, the greatest confusion comes from thence. The Church holds the first ranke in Parliament: and then the Prouost of Marchants in the citie of Paris, whereas the Vniuersitie had then great credit. All parts shall play vpon this Theater, either for good or euill, by strange accidents. But let vs returne to our Dauphin. After that he had made his proposition; the Estates being assembled in one body, resolved: That to auoide confusion, there should be fittie chosen out of all the Prouinces, to determine of things necessary, according to the instructions & remembrances declared to them. These fittie deputies assemble in the Grayfriars, where by a common consent they resolve what to say vnto the Dauphin: who being intreated to come vnto their assemblee, and set to heare some notable offer of assistance, conformable to the necessitie of the time, Robert le Cocq Bishop of Lyon spake thus vnto him in the behalfe of the companie. That the assemblee beseeched him to sweare to keepe secret what should be deliuered vnto him by the Estates. This young Prince being nothing amazed in this perplexitie, answers them presently with a resolution. That he should greatly forget the degree he held in the State, in receiuing a law from his fathers subiects. And therefore he did command them, by the naturall authoritie he had ouer them, to speake freely what their hearts conceiued. Then the Bishop in all their names, made knowne vnto him the ill gouernment of the treasure, demanding redemation thereof, with a commission to call the receiueurs to an accompt; that all such as had managed the kings money, should be displaced; & that hereafter both the treasure, and the affaires of State should be gouerned by 4. Prelats, & 12. Bourgeois, amongst the which the citie of Paris should haue the first degree & credit: and that without this counsell the Dauphin should attempt nothing. And for the conclusion of all their demands, they require him most instantly to set the King of Nouarre at libertie. And vpon this condition they promise the Dauphin aide & succour for his fathers deliuey.

The Dauphin noting plainly both the intention of this ill aduised people, and that it was now out of season to take exception at the violence of these popular furies; demands respite to giue them an answer; the next day passeth in this sort, without answer to the deputies, who intreate him to resolve. He makes his excuse vpon the importancie of the affaires, and demands a new day to consider thereof. And as they pressed him dayly to make his answer, so he still prolonged the time by many subtill delaies, grounded vpon sundry excuses, of purpose to disperse them, and to dissolve their counsels; the which he 1357. fees was practised by his enemies. And hauing cauled the deputies to attend many daies, A (this plot to holdis pursued) grew colde, and (tired with tediousnesse,) they retorne home to their houses, without any other frute, then great shewes: leauing the King languishing in prison, and the realme in pittifull disorder. But they parted not without leauing the chiefe leuaine of their intended mischiete at Paris, and too many hands to worke in this masse of confusion, to the great preiudice of France.

An ill aduised people hath this humor. To complaine still of the present estate, and to seeke the future with hope of better. The Parisiens who had seized vpon authoritie, (more carefull for the deliuerie of the King of Navarre, then of their lawfull king,) summon the Daulphin to set the Navarrois at liberty, according to the decree of the Estates: and taking his delaies for a deniall; they practise with Iohn of Piqueny, gouernour of the countrie of Artois (to whom K. Iohn going to the vnfortunate battaile of Poitiers, had giuen it in keeping, to deliuer him out of the Castell of Alleux in Cambrisis, where he had remained ninetie moneths a prisoner. This young Prince inuironed with all these difficulties, had yet one which exceeded the rest. The Bishop of Lion the chiefe of his counsell betrayed him, being a priuate and passionate partaker of the Navarrois. Charles King of Navarre is deliuered, meaning to come to Paris, and therefore he demands a safe conduct from the Daulphin, who grants it, will he or no; that is, he puts a sword into the hands of his most malicious and furious enemy, and lodgeth him in his owne house. These were bitter pilles, but he must digest them, euen the Daulphin and all good men that did assist him. But many of them (to the allow of these conuitions by their free contents,) retire themselves to their houses.

The Navarrois hauing his passport from the Daulphin, not onely as a gage of the publike faithfulness, but as a sentence against king Iohn being prisoner, goes to Paris with a state- lie traine, where they all prepare for his entertainment. The Bishop of Lion, and the Prouost of Marchants, with a great troupe of his Partisans meet him, who went to lodge in the Abby of S. Germaine. He lets the people vnderstand, that he desires to speake publicly vnto them. A scaffold is built, & the people throng in great troupes, bringing both hearts and cares. The Navarrois (a subtil and an eloquent man) represents vnto them the wrong of his imprisonment, and his interest to the Crowne: he desires iustice might be done him according to his desert and qualitie; but about all, he spares not to touch that sting which should aduance him to the royaltie. The people applaud him, and giue charge to the Prouost of Marchants to make the Daulphin acquainted therewith: the which he performs with a brauado. The Bishop of Lion (a treacheous servant to his Maistie) answers for him (being silent in this necessitie) That the Daulphin should shew grace and fauour to the King of Navarre, as one good brother ought to another. He makes the Daulphin so humble, as he prevents the Navarrois (who kept his lodging but to preach to this seditious multitude) and doth visit him first, whom he doth tearfully meete at the doore with a colde welcome. He requies audience of his demands. They are read in counsell, which consisted for the most part of men corrupted. When it was decreed: That all which the King of Navarre and his complices had done against the King, and his realme, should be forgotten as neuer done. his goods seized and in the Kings hands, should be restored both to him and his, with their honours, which had bene behoued by the commandement of King Iohn: their lones should be gathered together, and honourable interred: all acts of condemnation disannulled, and an act of their iustification authentically drawne, to free them and theirs hereafter from all ignominy. The demand of the King of Navarre pretended title, was remitted to another time.

But the Navarrois brings in the king of England, of whom the Daulphin demanded a truce: the which he grants vpon condition, That he might succour the King of Navarre & Iohn of Monfort duke of Brittain in their pretensions. Thus the seeds of warre were sown during the continued calamitie of this poore realme, by the means of Charles of Navarre.

At the same instant Edward makes rigorous demands of his prisoner Iohn, on whom (for all his good countenance) he meant to make a benefit by his captiuitie. He required homage of him for the realme of France, as holding it of the realme of England, and vpon this condition he would set him at libertie. K. Iohn being of a courageous spirit, though a prisoner

New causes of warre.

A in his person, answers him freely. That he must not speake to him of this which he neither ought, nor would do, to alienate a right inalienable. That he was resolved at what price soeuer, to leaue his children, as hee had received it from his Ancestors. That affliction might well ingage his person, but not the inuolable right of the Crowne, where he had the honour to be borne: ouer the which neither prison nor death had any power, & especialy in him, who should alwaies hold his life well employed sacrificing it for the immortal preservation of France.

This generous magnanimitie of King Iohn, gaue as great occasion to pittie his calamity as the strange conditions of the English being victor, ministered matter of grieue and disdain to all true hearted Frenchmen: but all this could neither temper the malice of the Navarrois, nor the furious impudencie of this enchanted people.

He exp in the Daulphin intreats the Parisiens to take pittie of his poore father: who not able to auide the inuitable crosses of fortune, common to all degrees, could well shewe his assistance in greatest afflictions. But these brutish mindes will not be moued by any apparent reasons: so as after this poore Prince had vsed all the submissions necessity could bring to win the people, in the end after the losse of his paines, he fought to the other Cities of France. Hauing left Lewis Duke of Anjou his brother at Paris, to supply his place, & to maintaine some shewe of authority, the effect whereof crept hourelly into the Navarrois power, he went from Cittie to Cittie, crauing aide of the French, for the deliuerie of his father and the restoring of his Estate.

The story doth much honor the Prouince of Languedoc, to haue made greateshewes of duty to their King being prisoner: for it obserues. That the three Estats of the Countrey (assembled in one body at Tholouse) vnder the authority of the Earle of Armagnac their gouernor, did freely grant a great aide to the King: for the performance whereof, they would not only employ their reuenues, but their most precious mouables, yea their wiewes, Jewells. And to testifie their generall heauines, they abandoned all sumptuous apparell and bankets, especially all daunces, makes, plaies and other pleasures, during the captiuitie of their King.

Champagne followed this commendable example. But examples did no more moue the Parisiens hearts: then reason had done, who answered the Daulphin roughly, when hee intreats them most humbly, that hee should call an other Parliament, where they would advise what was to be done. Their intent was to take all authority from the Daulphin, and to vltimate themselves: to dispose of the tresor, of honors and dignities, of peace and war, and of the life and death of the Kings subiects at their pleasures. To this end they made this young Prince contemptible & odious, assembling together both without his priuie & against his will, in Churches and publike places, in priuate houses, in great and smal troupes without any feare or respect of the royall dignity.

The Daulphin more a prisoner then his father, durst not repine against these disorders, which increased hourelly, like to a violent streame which falles from a high mountaine, through the force of much rayne. This furious multitude (puffed vp dayly by the practises of the Navarrois, who employed both heart and hand to ruine the Daulphin,) falles in the end to threats to blowes. The Apostum is ripe, it must needs breake. An exchager named Peter More, pickt a quarrel with the Daulphins treasurer, & kills him in Saint Maries street. Hauing slaine him, hee flies into Saint James of the Butcherie, and no man pursues him. The Daulphin seeing his authority too much blemished, in suffering himselfe to be thus treated, he caused the murtherer to be drawne out of the Church, and to be executed: his hand to be cut off in the place where the murther was committed, and from thence to be drawne to the gibet and hanged. And to the end the people should not murine, he went accompanied with a gerd of soldiars, led by Robert of Clermont Marshal of France.

The same day arrived the Ambassadors of King Iohn being prisoner, to sollicit his deliuerie, after many voiajes made forth the space of two yeares, that is to say two ages for a poore prisoner, to whome delay is a double languishing. But they were too true witnesses, both of the fruitlesse tears of this poore Prince, and of the barbarous cruelties of these Cannibals. They beheld the Bishop of Paris, in the Daulphins sight, and in the vewe of all the world, to take this murtherers carcase from the gibet, and to carry it to the Church, 1357. from whence he was drawne, and there to be honourably interred. But this was not all. John of Piqueny comes to the Daulphin from the Nauarrois, to summon him to hold his promise, concerning the demands which were granted him in counsell. And as the Chancellor replied, that they had beene performed. He answered (the Daulphin being preter, and the two Queenes.) That whosoever would maintaine the contrary, had lyed. And to heape one mischief vpon another: the Prouost of Marchants, with some of the Vniuersitie, come vnto the Daulphin, who by a Licobin Orator called Simon of Langres, (for it is not at this day alone, that Monkes haue beene medlers in State) require him to periorne the promises made to the King of Nauarre, or else the people would rise against him, if he refused to apparant and reasonable a dutie.

A Parliament was likewise called for the Kings deliuey, wherevnto the blood of France, (which cannot degenerate) caused the cities to be inclined, so as things seemed in the end to promise some redresse. Being assembled at the Augustins, the Prouost of Paris gathered together three thousand men of the basest artificers, and comes armed to the house of S. Pol, where the Daulphin was lodged, hauing seized vpon the gate, and stopt all the passages, he ascends to the Princes chamber, being followed by his armed men.

The Daulphin was therewith much amazed. Feare not (saies the Prouost) for anything you shall see. for what shall be done, hath beene decreed, and it must be so. The watchword being giuen, behold John of Conslins, and Robert of Cleremont Marshalls of France: (two trustie seruants to the Daulphin.) are slaine before his eyes, and so neere vnto him, as the blood rebounded vpon his face. Ha (cries this poore Prince) what is this? will you attempt against the blood of France? No my Lord (saies the Prouost vnto him) feare nothing, it is not against your person we pretend: they be your disloyall seruants we seeke, who haue sold aduised you. Then he tooke the Daulphins hood, and put his vpon the Daulphins head, being halfe red, and halfe skie-coloured, the citie liuerie: and he did weare the Daulphins all that day, being of a browne blacke, unbrodered with gold, in token of his Dictatorship.

This done, their bodies are drawne to the Marble table, and from thence cast into the Pallace yard, for a spectacle to this furious people, which flock thither from all parts, with shouting and clapping of hands. He presently sends to the Daulphin cloth, both red and skie coloured, to make him a hood, and assembles the people at the Towne-house, at the Creue, where he makes them to approue this massacre: and afterwards both the Daulphin and the Estates to do the like, which were then assembled for very contrary effects. And to confirme and iustifie his vnbridled impudencie, he writes letters in the name of the City of Paris, to all the good townes of the realme, exhorting them to ioyne with the chiefe citie, and to take their liuerie as the Daulphin had done, the better to reforme the disorders of the realme.

As these confusions increased dayly and hourly, William of Mountigu Bishop of Terouenne Chancellor of France, with many other officers of the Crowne, fle from Paris, and for the most part retire into Germanie, as a shelter to auoyde these stormes, expecting a better season.

The Chancellor had left the great Seale with King John, being prisoner, so as then they vsed none but the small Seale of the Chastellet, as well in the decrees of Parliament, as in all other publike acts. The Parisians likewise erect a Councell of State, composed of Stephen Coeg Bishop of Laon, (the Cocke of this confusion) of Renauld of Corby the first President, Stephen Marce Prouost of Marchants (who in the end shal receive the reward of his wickednesse), John Roussac, John Lisle, with many of the Vniuersitie, who had not the least voyce in the new commonweale. Affliction is good for something: as the Parisians (whom their furious tingleaders had fed with an imagination of the soueraigne government of the State, to dispose of all things at their pleasures,) had assured themselves of a willing obedience from all the Cities of the Realme, to whom (as we haue sayd) they had written, to ioyne with them in a common league. So were they greatly amazed, that for answer to their imperious letters, they receiued a generall denyall from all parts cercable example of so audacious a rebellion: standing more carefully vpon their gard, for feare of a surprise by the Nauarrois, whome they confidently beleecued to be the cause of the Parisians frensie and confusions.

The Daulphin being thus vnworthily intreated by the Parisians, retires himselfe out of this great citie of Paris, into Champagne, to the Towne of Vertus, where he assembles the Estates of the Country, and according to the honorable offers they had made him, he obtained all he could desire, answerable to their meanes and faculties. But the greatest benefit he did reape, was the good example they gaue to other Prouinces, who imployed all their meanes not to yeeld to Languedoc or Champagne, in the honor of their loyaltye, where-vnto God and nature bound all good subiects to their King especially being in necessity.

Thus the Daulphins courage began to reuiue, (seeing by effect (in his extremest danger) that all good Frenchmen were not dead. A lesson for great men neuer to despaire in most deperate extremities.

The Nauarrois had no other care but to ruine the Daulphin. Not satisfied with his practises in Paris, he solicits the King of England instantly, and represents vnto him by sundry messages, that a fit opportunity is now offered to make himselfe master of this goodly citie. There was great likelihood (the King being a prisoner, and the affaires brought to that extremity) that the English should soone haue preuailed ouer this realme. But God had otherwise decreed, who shewed the rod, but stayed his arme, holding in his hands both the hearts of men and the euent of things.

Edward obserued well the meanes to effect his desires in this confusion, but knowing the ambitious & disloyal humour of the Nauarrois, he could not trust him. Yet not to contemne to plausible an occasion: he assists him with some helpes, by degrees, onely to balance what force should be offered, expecting some better and more safe opportunity, the which hee promised himselfe rather by treatie with his prisoner: then by all the intelligences and practises of this Prince, importunately disloyall against his owne blood and the State: the which hee should haue mayntained with the hazard of his life. This turbulent spirit, not able to containe it selfe within the limits of duty, assembles al his forces, to beginne the game by open hostility against the Daulphin: and to this ende he labours to corrupt the Captaines of places; but hee could no more moue their loyaltye, then the Languedocians had done the Cities.

The Daulphin seeing the Nauarrois in armes, vnder the command of his brother Philip, doth likewise arme, and very lawfully against so vniust a violence. But heerein hee did wisely drawe profit from his enemy, and maintaine his authority, not duely respected with out force of armes: nor pleasing, if armes had not beene taken by necessity. And from hence there grewe a great occasion to confirme his authority, in the reasonable and necessarie imployment of his forces. The disorder and confusion of times had wonderfully disposed the Nobility against the people, by reason that the Nauarrois, (hauing im-ployed them two yeares to make himselfe redoubtable and fearefull, and keeping certain troupes in field, which were abandoned to all licentiousnesse, for want of pay:) they had no other enemy, but the Oxe and the Ass of James the good man: (for so did these soldiers of confusion call the countyman in derision,) whome they had long tormented with impunity. But patience too much moued turnes into furie.

The poore Country man thus tortured, in the ende resolves to shewe his teeth to this honour of the people, and to fall on them with open force, who had so often oppressed them without any resistance. Vpon this occasion they make a popular League in the Country of Brabant: the people being armed in great troupes skirmish in diuers places, and fall vpon the gentlemen, by whome they had beene wronged: they kill them, their wives and children without respect: spoile, sack, burne and pull downe their houses.
The armed multitudes in the beginning did much harme, like to a fire suddenly kindled.
A dangerous course and of great consequence: but it was happily suppressed by the Daul-phin, paying the fault, for the which the Nauarrois was blamed.

This popular frenzie quencht in the breeding, was called the Iaquerie of Jacquet or James 1358. the good man, too common in the souldiers mouths, as we haue said, more ready to deuoure the coutriman, then to looke vpon an armed enimie. Thus it was supplified by the Daulphins diligence, who opposing his men of warre to this seditious multitude vanquished them easily, as the peoples rage moued against reason cannot long continue: dangerous fits of civil warre, when as such as haue the gouernement in hand, neyther can doe will do iustice to the subiect vnjustly oppressed, who haue reason alwayes to demand it, and can complaine when it is denied them.

But they seeke a remedie worse then the disease, whē as being culpable of the insolencies they reprehend in such as oppress them, they will take vpon themselves to seeke reuenge, the which they may not expect but from the hand, of such as may lawfully take it, thais from such as haue the publike authority vnder the law.

A Parliament called at Com-piēgne.

The Daulphin (hauiug repaired this confusion) assembles the Estates at Compiēgne, to the great dislike of the Parisians, being partisans to the Nauarrois. They fought (as it were by especiall priuilege) to hold the possession of the Estates still at Paris, and were much discontented they should be held in any place else. But the Parliament proceeds without regard of their complaints, and decrees, That Charles the Kings sonne, Daulphin of Viennas, (who till then had bin called but lieutenant to his father being prisoner should be acknowledged and called Regent of the Realme of France & that all good Frenchmen should obey him as the King himselfe.

The Daulphin declared Regent.

This new title purchased great authority to this yong Prince throughout all France, and (making him to appeare in these obscure umes of attractions, as a lanthorne during the tempest of a cloudy night) reuiued his courage: seeing himselfe at liberty without the walles of Paris, whereas Marell should not braue him, nor murder his seruants in his chamber, yea in his bosome. Thus did he settle his authority by degrees, wondrously shaken by the audacious credit of the Nauarrois, who hauing another intent, did runne contrary courte. For as the Nauarrois dessein was to subuert the state against all orders, so he troade it vnder his feete, hauing recourse to vnjust violence. So as in the field he had armed troupes, in the city of Paris a seditious multitude, and generally passion and fury.

The two pillars of his desseins were Injustice and Violence, supported by the peoples fauour, who may do much being well aduised: but what mischief can we imagin in an enimie D which a multitude will not attempt, being bewitched by such as abuse them, like a brute beast which goes where he is driuen?

The project of this Prince, (otherwise great both by blood and meanes) had an unfortunate issue, as wicked attempts must haue a ruinous end. The mischief fell first on him by the people, in whom he had relied, and after by him vpon the people, whom he had deceived, to make them an instrument of many mischances: yet was the people lesse punished then himselfe, as lesse culpable.

But he who had disloyally abused this brutish multitude, fell in the ende therunto by hand of God, not onely in seeing al his practises proue vaine, but also feeling in his heart the fire of Gods wrath iustly kindled against such as confound the society of mankind by the laws of State vnder which they are borne. Without doubt, bad counsel is alwayes dangerous to the giuer. This Prince preached peace, and made warre: reformation of state, and nourished confusion: liberty, and yet brought those Cities which obeyed him into a new slavery. He abused the people with a shadow of liberty, and fought to win them: deuiles, but the contrary effects made him so odious, as hauing played the Tyrant of his credit, he fell into the hatred, and detestation of all the world, as the following discourse will testifie. To teach all men, That the greatest pollicie is to bee an honest man.

The Naurrois begins to grow odious to the Parisians.

The Regent countenanced with this newe Title, and the faithfull loue of the French, testified by the former effects, nor sought for by practises, but bred in their hearts; and encreasing dayly in experience of affaires, began to amaze the Nauarrois and to terrifie the heads of this Parisien multitude, hee seized vpon Tours, Orléans, Nantes and Pont Charenton. And not to loose any opportunity, hee approached the City

A Circle of Paris, and burnes and sacks the Parisians houses, in reuenge of that which the Nauarrois had done to the Kings seruants. Thus both armies were in field, and doing much harme generally, they multiplied the losses on either side vnder colour of reuenge. The Parisians thus tired, chose the King of Nauarre for their Capitaine, suiting him to bring souldiers, yea Englismen, into the Citie, of whom the most of his troupes consisted. The armies approch: the Regents forces incampe at Coxsars, and those of the Nauarrois at S. Iams. The Parisians heat began to coole amidst to many miseries, and without their commanders it had bene quite frozen.

loane the widow of King Charles the faire, and by that meanes Ante to the Nauarrois, she desired infinitely to see these two Princes at peace. Her degree and age gaue her free access to both. She visits them and perswades them to concord, with all the best reasons she could. In the end, after many iourneys, she obtaines an enterview, to parle themselves of their affaires without any mediators. The Regent (a yong Prince, wise and temperate) would not at the first be intreated, but in his heart he desired nothing more; soe seeing it to be the onely meanes to bring the Nauarrois in ialousie with the Parisians, who relented dayly, growing weary of his actions. The successe was answerable to his desire, for behold the people are presently incensed against the King of Nauarre, and the Priest, who had accompanied him to this parle. They sodenly make publike and priuate assemblies to preuent the practises of these two traitors (as they terme them) which would make their peace without them. John Roussac and others (ialous for that they were not employed) runne from shop to shop, to set fire to this flaxe, shewing that priuate treaties are very preiudiciall to the generall good of the Citie.

The Parisians grow odious to the Naurrois.

The Nauarrois is amazed at these newes; he leaues his armie, and runnes to Paris with the Prouost of Marchants, to pacifie these new tumults, the which he found to be practised against him. Being arrived, he employes ail his Partakers to preuent it; and by their meanes he renues the league with the Parisians, protesting to liue and dye together. He sweates the Regents death with them, and perswades them to admit a new supply of Englismen for the safety of the Citie. And to shew that he had his heart free from all intelligence with the Regent (as they had suspected) he makes a braue sallie vpon his troupes by S. Anthonies gate; but he soone found a stop: for as he did charge boldly, so D was he repulsed valiantly, being charged and beaten by the Regent, so as with difficulty he recovered the gate. Within few dayes after, he tries by the other gates, if he might speed any better, in diuerse resolute attempts. but all is in vaine; he is chased, shooted at and beaten with losse and shame. This charge did so alter the minde of this inconstant beast with many heads, I meane, of this Parisien multitude, who of late had so much loued, honoured and supported him in all his wrongs, as now there is nothing but cryes against him, as against a disturber, an ambitious and disloyall man, a prater, a deceiuer and teller of lies. That it is no longer time to depend on him, but the Citie must provide seriously for their owne affaires, and ioyne with their lawfull Lords.

Parisians discontented with the Naurrois.

During these popular humors, the Nauarrois appeares not, nor any man for him, being too odious vnto the Parisians, as it was very dangerous euen to talke of him. It was in vaine to hide himselfe at Saint Denis, during the heate of this popular rage. But to bring words to effects, the Parisians by a common consent in their Towne-house, resolute to treat with the Regent: and to this end they send a messenger vnto him, beseeching him to grant a safe-conduct for their Deputies to come vnto him. The Regent in braue this occasion, and giues them an ample passport; vpon which grant and assurance, the Parisians send a troupe of their grauest Cituzens to the Regent with these requests.

That it would please the Regent to pardon the Parisians (being ill aduised) what was passed, and to graunt them free trafficke, untill a peace might be made to his content. F The Regent hauing receiued them gratioously, graunts their requests and demands: and makes his troupes retyre from about Paris, to the Contessis Valles, expecting this peoples course, being newly reclaumed to their dutie, the which might as sodenly returne to their furie; suffering them to taste of peace, and to see the rod ready, being like

The Parisians submit themselves vnto the Daulphin.

1358. like unto a furious beast, not to be trusted but vpon good warrant.

The Nauarrois and the Prouost of Marchants labour to reparaire their credit at Paris, supposing (if this fury were once euaporated) they should returne into credit, hauing both the Basilie and the Louure at their deuotion.

But they are deceived. The chance was cast, and the howre of their ruine was at hand, the people being resolute to giue an apparent testimonie of their intent; and a fit occasion was offered.

The English nation was the chiefe support whereon the Nauarrois relied, hauing lodged them in great troupes both within and without the Citty, for his owne strengths; the which did much harme in all places.

The Parisians crye out, that there was no more neede of any souldiers, seeing that a peace was concluded, and then they began with the within the citty, which were in their power.

The occasion was very small. Behold a troupe of English men which came from dinner at the King of Nauarres lodging; the multitude (without any other cause, but that they were English) fallies iniuriously vpon them, they kill fise and twenty at the first, & take forty seauen, whom they drag into prison. Then euery man seized on his guest at one instant, so as there were 400. cast into the prisons of the Louure, without Magistrate & without order. Onely a tumultuous crye was heard in the streets. That they must punish these wicked Englishmen, which had committed so many disorders, and that the prisoners should answer the spoyle their companions did abroad.

The Nauarrois, the bishop of Lyon, and the prouost of Marchants, accompanied with their followers, run to this Alarum: they intreat the people to assemble and to do things by order and reason. The multitude comes to the Greue. The Nauarrois hauing whetted his naturall eloquence, with a long & artificiall discourse, makes known his loue and the good succours the English had giuen him in his necessity.

The multitude at this name of English, cries out. That they must kill them without any further speech, and then go speedily to S. Denis, to dispatch the rest.

So without any more speech they command the Prouost to lead them thither. The assembly being thus confusedly dissolved, the Nauarrois, nor Prouost not daring to reply, euery man runs to armes, especially such as were best furnished, so as in fewe howers there were fixtene hundred horse and ten thousand foote resolu'd to charge the English, which spoiled the cuntry with all impunity. The Nauarrois and the Prouost make a good shew at this sodaine mutiny of the people, and seeme more busie then the rest; to remaine still commanders of this multitude; but they dispatch sundry messengers vnder hand, to wishe the English men stand vpon their gard, and to attend resolutely this multitude of Parisians, which came against them without all order. The troupe is in field, the drums sound, & the Ensignes are displayed. But the King of Nauarre made a stande betwixt Montmartre & the windmills, to giue the English breath, who did lay a strong ambuscado at Bois de Boilegnie; & send forth some of their best horsemen to draw this vnwarlike and ill gouerned multitude into danger. These scouts appearing, they are hotly pursued by the Parisians:

but with such disorder, as is incident to people couragious in the streets, but cowardly in fight of an enemy that vnderstands his profession. They run in this Ambuscadoe, who charge of all hands vpon this disordered multitude, and folowes them fliuing euen to the gates of Paris, in sight of the Nauarrois and the prouost, who are beholders of this defeat and relieue them not. The Nauarrois retires himselfe to S. Denis, where the body of his Armie was lodged, & the prouost of Marchants to the citty, the which is filled with cries, lamentations and iniurious speeches against them both. The Prouost fearing the peoples fury goes garded with a troupe of 200. men: & least all should be lost, he seeks to assure himselfe of the Louure and Basilie. The maske is now vncovered, and the people runs to armes. Iohn Maillard (Captaine of a quarter at S. Anthonies gate) takes a banner with the Armes of France, and running through the Citty cries Montiours S. Denis. At this crye, & the sight of the standard, all flocke together on heapes. The Prouost seeks to saue himselfe in the Basilie, to auoid the fury of this multitude, whom he had so often employed to shed innocent blood: and with him were Simon Palmier and Philip Gnyphart, two torches of popular sedition

The Parisians mutiny against the English that had terned them.

The English beat backe the Parisians in view of the Nauarrois.

A sedition. They enter but (oh the iudgement of God which the wicked cannot fly, at such times, and by such meanes as he hath prescribed for their tyme) the place they had chosen for their safety, was the pitfall of their miserie: for being entred, they wilbe Masters, vnder colour of certaine letters from the King of Nauarre, who gaue the chiefe command of that place to the Prouost.

They fall to great words with them which commanded the place: and from words to blowes: where without any great difficulty they are all massared, to the peoples great content; who flocke to the Basilie to see the ende of their Prouost. They require the carcases, the which are presently deliuered vnto them and drawne from thence with all sorts of ignominy before Saint Caterins Church: whether the Prouost had dragd the bodies of the Marshalls of France, by him so vnworthely nurthered: to the ende we should honor God, who appoints the punishment according to the offence, with an equal ballance, and punisheth faults with answerable paines. Thus the Citty of Paris was freed from the sedition, and restored to the lawfull obedience of their King, in the yeare, 1358. the second day of August remarkable for so notable an act.

This iust execution thus made, the Citty (as it were recovered of a deadly disease) sends deputies to the Regent: beseeching him to come and take possession of the authoritie due vnto him. The Regent comes, and is receiued with as much affection as ioy, as before he had bene odious and contemptible. Such are the people: such they haue bin, and such they shall be, that great me may learne by these examples, how to gouerne a multitude.

This happy successe troubled the Nauarrois; who imagining the Crowne of France vpon his owne head: did (to his great grieve) see him seated in the State, who had bene almost ruined. Vntill then he had the Kings seruice alwaies in his mouth, as his good Kinsman and subiect, but now passions driue him into such fury and despaire, as he resolves to cast off the maske of humility and obedience, and all other ciuil respects: and to make war against the Regent with all violence, not only by secret practises, but by open force.

The Nauarrois, seeing the Parisians to grow affectionate to the Regent, sought by all means to torment them: making strange spoiles of their houses, especially of such as were his most deuoted seruants: but in general al that belonged to Paris, was abandoned to the spoile.

The Regent assembles his army, the which he had retired to ease the people. But the remedy proues often very hurtful to the champion Cuntry, vpon the first application. Behold two French armies are in field in the heart of France, committing that which we haue seene with our owne eyes in the bosome of our miserable Cuntry: for what better commentarie can there be then our own experience? Thus harme growes both from the enemy which assailes, & the friend that defends: so as we may truly say, that in ciuil wars the cure is often times more hurtful then the disease. The Nauarrois finding himselfe too weak alone, calls in the English to the sack of France without a head, and almost without a soule.

Edward aduerted from the Nauarrois, by sundry messengers, of the Estate of France, & Regents happy successe; condemned himselfe, as hauing failed his owne good fortune: taking the King of Nauarres complaint in no better part: who saied, that he had not bin assisted as the cause required, applying all his wit to the ruine of his Cuntry: holding it a gain to take from his owne bloud: so blind are passionate Councells.

He vpon Edwards sends new forces to the Nauarrois: who fortified with these succors, and with his goodly promises, begins the war more fiercely then before. He takes the Castiel of Melun with halfe the Citty, by the meanes of Queene Blanche, whilest that the Kings soldiers fight for the rest: he burnes the Abbie of Lis, & al other places alongest the coast of Norme and Gastenois. Then crossing the Isle of France, (to annoy the Parisians, and to strike a terror by his forces) he takes S. Germaine in Laie, Creil vpon Oise, Poissy and many other places, with great booties & many prisoners: running daily to the gates of Paris. Hauing stayed some daies at Mont, he goes to meete with the succors from England, taking Castres vnder Montlhery as they passe, the which he spoiles, sacks and burnes. led by Capitall de Boche in Medoc, a Cuntry in Bordeleis, a great and a mighty Lord: who resignes them to his brother Philip of Nauarre. With these forces he takes Clermont in Beauuoisin.

The desolate estate of France.

This was rather a robbing then a warre, as commonly ciuill warres be: the which with more reason they may call vnciuill. The cattel taken, houses burnt, men being dead or beggered, the land remained desolate, vntilled and vnsowne. So as there fell so great a famine, as halfe the people died for hunger, lamentable troups of poore families wandred vp and downe creeping into townes, like desperate folkes, to beg bread of them which had it not.

The Parisians
murther againe

The Parisians seeing that this alteration did nothing repaire their estates, grew mad: & as the common sort values no friendship but for their profit, they abated much of the loue and respect which in the beginning of their reduction they did beare vnto the Regent: who was not onely troubled to incounter armed men in field, but also with mens humors growne bitter by affliction, especially in Paris: a sea subiect to the ebbing and flowing of mens sundry humors and affections.

The Nauarrais makes new practices in Paris.

The Nauarrais (who was still watchfull to imbrace all occasions to annoy the Regent) seekes meanes to nourish the feedes of his ancient credit with the Parisians, by some of his faction: giuing them to vnderstand by diuers writings spread abroad, that he lamented to see France vndermined with this desolation, whereof the Regent was the original cause. He founded forth the vaine name of liberty and reformation of State, vexing the Regent more by his practices, then by open force, although he were supported by the succours of England. The Regent was thus perplexed with many difficulties, finding himselfe as it were besieged not only within the walls, but also within the humours of this great city, being ignorant howe to counterbalance force with mildnesse, in the perplexity of so many miseries, and the diuerty of such contrary humors, wherein he sees himselfe engaged.

The Duchess

villains in Paris.

Amidst all these difficulties, the wisdom and courage of this Prince is very considerable, for he seemed to the people of a resolute countenance: and in the managing of affaires he had alwaies a care to their reliefe, so as they could not but loue him for his amiable & sweet behauiour, yet for the maintenance of his authority (being come within the city) he caused some notable executions to be done, of certaine desperate & seditious men, and committed others to prison. This was done with the peoples liking, incensed against the Nauarrais, but seeing themselves to fall out of one mischiefe into another, the Parisians began to returne to their old waywardnesse.

He pacifies
the Parisians
being discontented

The Regent hauing worke for both hands, incounters his enemy in field by force, and in the City by eloquence, causing the people to assemble at the Greue, sitting vpon that crosse which we see at this day: his tongue preuailed more then his souldiers armes, whereof we obserue no great successe: but his eloquence was so happy, as the people regarded it as an Oracle, giuing him the title of wise, hauing ioyned a wife carriage to his admirable eloquence: as appears in those goodly discourses.

Three yeares passed thus, during the imprisonment of our King John, whom it is now time to visit in England.

Conditions for the Kings deliuey not granted.

Edward had caused John to be conducted from London to the Castle of Windfore, with his sonne Philip. There he propounded vnto him new conditions of peace, not so rigorous as the former: but yet so hard as (being deliuered to the Regent, and by him to the Estates then assembled at Paris) all the Kings good subiects (though very desirous to redeeme him) did not allowe thereof, for that they did import the honour of the King, and realme too much, making too preiudiciall a breach in the soueraignty.

The resolution of the Parliament.

The extremityes were notable, in the Kings languishing being a prisoner, and the present war: but least they should suffer al to run to ruine, in so great a suspence of affaires, the Estates resolute to comfort the King, by aduice, to attend an other time for his liberty, and to labour by all meanes to maintaine the warres.

Preparation to defend the Realme,

The Prouinces did their best endeauours to furnish money for this necessity: and euen Paris promised to maintaine 600. Lances, 400. Archers, and a thousand Corselets, that is 1000. foote armed with Brigandines a kind of armour then much vsed. The Nobility notwithstanding their priuileges, offered to contribute towards the charges, and restored

A the orders for martiall affaires, in a manner forgotten through the indulgency of our kings. The clergy shewed a notable zeale, and all those officers which had managed the publike treasure made a great & extraordinary summe of money, by meanes whereof they were discharged fro further accops, and the realme much eased. This position came happily for the preservation of France, against the which Edward made then great preparation at the instance of the Nauarrais. The truce expired, he did forbid the French to trafficke into England: in the meane time his army laids at Calais, & himself follows in person with a goodly traine.

Being landed & resolved to take possession of the realme of France, or by force to rume it, he marcheth directly to Arras, the which he takes in 3. daies, hauing assured it with a strong garnison: he goes towards Champagne, where passing onely, he besieged Sens, which yeelds without resistance, and by their example Nevers. All Bourgonne was strooke into such a terror, as they redeemed their country fro spoile with a great summe of money. Hauing thus found means to intertaine his armie at his enemies charge, & enriched his souldiers with an inestimable booty, he marcheth towards Paris, as the head city of the whole realme, & the chiefe end of his dessein, the certain triumph of his conquest, & the goodly theater of his victories. Our regent was nothing amazed at these threats of Edward, for, hauing assembled a goodly army with great expedition, he attends him at Paris, where the whole burthen of this war did lie. He lodgeth his army in the suburbs, & fortifieth against approaches, being taught by the examples of his grandfather & father, not to hazard any thing, resolving onely to defend himselfe within his trenches. This resolution succeeded happily, for Edward seeing the impossibility to draw the regent to fight (notwithstanding al his alarmes), raiseth his

C siege, & marcheth into Britaine, to refresh his army, to the great content of the Parisians, who could not sufficiently commend the wisdom of their regent, hauing so politickly auoided this storme. The regent embraceth this occasion, he furniseth Paris with abundance of victualls, & commands the souldiers to lue orderly without oppression of the inhabitants: he fortifies the weakest places with all speed, and doth so encourage the people, as they are ready to sacrifice the felues for the preservation of the State. Edward (supposing the great wast caused by the men of warre resident in this great city, would haue taken from them al means to continue, & haue bred an impatency in the minds of this vnconstant people, giuing him the better meanes to enter it) he returnes with his army being strong & lusty, by this good refreshing of Britaine. Being returned, he finds things better ordered then before: so as preuailling nothing, but walking about the city, & beholding a far off the great towers, and the admirable masse of so many buildings, as a briefe of the whole world, he resolves to leaue the siege & returne no more. Thus experience teaching him, what the strength of our chiefe city was, he packes all vp, and goes towards Chartres, meaning to besiege it. But whilest he lodged there, his army making a horrible spoile of the whole country, there chanced an occasiō (as the worke of heauen) which sodainely quailed his ambitious dessein to ruine France. for behold a horrible & extraordinary tempest of haile, thunder and lightning falls with such violence as many horses & men in the armie perished, as if that God had stretched forth his hand from heauen to stay his course. This amazement caused Edward to vow to make a peace with King John, and the regent his son vpon reasonable conditions. He which had thus thundred, did likewise open the Duke of Britaine his mouth, shewing how reasonable it was to limit humane attempts within restrained bounds, & not to attend an infinit & perpetuall prosperity in worldly affaires, being more faine to content himselfe with a meane successe, then to be transported with the violent course of humane hopes, cast in the mould of indiscreet desires. He likewise laied before him the impossibility of so extraordinary a dessein, as to make himselfe maister of all France, a notable example for Princes to behold their own infirmities and the greatness of God to whom they owe the homage of their enterprises. being the most happy, when they are most sober & temperate, without imagining an infinite power in the short weaknes of this mortal life, whereinto they are subiect like other men. 1360. the two next yeares after, at reasonable payments. And for the consideration, the said King of A England, and the Prince of Wales his sonne, ask for themselves their successors, should renounce all rights pretended to the Crowne of France, the Duchie of Normandie, the countie of Toumay, Artois and Maine: the souerainety and homage of Brittain, and the Earldome of Flanders, and within three weekes they should deliuer King John at Calais at their charge, the expenses of the Kings house only excepted. For allurance of which agreement, there should be deliuered into the King of Englands hands, these hostages: Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, sonnes to the King of France: Philip Duke of Orleans, the Kings brother: Philip Duke of Burgoyne, the Earles of Blois, Aranson, Saint Pol, Harcourt, Perceval, Valentinois, Grandpre, Beaumont and Forest: the Lords of Flandremont, Couilly, Fyennes, Saint Venant, Preaux, Montmorency, Renieres, Rochegon, Estouteville, the Daulphin of Auvergne, Andregot and Craon. A choise of well selected personages, to be a sufficient caution for the money and conditions that were to be performed.

The hostages performance of the conditions.

The Deputies for King John were John of Doumans Bishop of Beauvais, and Chancellor of France, John of Melun Earle of Tancarville, the Lord of Beaumont Marquis of France, the Lords of Montmorency and Vignay, John Croker, Simon of Bury, John Mares Lawiers, and John Maillard, and Stephen of Paris, Bourgeois of Paris. For the King of England were, John Duke of Lancaster, the Earles of Northampton, Warwick and Suffolk, Edmund of Cullyan, Chasteler of Mauny Knights, with certaine learned men for their Councell.

This treatie of a generall peace, signed by the two Kings, was ratified by their two eldest sonnes, Charles and Edward, and proclaimed by Heralds: first at the windowes of the Kings and Princes lodgings, and then at the corners of the street in great solemnitie. The hostages were deliuered to Edward, the father, who embarked at Harfleur, and lead them into England, leauing the Earle of Warwick in France, to see the execution of the peace.

King John brought to Calais.

King John (hauing long expected the time of his deliuerie) parts from England with a strong garde, and is conducted to Calais, attending the money promised, the first pawnee of his libertie. The Regent his sonne labours earnestly: the Citie of Paris did contribute willingly a hundred thousand Royals, and after their example all other cities paid their portions. Of such power is our head citie both to do good and euill: so by this end they made amends for all former errors. The money is brought to Dover, wherethe Regent comes to see the deliuerie: Edward returns to Calais, he is wonderfull kinde to John, and they sweare a league of friendship, and comprehended Charles King of Navarre (being absent in this peace) his brother Philip vndertaking for him, to the end that all quarrels might be troden vnder foote and all men liue in peace, vniue, and concord. So John being set at libertie, after a long and hard imprisonment of foure yeares, takes his leave of Edward with all the shewes of loue that might be betwixt brethren and constant friends.

The two Kings sweare a mutuall league of friendship.

Being parted from Calais, he findes his sonne Charles comynge to meete him, with a great and stately traine. I cannot well expresse the ioy of this first encounter: this good King imbracing his sonne (as his redeemer) with ioy mixt with teares, and full of fatherly affection, with the content of his sweete recovered libertie: seeing himselfe in his traine armies, who had giuen him so many testimonies of his faithfull loue in his necessitie, yet in the midst of his subiects with his first authoritie, depending no more vpon anothers will. And contrariwise, what ioy was it for this wife to me to enioy his father, to possess a gage of the authoritie, order and obedience of a State, and a great discharge for him of this painfull burthen.

King John received by his sonne with great ioy.

Thus discoursing of what had bin done during his imprisonment, and of what was to be done, they arrive at Harfleur: whether not onely the whole countie repaires, but also the Deputies of Paris, and of all the prouinces of the Realme, to congratulate their good Kings deliuerie, where he disposeth of the gouernment of his house.

The King of Navarre meetes him at Compiene, hauing first sent back his hostages, to shew that he relied onely on his word, put himselfe into his power. Thus passeth the world, world, after a storme comes a calme. King John made his entrie into Paris with this goodly traine, being receiued with an incredible ioy of all his subiects. The Parisiens going to kisse his hands, offer him their hearts, with a goodly cubberd of Plate, worth a thousand markes, for homage of their fidelitie and obedience.

The Kings reception into Paris.

The Parliament had surceaused about a whole yeare: John, for the first fruits of his recovered authoritie, would honour the opening of the court with his presence: being set in the seat of Iustice, in the midst of all his officers, to the incredible content of all men, who beheld the cheerefull countenance of this Prince, like the Sunne beames after a troubled skie. Such was the returne of King John into his realme after his imprisonment, as the catastrophe of a Comedie, in the which after mourning they reioyce. This happened in the beginning of the yeare 1361.

Some moneths were spent in these publike ioyes, but they must seeke to get againe his hostages, in the effecting whereof they found many difficulties: for neither the priuate Lords (whose homage he had bound to the King of England,) nor the countie (whose Soueraignities he had yeelded by this accord) would obey. They argue with the King in councell, and demand an acte, shewing that the King cannot dispose of the soueraignie of his realme, nor alienate the reuenues of the crowne. John on the other side (feareing least Edward should reproche this vnto him, as a practise betwixt him and his subiects,) made them sundry commandments to obey.

Difficulties in the performance of the conditions of peace.

He went to Auignon, to visit Pope Innocent, who dyed at this time, and Urban the sixt succeeded in his place, both Limosins. To hanfell Johns recovered libertie, and to ease his minde, afflicted with long imprisonment, Urban exhorts him to vndertake the voyage of the holy land, as generall of the action. John not remembering the examples of Kings his Predecessors, Lewis the 7. & 9. nor apprehending the present burthen of his great affaires; nor the danger of so mighty and watchfull an enemy, who had so long, and with so great paine kept him prisoner) accepts the charge, and makes a solemne promise: and to hasten the execution thereof, he returns into England. Some saye, the loue of the Countesse of Salisbury (whose husband had the garde of the King being a prisoner) was the principall moue of his returne. The which I cannot beleue, vpon the report of the English: being vnlkely that his age, his afflictions, his great affaires, and the voyage wherevnto he prepared, should suffer this Prince to follow to vnseasonable a vanitie. But whatsoeuer moued him thereto, he dyed there, leauing his life in England, where he had so long languished, as a preface of his death.

John promiseth the Pope

an armie.

Thus John died in England, in the yeare 1354. the 8. of Aprill, leauing Charles his eldest sonne heire to the Crowne of France. A good man he was, but an vnfortunate Prince; wise in ordinarie things, but ill aduised in great affaires: iust to all men, but not warie how or whom he trusted in matters of consequence: temperate in priuate, but too violent in publick. To conclude, a good Prince, but not considerate: more fit to obey then to command. Truly these heroicke vertues are the proper Iewels of Crownes, and wisdom is a companion to the most excellent vertues, especially in Princes, who are aduanced vpon the Theater of mans life, to gouerne the rest.

His dispositio.

We haue noted that Bourgoigne had bene giuen to Robert the grand-child of Hugh Capet for his portion. A little before the deccasse of King John, it was vnited to the Crowne of France by the death of Duke Philip, a young man of the age of fiteene yeares, sonne to that John which dyed in the battaile of Poitiers. He was betrothed to the heire of Flanders, but both the Duchie, and the Daughter were for another Philip, the sonne of John:

His manners.

His Charles, during the life of his father John, had giuen so many testimonies of his sufficiencie to gouerne well, that he was held for King before he tooke the crowne, the which he receiued at Rhene the 19. of May 1364. hauing before his coronation prouided honorable for his fathers funeralles.

He reigned fixteene yeares, being called and knowne by the name of Wise. In his youth he did taste the bitter rootes, and in his age the sweet frutes of vertue; beloued, honoured, feared, and respected, both of his owne subiects, and of strangers. A deuout Prince, wise, temperate, chaste, vigilant, louing Iustice, order and the people, indued with as great authoritie as any Prince that euer raigned ouer this Monarchie, accompanied with other vertues fit for those times, to preserue a state, the which had more need of counsell then of force, too venturously hazarded by his grand father and father. He was well assisted by the Princes of his blood, and the officers of the crowne: very wished worthy aduantages for a King, who being the head of an estate, ought to be well serued by the principall members, to guide and gouerne the whole body.

We haue said, that he had three brethren: Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry, & Philip Earle of Touraine: to whom according to his fathers testament, he resigned the Duchie of Bourgoigne, with a mariage of great aduancement. He gaue to Lewis the Duchie of Orleans, and to John he gaue Auvergne, Poitou and Xaintonge, (besides Berry) for his portion, and Langueadoc for his gouernment. He was likewise well serued for Militarie causes, by Bertrand of Guesclin a Brittain, (an excellent Capitaine) whom he honoured with the dignitie of Constable, in the place of Maurel de Fiermes (hauing deposed him for sundrie crimes) and for affaires of state, he had John Dormans Bishop of Beuonais, and Chancellor of France, & in the end Cardinall, whom his brother succeeded in the same charge. With these helpes of counsell and force, he soone restored the realme, being dismembred by the strange confusions of the forepassed raignes. In his youth (during these former broiles) he was poisoned by the practises of the Nauarrois, of whom we haue so often spoken. This was preuented by counterpoysons, yet left it a great infirmite in his bodie, the which forced him to a quiet life, more profitable both for himselfe and his whole Realme, then

A then if he had bene a man of action: for he dispatched affaires in his Clofset without danger, and incountred his enemies with a happie successe. 1364.

In the beginning of his raigne, he married with Ioane the daughter of Charles Duke of Bourbon: a Princesse of excellent beautie: the which he preferred before the great wealth of the heire of Flanders, and the benefit of his owne realme: he had three sonnes and one daughter. In the former raigne there was nothing but warre, desolation, teares, cryes, lamentations, despaire, and generally the mournfull image of death. After these long and insupportable calamities, the wisdom of Charles (reducing things to their first beginning, by his happy dexteritie) gaue France a new forme: like vnto a man who hauing a long & dangerous sicknesse, recouers himselfe by carefull keeping. But there remained an infinite number of men accustomed to liue dissolutely, through the licentiousnesse of the warre; the which if he had sought to reforme by any good order, it had bred some tumult in the State: according to the violent and head-strong or restless humour of the French, who must be doing at home, if they be not employed abroad.

The English prouided worke for these warriors in Brittain, in Flanders, in the heart of France: and in Castille: but the wildome of Charles preuented all. I will note what happened, rather according to the subiect, then the order of times; for that the matters are so confused, as I cannot represent the dates distinctly, without repetition and tediousnesse.

Brittain was the first list to trie our men of warre: there might they make warre without breach of iuice; and the quarrell betwixt Charles of Blois, and John of Montfort, continued more violent then before: for that John of Montfort had married the daughter of the King of England, and Lewis Duke of Anjou, the daughter of Charles of Blois, who imbraced and inkindled their priuate quartels, by these new occasions.

Bertrand of Guesclin a Gentleman of Brittain (of whom we haue before made mention) had done the King good seruice, during the warre with the Nauarrois. Charles relying vpon his fidelitie and valour, giues him the charge of the warre, to assist Charles of Blois, being old and broken; who was pressed by the enemy, being supported with forces from England. Guesclin being arriued, the Nobilitie of Brittain (which were of Charles his faction) repaire vnto him, to the number of 1500. lances. The Historie names the houses Rohan, Lancel, Leon, Dinan, Rieux, Chastelau-Briand, Tourne-mire, Raiz, Malestroit, Quintin, Auzgour, Lohes, Ancenis, Pont, and many others.

This notable occasion was ministred to imploy these forces; seeing that Ioane the heire, the Duchesse of Brittain, would not end this controuersie by composition, as her husband Charles of Blois desired. John of Montfort besieged the Castell of Aulroy, well defended by the contrary faction. John Chandos an Englishman, a wife and well experienced Capitaine, commanded the English troupes. He had an aduersarie in front, no lesse valiant then himselfe, Guesclin, who fought for his countrie, and the despaire of Charles of Blois (much grieved with the tediousnesse of so painfull a processe,) was a new spurte to animate him to fight. They ioyned with their troupes, the encounter is furious, well charged, well defended. The two commanders made great prooffe of their valours. Guesclin & Chandos are noted to haue omitted nothing of their duties: but God, who holds victories in his hand, gaue it to John of Montfort, and the English armie. The ouerthrow was great, for Charles of Blois (the head of the armie) with John his bastard brother, the Lords of Dinan, Auzgour, Lohes, Malestroit, Pont, Quergourlay, and many others were slaine: the Lords of Rohan, Leon, Raiz, Mauny, Tonerre, Kouille, Frainville, Renouall and Rochfort, were taken prisoners, and so were John and Guy the sonnes of Charles of Blois, with Bertrand of Guesclin, the which did greatly preiudice our Kings reputation. The place of battaile, the ensignes and the dead bodies, remained in the power of John of Montfort, who sent the body of Charles of Blois with an honorable conuoy to his widow. The Castell of Aulroy (the cause of this battaile) yeelded to the conquerour. This hapned the 29. day of September. 1364.

This great defeat troubled Charles, as a thing beyond his expectation. John of Montfort sends his ambassadours, beseeching him (as his Soueraigne) to receiue homage of him and his: the Duchie of Brittain, wonne by rightfull armes, by the defeat of his enemy, as God adiudging vnto him this right and possession.

Charles

1365. Charles embraceth this occasion: he assignes him a day for the performance thereof, and to do right and iustice to both parties being hard, the widow of Charles of Blois being called, and the matter debated, he reconciles them vpon these conditions: That, for the interest which Joane pretended for her and hers, to the Duchie of Brittain, she should haue the Earldome of Ponthieu, the Seigneuries of Auanoir, Guello, Gincamp, Rochedorie, Lauaton, Chajaulin, in Cornuaille, Duall, Vhelgost and Rospreden, to the value of twentie thousand liues or franks of rent: and if John of Montfort died without lawfull heires, the Duchie of Brittain it should returne to Joane and her issue male or female.

King Charles reconciles the pretendants for Brittain.

2000 pound sterling.

This accord drew John of Montfort to Paris, where hauing done his fealtie and homage, as well for the Duchie Brittain, as the Earldome of Montfort, and other Lands hee had in France, the widow of Charles of Blois ratified it by vertue of the decree. Oliuer of Clifton at the same treatie was restored to the possession of all his Lands, forfeited when his father was beheaded, (as we haue said). He shalbe Constable, and shall giue vs good cause to speake of his life.

This accord was made in the Towne of Guerande, in the year. 1365: but it continued not long: for Lewis of Anjou the Kings brother, (sonne in lawe to the Duchesse of Brittain) was not pleased with this agreement: whereby he said he was greatly wronged, & John of Montfort distrusting King Charles, had his recourte to the King of England, to whome he went in person, to require ayde against the forces which he pretended would come against him: leauing Robert Knowles an Englishman in Brittain, who not attending Johns returne, began to make warre vpon the French, with all violence. Charles being protested, both by the Duchesse Joane, and by Lewis of Anjou his brother) declares John guiltie of high Treason: for that he had broken the accord, & would not appeare vpon sundry summons daily made vnto him. So the warre began againe: the successe whereof we wil note heere after. Thus there passed six or seauen yeares, with varietie of accidents in Brittain.

The warre continued in Brittain.

In Flanders.

Whilest that Brittain was thus shaken with sundrie stormes, Flanders was not without trouble, by the accustomed practises of the English. Lewis Earle of Flanders, sonne to that Lewis which was slaine at the Battaille of Crecy, had one only daughter named Marguerite, who remayning here of this great and rich estate, was the Leuaine of the ancient ieaalousie betwixt the two Kings, Charles and Edward, struing who should haue her.

The Cities of Flanders, of greatest power in this purlieu, held stoutly for the English. Conte Lewis rather to the maide, was in suspence: fearing both the English and the French, for diuers respects: and yet hee loued the first and feared the last: But in the end, by the meanes of Marguerite of Arthois, mother to the Earle: a marriage was concluded in fauour of Philip the hardy, brother to Charles King of France, to Edwards great griefe, both father and son: who in disdain of this refusal, sought all meanes to breed new troubles in France.

The treatie of Bretigny ministred a newe subiect, and apparent cause of discontent to the King of England, who complaind that hee had bene deceived by Charles, vnder a shewe of faithfullnesse, hauing restored vnto him all his hostages, receyuing onely the sommes promised for the ransome, leauying vpon his simple word, the reuenues of those Seigneuries granted him by the treatie.

The cause of new warre betwixt France and England.

Charles had retired all his hostages, in good time paying readie money: and making knowne vnto Edward, the sundrie charges he had giuen to the Countiees and places comprehended in the treatie, to yeeld them slues whollie into his power, he likewise signified vnto him his subiects answers: who in the beginning excused themselves ciuilly, by honest delauies but in the ende the generall Estates giue Charles to vnderstand, That the question being for the generall interest of the States they were not to bee forced to yeeld to an vnlawfull action directly contrarie to the fundamentall lawe of the realme, which suffers not the King to induce the Crowne, nor to alienate the reuenues thereof, which were not to be alienated. That this accord made in prison for the Kings redemption was forced, and so by consequence, vniuall, and not to be allowed by the Lawe of nations.

The effects followed this resolution, with such an obstinacie of the Countiees, Cities & Noble men, which were charged by this treatie to yeeld, as they protest freely to Charles, that they wil willingly spend, goods & liues, rather then fall into the king of Englands hands: & contrariwise, wold employ all their meanes to liue vnder the subiectio of the king of France.

This

A This iusticiall instance of the interrelled subiects, must needs be pleasing vnto Charles: but that he himselfe had made this treatie, his honour was greatly engaged, the which he must iustifie by good and auaylable reasons: and make it knowne vnto all Europe, who had their eyes fixed vpon these two Princes, playing their parts vpon so famous a Theatre. Charles complaines by a sollemne Ambassage to the Emperour Charles the fourth, who ke the paines to come into France, with an intent to employ his authoritie and command to reconcile these two Princes: but it was in vaine. The cause of this fruitlesse attempt proceeded from Edward, being resolute to haue his part tryed by armes, being incited by his victorious successe in the former raiges.

The Emperour seeks to reconcile these two Kings.

Charles had alwayes protested to obserue the treatie of Bretigny inuolable. But hauing considered the generall resolution of the States, and of the countiees and Noblemen incited by the said treatie, he resolues to protect them: and hauing excused himselfe both to the Emperour and forraigne Princes, by a publike declaration, he sends a Gentleman called Chapponeau, to the Prince of Wales being at Bordeaux, summoning him to appeare before him at Paris, at the instance of the Nobilitie and commons of Guienne, complaining of him. He also sent a Herald to the King of England, to proclaim warre against him. The Earle of Armagnac, the Lord of Albret (who had newly married Isabel of Barben, and by this alliance was become French) the Earles of Perigord, Comminges and Carmain, the Lords of Barde, Condon, Pircoinet, Pardullan and Agenois, began the opposition against the King of England, followed by all those Prouinces, protesting for the recovery of France.

Charles proclaims warre against the King of England.

At this example all the Townes of the Countie of Ponthieu, yeelded to Guys Earle of Arundell and to Guy of Chastillon Maister of the Crosbowes. Then the Kings armies marche towards Paris, vnder the commands of the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, & the Constable Gaston, to whose wisdom, (& especially to the Chancellor Dourmans,) they attributed the obedience of the people of Guienne, discreetly practised by them. Limoges and Cahors yeeld at the sight of the Kings armie. Carlet, Bergerac, S. Senere, and in the end Romagne, and by the successe of these Cities (reduced to the Kings obedience by force) Lin d'Argely, Angoulesme, Xaintes, Fontenay, Parthenay, and many other Townes obeyed voluntarily. The fortresses of Mortagne, Lusignan and Senezay, are added to this conquest: and in the end Tours stretcheth forth her hands to the King, and shakes off the English yoke. Whilest that the Kings armie performed these happy exploits in Guienne: the Prince of Wales (a hardie and generous warrior) to turne aside this deluge, the which he feared falling vpon the countie of Bordeaux, resolues to enter by another quarter, which being an enemy should be found without defence.

The successe of the French armie in Guienne.

Hauing made a flying campe of English & Gascons well armed, he slips into Anuergne, from thence into Bourbonois & Berry, where hauing refreshed his troupes some daies, he passeth into Forest, and gathering together his forces vpon the riuer of Loire, he passeth ouer at Morsigny of Nannes, & so crossing St. Jeanis, he comes into Bourgoigne, where finding all desert, without victualles, all being carried into walled Townes, by the care of Philip the Kings brother, he marcheth into Saxennois, and from thence into Gastinois. In the end he staves before Eppeyran, with an armie of twenty thousand men, which terrifies the whole country, and takes the Towne easily, being not relieved.

The exploits of the Prince of Wales.

Charles recalls his armie out of Guienne, giuing the Constable Gaston commission to follow him: the which he executes so happily, as all this cloud was presently dissipated: so as the Prince of Wales could hardly retire himselfe to Bordeaux, not laden with spoils as in former times, but with shame and losse.

This was the successe of the first passage the English made through France. But what is become of our Anuarois? we haue obserued how he made his peace with K. John, when he returned from prison. He thence retired himselfe quietly into his realme of Nauarre, where he remembered his ieaalousie, and watching all opportunities to crosse the affaires of Charles, he was spared him with so great respect. The neerelie of Bordeaux was a fit meanes for him to continue his practises with the English vnder-hand: although by meanes of the Guennies, he entertained a shew of friendship with Charles his brother in law.

The Navarrese returned from prison, practises vnder hand against Charles.

1366. Castille ministered matter of imploiment for our warriours, with a very notable successe. A
The subject of warre in Castile.

Peter King of Castille, sonne to Alphonfus, (making great protection of loue to the French) married Blanche the daughter of Peter duke of Bourbon, and sister to Joane the wife of our Charles the wife, and so brother in law to the King. Whilest the Castilian loued his wife, the alliance and friendship of our King, was his greatest honour: but abandoning himselfe to a strumpet named Fadille, he forooke all duty to his wife, left France, and lincked himselfe with the Englysh, against his sworne faith to his allies. To this treacherie he addes the murder of his wife, and a cruell tyrannie against his subiects.

Peter King of Castile murders his own wife.

These execrable proceedings procured the wrath of God against him, with the hatred both of great and small, which drew him headlong to his ruine. Alphonfus his father making him his heire and successor of his realme of Castille, had bequeathed a legacie by testament to Henry his bastard sonne, a vertuous man, that is to say, as lawfull by his vertue, as Peter was growne degenerate by his vices; and as greatly beloved of the people, as Peter was hated in generall, by reason of his abominable life. He spoiled Henry his brother of this legacie, the which his father had left him; but thinking to take from another, he lost his owne. for Henry (thus ill intreated) flies to Pope Urban the 5. resident at Avignon, beseeching him to vse his authoritie by admonitions to his brother, aduising him to restore that which his father had given him. Urban inclining to his iust request, cites them both to appeare before the consistorie, to draw them to their duties; Peter not onely refuseth to obey the Pope, but doth outrage to his Nuncio. Henry thus repulsed, repaires to Charles, by the meanes of Peter of Bourbon, brother to the Queene of Castille, whom her husband Peter had murdered. The indignitie of this fact procured Henry great succours from King Charles, euen at such a time as he wanted worke for his men of warre. The command of this armie was giuen to Peter of Bourbon a Prince of the blood, with the counsell and direction of the Constable Guesclin, who also bare the name, as he took the greatest paines. The armie is leued in Languedoc by the kings command, & the exceeding care of the Duke of Berry, gouernour of that country, to the incredible ioy of many voluntaries, who went cheerfully to so iust a warre: the successe was both happy & speedy; soderly as the French armie appeared for the succour of Henry, all the Castilians reuolt against Peter, who (with great difficultie) saues himselfe with his concubine, and three daughters he had by her, and one onely seruant, carrying nothing with him but a little ready money, and the miserie of a dispossessed Prince.

The French defeated in Castile by the Englysh.

This his calamitie did first moue the Prince of Wales to compassion, & then his father Edward commanding his sonne to succour him with all his forces; the which he performed speedily with a goodly army, meaning to crosse the designs of our Charles: But (oh the patience of God, which giues a sinner to long a time of repentance, that in the end (without any excuse) he might pay both the principal and interest :) the successe of this Englysh armie was such in fauour of Peter of Castile, that hauing vanquished the French armie, by a notable defeat of foure & twenty thousand men taken Guesclin the Constable, Arnoul of Andregien Ma. shall of France, and many other great men prisoners; Peter was restored to the possession of his realme, and Henry dispossessed: who escaped hardly from this great danger, & retires himselfe into Languedoc, to John duke of Berry the Kings brother, and gouernour of that countrie. But after this gracious assistance of Gods mercy, his iustice must take place, as it did against Peter by this meanes. Henry being courteously received by the Pope & the duke of Berry, and the Constable of Guesclin set at libertie with all his companions, hauing paid their ransomes to the Prince of Wales, he recouers a second aide by the bounty of our wife Charles, and the diligence of the duke of Berry, to attempt a new recuperie of the realme of Castile. The Constable Guesclin was appointed to this charge, to withstand the first check, if it were possible. The cunct answered the project, and by an admirable meanes, the which ruined Peter through his owne folly.

This tyrant (growne proud by the withfull successe of the Englysh forces) makes no regard to satisfie the Prince of Wales for the charges of this warre (although the successe were for his good, but buying himselfe to take reuenge of such as had risen against him, he contemned such as had succoured him: yea treading all pietie vnder foote, he affected

A himselfe with the King of Belle-marine a Sarasin, and marrying his daughter) he abiured the Chriitian Religion; holding the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, to be more certain and profitable, then all the forces of England. But it fell out contrary to his conceipt, for Henry assisted by the constable Guesclin and the French forces, hauing won fivc battels against Peter, in the ende he was quite defeated and taken prisoner.

Peter King of Castile beheaded.

Hauing him in his power, at the Castilians sute (wonderfully incensed against this Tyrant) he caused his head to be cut off, reaping the fruites of his impiety, the which made him to forsake the true religion: of his vanity, trusting to a rotten plank, with the losse of his conscience, and of his exceeding cruelty, hauing murdered his wife, tiranised ouer his subiects, and spoyled his brother of his estate against all right.

E An excellent lesson for all men, especially for great Princes, not to dally with God, who punisheth haynous crimes with haynous punishments, euen in this life, attending the euellastng paine in the life to come.

Charles King of Nauarre was much perplexed, seeing himselfe betwixt two armies, for desiring to be a neuter and to please both, he knew not how to gouerne himselfe. He seeks to intertaine both Charles and Edward, although he were more ingaged to the Englysh, and could not well trust his brother in law, hauing greatly offended him. So hee lets the English army to passe through his dominions when it marched into Castile, to succour Peter, and suffered himselfe to be taken prisoner by Oliuer of Mann a Gentleman of Britaine who led him into Castile to make the Englysh thinke he had bin forced, and the French, that hee did willingly imploy himselfe for them being in their troupes.

The King of Nauarre dissembling.

C A miserable hypocritie, which of a maister makes himselfe a slaue, who might haue bin one of the chiefe of the army, without this wretched dissembling.

The good and wise King, taught by the example of his father John, that an Eccl is lost by ouertipping it, desired onely to pacifie his brother in lawe, although he were well acquainted with his bad disposition, and the practises he continued with England. So he gaue him a safe conduct to come vnto him, and restored vnto him Mantes and Meulan, and the free possession of his lands in Normandy. but this prince fraught with malice, could not be reclaimed, neither by the Kings prosperity, nor by his clemency, for (not trusting him) hee retires to his realme of Nauarre, where he continues his old practises with the Englysh: hee helps the Briton with men out of Normandie, and attempted against the Kings person, seeking to poyson him by Iaquet Rue and Peter of Tertre, his domesticall seruants: who were executed, and the Nauarrois places seized on, as guilty of high treason. Thus Charles was forced to fight against his owne blood, and to haue the malice of his kinsmen and allies. No small combate for a great Prince.

The French seek to poyson King
Charles.

We haue discoursed at large of the valour and happy successe both of Edward the 3. King of England, and of Edward his sonne Prince of Wales. Put as humane things are not durable, so there chanced a great accident vpon his returne from the war of Castile, which brought them both to the graue. The Prince of Wales finding himselfe threatened with a doopley, passed from Bordeaux into England, to take the ayre of his native country, but hee died soone after his arrival, the 46. yeare of his age. A Prince of great hope, not onely lamented of his friends but comed of his enimies. Edward the father, seeing his right arme as it were cut off, died for griefe: leauing Richard the son of his son Edward in his place, who was received (without any questiō made by his vncles) as the first by right of succession.

The death of both Edwards

Richard (not to degenerate from the example of his grandfather and father, being crowned King, vndertakes a warre in France: whether he sends a goodly army vnder the command of the Duke of Clarence his vnkle, who (hauing landed at Calais) passeth the Riuer of Somme, at Clery neere vnto Peronne, & bending towards Soisson, he croseth the Riuer of Oise & Ain. Then marching towards Chalons he passeth Marne, and shewing himselfe before Troyes in Champagne, he spoyles the country, and so goeth ouer Seine betwixt Ville-neufue and Soucy, and bending towards Beauuise and Gassinis he croseth into Brittaine, there to reuie the war in fauour of John of Montfort spoyling the country with a strange desolation. On the other side there lands an other army at Bordeaux, the which hauing entred the country, fortified such places as held for the Englysh, to nourish the seeds of this new warre.

The Englysh
second passage through France.

1380 In the country of Genaudan (a diocess in that large Prouince of Languedoc) there was a Castle neere to Mande named Randon, whereas the English maintayned a strong garnison, a retreat for theeeues, which did infinite harme in the country. The country hauing sued vnto the King, to free them of this incombrance, he graunted them Gueselin the Constable, a man of great reputation, but the army should be deftayed at their charges.

He comes into Languedoc, be seegerh Randon, and brings them to the last extremity: but as the beseege (not able to hold out) were entered into composition, behold the Constable (sick to the death) yeelds vp the ghost. At the same instant the place was yelded vnto the King, so as insigne that the honour of this prize was due to Gueselin, the Captaine carried the keyes of the castle vpon his herse.

The death of the Constable Gueselin,

Thus died Gueselin, leauing an honourable testimony of his valour and loyalty: and to Charles an exte came sorrow for his death, who honoured him with a notable obsequie, causing his body to be interred with the Kings at S. Denis: & at the foot of his own tombe was that of Gueselin, with a burning Lampe maintained by foundation, called The Lampe of Gueselin vnto this day.

King Charles had giuen all Burgogne to his brother Philip for his portion, according to the will of his father John, as we haue said, and had married him with Margueret the rich heyre of Flanders, being in possession of Burgogne, there happened another occasion in Flanders, which won him great credit with those people, whom he should command after the death of Lewis his father in law, who was yet liuing.

Troubles in Flanders pacified by Philip.

The Inhabitants of Gand, a mutinous people by nature, who neuer want matter to mutine, had then a great discontent, both against their Earle in generall, (by reason of some new impositions) and against them of Bruges in particular (iealous to see them in so great fauour with their Prince) by reason of a Chanell which they had drawne from the riuer of Lis, for the commodity of their country, which Riuer crossing the riuer of Gand, the Gantois supposed it was all theirs in proper: so as none might vse it without their liking.

This iealousie grew so great, that this great city (as big with their wayward and contentious humors, as it was populous and rich) being thus moued, resolues to make shewe thereof, and in this fury they make a League, and choose a head, bearing a marke or token of their faction, and from words they go to blowes. One called Leon (a bold practiser of popular seditions) was found fit to be the Ringleader of this tumult: their marke was a white cap, for all the troupe. These Gantois gather together, they hinder the worke of this chancell, and the gathering of the custome, becing the cause of this quarrell: they kill Collectors and receiueurs, and in the ende the gouernour of the citie called Roger, who being there for the Earle, laboured to teach them their duties.

Their fury exceeded so farre, as they spoyle the Earles Pallace, fire it, and in their rage pull it downe to the ground. They run in great troupes to other townes, to draw them to their league. They beseege Ypre, held by the Earles men, crying in all places, Liberty, as hauing a meaning to change their Lord, and then to seize vpon Flanders.

This cruell disorder amazed the Earle, when as behold Philip Duke of Burgogne, his sonne in law, flies vnto him to quench this fire: and as men admire rather the Sunne rising then sitting, and that the name of the house of France, and the greatnesse of his goodly portion gaue him great authority: so it chanced that he pacified this rebellion, to the content both of the Earle and cities, taking a happy possession of this great inheritance, by a famous and profitable occasion.

Sedition at Montpelier.

But Flanders alone was not subiect to these madde mutinies: for those of Montpelier, newly reduced to the obedience of our King, grew into to great a fury, as they slew James Pontel a Knight of the order, and Chancellor to John Duke of Berry, Gouernour of the Country, Guy of Serry Seneschal of Roergue, Arnould of Montclair Gouernour of the said city, and other officers of the Kings and Dukes, to the number of fower score, and cast their bodies into a well. As the outrage was odious, so the punishment was memorable.

The Duke of Berry, comes with forces, assisted by the whole Prouince, detesting so foule an insolency, so as the Inhabitants (calling to minde their audacious phrenesie,) resolved

A solue to submit themselves to punishment, and not to stand desperately against force.

The Consuls of the Cittie hauing halters about their necks and torne cloaths, the keys of the city in one hand, and a red cap (the marke of their office) in the other, met with the Duke their gouernour being followed by the Clergy (carrying a croisse) all crying for mercy, and weeping with a lamentable noyse.

In this mournefull sort the Duke enters the city gates, being without any gard, he finds the streets full of poore and desolate people, vpon their knees, men and women, olde and yong, crying for mercy, and redoubling their pitifull cries, as witnesses of their repentance. Then the Duke commands, they should presently bring all their armes into one place nere vnto his lodging, placing a gard at the gates and vpon the walles. The next day, he caused a scaffold to be made in the market place, where hauing sharply rebuked the people for their rebellion, he pronounced a sentence in the Kings name, whereby he declares: That all their priuileges were taken from them, their Consullship, Towne house, common Arches, vniuersity, their Bells, Salpannes, and all Iurisdiccions of the citie, cyther of soueraigne courts, or of the commonalty: six hundred Inhabitants to be chosen at aduerture, condemned to die, that is, two hundred to loose their heads, two hundred to be hanged, & two hundred burnt, their children declared infamous and slaves for euer, & their goods confiscate. The commonalty should pay six score thousand franks of gold, and the charges of the Dukes voyage, and his armies. The Consuls with certaine Councillers that were named, should drawe the bodies of such as had bene massacred out of the well, and bury them. A Chappell should be built for their obsequies. With the same Bell which did found the alarm. The gates and city walles should be beaten downe, and their armes burnt publicly.

The sentence pronounced against them of Montpelier.

This was their doome: but it was moderated at the intercession of Pope Clement, then resident in Avignon, by the meanes of Cardinall de la Lune. The same was qualified, the priuileges restored, the gates and walles preferred: but the Authours of this sedition were put to death, that the rest of the Inhabitants might liue in safety.

The sentence
moderated.

A notable president for subiects to suppress their fury, euen when they thinke to haue a iust cause of complaint, feeling themselves surcharged or otherwise grieved: considering the errors are sooner committed, then repaired. And for commanders, that it is a dangerous resolution to let loose the raines to a mad multitude, which augments the mischief, supposing to cure it.

Queene Joane wife to our wife Charles, daughter to Peter of Bourbon, dies about this time, to the great griefe of her husband, to whom she left two sonnes, Charles & Lewis, both very yong: for Charles was borne the 3. of December 1371. and was carried to the Font by Charles of Montmorency, and baptised by Dourmans Bishop of Beauuois, and Chancellour of France, Lewis was Duke of Orleans. She left him also one daughter, Isabell, married afterwards to Richard King of England. Necessary obseruations for the course of our history.

Her children.

This good Prince after his wiues death, was nothing healthfull, so as broken with poyson the which had much weakened him, & with the tedious toiles of his youth more then with age, he decayed dayly, and he himselfe perceiued it, so as feeling the ende of his life to approach, remembreing what troubles he had past, during the mournefull imprisonment of his Father, by the contempt vsed of his yong age, least the like should happen to his sonne Charles, vnder colour of his minority gouerned by tutors, he decreed in a general assemblie of the States, by a lawe, and an irremocable Edict, That after the decesse of the king of France, his eldest sonne should succeed him presently, and at the age of 14. yeeres should be declared capable to gouerne the estate alone, & be freed from Tutors. But (oh the weakenes of mans wisdom) he did not foresee that his son should be ill gouerned by his Tutors in his minority, that the age of 14. should not free him from Tutors: and that euen his sonne coming to mans estate, should giue more scope to the ambition of his owne vncles (more worthily to be called murderers, then tutors) then his weakest youth had done.

He had a Fistula in one arme, by the which those ill humors were drawne away, which grew by poyson, and gaue him great ease when it did run. It chanced this Fistula stopt, and then his maladie encreased much.

Charles

1380. Charles (resolving by this sharpe alarm, to go the common way of all flesh) calls for his three Bretheren, Lewis, John, and Philip: and hauing recommended his children and subiects vnto them, he giues them particular aduise, for the gouernment of the Realme. leauing the custody of his sonne, and the Regency of the Realme vnto them. He died the 16. of September: 1380. in the Castle of Beauuy, seated vpon the Riuier of Marne. He commaunded that Oliuer of Clifton should be Constable, hauing commended his fidelity and sufficiency, and that they should carefully preserue the amity of Germany.

Charles dies. Thus died Charles the wife, wonderfully beloued and lamented of his subiects, leauing his Realme in good estate, after so horrible a desolation. And although the confusions passed had wonderfully impouerished the subiects, and wasted the Kings Treasor, (neyther was his raigne free from warre) yet did he leaue the Prouinces of his Realme very wealthy, and an infinite tresor in his cofers: although he had built the Louure, S. Germaine in Lay, Montargis, Creill, the Celestines, and some other Churches.

Of such power is good husbandry in this realme, as in riches it yeelds not to the treasures of Peru, nor in fertility to any country vnder heauen, to subsist amidst so many storms, and to be presently restored by good husbandry.

An example for Princes to imitate, and not to despaire in like confusions, but to hope for all that may be wished for in the restoring of an estate, by patience and dexterity, virtues proper to our wife Charles.

A Prince so much the more praise worthy, hauing preserued this Estate, when it seemed lost, religious, wise, modest, patient, stirring and stayed, when need required, able to entertaine euery man according to his humor: hauing by these virtues wonne a great reputation, both within and without the Realme, and honourable to his posterity: as he to haue saued France from shipwracke.

He loued learning and learned men: Nicholas Oresme was his schoolemaister: whom hee honoured with great preferments. He caused the bible to be translated into French, imitating S. Lewis. I haue leene the originall in the Kings lodging at the Louure, signed by King Charles and his Brother the Duke of Berry.

A goodly obseruation of the auncient simplicity of these royall characters. I haue likewise seene a Manuscript of the translation made by the commaundement of S. Lewis. He delighted in the reading of the holy Scriptures & Philosophy: hauing likewise caused the Ethicks and Politicks of Aristotle, with many bookes of Tully, to be translated into French. The fame of he shewed to learned men, stirred vp many good wits, who began to draw the Muses from their graues, both in France and Italy.

The History doth particularly note, that he did often visit his Court of Parliament and his chamber of accompts: gaue audience vnto suitors, read their petitions, and heard their complaints and reasons, imploying some dayes of the weeke, euen in his greatest affaires, to do those fatherly and royall workes of Iustice. He tooke great delight to aduance his household seruants, giuing them meanes secretly (and without the piniuity of any) to instruct their sonnes, and to marrie their daughters. A testimonie of a good conscience, and of a wise man. This bond of loyaltie could haue no better foundation, then in transporting it from the Father to the sonne: nor almes be better imployed then from the master to the seruant.

Royall virtues and worthy of eternall memory. But alas, what shalbe the success of this bounty and wisdom? The raigne of his sonne Charles shalbe most miserable. He hath done the part of a good Brother, of a good master, a good Father and a good King: but God the Soueraigne of Kings, had limited the euents of his cares. To reach vs a notable example: That unless the Lord build the house, the workemen labour in vaine: for an eternal maxime of gouernement and state, Who seuer glories, let him glory in the Lord. But virtues are not hereditarie, John not very wife, begat Charles a wife and happy Prince, and he beges a fruitlesse man, vnhappy both in youth and age. We may on the other side oppose other considerations very disputable. Profit aduised him to marrie the heire of Flanders, not onely to pacifie that country, but also to enlarge his owne dominions, adding thereto that great and rich Considerations worthy to be observed by Princes.

A rich estate of Flanders, from whence so many mischiefs haue sprung to France, but his delight made him preferre the fayre before the rich. Moreouer the rules of State did not permit him so to aduance his brother, making him in a manner equal to himselfe in power, the which must needs be the cause of many inconueniences, as it after happened.

The cause of his brother Philip Duke of Bourgogne, is ordered by the same rule, for who can with reason mislike that Charles giues a portion to his brother by his fathers will; and that in the rich marryage of a Prince his vassall, and of a neere estate (whereby his realme was dayly annoyed) he preferres his brother before his capitall enemy? But God had reserued the honour to himselfe. Bourgogne since Robert, the Grandchild of Hugh Capet, had bene successiue in the power of Princes, who had alwayes done faithfull seruice to the crowne, and now it shalbe a scourge vnto it: yet in the ende it shalbe vnted vnto the crowne againe and taken from such as had abused it. Experience doth teach that in matters of State, the ende is not alwayes answerable to the beginning, nor the successe to the dessein, to the ende that Princes may depend of him who is greater then themselves who hath made them, and can marre them: & without whom they cannot do any thing.

Behold the life, death, race, raigne and manners of Charles the 5. called the wife. But before we enter into the trouble some raigne of Charles the 6. Let vs obserue the estate of the Empire and of the Church. We haue saide that Charles the sonne of John King of Bohemia had bene chosen Emperour, and called Charles the 4. Hee held the Empire 32. yeares, beginning in the yeare 1350. So the raignes of John and Charles his sonne are contained in this Empire, for he died in the yeare 1378. Before his death hee provided that Wenceslaus his sonne should succede him in the Imperiall dignity.

The Estate of the empire.

At the first he married Blanche Countesse of Valois, daughter to Charles Earle of Valois, and sister to Philip of Valois King of France, beeing very yong, (for she was but seauen yeares old when hee was betrothed vnto him) hee had bene bred vp in the Court of France, and learned the French humors: he loued our crowne better then our Lawes. A Prince wholly inclined to his owne particular: making shewe to loue our Kings, but vnderhand hee supported their enimies against them.

This was the principall reason why his coming into France proued fruitlesse, after so long a voyage and so great expences, ministring a sufficient cause of ialousie to our Charles, who gaue him the best entertainment he could, to make him knowne, that the souerainty which he pretended to haue ouer France was but a dreame. Yet hee suffered the Country of Dauphiné (which they called the Empire) as a member of the auncient Realme of Ayles to bee wholly infranchised from that subiection, to cut off all pretensions from his successors, embracing the commodity to settle his affaires euen by their meanes who he knew were not his friends.

This Emperour Charles the 4. did all he could both in Italy and Germany, to apply vnto himselfe the rights of the Empire, being wholly inclined to his owne profit, for the which he vied the name of Iustice & good order, being more learned in law, then in doing right, and hauing more knowledge then conscience. It is he which made the Golden Bull, both to rule the Election of the Emperour, and the rights and dignity of the Empire.

The Emperours disposition.

The former confusions of the Empire had so dispensed all priuate gouernours of counties and cities, as euery one played the Emperour in his gouernement.

These tyrannicall disorders were the cause of the Cantons, in Switzerland, who since haue established a goodly commonweale, consisting of thirteene Cantons, who maintain themselves with great order and force, hauing the amity and alliance of the neighbour monarchs, and an honourable place among the Estates of Christendome vnto this day.

Originall of the Cantons in Switzerland.

Their particular history, belongs not to our subiect, it sufficeth to haue noted their beginning, and the occasion of their common weale, newly erected in the disorders of that age. The church of Rome was in very poore estate, first by the continual factions of the Guelphs & Gibellins, and of it selfe by a distraction bred by an open schisme, hauing two Popes, two chaires, two seas: and a deadly hatred, the which troubled all the Kings & princes of christendome, some defending the Pope, others the Antipope as his opposite.

Estate of the Church.

1380. We haue said that in the raigne of Philip of Valois the Pontificall Sea was translated A from Rome to Auignon, where it continued about 70. years, Clement 6. hauing bought this citty for his successors, being a pleasant and trutesfull seate.

These quarrells continued with such violent passions had tyred mens minds like as a long proceffe doth wea: y the most obdinate pleaders. The Popes beeing absent from Rome, gouerned the estate of Italy by three Cardinals their Legats, but all went to ruine. Gregorie 5. a Limosin, being chosen Pope at Auignon, went to Rome to redresse these confusions, wherein there was small helpe. Being receiued with an incredible ioy of the Romans, and of all Italy, he returns no more to Auignon, but passeth therest of his daies at Rome. After his death the people with all vehemency require a Romaine borne, or an Italian for Pope: but there was some difficulty in the election, for the Colledge consisted, for the most part of French Cardinals, who desired to haue one of their owne nation. They were much diuided: but the Cardinals (fearing the peoples fury, armed with an intent to murder them if they did not choose one of their nation) yeilded to the election of a Neapolitane, named Bartholomew, who was receiued and proclaymed by the name of Vibian the sixt.

An Antipope chosen.

But within few dayes after, the Malecontents retyred from Rome (vnder colour to flee the plague) to Fundy, a towne in the Realme of Naples (of the French faction, by means of Queene Ioune, when they did choose Clement the 7. a Limosin, who retyred to Auignon, and was opposite to Vibian the 6. with open despayance one of another: which schisme continued vntill the Countell of Corisance, each Pope with his faction. Clement had for him the Kings of France, Castile, and Scotland. Vibian had the Emperour, the Kings of England, and Hungary. Clement held his seat at Auignon, and Vibian at Rome.

In those dayes liued Bartholomew, Baldus, Petrarch, Boccaccio Plinudes a Greeke by nation, Bona uenture, and Iohn Wicklife. These huriburles touched the hearts, & opened the mouthes of many good men, wonderfully grieved to see such diuisiō in the Church, apparantly growne by the ambition of such as had greatest authority in the same.

Their writings lye open to their reasonable complaints, which euery one may read, without any further discourse.

CHARLES the sixt, 53. King of France.

It is necessary to haue some direction to passe through a Labyrinth; so this crooked raigne hath need of some order to guide vs, in the disorder of so many obscure confusions, which we are to represent. I will first obserue the most famous acts and worthiest personages of this raigne, and then will I distinguish the subject according to the occurrents.

1380

Necessary
obseruations for the vnder-standing of this raigne.

This miserable raigne continued 42. yeares, beginning in the yeare 1380. and ending in the yeare 1422. Charles the 6. succeeded his father Charles the 5. at the age of 12. yeares (being borne in the yeare 1368.) he was crowned in the yeare 80. married in 84. dismissed his Tutors to raigne alone in 87. falls into a phrensie in 93. and dyes in the yeare 1422. So being vnder age with his Tutors, and of age in perfect sense, he reigned 13. yeares, and liued in his phrensie 29. yeares. Who sees not then the iust calculation of 42. yeares in this raigne?

The seuerall
dates.

Charles the 5. his father, had three brethren: Lewis Duke of Anjou, Iohn Duke of Ferry, and Philip Duke of Bourgoigne. Queene Ioune, daughter to Peter Duke of Bourbon, wife to Charles the sixt, and mother to Charles the sixt, had one brother, James Duke of Bourbon. These four vnckles shall plaie their parts vpon this stage in diuers occurrents; but let vs adde therest, euery one shall haue his turne.

The Kings
Vnckles.

We haue said, that Charles the wise left two sonnes; this Charles the 6. whose raigne we now deser be, and Lewis Duke of Orleanse. And our Charles had three sonnes, Lewis, Iohn and Charles: and one daughter named Katherine, all by Elizabeth of Bauiere, one of the chiefe fier brands of this Tragedie: an outrageous woman, an vnnaturall mother, and altogether vnworthy of this crowne.

of Charles vn-worthily married,

These three sonnes were Daulphins one after another in their fathers life: but Charles succeeded him, notwithstanding all crosses and difficulties: and Katherine his sister was married to Henry the 5. King of England: a mournfull gage of a horrible confusion for this Realme.

Ec

But

1380. But alas, how many cruell acts of ambition, vanitie, and treacherie of such as held the helme of this estate, being either royall persons, or seised in the highest dignities? How many changes and reuolutions of these froward humors, daring any thing vnder the libertie of this raigne: the King being cyther a child, or sick, and alwayes weake and vnable to gouerne so great a charge?

Strange
newes.

In the first Scene of this Tragedie, we shall see the Vncles of this young King in diuision one against another. Lewis Duke of Aniou (declared Regent, as first Prince of the bloud) is crossed by his bretheren, the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, and he abuseth his authoritie imperiously.

Lewis Duke of Aniou being dead, Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the sixt shall take his place, as the first Prince, and shall fall to quarrell with Philip the Hardie, duke of Bourgogne, his Vncle, who dying, shall leaue John his sonne successor of his ieaousie, against Lewis Duke of Orleans his cousin.

John shall exceed all humanitie, and kill him; but the hatred shall not dye, being transplanted into Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to Lewis massacred, the which shall breed infinite troubles.

The Daulphins shall play their parts, sometimes friends, and sometimes enemies one to another. John who had murdered Lewis of Orleans, shall be slaine by Charles the Daulphin, who shall be King: but from John shall spring another Philip of Bourgogne, who shall kindle a new fire, to be reuenged of his fathers death.

The Stranger is engaged in these ciuill warres: women augment it by their furies. On the one side Valentine Duchesse of Orleans: on the other Isabel Queene of France. The Constables of Cliffon and Armagnac are likewise drawne in: and the subiect growes licentious in these disorders. Passion preuailes with such furie, as the mother forgets the birth of her owne wombe, and so abuseth her authoritie, as she dares attempt (against the fundamentall law of state) to giue the realme to a Stranger, who was crowned, and proclaimed King in the heart of France, by her boldnesse.

These be the contents of this wretched raigne, with these two parcels distinctly to be obserued; the Kings Minoritie, and his Maioritie, and thereby we shall diuide our whole discourse.

The

THE MINORITIE OF KING Charles the sixt.

From the yeare 1380.

When as Charles receiued the Crowne by the decease of his Father, vnto the yeare 87. that he dismissed his Vncles, to rule alone with absolute authoritie.

He generall estates assemble at Paris, presently after the death of 1380. Charles, called the Wife, to prouide for the gouernment of the King and realme, and to auoide all apparant ieaousie betwixt the Kings Vncles, they decree, That according to the declaration made by their good King deceased, Charles his sonne should be annoynted and crowned King, and that until he were of competent age to gouerne so great an estate, Lewis Duke of Aniou, (as eldest of the house of France, and so the first Prince of the bloud) should be Regent, and haue

the authoritie of Councell and royall command.

And likewise by vertue of King Charles his will, Oliuer of Cliffon (a braue and valiant Knight borne in Brittanie) was made Constable of France. Oliuer of Cliffon tooke possession of his charge, preparing for the Kings Coronation: And the Duke of Aniou receiuing the Kings treasour, which they say was eightene hundred thousand Crownes. A very great summe for those times, and after so wretched a season. He forced Sauvisy the head Treasurer, to deliuer those summes into his hands, and by this excessse laide the ground of a great presumption which followed.

Charles is annoynted at Rheims, and Crowned after the custome of France, the 25. of October, in the yeare 1380. in a sollempne assemblie of his Princes of the bloud, Princes allyed, and Officers of this Crowne. The Dukes of Aniou, Berry, and Bourgogne, the Kings Vncles, Wenceslin Duke of Brabant, the Dukes of Lorraine and Barre, the Earles of Sauoy, of Marche and Eu (friends and confederates to our Kings) did assist. At this sollempnitie there was some question for place, whether should take it: the Duke of Aniou as Regent of the Realme, or the Duke of Bourgogne as first Peere of France and Deane of the Peeres: distinguishing the degrees according to their qualities, to whom the order was giuen.

The King to crowne his installment by some notable act, tooke vpon him to decide this controuersie, and decreed: That for as much as at the Kings annoynting, the Peeres of France ought to hold the first ranke, in all ceremonies: the Duke of Bourgogne as the first Peere should take place of the Duke of Aniou: And so Philip was preferred before his elder brother, continuing the possession of the name of Hardie, the which he purchased in defending his father John so stoutly at the battaile of Poitiers. But he encreased this name of Hardie too much in his carriage, leauing it hereditarie to his children, conuerting this stoutnesse into an imperious presumption, which bred a huge deluge of miseries to the great preiudice of the whole realme.

The day after the coronation, the States beseech the Regent to prouide for the reliefe of the poore people, whose burthen was too heauie for the great arrerages they were to pay of debts crowne in former raignes, and the rather for that there was no warre which imposed the necessity of so great a charge.

The Regent did not yeeld therevnto, but continued these leauies of money more and more, which was the occasion of tumults in diuers Prouinces of France, as if this popular humour had beene like vnto a pestilent seauer, or an infectious disease.

Flanders

Tumults in France.

1380. Flanders likewise kindled great fiers vpon sundry occasions, which were quenched with A much trouble, after memorable combustions.

Flanders shall imbarke first in this misfortune, and shall come last to land, not without danger by strange accidents. To teach Princes, how farre they should presse their subiects. And for subiects, with what respect they should reuerence their Superiours, in seeking out remedies for their afflictions; for in the ende (amiddest all these tumults) the victors weepe and lament in the ruine and notable losse and ouerthrow of the vanquished.

Flanders. We haue sayd, that Philip Duke of Bourgogne, made a composition for the Gantois, with the Earle of Flanders his father in lawe. But this accord lasted not long: for the Earle disdayning the indignities he had digested, during the sedition, could not forget them: B but vnder tained quarrels (to the end they should haue no cause of complaint, as breaking the accord (he pincheth some, and ruines others: and for that the Gantois stood vpon their garde, not suffering the Earles men to attempt any thing within their Citie, he made a search in the Citie of Bruges, (where he commanded absolutely) for such as had bene of the faction of White Cappes, where he executed aboue fise hundred. This execution kindled a new fier: Gand falls to armes, and Ypre followes; to whose succour the Gantois send three thousand men. The Earle being the stronger, cuttes them in peeces betwixt Couttray and Pourpriery, as they marche: Ypre yeelds vnto him; being entered the Towne, he cuttes off leauen hundred of the cheefest mens heads: and then without any stay, he marcheth to Gand, and beseegeth it. But his forces were too small in regard of that great and spacious Citie, so as hauing employed all his meanes, they had still the libertie of foure gates.

The Gantois loth to be shut vp, and to endure the discomforts of a siege, hauing a wonderfull aduantage by the numbers of their people, resolves to prouide well for the garde of the Citie, and then to drawe forth a good troupe to spoile the Countrey, and to force some of the Earles places, thereby to make a diuersion of the siege. They go to field with six thousand choise men, vnder the command of Iohn de Launoy one of their Tribunes.

The Gantois go to field with an armie and are defeated. They take and burne Tenremonde and Gramont, Townes belonging to the Earle, committing infinite spoiles in the countrey. The Earle leaues the siege, and marcheth away D with an intent to fight with them. He findes them neere to Niuelle, chargeth them, defeats them and puts them to flight. They recover the gates of Niuelle, and the Earle enters with them pell mell: some of them (led by Launoy) recover the fort of the Towne: the Earle besiegeth them, and causeth many Fagots and Bauins to be brought about this Tower, and to be set on fire. All these poore wretches are burnt, making most horrible cryes.

Many of the burnt in a Tower. This Tribune intreateth, that they might be receyued to ransom, and shewing his purse, but receiuing no answer from them, but scornes and mockes, he castes himselfe from the toppe of the Tower vpon their Halbards and Pikes, and so hee dyes very E valiantly.

A cruell execution of a Lord against his subiects. This sight was horrible, and truely vnworthy of a Lord displeased with his subiects, and yet he continued it with a new slaughter of this poore people, who being amazed with this great defeat, had neither feete to runne, nor hands to defend themselves. All are put to the sword, so as of six thousand, there hardly escape three hundred. But the Gantois shall soone haue their reuenge.

At the bruchereof, they were as much amazed, as the Earle was puffed vp with pride to pursue his victorie, being in so ready a way for the execution and pursue thereof.

In this disorder, the Gantois choose another head, Philip of Arteuille, sonne to James F of Arteuille, (who (as wee sayd) was slaine by the people,) who aduise them to humble themselves vnto their Earle, and to craue pardon. They are resolved, hauing necessitie for their chiefe Councillour, praying and beseeching their Earle, To haue pittie pitie of the blood of his subiects, who submitted their liues and goods to his mercy, to dispose at his pleasure, eyther in pardoning them, or suffering them to depart, in abandoning their native Country, as a perpetuall banishment, that it would please him onely to graunt them their liues.

The Earle was greatly incensed against them, and in such a choler, as they could receiue no other answer. But that all sorts within the Citie, men and women about the age of fiftie yeeres, should barefeet and bareheaded submit themselves to his mercy, and being in this soire desperate, giue he would aduise what to do.

The people of Gand seeing him transported with wrath, and no meanes to pacifie it. They resolve (by the aduice of Philip of Arteuille, their leader, in this extreame necessity) to bazzard all, and not to hope for any safety but in dispaire, being the least of two mil- chieues, to die courageously, for the liberty of their country, and defending themselves against the vniust violence of so inexorable a man: then hauing scene their wiues and daughters deflowred, they should either suruiue their infamie, or bee slaine and massacred without any defence, like Dogges, at the mercie of so cruell an enemy. The event, or rather GOD the protector of the afflicted, fauoured this courageous resolution.

For the effecting hereof, they make choise of fise thousand of their most resolute and best armed men, to trye their fortunes against the Earle, and prouide the best they can for the gard of the Citie: with a generall resolution and consent. That if these fise thousand men should be defeated: to the ende they should not attend the doubtfull event of a siege, nor fall into the hands of so irreconcilable an enemy, they would set fire of the Citie, and euery one saue himselfe as he could.

This being concluded, Philip of Arteuille parts from Gand, with his desperate troupe, and marcheth directly to Bruges, takes a seat of aduantage, and intrencheth himselfe, attending the oportunitie, eyther to defend themselves with aduantage: or to sally vpon the enemy.

The Earle puffed vp with his first successe, imagining them too few for the Laquaies belonging to the Gentlemen of his traine, came to charge them within their trenches, and to force them to fight. Arteuille not like a Brewer of Beere, as he was, but as a great Captain, ordred his troopes with such dexteritie, as the Earles armie had the sunne in their eyes: vpon this sodaine change, hauing a full view of the Earles men, he goes resolutely to the charge, leading forth this desperate troupe, which fell vpon them like a great streame of water, breaking forth sodenly, hauing found a passage.

The first ranks (troubled with the Sunne beames which dazeled their eyes, and not able to withstand so violent a charge) giue way, and turning their backs, they disorder all the rest.

The Gantois vpon this aduantage, teare all in peeces, they encounter, as famished Woioes do in a flocke of sheepe. This braue Nobilitie flies, as astonied, and is put to the sword.

The Earle cries, intreates, and runnes, but all in vaine: he that had the swiftest horse, and the best legges, to flie was the most valiant. The passage thence to Bruges was neere: the multitude flies thether, like a current of water. The Earle encounters with the rest, not able to gather againe together his people, and shuttes himselfe into his Castell.

The Gantois following, and killing them that fled, enter pell mel, and seized vpon the gates.

Arteuille hauing speedily prouided for the guard thereof, the Gantois (being victors) disperse themselves through out the Citie, crying against the vanquished. The Citie is none: and proclaimed for the good Cittizens, Libertie, killing all such as they found to fauour the Earle, searching all houses for his seruants, and commanding to spare the good Cittizens.

The Earle (foreseeing by this brute) that the enemy would presently pursue him, he sodenly leaues his riche attire, and takes the simplest of one of his gromes, and so forsakes 1380. the Castell, to teeke some corner to hide his head in. He was scarce gone out, but his Castle was beset, and easily taken and spoiled, whilst that he saues himselfe in a poore womans house: where in her fillie cottage she had onely one roome beneath, and aboue a garret, to the which they mounted by a ladder. The Earle creeps into this cabbin, and the woman hides him in the bed-strawe, where her children did lie, and coniming downe, tooke away the ladder.

The Gantois hauing made search in every corner for the Earle, they came to the house where the Earle was, and searching it, they went vp to the place where hee laye hid, den.

He that could haue read the secrets of this poore Princes heart, in this amazement, should haue scene a remorse of conscience, for that he had not intreated his subiects with more mildnesse.

Being thus freed, hee creeps out of this cottage, and gettes forth of the Towne, being alone and on foote: running from bush to bush, and from ditch to ditch, fearing euery one that passed. when as behold (lying hidden in a Ditch) he discouers a household seruant of his owne, named Robert Marshall, who takes him vp on horse-backe behind him, and in this order herecouers Lisle.

This vnexpected successe bred new desseignes, in the frantick braine of this Tribune: and of this furious multitude, who should haue bene satisfied to haue auoyded shipwracke, and (returning to their houses) should haue fallen to their vsuall trades, and haue vsed this profitable successe to good purpose, and made their peace with their lawfull Lord, being sufficiently chastised. But vanitie thrusts them on, and the certaintie of Gods threats shewed it selfe in the following punishment: to teach vs, That man hath but the miserie which he seekes by his owne folly. A generall lesson for great and small, both for men, families, and States.

Artenille with his Gantois (hauing glutted themselves with the sacke and blood of such as were any way affected to the Earle, hauing spoyle his Castle, and left it desolate, beaten downe the gates of Bruges, and filled vp the ditches) From thence they goe to conquer the other cities of Flanders, where he conuected a newe Empire.

Presently all obey him. Ypre, Dam, Bergues, Burlbourg, Furnes, Scluse, Pourprigne, Courtray, and the lesser townes, Andenard resists. It is presently besieged. At the brute of this successe, all Flanders flies thither: so as in few daies there were aboue a hundred thousand men assembled before the towne.

The Earle amazed with so violent a reuolt of all his subiects, hath recourse to his son-in-law Philip Duke of Bourgonne, that by his meanes hee might bee relieued from the King: although he were more affected to the English then French, hauing bene too much respected by our Kings. A proud Prince he was in prosperity, and too much dejected in aduersity.

The Regent and the Councell refused to venture the King with this man in so dangerous a cause: but two reasons moued the King therunto, and made him ouerule both the Duke of Aniou his Vncle, and his whole councell by the perswasions of the Duke of Bourgonne.

The one was Artenille himselfe, who during the siege of Andenard (not content to haue ruined the Noblemens houses of the Country) had made some roades vpon the frontiers of France.

The other was King Charles dreamed that he was mounted vpon a flying hart, which carried him gently through the ayre, and a Heron vnder him, which did beat downe all other birds, came then flying to his fist, and the Hart brought him to the place from whence he carried him to his great content.

Artenille, to auoide this storme, fortifies the passages into Flanders, especially Pont du Lis neere to Comines. The french surprise this passage cunningly, hauing patiently attended all night in the miery fenne vp to the ancles, expecting the commoditie of the passage there.

All Flanders reuolts and joynes with the Gantois.

King Charles succours the Earle of Flanders, contrary to the aduice of the Regent and Councell.

The Earle hides himselfe.

The Earle of Flanders in great perplexitie.

The error of the Gantois.

As the King conceiued a delight to report this dreame, as presage of some good successe, so the Duke of Bourgonne labored to drawe him into Flanders. The King vpon these moues doth presently leue an armie, and goes to field.

Artenille to auoide this storme, fortifies the passages of Flanders, especially Pont du Lis, neere vnto Comines. The french surprise this passage politilly, hauing attended all night in the dirty marsh vp to the ancles, expecting the comoditie of the passage. Their patience was the more commendable: for that it was in the depth of a sharpe winter, in December, Comines and Verain, being taken, sackt and burnt, the Towne of Ypre kills their gouernor, who wold not suffer them to obey the King, and yelded themselves, paying fortie thousand franks for a composition. By their example, Cassel, Bergues, Burlbourg, Grauelin, Furnes, Danckerke, Pourprigne, Tourmont, Vaillant, Messine & other neighbour Townes resolute to seaze vpon their Gouernors, being Gantois; and to send them bound hands and feete vnto the King as testimonie that they had yelded vpon force.

Charles receiues the Townes to mercie; and cuts off the heads of these vnlawful Gouernors. Artenille fearing the reuolt of other Citties, and that his forces (which were great) would fall from him, resolues to preuent Charles, and to force him to fight, promising himselfe the like successe as he had against the Earle before Bruges. With this resolution he chargeth the french army betwixt Courtray and Rosebecque, vpon the Mount of gold: but hee found an alteration. The Gantois charge our foreward, like furious beasts, which at the first shocke did somewhat amaze them, they recoyling a little, but without a Cny disorder: yet supported by the Battaille and rereward, they breath, and all together charge this multitude with so great a furie, as all are put to flight, are cut in peeces, or taken with a strange disorder.

They number aboue threescore thousand men slaine, and an infinite number of prisoners, taken: after the Nobilitie had glutted their cholier vpon this seditious rable, who had made rebellion a vertue, Philip of Artenille their leader was slaine: he was found breaching among the dead carcases, whom the King commanded to be hanged, and so he had the reward of his imagined Empire.

This double euent may serue as a lesson, both for great and small, for great men, in the Eales person; for small, in that of this Tribune. For the first, to command well, for the others to obey well: and for all, not to passe the bounds of their duties. God punishing the great for their tyranny and crueltie, and the lesser for their disobedience: dangerous plagues of mankind: the which cannot stand but by order and authoritie, well gouerned, and well applied.

They call this ouerthrow the battaille of Rosebecque, which chanced in the yeare 1382. in December: it was the more remarkable, for that the vanquished had soone their reuenge.

Charles thus victorious, could not manage his victorie: for in steed of surprising the Gantois in this amazement, he lingers too long at Courtray, to seeke out the remainder of those miserable muiynous, which remayned in this defeate: whereas, in pardoning the vanquished, the victor gets a double victory.

This place also (being infamous by a great ouerthrowe which chanced in the yeare 1312.) moued him to cholier, for that this ill aduised people, to auare the memory of that day, did celebrate a tollingne feast yearly, and had reserued fide hundred pair of gilt spures, which they had taken from the french in that battaille. Charles was so transported with the remembrance of this audacious indignitie, as he caused this poore Towne to be burnt. An vnworthy reuenge of so great a monarke, who should hold it the greatest reuenge vpon his enemies, to pardon when he may reuenge. The Duke, of Bourgonne in all this confusion, did not forget to seeke for goodly mouables, whereof there was abundance. He carried away that goodly flock, and that exquisite tapistry, which is now at Dijon in the Kings house.

The Gantois seeing their ruine, flee to Richard King of England: they choose Francis Arthemis, one of their Cittizens for their head, and reuue the league of white caps, more ob- stinately then before, being resolued to die, rather then to trust their Earle, to whome they imputed

The Townes of Flanders seaze vpon their Gouernors and send them to the King.

The Flemings ouercome by Charles and threescore thousand slaine.

An vnworthy reuenge taken by King Charles.

The Gantois flee to England for succour.

1382. imputed the cause of all their miseries, the which had continued five yeares, and deuoured two hundred thousand men. So fatall are ciuill diffentions betwixt the Lord and his subiects: Lewis their Earle, hauing labored to settle his affaires both by the French and English, against the Gantois, fealing daylie the inconueniences of this rebellious people, as thornes in his sides, fell into such a melancholic, as hee died. Leauing his whole estate much troubled, to his sonne-in-lawe, Philip Duke of Bourgongne: who beeing faine ingaged in his Father-in-Lawes quarrell, was nothing pleasing to this his people.

A strange
meane to pacifie Gand.

The warre was reuiued, both by practises of the English, and by meanes of Artreman, the head of that faction: who hauing tasted the sweete of popular commaund, desired nothing more then to maintayne this diuision: but there fell out a sodaine accident, which pacified all this great trouble, as a little raine doth a great winde. Two Citizens of Gand (whose names deserued well to be registred in this historie) discoursing one day of their common miseries, and noating the true causes of these calamities within their Citie, as feeling the wound, they sought the meanes to cure it, the which had continued so long, and cost their miserable Countrie so deere.

The Kings pleasure, and the Duke of Bourgongnes, must be knowne: they were not ignorant of the peoples humour, being verie wearie of so many miseries.

Their enterprise was not without exceeding danger, by the absolute authoritie of three or fower, who had most credit with the people, being susceptible of any mischiefe, when they are thrust forward with a shewe of good. It was requisite in the managing of so important a busines to vse wisdom and silence, vntill the foundation were well layed: and for the execution thereof, there needed one which had both credit and authoritie with both parties. The God of peace presented one vnto them, which gouerned this action discreetly, John Delle, a gentleman of Gand, but bred vp in the Court of France. He that seeks peace, finds it. This Delle goes to the King, and Duke of Bourgongne, hee layes open his desciue, and is well entertayned. He returnes with a good answer, both by letters of credit, and private instructions, to the Gantois. At his returne the matter is so well furthered by those two Citizens (who were in great reputation with the people) as without the priuie of Artreman, or the English Negotiators, the banner of Flanders (the signall of their popular power) is solemnly planted in the great market place. All the people flocke thither, where hauing signified vnto the chiefe Magistrats, that they would haue peace, and obey the Duke of Bourgongne their Prince: Deputies are appointed with power to negotiate & conclude a peace with him. This was effected after a long confusion, to the content, both of the Earle and Flemings. Of a light beginning, God performes a great worke, when it pleaseth him. Thus the Duke of Bourgongne pacified Flanders in the yeare. 1384. when as he feared greatest tumults by meanes of some seditious persons: to whose great grieve a peace was proclaymed throughout all the Estats of Flanders, which gaue an incredible content to all the people after so manie miseries.

Nowe King Charles grewe great, and although he were but sixteene yeares of age, yet was he desirous to marry. The Duke of Aniou his Vncle, according to the aduice which King Charles the wife had giuen on his death bed, thought good to seek him out a marriage in Germanie, in the house of Bauiere, to counterbalance the credit of the Emperour Wenceslaus, no friend to the house of France, what shewe soeuer he made. He therefore matcht with Isabel the daughter of Stephen Duke of Bauiere, a Princesse from whom they expected much good: but shee brought infinite troubles to France, as we shal see hereafter.

Thus mans wisdom is deceyued, when as hee hopes for best: that God might be knowne for the author of al good, both in the family and State. This imperious Proserpine, verified the prouerbe, That a woman raiseth, or ruines a house. She had almost ouerthrowne the State. But shortly there shal an Italian woman be ioyned to this German, to augment the confusions of this raigne, reasonable good in the beginning, but verie miserable in the ende. This yeare likewise concluded a peace in Brittain, after many troubles, John of Montfort hauing renued his homage to the King, and sworne fealtie, which shal not long continue, to the great preiudice of the King and his realme.

The

A The truce was continued in shewe betwixt France and England, but with no more loue of the two Kings, then betwixt capitall enimies, who sought to annoy one another by new attempts. Charles hauing pacified Flanders and Brittaine, resolues to bee reuenged of Richard, who had sought all meanes to annoy him in eyther prouince, besides the ordinary brauadoes he gaue him within the hart of his realme. He therefore sends a thousand men at armes to Dauid King of Scots, and threecore shippes well appoynted with furniture to arme twelue thousand men of his country, vnder the command of John of Vienne, Admirall of France. Their entry into Scotland was pleasing, but the Scottishmen grew soone discontented with our men, eyther through their fault or ours, they accusing vs of insolency and loofenesse, and we them of barbarousnes and cruelty to their friend a stranger, who came to succour them.

Charles sends men and munition into Scotland.

B This diuision caused Dauid to make a peace with Richard, and our Admirall of Vienne to returne speedily home with his Frenchmen: but not without obseruing the manners, strength and commodities of this Island, diuided into two kingdomes.

And least he should seeme to haue made a fruitlesse voyage, yeelding an accompt vnto the King of what he had done, seene and learned in Scotland, he lets him vnderstand, that the strength of Scotland consisted but in five thousand horse and thirty thousand foote halfe armed, and that of England in eight thousand horse and threecore thousand foote.

C This relation (were it true or false) gaue aduice to assaile the King of England in his owne Country, where he might be vanquished with more facility then abroad: the which so moued the minde of this yong Prince, (transported with the great harmes suffered with much indignity by the English) as it was easie for the Duke of Bourgongne whom it much concerned to haue the English molested, being often disquieted by him in his country of Flanders, to perswade the King to vndertake this war. Opportunity did likewise seeme to inuite him: for that the Duke of Lancaster (pretending right to the realme of Castile by his wife) had exhausted England, both of men and money, and the Gantois being pacified, all Flanders would be held in subiection by this check.

Charles resolues to make war in England.

The Regent acquainted with the Duke of Bourgongnes humor being his brother (who for his private interest would hazard the whole) and noting the eminent dangers in the Kings person (who would imbarke himselfe in this action) the great want of money the peoples exclamations: the great danger of tumults, by the great exactions which must be made, and in the action it selfe, the inconueniency so apparant to any one that would open his eyes, the impossibility of so great an enterprise; to assaile a great King (so oft a Conquerour) within his owne Realme, not holding any land there; he was verie against it, yet he spake soberly, least he should offend the King, who greatly affected it.

The Regent
dislikes of this enterprise.

Lewis Earle of Touraine the Kings brother (who soone shal be Duke of Orleans) the Constable Ciſſon, the Earle of S. Pol, the Lord of Couſy, and others in whom Charles had most trust, had beene so perswaded by the Duke of Bourgongne, as they had nothing else in their mouths, nothing founded in this yong Princes eares, but the necessity, profit, honour and facility of this voyage. What my Liege (say they) are you lesse then the King of England? shal the French yeeld to the English in valour, courage or force? what an indignity is it to haue this people alwayes at our gates, to nourish them in our bosomes, and to furnish them with armes to beat vs? what a benefite wil it be to take their nest from them and leaue them no place of retreat? Your Countries of Guienne, Normandie, Picardie and Flanders, are wholly yours. How much doth that import for the honour of your Maiessty, and the good of your Realme, to returne them their owne, who haue so often defeated your armies, taken your ancestors, spoyled your Estate, braued it in your Townes, and besegged your chiefe city of Paris? As for the facility of the execution, who sees not but you may effect it if you please? The Saxons conquered England with a handful of men, far from their own home and with small meanes. and William the Conquerour with his sword alone. And you my Liege hauing a realme ful of men, victualls & monie, euen at your enemies gate shal not you persuaile? England opens her armes vnto you: your Realme inuites you, which without doubt will employ both heart and purse for so great & generous a desciue the which imports both the honour and quiet of your Maiessty.

Such

1382. Such and like speeches they did continually buzz into Charles his cares, but from his Chamber they were published in the Court, and so through out the whole realme, as that which pleaseth the King doth commonly please all. The deffine was to bee wished against a capitall enemy of the State, and the proceeding had a fayre shewe.

At the generall instance of all the French, the King decrees in counsell, to leauy a great armie, for the voyage of England: letters are sent out to all parts, Subsidies, Taxes, Loans imposed, greater then during the imprifonment of King John, but all was shadowed with this reason. That they must endeaour once for all, to roote out the Englisch, who vndermined this estate and sought to ruine it. This decree was put in execution with great applause of all men, as if France had layed new foundations of her greatnesse: both to warrant it selfe from danger at hand, to haue a reuenge of former losses, and to build a newe Estate at the cost of the common enemy of the French nation.

The Nauie is prepared at Seluse and Blanguerge to the great content of the Flemings. They armed fower hundred eighty feuen Shippes for warre, with an infinite quantity of victuals the which came from all parts like to a flowing stream.

Preparation for the warre
of England.

The nobility striues who shal be best appointed. Strange Princes are intited. The King of Spaine (then a friend to our King) the Earle of Sauoy, The Dukes of Saxony and Bauiere send men. Our Princes will not yeeld one to another in costly shewes: they adde superfluous curiosity to necessity. They paint and gild their shippes: All glisters with goodly ensignes, penons, banners, standards and streamors. The masts painted with rich grounds shining with leaues of Gold, gaue notice to all men, that they went not onely to a certain victory, but to some ioyfull nuptials. But all this feast was made without any reckoning with God, who laughs from heauen at these ants, that strue to climbe without a Ladder, and at Princes, who made these brauadoes at the poore peoples cost, who remembered not that God hath a soueraigne court, and a register to controll their actions, and to oppose against their vanities.

The armie was prepared in two places, in Flanders, and in Brittaine. It consisted of twenty thousand Knights and Squires, as many Genouois archers on foote, and fure hundred men at armes Brittons, vnder the command of the constable Cliffon, who was with the fleet in Brittaine.

They had a care safely to lodge this great army after their descent in England, expecting with safety the variable euents of warre, against a king and people, whom they came to fight with on their owne dunghill.

A strong fort of wood made.

To prevent all inconueniences, they build a great frame or engine (some attribute this inuention to the Constable Cliffon, others to John of Vienne, A dimitall of France, who had layde the first plot of this enterprife) like to a towne of warre, with towers, bastions, bulwarks, flankes and other defences, according to the manner of that age. There was a lodging for the King and his court, according to the degrees of Princes, Officers and Noblemen of marke: Lodgings for the chiefe of the armie, according to their quarters, and space to set vp their tents and pauillions, halls and common places for the munition and victuals which followed the army, and to conclude, conuenient roomes to imbarrell a great number of men of warre.

This inclosure or frame was round, and made of many peeces with admirable arte, and so great abundance of stufte, as if they had cut downe a whole Forrest: it was finished with wonderfull speede, by the great number of workemen which came from all parts.

To the men, shippes, victuals and this engine, the Kings court gaue an extraordinaty beauty, being accompanied with the Dukes of Lorraine and Bir, the Earles of Sauoy, Armagnac, Geneue, S. Pol, Longueuille, Eu, Daulphin of Auuergne, the Lord of Couffy, Master William of Namur, with all the great Barons of France, and an infinite number of braue nobility who imbarked themselves more willingly then in the voyage to the holy land.

The preparation of the English for their defence.

Thus was the preparation made in France for England, where they remayned in great perplexity, to see so great a storme readye to fall vpon them. They provide the

A the best they can, first by deuotion, (hauing recourse vnto God) then they fortifie their ports and all passages with great diligence, both with men of warre and all sorts of incombers, to helpe those places which nature had made of hard acceffe in this Iland. They say that Richard leauied a hundred thousand foote, and ten thousand horse, which was not answerable to the Admirals relation, the first Architect of this ridiculous attempt. But thus are princes oft times abused, imbarcking themselves in dangerous actions without reason, whole endes are not answerable to their beginnings.

All was ready in the end of September: the King had provided for the gouernement of the realme in his absence, leauing his brother Lewis Earle of Touraine, assisted with the Duke of Berry his vnle, and the bishop of Beauuois his chancellour. Thus he parts from Paris, and comes to Seluse with great speed, to recouer the time lost. The Regent should not abandon his person in so long and important a voyage, but he stayes behind the King promising to follow presently, but his meaning was to bring this enterprife to nothing.

The king beeing arriued, the howers of stay are tedious, he tells the minutes, and complaints of the time lost: he sollicites his vnle to come by sundry letters, and sends post after post: he stamps, he chafes by reason of his stay. The whole Court is of the same humour. The Duke of Anion answers the King, that he will part to morrowe. but he stayes at Paris to make good cheere at leysure, of purpose to draw on winter, to make the voyage impossible, and so to ouerthrow the action, the which was neuer pleasing vnto him, eyther for that it was pleasing to the Duke of Bourgogne his brother, and so to crosse him, or for that he held it preiudiciall to the King and his realme.

The Regent
seekes to o-uerthrow the action.

But seeing himselfe preft by importance, and impatient letters from the King, he parts from Paris, and the same day the Constable Cliffon waies anchor at Lantriguer in Brittaine, with this great Towne of wood, and seuentie two shippes of warre, meaning to ioyne with the whole bodye of the armie at Seluse: but it fell out contrary to his discline, and otherwile then the facility of his supposed victory had represented vnto him.

For hauing run his course towards Flanders, to take port at Seluse, behold a contrarye wind casts him vpon the coast of England, where (notwithstanding all the diligence of his Mariners) his fleet was disperfed into diuers parts, three shippes (wherein this great Engine was) are driuen into England, and runne on ground at the mouth of the Riuer of Thames. Behold our Argonautes as much amazed to see themselves taken in a weyre, as the Englisch were glad, who with ioy and admiration see themselves possessed (beyond all hope, and without any paine) of that which had cost their enemies so much to ruine them.

Part of the French nauie

sea.

Their newes flie speedily to King Richard, who commaunds this great booty to bee brought vp the riuer vnto him, whether all the Country flocks to so strange a spectacle, and euery one holds it for a preface of good successe, to haue taken their City which should haue taken them. An other part of the Fleet is driuen into Zealand, and the Constable of Cliffon with the rest arriues at Seluse, much amazed at this first successe.

All their ioy of an assured victory is conuerted into a generall feare, least some newe lesse should followe this vnforgotten beginning. But whilest this amazement troubled most of the French, the Duke of Bourgogne and those of his faction (who desired the performance of this voyage at any rate) made these difficulties light, as common accidents which should not hinder great enterprises, the which cannot bee executed without some crosses, for the which they must seeke a remedy and not dispaire. He had perswaded the King againe, easie to be drawne to what he desired. Hereupon the Regent arriues, who (seeing the King resolu'd to imbarke) vales his maske, speakes plainly, and tels the King in his Counsell, That he will neuer consent he should expose his person and estate to the hazard of the sea, of weather, and of war, and vpon an aduice which seemed apparently false: being most certain, that the King of England had assembled aboue a hundred thousand fighting men. That these first losses were aduertisements fro heauen to bridle those vaine hopes, which are sooner conceiued then brought forth. He had alwayes sufficiently declared, that it was not his aduice, yet for that he would not seeme to contradict the Kings will, &c. crosse such as gaue him this counsel, as honorable 1382. to himselfe and profitable to his Realme, he would not rashly oppose himselfe. But seeing now that God spake, he did open his mouth the more boldly, bearing in his heart a saythfull zeale unto the Kings service and the good of the State. That shortest errors being best, it were better to retire in time then to make an absolute shipwracke of the Kings person, and the honour and good of the Realme, too much dismembred by former afflictions.

The enterprise broken off. This checke from heauen which God had sent; Winter, and the feare of worse, made the Regents aduice to be allowed, both by the King and his counsell, who changed opinion for their voyage to England.

So this great enterprise was disappointed, being very preiudiciall to the poore people, who endured the warre that their enemy should haue felt, by an vnseasonable and excessiue charge.

I haue coated this action in the yeare 1381. vnder the Regency of the Duke of Anjou. I know some attribute it to the Duke of Berry, but I haue followed the first opinion, vpon the relation of true Authors, and as it shall appeare by the progresse of this report most likely.

This action was the cause of seditions at Paris and Rouen, bred without doubt by the discontent of this bad gouernment: for this great shewe so incensed the people (being weary and grieved to haue borne so great a burthen for so vaine an enterprise) as they rise at Paris, Rouen, Amiens, Poitiers, Lyons, and many other Citties, by this new occasion which presently succeeded the first folly.

Sedition at Paris.

The Regent was blamed by the people, to haue bene too slacke in his oppositiō against this preparation for England, and the chiefe in Court hated him for being so hastie, for that he was the onely itaie thereof. Thus ill thought of by both, he was maligned of all handes.

Naples offered to the Regent. It chanced the realme of Naples was offered vnto him by Queene Ioane and Pope Clement the 7. This was his whole desire, but he must conquer it by dint of sword. The title only was offered him, both by her that might giue it as being heire, and by him that might confirme the donation as being Pope.

All the Kings counsell, being weary of the Regents cōmand, wished to see him gone: but they must flie to the people for money; the which was hard to get, as experience did witness.

Presently as they heare talke at Paris of a newe imposition (although they sweetened these bitter pilles with the goodly name of subsidies) all the world begins to crie out: and from Paris this brute flies through the whole Realme. The people runne tumultuously to the Greue, they desire the Prouost of Marchants to bring them to the Regent, the which he delays from day to day by excuses, but in the end he cannot retaine them.

A great multitude runs to the Regents lodging, they giue him to vnderstand by their Prouost into what extremity they were brought, and vige the late superfluous expences. To what end then (say they) serues a new warre to conquer a new kingdome in the aie with the ruine of the widow and the Orpheline? This was not decreed, nor practised by the good and wise King Charles, wherevnto he had bound his sonne, who should not suffer the memory of his fathers ashes to be taxed with this dishonour. The Chancellour Dormans speakes at the Regents request: he layes before their eyes the necessity of this voyage whereby both the King and realme might reape profit & honour, promising the King should prouide for the reliefe of the people. This was gently put off, to make them loose this humour in diuiding them: but the people continue more obstinate, they require a plaine & resolute answer to their demaund, so as the next day, they come in troupe before the Kings lodging, where the whole Counsell was assembled with the Regent.

The King giues audience to the prouost of Marchants in the peoples name, who delivers the same complaints. Then John de Marais an aduocate in Parliament, an eloquent and popular man, prepared carefully for the purpose, makes a goodly and artificiall oration to diuert the people from this bitterneffe, laying before them their duties, the necessity of the Kings affaires, and the good which should redounde by the enterprise of this foraine warre. He omitted nothing of the office of a good Orator: but he preuayled not, for

A the people going from thence, without respect of the King or his Counsell, runne presently to the Iemes, Lombards, and such other Marchants houses as had bene accustomed to gather all publike exactions: they breake vp their shoppes and counting houses: they take away what was good, and ill intreate all such as they meete of that profession, yet they kill no man in this first tumult. The Regent winking at this insolencie, and fearing least it should encrease by mouing the people already in choller, thinks it best to referre the matter to another time, vntill the fume of this bitter discontent, were blowne ouer: aduancements comming from all parts of the realme, that the Citties grewe into the like humour.

But all this dissuads him not from his enterprise; he employes all such as he thinks fit to winne the people. John of Marais, Peter de la Riviere, James Andelle and such like Tribuns, who seemed to be in credit with the people, in shewing themselves affected to the common good. And to loose no time, he prepares his armie, being resolute to leuie this imposition by force whatsoeuer it cost. The farmers of this leuie, haue charge to beegin it. A Collector at the Hales requiring a denier from a poore gardiner, for a basket of herbes, she crying out, a great troupe flocke about this Collector and teare him in peeces.

But this is not all, in this tumult all runne to gither on heaps: Porters, Pedlers, Carters, Butchers, Tauerneers and such like, the scumme of the baser sort: they goe in troupes to the Towne house, they breake open the doores, and take such armes as they finde. By the Constables command they had made beetles or axes to arme their men withall: they

C take them, and so vse them, as this sedition was afterwards called, by the name of Mailloins. Being thus armed, they goe to the Farmers Lodgings, beat downe the doores, breake open cofers, cubberds and counting houses, they drawe forth their books and papers, they teare and burne them: they take away money and mouables, and in the ende they kill and massaker all the farmers they can finde, searching all corners of their houses.

They crie that one had saued himselfe in Saint James Church at the Butchery, they runne thither, and murder him holding the image of the blessed virgin in his armes. Some saue themselves in Saint Germaines Abbay, where they are presently besegged. But whilst that some labour after this sege, the rest runne to the prisons of the Chastelet and Fourl' Euesque where they release the prisoners and arme them: They bethinke themselves of a head,

D there was a very sufficient man in prison named Hugh Aubriot, who in former times had bene Prouost of the Marchants, and had with honour executed great charges, both in the Tresorie and State, but for certaine dislikes of the vniuersities, (which was then in great credit at Paris) he was condemned to perpetuall prison. This multitude drawes him forth, vpon promise to be their leader, but being at libertie he slips away and retires wisely to Dyon: being loath to ingage himselfe in these popular confusions, the which discrete men doe flie, as plagues in a Common weale. This rabble finding themselves countenanced with a Commander so well experienced: presume farther, yet seeing themselves abandoned by the departure of Aubriot, and recalling themselves from this phrensie, their hearts faint and euerie one bethinkes himselfe howe to yeeld an account of that

E which had chanced, all this zeale of publike good vanishing away with the consideration of priuate danger. Such as had most to loose, (finding themselves actors in these insolencies) seeke for Counsell of John de Marais a popular Aduocate, intreating him to be intercessor for them vnto the King. The vniuersitie is also requested to imploy their credit with the Prouost of Marchants and other notable Cittizens, which were not guiltie of these phrenesies.

There is a number chosen to goe to the King, and to sue for pardon. These deputies, in their habits, countenances and words shew the greatest sorrow that may bee, for an offence committed. John de Marais is their Aduocate, the King hauing heard them, sends them away, vntill his Counsell had aduised what answer to make: who decrees, That for punishment of this popular insolencie, the Cittie of Paris should pay a hundred thousand francs, and the heads of this sedition (with such as had broke the prisons,) should be at the Kings discretion.

This decree is deliuered to John de Marais to make knowne vnto the Parisians, in whose

He acquaints them with the Article for the tyme, and conceales the punishing of the Authors of this sedition: whether it were by commandement, or otherwise, the Historie makes no mention: yet he kept their heads and his owne for the scaffold, as we shall presently see. to reape the deserued punishment for dealing in these dangerous affaires, and to pay a deere interest of their popular brokerage.

The Parisiens tamed by this reprehension, pay the hundred thousand franks, as a fyne for their folly, and the whole taxation imposed for the warre of Naples, without any question.

These summs are giuen to the Regent for his voiage into Italie, where his Bretheren, the Constable of Cliffon and the greatest part of the Councell wished him, rather then in France (the Chanceller Dormans onely excepted, who soone shall reape the frute of his departure.) notwithstanding any shewe they made him, to see him in so good away to settle his greatnesse. He parts from Paris taking an honorable leaue of the King, of his Bretheren and of the whole Court, leauing the Regencie to the Dukes of Berry and Bourgonne vntill his returne. But taking the way of Italy, he takes the way of much paine, and the Rendez-vons of death, which soone swallowes vp both his life and all his desseins. His army was goodly, some say thirty thousand horse and an infinit number of foote: others thirty thousand men without specifying horse or foot: but all agree that he went to the conquest of this realme, not onely well accompanied but also well furnished with siluer, the necessary synecwes of a long warre. They gaue out, that it was the Treasor of Charles the 5. the which he caused Sauoyss to deliuer in the beginning of his Regency.

The order of the Historie commands mee nowe to set downe the titles of the realme of Naples, for the which our Lewis of Aniou marcheth into Italie with his army: and the successe of this voiage. We haue sayed, that Charles (brother to the King Saint Lewis.) Duke of Aniou and Earle of Prouence by his wife Beatrix, was called to the realme of Naples by Pope Vrbaine the 4. and conquered the possession by his sword, hauing defeated Manfroy and Conradin of Suenia.

That he was dispossessed of Sicile at the Sigilien Euen-song, by Peter of Arragon sonne in lawe to Manfroy, fauored by Pope Nicolas the 4. taking from Charles what his predecessor Vrbain had giuen him: so as after hee had contended long with Peter of Arragon, the realme of Naples remayned vnto him, leauing it to his children with more trouble then content. This Charles of Aniou brother to Saint Lewis, had many Children, Charles, Robert, Lewis and Philip. Lewis surnamed the Lame, married Marie the Daughter of Stephen King of Hongarie. Charles Martell had two sonnes, Lewis and Andrewe: Lewis was Prince of Durazzo or Di-rachium, and Philip Prince of Tarentum. All appered on this Theater in some sort, but Robert second sonne to Charles, was King of Naples, and Earle of Prouence: he had one sonne named Charles, who succeeded him in these two citats, and he had but two daughters, Ioane and Marguerite.

Ioane as the eldest, was Queene of Naples and Contesse of Prouence, and was married to Andrewe brother of Lewis King of Hongarie; a loose and an audacious Princeesse, who slewe her husband (as we haue sayed) and married with Lewis sonne to Philip Prince of Tarentum, his Cousine, against all order. Lewis King of Hongarie, sonne to Charles Martell, comes to Naples, to reuenge the murder & adulterie of this mastiue bitch: who flies with her incestuous husband into Prouence, yeelding him the free possession of the citie of Naples, and that of the greatest part of the realme, some places remayning in Apulia, in the gard of certaine Capitaines, confident seruants vnto Ioane: who were the meanes to put hir againe speedilie in possession of that estate, soone wonne and soone lost. It is manifest that the institution of the realme of Naples belongs to the Sea of Rome.

Lewis King of Hongarie being victor, hauing performed the dutie of a good Brother, and done all hee could against this vilanous murderesse, returnes home, leauing all his newe Conquest to the disposition of Pope Clement the 6. a Limosin, then resident in Auignon.

1383. A nowe long held their Sea) belonged, had no great labour, for yeelding Auignon vnto him he recovered Naples, both by the Popes fauour (who had the chiefe authoritie,) as also by money, wherewith hee did both winne the Gouernors of places most easie to corrupt: and also leuied an armie to force them that were most affected to the King of Hongarie. Nowe hee is settled againe in the realme of Naples, with her Adulterer Lewis of Tarentum, who struined not long after this exploit of Naples and the sale of Auignon. After his death shee marries presently with James of Arragon Duke of Calabria of whome shee was soone wearie, falling in loue with Otho of Brunswike, a young Germaine Prince, of a good house, but not of abilitie to support Ioane, so as she held him not as a husband, but vied him as a Stallion.

B Amidst these alterations of Naples, the Sea of Rome, was not quiet, for after the death of Pope Gregorie the xi. who retired from Auignon to Rome, the Colledge of Cardinals fell to a horrible contention for the Popes election: the Romains being resolute to haue one of their owne nation, and the French one of theirs: from whence sprong that strange Sieisme whereof we shall speake.

Vrbain the 6. was chosen at Rome, after the decease of Gregorie the xi. and the French Cardinals yeelded to this election: but for that they sayed they had bene forced by the Romains, who had them in their power and threatned to kill them, vnder colour to change the aier, hauing obtained leaue to goe to Anagnia, they retier to Fundi, a Citie of the realme of Naples, fauored by Queene Ioane, French by stock and humour, and there they choose

C Clement the 7. for Pope, to oppose him against Vrbain. Clement rettyed to Auignon, and Vrbain keeps at Rome. A Sieisme in the Church.

Two Popes, two Seas, two FaCTIONS, which trouble all Christendome with horrible confusion. Clement seekes to fortifie himselfe, and as France held for him, so did he labour to haue Naples wholie at his deuotion, by reason of the neerenesse, much importing for the Citie of Rome, where the chiefe quarrell was debated, Contrariwise Vrbain the 6. to bereuenge of Ioane (a partisan to Clement the 7. his enemie,) hath recourse to Lewis King of Hongarie the first interessed, being brother to him whome this stumpet had slaine, that he might oppose the same scourge which had already corrected her. But Lewis excusing himselfe by his age, and the infirmity of his body, sent him Charles issued from that Lewis Prince of Durazzo, who we sayed, was sonne to Charles of Aniou, seeking euen in the race it selfe, a man to punish this wicked woman, giuing him a goodly armie to that ende. Ioane seeing this great storme readie to fall on her, flies to Pope Clement the 7. and by his aduice adopts our Lewis Duke of Aniou, of whome we nowe treat.

Lewis hauing prepared his army, and being crowned King of Naples and Sicile by Pope Clement the 7. in Auignon, hee lands at Naples, to take possession of the realme, whereto the lawfull heire and the Popes authoritie did call him. But he came too late, for Charles of Durazzo (being parted from Hongarie with his army, and happylie landed,) entred the Country, ouercame Otho the pretended husband of Ioane and holding him prisoner, he forced this miserable woman to yeeld vnto his mercy, the which was too great, for that he only caused her to be smothered betwixt two pillowes, deseruing as cruella death as her life had bin execrable.

Notwithstanding all these difficulties, Lewis of Aniou (thrust forward by his owne ambition,) proceeded: hauing giuen such order to his affaires (after the adoption, made by Ioane in his fauour, and the Popes coronation) as he procured all the Capitaines of places to hold for him, hauing ingaged them by money and golden promises, so as many places held good for him: and the people desyred him, being glad to be freed from Ioane and to haue so mightie a Lord; to maintaine them in peace.

Lewis enters the realme of Naples: at the first hee winnes Tarentum and Beri, but whilst he determines to proceede in his desseins, death surpriseth him, making an ende of his infinit ambition and of all his toyles: but not of his childrens, Lewis and Charles, nor of their posterities.

Thus Charles Pince of Durazzo, of the race of Aniou (called the Hongarien, for that he had bene borne and bred in Hongarie, and brought vp by King Lewis) remayned peaceable

Let vs nowe returne to France. The Duke of Anious departure put all authoritie into the hands of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, who began to manage the affaires of State at their pleasures.

The Duke of Berry and Bourgongne in credit.

There was no great loue betwixt them, although they were bretheren, but onely to maintaine themselves against such as might hinder their ambitious plotts. And for that they had knowen the Chancellor Dormans, to be wholly affected to the Regent, they perswaded the young King to dismisse him, for some reasons, the which are not specified in the Historie.

The Chancellor Dormans disgraced.

But Princes want no colours when they will disgrace their seruants. Peter Orgemont was appointed in his place, after the seale had remayned some time in the hands of Robert of Corby, first President of the Court of Parliament of Paris, and of Philip Moulins a Chanoine of the fayed Cittie.

New troubles in Flanders.

But Flanders (which alwayes bred some monster in that age) stirred vp by the Engliss, and putte vp by the ridiculous conclusion of this great and vaine preparation, began new troubles, and had praictises with them of Paris, to drawe the rest of the Citties of the realme into some popular league. These newes put the King into great perplexitie, the rather for that he had surprised certaine letters from the Mailloins of Paris, to the white capps of Gand, to make a correspondencie betwixt them, the accustomed Leuaine of rebellion with ill aduised people.

The Engliss enter Picardie.

As these things amaze both the King and his Vncles, behold Richard lands at Calais, with an army vnder the command of the Duke of Lancaster, who at first spoiles Picardie, and then plants himselfe before Ypre, and beleageeth it. The Gantois had made a good shewe, both to the King, and Duke of Bourgongne, vntill that time, seeming resolute to obserue their former accord: but the Engliss armie being entred into Flanders, they go to field, and ioyne with them before Ypre.

The Kings Vncles muster men in all places with great diligence, and intreat their nearest friends to come speedily to their succour. The Dukes of Lorraine and of Bar make hast: the Duke of Brittain comes with a goodly troupe. They haue sodenly assembled twentie thousand Frenchmen at armes, besides the succors of Lorraine and Brittain, the number of foote is not specified.

A great quarrell grows for Precedence.

Charles (thus accompanied) comes to Saint Denis in France and hauing taken leaue of the Martyrs, (according to the ancient custome of Kings) and giuen the forward of his army to the leading of the Constable Cliffon, and the Duke of Brittain, (the Constable marching before the Duke, by reason of his place) the ground of a dislike fell out betwixt them, which beeing nourished by diuers occasions, shalbe the subiect of a great defaister both for the King and realme.

The King followed (accompanied with the Dukes of Berry, Bourgongne and Bourbon his Vncles, and the Dukes of Lorraine and Bar: he lodgeth at Blandelle, two leagues from Cassel, with an intent to charge the Engliss: who presently leaue the siege of Ypre, Cassel and Grauelins, and retyer to Bregues, where Charles presently beleageeth them.

Charles makes a truce with the Engliss.

The Engliss demande a parle with the Duke of Brittain, they put him in minde of the benefits he had receiued from their nation, and demande requitall in this occurrent. The Duke of Lancaster remaines at Calais, by reason of his weakenesse: the Engliss Capitaines requier respite to vnderstand his pleasure.

In the ende the King receiues them vpon honest conditions, to depart with bagge and baggage and to leaue Flanders, the which they performe. Being returned into England, they are accused to haue sold the Earldome of Flanders to the French, so as by Richards commands they are beheaded.

The Gantois made a dutifull answer, and promised obedience and loyaltie to the King.

A Truce was concluded for one yeare with the Engliss, by meanes of the Duke of Lancaster for King Richard, and the Duke of Berry for our King Charles.

Such was the issue of this fodaine voyage of Flanders, being a meanes to settle a business of a deeper consultation and more dangerous consequence; seeing it concerned not onely the heart, but the whole body of the State. They sought how to suppress the sedition, which was apparently bred in Paris, and by their example, in many great citties of the Realme. To this ende, Charles vpon his returne from this voyage, stayed at Saint Denis with his vncles, the Constable, Chancellor, and his whole Councell: they were all troubled to resolute in so important a cause, for what should they do? To punish the poore people tyred with the warres, threatened with losses: halfe dead by the feeling of so great calamities, that were to beat one lying sicke in his bed, for his waywardnesse, and not to cure him of the paine which is the cause thereof. It were a meanes to driue him to despair, to apply a remedye worse then the disease. And not to punish them, would argue feare, and make them grow more proud and insolent, a means to animate them to all unpurue, and to lay the way open to a disordered rebellion.

But the last aduice preuailed, beeing well verified, that since the payment of the fine, the Parisians were growne worse and more bitter: hauing had conference with the Commons audacious mutines, and the right artisans of rebellion, holding it a vertue to play the madde men against their naturall Lords: and also had so farre abused the Kings bountie, as they had presumed to sollicit the best Citties of the Realme to the like disorder. It did greatly import for the good of the Kings seruice and of the State, that such phrensies should be suppressed by an exemplarie punishment done vpon the chiefe authors.

John de Marais was verie deepe engaged in these tumults, and the more dangerously, for that he cast the stone, and withdrewe his arme: and making a shewe of seruice to the King, he fed the people in these madde humours, very torches of sedition, vnder a colour of the Common weale: for who can beleue they would put so famous a person to death without some iust cause. I knowe they write diuersly, and euery man hath his iudgement free: yet is it not true nor likely, that in pardoning a whole multitude offending, they would punish him in whome there were no shewe of offence. If hee were not culpable at the least, he was accused of that which was the subiect of a publike condemnation.

Charles being aduised to punish the Parisians for the insolencies they had committed in his presence, caused his armie to lodge about the Cittie, and on a certen day he sends for the chiefest of Marchants & the Sheriffs, who come vnto him to Saint Denis, with a countenance full of humility, and shewe of amendment.

The King gaue them to vnderstand, by Peter Orgemont his Chancellor, that he ment to goe to his Cittie of Paris, to punish the rebels and seditious, who had not respected his presence.

The Prouost makes answer. That the whole bodie of the Cittie was wonderfully grieved for that which had beene committed by men in despaire, worthy to be seuerely punished: but the good Cittizens had no community with these rascalls: and that the whole Cittie was readie to do him faithfull seruice.

There were many about the King which made all odious that concerned the Parisians: but Charles made them no other answer, but that he would be soone at Paris, and doe what reason and the dutie of a good King required. He causeth his foreward to march, led by the Constable Cliffon and the Marshall of Sancerre, who seaze vpon the gates, the which they found open without any guards. The King accompanied with the Dukes of Berry, Bourgongne and Bourbon, with other Lords of his Councell, and an infinit number of Noblemen and Gentlemen in great shewe, terrible to the people, marcheth into the Cittie. Being come to Saint Denis gate, he causeth the barres to bee beaten downe. The Prouost of Marchants, the Sheriffs with the chiefe Inhabitants of the Cittie, carrying the keys, beseech the King to giue them audience: hee denyeth them, and passeth on to the house of Saint Pol, but the army is disperfed throughout all the quarters of the City. Presently they take away all the chaines, and send them to Fais

The King enters Paris with his army.

1385. de Vincennes. They search all houses for armes: the which are instantly carried to the Louvre, and the Bastile. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, with the Prouost and his Archers, go throughout the city, causing 300. of the most tedious to be apprehended.

The next day many heads were stroke off at the Halles, &c. amongst the rest, that of John de Marais, who al men had heard of late discours to eloquently with admiratiō, being held for the Oracle of France. These executions were done by fits, with such a shewe of grauitie, as the seat of Iustice did more terrifie, then the executioners arme vpon the scaffold. A whole day was spent in these slow proceedings, the city gates being kept so straitly, as no man might issue forth: houses and shops were shut vp, with great silence as if all had bene dead, euery man being hidden in his house, or else so amazed as he durst not looke into the streets.

The vniuersity (which then was in great credit with the King) becommeth tutor for the people, and beseecheth him not to include the Innocent with the culpable.

The King answereth coldly, that he would aduise what to do, willing them to retire. In the meane tyme a great Scaffold is made on the highest staire of the Pallace, before the great image of Philip the faire, with great shewe and pompe: in the middest was a royall throne, and seates on cyther side.

The Herald giue commandement throughout the city in the Kings name, that euery man should repaire to the Pallace at a certian howre. The King sitting in his seat of Iustice hauing on cyther side of him, the Dukes of Berry, Bourgogne and Bourbon, his Vncles, with al the rest of his Counsell in order: he commanded Peter Orgemont his Chancelour, to deliuer his minde to the people of Paris. The multitude beeing disarmed, compassed in round about with armed men, beeing bare headed, they fall vpon their knees, seeing Orgemont rise from his chaire: who hauing made a great obeysance to the King, hee turnes to the multitude. If thou haddest (quoth he) O City, as much care of thy duty, as thy Kings haue Orgemonts speech to the Parisians. alwayes mildly and fatherly intreated thee, thou wouldest remember the soveraigne bounty and clemencie of our late King of happy memory, Charles truly wise, who desirous to tame thy folly & rashnes by a wife mildnesse, pardoned the strange and cruell errors which thou haddest committed against his father being a prisoner, without any respect afflicting the afflicted, and supporting his capital enemy against him, with all treachery and insolencie. Thou canst not deny, ingratefull people how much thou wert indebted to that good Prince: doste diuine thee to sacrifice thy selfe cherefully for him in his afflictions. But all these things being troden under foot, he used towards thee all the humanity, which the most affectionate and faithfull subject may hope for of his Prince. His sonne our King seated at this day in the royall throne, and heire to his vertues, hath followed his fathers steps in this mildnesse and clemencie, hauing supported thee more then a father could do his childe. But thou hast followed, beeing mad and ingratefull thy wretched disposition, suffering thy selfe to be furiously transported by thy wicked counsellors, (the firebrands of sedition and disobedience) and by the unruly passions of thy blind furie. The goodly worke thou hast made of late, the disloyall intelligences thou hadst with those mutines, enemies of all commande and policie: the audacious practises thou hast presumed to make in the Citties of this Realme: and the blood which thou hast spilt in the bowels of this thy country, whereof thee hath horror, feeling her losse polluted with the blood unrightly shed by thy violent hands. All these horrible and tragick effects are knowne to the world: for the which thou canst yeeld no excuse, which doth not double the offence. O wretched people: be not these authenticke testimonies to the whole Realme yea to all nations, of thy ingratitude, disloyalty, crueltie, villany, and fury? Miserable, what hast thou deserued? The Kings bounty? But thou hast treacherously abused it. Thou hast made shewe to contemne publike authority, drunke with thine owne phrensie and of thy wicked counsellours. The King, the King I say, shall make thee feele, that he hath one arme to support and mainteine the good, and another, to punish and roote out the wicked. Thou hast seene examples vpon these wicked heads, which made thee to forget thy duty. But the punishment is light in regard of the offence. neither dost thou feele any smart, whereof thou thy selfe art not the cause.

Orgemont, hauing thus ended, turnes vnto the King. My Liege (saith hee) is this it which your

A your Maiesie commanded me to say vnto the people. It is (answered the King) but this sufficeth not, in regard of what they haue deserued. This short and rough answer from the King, the Chancellors speech, vttered with great vehemencie, and especially the bloud fierly spilt, which they did see as it were rebound vpon the place of execution: the fearfull armes wherewith the people were compassed in, had brought them into extreame perplexitie, like men already in the graue: so as euery one bethought himselfe, according to the offences he had committed: and such as had wealth, according to the enemies which did maligne them, being terrified with the tragick spectacle of John de Marais.

They stand all mute, their eyes fixed on the ground, prostrate before his throne, men and women, young and old, infinite in number. In this great silence the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne rise from their seates, with a very mournfull countenance, and fall at the Kings feete, beseeching him to haue pittie of his poore Cittie of Paris, and not to comprehend the innocent with the culpable; good men with falcalls vnworthy of his grace.

Presently after their speech, without expecting any answer from the King, the sorrow of this miserable people, suppressed during these complaints and threats, burst forth into so lamentable a crye, as if the whole citie had bene lost.

All cryed for meicy. There was nothing but cryes, lamentations, and howlings, of women and men, olde and young. The Ladies and Gentlewomen of the Citie, with their haire hanging downe, full of teares, crye out. Leege Lord, will you ruine your Citie of Paris for somersalcies. let it begin by vs and ours, we desire not to suruiue this miserie. Take pittie Leege Lord of your people, who sue for pittie. The people crye out againe with a fearfull voyce, Mercie, Mercie.

This spectacle was pittifull to behold: there was no heart so hard but relented. The King in the end answered, (the noise being quieted,) That he would not punish the good for the bad, so that he did pardon the people, vpon condition they should be better aduised hereafter, and not suffer themselues to be seduced by these wicked ring leaders of sedition. That for Gods sake, and at his Vncles sute, he gaue life vnto the prisoners, paying such fines as his Counsell should decree.

Those to whom the prisoners belonged, cryed out, God saue the King: and the people freed from their feare, redouble their cryes with great ioy, and so they all depart. The counsell decrees, That forasmuch as the Citie of Paris had bene engaged in this sedition, they should be deprived of their Magistrates, chaines and armes, and should loose all priuiledges until the King had otherwise determined. That for recompense of this capital crime, as well the prisoners as all others guiltie of the sedition, according to information duly made, should pay the moiety of their goods. The which was speedily put in execution, to send home the men of warre, by meanes of the great summes of money which they leuied by this exaction.

Thus the sedition at Paris was suppressed, and afterwards at Rouen and Orleance, but with farre more rigour then at Paris. An example for all subiects, how to oppose themselves against their Lords: who soone or late make them to reape the fruites of their rashnesse and insolencie.

Their Magistrates, chaines, armes, and all priuiledges, were soone restored to the Parisiens, by meanes of the Duke of Bourgogne, who from that time sought all meanes to creepe into the peoples fauour, which he and his sonne shall vse no lesse then the Nicarrois had done: this happened in the yeare of our Lord God 1387. in the moneth of December.

This iust execution did greatly countenance the young age of Charles, for that in so sollemne an acte, he had carryed a countenance worthy of a royall Maiesie. His age and the name of a King, made him know that he was a King; together with the dayly instructions which did sound in his eares, by his most inward and trustie seruants: yet his Vncles kept him still in his minoritie, disposing of matters in counsell by their authority.

1388. Charles was much discontented with this proceeding of the Dukes of Berry and Bour-gongne, who should rather haue preuented him then he them, experience hauing taught all Frenchmen what he was. He therefore seekes a remedy for their errour.

He caused a counsell to be held at Rheimes, where it was decreed, That Charles should be free from the gouernement of his vncles: for that both his age and the prooffe of his iudgement did testifie plainly that he was worthy to gouerne his realme.

Charles out of his vncles gouernement who grewe discontented.

This resolution greatly displeased the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, who would gladly haue held a longer possession of this royall authority which they inoyed, being discontented with such as had put this spirit into the yong King. The Cardinal of Laon (one of the first authors of this counsell) enioyed it not long, for he died (not without suspition of poyson) Iohn of Montague shall pay both principall and interest in this time. Iohn Mercier B and the Lord of Noiant shall haue their parts, these shall now enter into quarter, and haue all the credit. It is this Noiant which caused the golden Hart in the Pallace to be made for a modell of that which he would make of gold, of the Ingots hee had gathered together in the Treasurie, hauing reduced the coyned money into this forme, least Charles, a yong Prince and very bountifull should giue it away prodigally.

The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne retire themselves quietly to their houses, making a shewe to be very well satisfied, although they hatched a great discontent, and especially Philip, being a man of an imperious and insupportable spirit.

The order of this relation.

We haue drawne Charles out of his Minority, the first parcell of our discourse. Let vs now see his Maiority, into the which I tremble to enter, foreseeing so happy a beginning to haue so lamentable an end. But alas what shall wee see therein, which wee haue not scene in our miserable age. Our experience shalbe vnto vs a mournfull commentary, most true in the raigne which we are to represent.

The Maiority of King Charles the sixt.

Remarkable in two respects, of health and sickness.

He reigned thirteene yeares, eyther with his Vncles or alone in his good sence, and 29. in phrensie, not ruling but ruled, or rather rauished by the sundry passions of others. So wee will distinguish his Maioritye, according to the calculation of these two seasons, and in eyther of them the most famous actes of these home-bred confusions.

France enioyed a long rest, the tempests of these popular tumults being pacified, Flanders subdued, and the English forced to hold a truce (by reason of their home-bred quarrells, the which brought forth strange effects, as we shall hereafter shewe.) Charles then vnderooke the charge of his Realme, to gouerne alone, without any Tutors.

The flower of his youth, framed to great affaires, and commendable for his milde disposition, promised the fruites of a raigne both wise, moderate, peacefull and most happy. But oh the vanity of mans hopes, a dreame of him that wakes, a fruitlesse paine which hunts and gets nothing.

Being freed from the gouernement of others, hauing absolute authority, he was desirous to marry Lewis his onely Brother, and to giue him authority: neither would he abandon his cousins of Anjou, Lewis and Charles in their pretensions to the Realme of Naples.

The Estate of Milan did wonderfully import to aduance this action, for the commodities it hath in Italy. To this ende he married his brother Lewis with Valentine the daughter of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, a marriage which succeeded not according to his desire, no more then his owne. An Italian woman ioyned with a Germane, shall make strangework: to shewe that all is not gold that glisters: for both these marriages were built vpon grounds of apparant good, as farre as humane reason could comprehend: to the ende they might haue great intelligences both in Germanie and Italy, alliances which import much for the good of France.

Philip of Faliois, the Kings brother, and Iohn Duke of Orleans, were dead without children, and the duchy returned to the crowne. Charles giues this duchie to his brother Lewis, who was but Earle of Touraine, and now shalbe duke of Orleans, and by this name shalbe much spoken of.

Charles giues the Duchy of Orleans to his brother Lewis

In this profound peace, it was necessary for Charles to make himselfe knowne to his subjects, after so many confusions. He makes a progresse into Languedock, one of the farthest Prouinces from his chiefe City, lying vpon the Mediterranean sea, and yet one of the most fertill and best affected to the crowne. He had especiall reasons to visit this goodly Prouince, for the great complaints they made against the duke of Berry their gouernor, who committed great extorsions by his officers, vnder colour of authority.

Charles passeth by Dijon to his Vncle the Duke of Bourgogne, who accompanies him to Auignon. The Earle of Sauoy comes vnto him, the people of Daulphiné and Vinarez shewe a wonderfull ioy to see their King after so troublesome a time. So he comes to Auignon, being kindly receiued and much made of by Pope Clement the 7. who could not stand without him, hauing Vrbain the 6. for his competitor. The widow of Lewis Duke of Anjou repaired thither, who by the fauour of Charles caused Lewis the 2. her eldest sonne to be crowned King of Naples. This course wee must hold for the continuance of our history.

He visits Bour-gogne.

From Auignon he went into Languedoc to settle his authority, the which was much respected by the people of that country, but had beene greatly blemished by the gouernement of the Dukes of Anjou and Berry his Vncles, Gouernours of that goodly Prouince one after another. Hee stayes at Montpellier a Citie of a goodlie goodly and pleasant situation; where he heard many complaints against the Duke of Berry, his Vncle, for his great oppression of the countie. But the absence of this Prince, and the authoritie of his name stayed the remedie to another season. The Estates of the countie made sute to haue the Earle of Foix for their gouernour, hauing heretofore liued quietly vnder him; but he would not accept of this gouernment, without the good liking of the Duke of Berry, so as all the punishment fell vpon Betizac his chiefe Treasurer, who was burnt at Beziers, purging in the fire the extorsions he had committed vnder his maiesties authoritie.

At that time Charles King of Navarre died, so often blemished in the truth of this historie: we haue noted how he had retired himselfe from Court, into his realme of Navarre. As this retreat was vnto him a reprochfull banishment, so this shamefull solitarinesse was a ciuill death. But the Catastrophe of his tragically life was a famous prooffe: that God doth often reuenge notable sinnes by notable punishments euen in this life. He was much broken by the excesse of venery, and all sorts of dissolutions, the which he had exceedinglie vied with his wonderfull tyrannie and crueltie. As they did anoint him with medicines fit to warme and comfort his benumbed members (some say they had chafed him with Aqua-viue, and wrapt him in a sheete) but behold, fire takes hold of this sheete with such violence, as (being vnable to quench it) he was consumed by degrees, liuing some daies, as suruiuing his paine; and that which encreased the horror of Gods iudgement, his death made both great and small to reioyce, and was receiued in France with as great content, as the winning of a great and famous battaile.

There was a generall truce betwixt the French and English, so as the garrisons lying still, the Souldiars bred vp and nourished in armes, fighting no more by order vnder their ensignes, sought now their prey by disorder vpon the labourer and marchant. The counties of Rouergue, Perigord, Limosin, Auvergne and La Marche, had English garrisons, who spoiled these counties, and did runne vp into the neere parts of Languedoc, Velay, Gewaudan, Vivarrez and Suenes, where the villages are for the most part walled in, to prevent these soldaine incursions. There were many theecues amongst them: Teste noire or Black-pate in the Castell of Ventador; Amerigor Martel at Roche-Vandais, who breaking the truce, sought to be supported by the King of England, but in the end they all fell into the hang-mans hands, or perished miserably by some strange death, an Image of our late confusions.

Libertie had bred vp these warriors with so great abundance, as the English passed the sea to make Turneyes, and to fight at Barriers, as they vse at great Triumphes. There was a Tilt set vp betwixt Calais and Saint Iaques, where the Nobilitie made trial of their valour, as in a Schoole of Fence.

To take away this troublefome abundance, they tooke occasions to make long voyages into Castille and Italie, but in the end there was a very famous one offered against the miscreants of Barbarie, at the Geneuois request, who suffered many discommodities in their traffick, by these barbarous Affricans.

Charles granted them succours willingly, and gaue the charge of this warre to Peter duke of Burbon, assisted, with the Earles of Auvergne and Foix, the Lords of Coney, Guy of Tremeuille, John of Vienne Admirall of France, Philip of Arthois Earle of Eu, Philip of Bar, Harcourt, Antoing, Linge, Pyquiny, and many other great men from all parts of the Realme, which ranne to so famous an action, vnder so worthy a commander, and at so great expence, more painfull then the toyle of warre, to men that desired nothing but employment.

Richard King of England, to imitate Charles, granted succours to the Geneuois, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisbury, accompanied with many Noble men and English Gentlemen, moued with desirelike vnto the French, in the enterprise of this pleasing paine. The Deputies of the Kings of France and England assembled to treat of a generall peace: but not able to effect it, they continue a truce for foure yeares, with goodly provisions against robberies, for the safetie and quiet of their Estates. Charles gaue free passage to the English, by the Counties of Languedoc and Dauphiné, to passe the Alpes safely.

All

A All come to Genes, to the great ioy of the Geneuois. Being shipt, they land within fewe dayes in Barbarie. Presently they beseege the City of Affricke. So our histore termes it, as bearing the name of all the vast and barbarous countie. They call the Affricanie commanders Agadin of Oliferne, and Brahadi of Thunes. But our Argonautes found them which stayed their fury. The Barbarians defended themselves with an obdurate resolution.

But their force did them lesse harme then the ayre, and diet being very contrary to their complexions, so as our armie decreased dayly, especially of men of accompt. This siege continued six weekes with much losse & no hope to preuaile. The Geneuois hauing conceived a hope of a soldaine victorie, began to grow cold and slacke in furnishing of the armie. The Duke of Bourbon foreseeing the difficulties which might grow in continuing obdurate at this siege, fearing the winter, and not trusting the Geneuois (who are famous for that they haue no faith) remembreing the example of the King S. Lewis, resolved to returne, without any greater losse. He trusteth vp his baggage, & bringes backe his troups into France: continuing the example to all such as are capable of reason, how difficult it is for Christians to performe these strange attempts, after the experience of many ages.

The French and the English hauing liued louingly together in this voyage, returned to their houses, without doing of any memorable act, but to haue endeauored to doe something worthy of memory, to auoide idleness during so peacefull a time.

Enigane did then conceiue, and afterwards bring forth more preiudiciall effects then Barbary itselfe, and the way was made by light occasions to horrible and monitrous effects, to the great preiudice both of the King and Realme: for a notable testimonie to posterity, what Councillors Enuye and ambition be in a state, we like wretches seeke for peace, and when God giues it, we flie from it, we maligne an other mans good, and depriue our selues of our owne. But alas it were a small matter for a great personage to hurt himselfe by his owne passions, if this poison did not spread abroad to the preiudice of the common weale.

We haue said that John of Montfort remained peaceably Duke of Brittaine, by the death of Charles of Blois, and the agreement he made with his widow, whose eldest sonne John of Brittain Earle of Ponthieu was redeemed from prison out of England, by the constable Cliffon, who gaue him his daughter in marriage & payed his ransom. The constable was a Briton, and so a subiect to John of Montfort Duke of Brittaine his ancient and capitall enemy, and yet by this newe succession was become his Lord.

Doublelesse in this quality Cliffon could not but yeeld vnto him as his vassall, but as constable of France and deere beloued of his Maister, the greatest monarch in Europe, and Soueraigne to the Duke of Brittaine, herein the Duke must needs respect him, his place giuing him authority in many notable actions, ouer the greatest personages within the Realme. This was the ground of their hate, which not onely embarked King Charles, lord vnto them both, but carried him so farre into the maine, as he could not auoide a notable shipwracke by their meanes.

E By the former accord, John of Montfort was to yeeld vnto Cliffon all his patrimonye, whereon he had seized vnder colour of a confiscation, reuoked by Charles. the which he had not yet performed.

And although he had promised the King and giuen him a newe assurance, yet did hee not trust the King but continued his intelligences with the English, fortified his places, and eschyned both gold and siluer against the Lawes of State. He refused likewise to acknowledge Clement the 7. for lawfull Pope, whom France approoued: nor to suffer the Earle of Ponthieu afore said to beare the name and armes of Brittaine. These were the chiefe causes of their complaints and differences. The King and his most secret counsell Meytier Montagu, and La Riviere held for the Constable. The Dukes of Berry, and Bourgonie, and the Chancellour Orgemont, for the Duke of Brittaine, a cunning dissembling Prince and high minded. He spake proudly, by reason of his intelligence with England, which could not faile him and mildly when as he found meanes to do his business vnder-hand, & not to breake with the King.

He

He is reconciled to the King & Constable.

He comes to Tours vnto Charles, where after many discourtes, their quarrells are ended by marriages: the Kings daughter (being yet young) is promised to the Dukes sonne, and the sonne of John Earle of Ponthieu borne of the Constables daughter to the Dukes daughter, who promisseth likewise to restore Cliffon his lands, in shew, friends, but in their hearts irreconcilable enemies.

Hereupon Cliffon goes into Brittaine to receiue his lands. The Duke held a Parliament at Vannes, whether he called his nobility. The Constable comes, fearing no enemy: the Duke had built a Castle called the Hermine, where he feasts the States. The Constable is called and welcommed with the first, this countenance did not shew what was prepared for the end of the banquet against the Constable.

After dinner the Duke taking him by the hand, vnder colour to shew him his building and to haue his aduise, as of a great Captaine and well scene in Architecture, he leads him from place to place, through halls, chambers, and clofers, vntill hee had brought him to a great Towre, hauing an iron dore, wherein were armed men. The Duke enters first, the Constable followes him as viewing the proportion of this worke, and the thickeesse of the walles by the windowes. But behold the Duke slips out of the Towre, where he leaues the Constable, and shutres the doore after him.

This signe giuen, the armed men seaze vpon the Constables sword, and keepe him prisoner putting irons on his legges. The Constable was not so much amazed at this strange vsage, as the Duke reioyced at this sweet content of reuenge, thinking to attaine the full of his desires, to be reuenged of a capitall and cruell enemy, and in the heat of his fury he commands a faithfull seruant of his, called Iohn Baualan to dispatch the Constable presently. Baualan accepts this charge, but he doth not execute it. He goes to the Towre and assures himselfe of the Constables person, retaining the souldiours, whom the Duke commanded to obey him, and so he passeth the night with the constable. But the night gaue him Councell. The Duke transported with ioy in the heat of his choler, goes to his rest, but care awaked him, and reason (of more force then his passion) lets him know the fault he had committed, and repentance followed this first act.

A wife seruant in not obeying his masters passion. The Duke lying restless a great part of the night, riseth early in the morning, calleth Baualan, and demands what is become of the Constable: his passion bewrayes his minde before he speake, witnessing the shame he had of his choler, and his griefe for this furious charge. Baualan comforts him, and assures him that the Constable is well. The Duke wonderfully glad of this newes, which freed him from so cruell a torment, commands he should be well intreated and with respect, attending newes from the King: from whom there comes post vpon post with complaints and commandements to the Duke.

The Duke without any great delay excuseth himselfe of his imprisonment, and sends the Constable to the King. It had beene more auailable for him to haue suppressed his choler, in committing this error. But he did verifie. That he which offends doth neuer forgine.

The Constable goes to the King to Blois, he thanks him for his care of his deliuey: the Duke doth likewise send vnto him, to craue a safe conduct to come himselfe to make his iust excuses, and to shewe what reason had moued him to put the Constable in prison.

The Dukes of Berry and Bourgonne holding openly for the Britton, obtaine leave for him to come vpon the Kings word. He comes well accompanied, and not onely iustifies the taking of Cliffon, being his subiect, and in his owne Country, but also hee would haue the King beholding vnto him for the respect he bare vnto his officer, who otherwise he might iustly haue put to death. It is an easie matter for great men to manage their affaires at their seruants cost.

The Constable digested quietly this new affront, being glad to haue recouered his liberty, but the Duke of Brittaines malice shalbe the cause of great miserie both to the King and realme, seeking new deuises to satisfie his choler, a furious beast which can neuer be tamed by flattery. It burst forth vpon a light and ridiculous subiect, which bred a horrible Chaos of sundry confusions.

The Duke of Brittain is reuenged treacherously on the Constable.

The Duke of Brittain repents him of what he had done.

Peter Craon a Nobleman of the Countrie of Aniou, had great credit with the King and with Lewis Duke of Anjou his Brother, who loued him so deere as he trusted him with his greatest secrets, euen with his amorous passions, wherevnto his loose disposition, his age, ease, and Court made him too proane, to the great discontent of Valentine his wife, who exceeding iealous of her husband, and an Italian, seeking by all meanes to learne how he was affected, feeling him so colde to her, she finds no better expedient then to gaine Craon, whome shee handled so cunningly, as she drew the worme from his nose.

Hauing speciall aduertisement of her husbands loues, she threatens the Ladie that was beloued, and complaynes to her husband, naming the reporter. The Duke of Orleans finding himselfe wronged by this disloyall affront done him by Craon, in a verie light subiect, but a prooue of his rash treacherie, vnworthie of so strict a friendship where with he had honored him, he complayned to the King his Brother, who loued him exceedingly. Both of them detesting this disloyal rashenes of Craon, as a treacherous and an insufficient man, holding him vnworthy of their seruice, dismisst him with great disgrace, refusing to see him or to heare his pretended excuses.

Thus Craon retyers to his house wonderfully perplexed with this disgrace, and finding himselfe not greatly safe, he retyers to the Duke of Brittain his kinsman and deere friend, to whome he reports his misfortune. The Duke imbraceth this occasion, and with a deeper reach, perswades him that the Constable is the cause of this disgrace, making his profit of the passions of these young Princes: and proceeding in his discourse, (thrust on by the inueterate hatred he bare him) he perswades Craon to kill him, to ridde the world of so pernicious a man: and therevpon offers him his means, vpon all occasions.

This was that miserable councell which hatred & malice gaue him, two bad counsellors: for it choller be a short furie, who sees not by the effect, that hatred is a continuing rage, the mother of reuenges, the seede of all miserie to mankind.

As it was simply concluded betwixt them, so was it vainly executed by Peter of Craon. He had a house at Paris, whether he finds means to send men fit for this murder, and follows himselfe secretly: (an easie matter in this great forest of Paris;) who knowing the howers of Court, and hauing set spies to obserue when the Constable should goe from the King at night to his lodging, he attends him with his murderers in a little house where he should passe, and lets vpon him with twentie armed men.

The Constable thinking at the first, that the Duke of Orleans had done it in iest, made no great regard thereof, but vnderstanding it was Craon, he defends himselfe, with a great keene, (such as they did vsually weare in those dayes;) who being charged of all sides by the twentie murderers, and crying for ayde, he saues himselfe (all wounded) in a bakets shop.

The people that were neere, came running at this noyse: Craon saues himselfe on horsebacke by Saint Antonis gate, with the greatest part of these murderers: three onely were taken in this disorder.

The Constable was carried to his lodging called the house of Mercy (it is now the house of Guse, as the historie obserues) all wounded. The King and Court (disquieted by so audacious an attempt,) are all the night in tumult. These murderers being examined confesse that Peter of Craon had not onely caused them to commit this acte, but was also present at the execution, and so they are beheaded.

The King comes to visit the Constable lying in bed: he doth comfort him, and assures him, that he will not leaue so execrable an acte unpunished. But in effect this affront so impudently done to his Constable in the bosome of his head Citie, in the vewe of all his Court, and in his presence, together with the scorne of his audacious imprisonment, and the patience of Cliffon, who keeping sylenece, the indignities he had so outreeyed of the Duke of Brittain, pleaded for him, being sealed by these outragious wounds. All these things put Charles into such a choller, and made so great an impression

Notes of Charles condemned for attempting against the Constable.
King Charles assisted by his Councell, declares Peter of Craon guiltie of high Treason, and enemy to the Crowne of France, hauing attempted against his chiefe Officer, and doth cite him to come and iustifie himselfe speedily. Hee is called, and (not appering) is condemned for his contempt: he is declared a banished man, and his body and goods confiscate. And in the execution of this sentence, his house at Paris was razed. The Tragedie began by this acte, in the yeare 1393. in the moneth of May, but it shall continue with many other mournfull acts, and shall cause newe Scenes vpon this Stage. This sentence thus executed at Paris, it went into Aniou and Brittain. All Craons places and houses were seized on, and put into the Kings hands: and the Duke of Brittain was commanded by the same Commissioners, to deliuer him.

The first act of no mourn-full tragedy.
The Duke of Brittain excuseth himselfe, sweares that he hath him not in his power: discouers the place where he is: makes offer of all his meanes, for the execution of Iustice: he sends to the King to reiterate his excuses, assuring him, that he was not priuy to this murder. Craon was fled to the Towne of Sablé in Maine, which appertained vnto him.

Charles (transported with choller) lost both meate and rest, incensed by the Duke of Orleans his Brother, and his most trustie seruants, Noiunt, Mercier, and Montagu, dreaming of nothing more then to be reuenged of the Duke of Brittain, whome he held to be the very cause of this attempt. Such as were of iudgement and without passion, thought no otherwise. But alas how weake is mans vnderstanding, euen in the best things, wherein there often wants a good proceeding. Charles had great cause to be greeued with the Duke of Brittain, but he should moderate the heate of his choller, by the temper of wisdom, expecting wisely a fit oportunitie to punish, not troubling the quiet of his minde with such violence, in seeking reuenge of his enemy.

Charles dis-
with choller.
We may well say. That Charles had a good cause, but it was ill managed, and the Duke of Brittain a bad, the which he governed with policy. Wherein our Charles should haue vsed cunning, to crosse his enemies cunning: following the example of his wise father Charles the 5. who vanquished the Nauarrois with patience, and tyeing the vntempered rashnesse of John his grandfather, who seeking hastily a reuenge of the same Nauarrois his enemy, did thrust himselfe into a mortal prison.

The Children are neyther heires of their fathers vertues, nor of their happinesse, whose bodies they haue by the will of God, being the instruments of their essence, but hereserues to himselfe the soueraignty of vertue and happinesse, to gouernethem in the difficult pathes of this world.

The Kings
Vncles dis-swade him from the war of Brittain.
The Dukes of Ferry and Bourgonne aduise the King their nephew to leaue the deciding of this quarrel to the Constable and Craon, and not to attempt any thing against the Duke of Brittain, who disauowed the fact, who feeling himselfe oppressed, would seeke for extraordinary remedies to defend himselfe, whereby strange inconueniences might insue.

But the King was resolute, at any hand to make warre against the Duke of Brittain. All are sent for: euery man doth march: the Rendez vous is at Mans. Peter of Craon retyers from Sablé, whilst this storme riseth: but the King marcheth on, assuring himselfe that he was in Brittain, although some say that he was in Arragon, and that the Queene of Arragon had giuen him intelligence, that she held a French Knight prisoner at Pe pignin, who would not discouer his name.

This distempered choller had much impayred the Kings health, who carried in his face the disease of his minde.

The King marched against the Duke of Brittain.
His Physitians disswaded him from this voyage, as most preiudiciall for his health, and the Duke of Brittain by a new excuse, beseeched him to beleue, that he had no dealings with Peter of Craon.

The King could not bee diuerted by all these difficulties, from passing on in this journey, so willfully vnderaken by him. although his Vncles found newe deuises to stay him, both at Chartres and at Mans, employing his physitians, to shewe vnto him, how

A how dangerous it was to march in Sommer, being extremely hot, considering the debility of his health, much impayred sence his burning choller, the which had altered all his blood, whereof he had prooffe by daylie feauers. But this passion of choller had so possessed his poore afflicted spirits, that such as were about him, besides himselfe, perceiued his griefto be the more weake in that he was insensible of what he suffered: & his seruants espied that which they could not but see in him, by the extreme apprehension they had of the harme which was at hand.

Moreouer the Duke of Brittain (to calme this great storme which was readie to fall vpon him, (although in truth hee had hidden Peter of Craon at Susmet, and was sory that he had not slaine the Constable Cliffon) sends a certaine Bishop of his Country to the King, called the Bearded, a very famous man for the integrity of his life: to beleech him to beleue that he was nothing guilty of this attempt, neyther did he knowe what was become of Peter of Craon, whome he would send vnto him with his hands and feete bound, if he were in his power. That he should not make warre against his owne Country, and against a poore people, which must suffer for an other mans folly. In the ende, this man pronounceth the threats of Gods iudgement against Charles, if hee should proceede vnto warre, so lightly vnderaken against his vassalls and subiects, and against the articles of marriage concluded betwixt his daughter and the Dukes sonne, as a seale of their loues. This Bishop was heard in Councell, and the Duke of Berry speaking more boldly then the rest, for the authority which his degree and white haies

C gaue him) layed open all that might hinder this voyage. But Charles stopt his eares to all good Councell, hauing his braine disposed to the distemperature which shall presently seize vpon him, running headlong into the mischief which should afflict him and all France. He parts from Mans in Iuly, (in an exceeding hot day, as the history sayes,) as if all things had conspired to afflict this poore Prince: at nyne of the clocke in the morning, to receiue the coolenesse of the greatest heate at Noonetyde, weake in head and minde: distempered with choller, grieft, despight and languishing: his bodie wearied with watching and distast, not able to eate nor sleepe, hauing his head muffled with a great cap of Scarlet, and his body couered with a thicke Ierkin of Veluet: (too weighty for a sharpe winter,) marching on a sandie plaine, so scalt with the sunne beames, as the strongest did melt in sweate, and were out of breath.

D Being entered the forest of Mans, behold a man bare headed and bare legged, attired in a coate of white rugge, stepps sodenly forth betwixt two trees, taking hold of the reynes of his horse: he staves him, and sayes vnto him, King, ride no farther, but returne backe, for thou art betrayed.

A strange accident befalls
the King.
Charles, (whose spirits were otherwise dulled) was amazed at this voyce, and his blood greatly distempered. His seruants runne to this man, and with blowes make him leaue the reines of his horse, and so without any farther search the man vanished.

E After this accident there presently followes an other. Charles and his Noble men did ride in troups deuided, by reason of the dust, and he himselfe was all alone pensif, with the pages of his chamber, who were so neere vnto him, as they trod on his horse heeles. He that was neereft carried his helmet vpon his head, and the next his Lance, being garnished with crimfen silke. As the heate of the Noone day makes men drowse on horse backe, it chanced the Page which carried his Lance, (being very sleepey) let it fall vpon him which carried the helmet, making a great noyse, like the rushing of armes: The King starts with amazement at this noyse, and seeing the crimfon banderolle of the Lance, hauing his spirits weakened with the former distemperatures, transported with the imagination of this voyce, sleepey with labour and heate, he imagined himselfe to be, compassed in with many armed men which poured him to the death.

The second season, from the time of the Kings sicknesse.

From the yeare 1393. to the yeare. 1422. This time of his infirmity is distinguished into many acts, whereof this is the first Scene, of a long and mournful Tragedie.

Charles falls into a phrensie.

CHVS Charles transported with this phrensie, layes hold on his sword, drawes it, runnes violently after his pages, and cries amayne, At these Traitors. The pages conceyuing at the first, that he had beene displeased for the disorder of the Lance, fle from him. The King followes after, doubling his crye. At this noyse the Duke of Orleanse runnes towards him, to vnderstand the cause. The King layes at him, not knowing him: the Duke flies, and the King followes. The Duke of Bourgoigne rides to him. All gather together with great outcry. Squiers & knights compasse in the king, till that being wearied, and his horse out of breath, his most trustie Chamberlaine takes hold of him gently behind, and stayes him, cheering him with flattering words, and speaking vnto him with that familiarity that befits a faithfull seruant to a good master. Then all drawe neere vnto him, they take his sword from him, they lay him on the ground, and disroabe him of his thicke velluet ierkin and his scarlet cap, to giue him breath.

His Brother and Vncles salute him: but he knowes them not, neyther makes he any shewe to moue: being pensieue, his eyes troubled, turning vp and downe, mute, sighing, panting, mouing both body and head with great amazement. All signes of phrensie appered in this poore Prince. The Physitians are sent for in hast: they come, but hee knowes them not. Brother, Vncles, Lords, Physitians all sigh: all lifte vp their eyes to heauen. Tears fall from the Duke of Orleanse eyes: he beats his brest and crossest his armes, he approacheth neere to his poore brother, and hee regules from him. All are amazed, all confounded.

O my Country, what trouble shall this poore head giue vnto thy body? But may I lawfully sigh with my Countrymen who sighed then, foretelling the miseries that should befall them by this phrensie, as if my selfe had beene (in this disorder) a witness of so great an affliction, both to this poore Prince and to his Estate.

The History doth very fitly set downe the diuers Censures that were giuen of this accident, both at Rome and Auignon (famous places being then the seats of Popes) and also in England and in France.

The poore subiects (as men who it concerned) spake soberly, & with great griefe, some blaming the Duke of Brittain and Peter of Craon, others the Constable of Cliffon, and Mignons of his chamber, who had induced the King into this action: but all in general lamented bitterly this great defaister.

England was amazed at this report, and sorry for it: especially the Duke of Lancaster, who had conferred with our Charles very privately in the treaty of peace which they had at Amiens. He wept, commending this good & wise Prince, being desirous of the good of all Christendome. Rome and Auignon (being then banded one against the other, by reason of the Schisme of Antipopes) reioyced at this calamity befallen vnto our poore King. Frbain (as his professed enemy) triumphed in his misery whereinto he sayed he was fallen by a iust iudgement of God, hauing supported Clement his competitor against him. Clement reioyced, for that he was not fully confirmed in his authority by him: the King hauing busied himselfe with his subiects quarrells: whereas his greatest charge was to restore the dignity of the holy Sea to her ancient beauty. This the Historie obserueth of the Censures of these Antipopes.

A general Censure of this accident.

Wolard tow. 4. Chap. 5.

A But the diuine Oracle saies, O how happie is he that iudgeth wisely of the afflicted, representing an admirable example in the person of Iob, to gouerne themselues discretely in their Censures. Iob hath the testimony of a very goodman, and yet he had great afflictions, hauing lost goods, children, howe and helth, tormented by his wife, and not only abandoned, but also persecuted by all his friends, in that which was more decre vnto him then his goods and life, his credit, wherof they seeke to depriue him, accusing him that he had liued wickedly like an hypocrite, hauing but the shew of a good man, and not the integrity of a good life whereof he made profession.

Such is the vaine iudgment of this world, which holdes aduersity for a vice and profectory for a vertue; measuring things according to their passions, and not with reason, but the truth doth teache vs an other lesson. O Lord howe great are thy workes, thy thoughts are verie deepe, the ignorant man doth not know them, nor the foole doth not vnderstand them. That we might know the chastisements of God to be alwayes iust, although the causes be vnknown vnto vs.

We cannot denie but there were errors in Charles; but yet we must confesse, in acknowledging things as they be, that he was one of the least vicious Kings of France, and if we shal examine the zeale he had to the gouernment of his Estate, he must hold an honorable ranke among the most vertuous Princes that haue at any time defected well of this monarchy.

Many neerer causes of his infirmity, may be truly and soberly obserued: the disposition of his body, his manner of life, the surcharge of affaires, the weaknes of his braine, the abounding of choller, greefe and waywardnes, the want of rest and foode, the importunite of his voiage, the terror of this voice, & the noise of armes, to waighe downe the ballance ouercharged with so heauie a burthen. But why from man do we not ascend to God?

Truly God doth hold & gouerne this rod: and as Charles was the head of this great Estate by his wife decree: so he not only punished the person of Charles, but the whole body of this ealme: that both great and small might learne by this pittifull spectacle, to humble them selues vnder the mightie hand of God, who hath created the spirit of man, to worke according to his good and wife will; and disposeth absolutely of men & their affaires, as he pleaseth: and that this saying may be the scale of a true and sober humilitie, I haue held my peace O Lord, for thou hast doone it, drawn from this Maxime, God doth all well, what so euer he doth. O Kings, his famous example belongs to you, in so famous a King. O Subiects, you must learne by the head of Charles, of what price his head is whome God hath giuen you for king: that you may praie vnto him with all your hearts, to make him fit for the gouernment of the whole bodie, without the which it cannot subsist. But I wil returne to our Charles. Pardon curteous reader this digression, for the search of the vse of so famous an Accident.

This new and strange accident made them presently to dismishe the troupes, hauing other worke in hand then to make warre in Brittaine. All the Court is wholly affected to the Kings health. He is presently caried backe to Mans: his sicknes encreaseth, he must be transported to a better aire. The Physitians aduise it shold be to Creil upon Oise, one of the royall houses, in the Countrie of Beauuaisin, betwixt Beauuais and Senlis, a pleasant and wholesome seat vpon the riuer. He is conducted thither with great care: but his frantike feuer continues still. They seeke to conceale it, least the fame thereof should be dishonorable: but truth speaks generally. James Horsely, an excellent Physicion of Laon is sent for, and performs his duty happily, as shal appeere by the event. Nothing wanted that mans wit could deuise to helpe and cure the infirmity of so great a King. Let vs leaue Charles, in the Physicions hands, and returne to the Crowne as sicke as the head, hauing as great need of a good and speedie remedie.

A Parlement is presently called: they assemble at Paris, with all speed. All France, mournes for the affliction of their King, whom they loued deere, for his myldnes, and the singular hope they conceyued of his reigne: whereby Charles purchased the name of Wellbeloued.

The Estates assemble to resolve what was necessary for the government of the realm in this accident. They determine first, what might be fittest for the form of government, hoping verily of the Kings speedy recovery, being loath to seeke a remedy that might any way prejudice his authority. It was therefore let downe for a lawe, That they should abstaine from the name of Regent, unfit in this sodaine accident, the King being alive & of years. And they concluded, That during the Kings infirmittie, and without any prejudice to his authority, the soueraine government of the Crowne of France should be given to the Princes of his blood. But this point being decided, there was another of no lesse difficultie. To what Prince? The order of the fundamentall Lawe, called Lewis of Orleans the Kings Brother, as first Prince of the blood: but neither his age, nor the present necessity could allowe therof. The States yeelding vnto reason, decreed; That being apparantly necessary to provide for the State, by reason of the Kings weaknesse, being verie sick, it were not convenient to lay so heauie a burthen vpon so weak shoulders, as the Kings brother, a young Prince: but that the Dukes of Berry, and Bourgogne, his vnckles, next to his brother should haue the government of the realme, untill the Kings recovery. John Duke of Berry was elder then Philip: but hauing purchased an ill fame in Languedoc, to be couetous and violent, hee was nothing pleasing: so as the French were better affected to Philip the hardy Duke of Bourgogne, a cunning, cold, temperat, mild, patient and popular Prince, but ambitious, factious, reuengefull and malicious. Being therefore pleasing to the States, the chiefe charge was imposed on him: the title was common to both brethren, but the effect of the authoritie was proper to him aloane. The Estates adde to their decree (especially in his fauour,) that the Duchesse of Bourgogne should haue the first place next to Queene Isabel our sickes Kings wife, and by consequence, they giue her accesse to her chamber, and the government of the Children at all euents. This was Marguerite the heire of Flanders: a woman of a manly courage, raised for her great possessions, and wholly bred to ambition. This newe presidence displeased Valentine the Duchesse of Orleans, who yeelded nothing vnto her in greatnesse of courage. We stand now vpon good termes that must be gouerned by three women, a German, an Italian, and a Flemings, all which had absolute authority ouer their husbands: whose distaffes did cut like swordes, whereof they will giue vs presently a sufficient prooffe.

Philip Duke of Bourgogne

Advanced to the government of the Realme by a decree of the States.

Behold the Kings Vnckles now at the helme, to the great discontent of the Duke of Orleans, and of Lames of Bourbon his Vnckle by the mother side. The winde changeth, and the failes turne, the Court is transformed. There are two factions: but that of Berry and Bourgogne is the stronger. The Dukes of Orleans & Bourbon make the other: but there is no equality. The authority of the whole government, and of the treasor, is in their hands to whome the States had decreed it. Such force hath this sollemne consent of the French in matters of State.

Two factions in Court.

Such as had bin of Charles his most secret Councell, were out of fauour: the Constable, Begue de Villaines, Montagu, la Riviere and Mercier, they are all in bad estate, for their ouerthrow is plotted, by what meanes soeuer. The Dukes authority must begin with them, yet there was no loue betwixt the two brethren (for who can beleue that ambition and couetousnesse are fit to winne friendships) but onely to ruine their common enemies, and to suppress their authority. Such as were in their rowle, had their turnes, but diuersly. The Duke of Bourgogne standing vpon his gard, restrayned his imperious wife, who at his first advancement to this great commande, would haue turned all topsie turuy. but he seekes all meanes to preuent his enemies, being resolved to begin with the Constable, as with the strongest: and this he concluded with his brother of Berry. Montagu cunningly smels out this practise, and withall the best hee could carry away, saues himselfe at Auignon, attending some better opportunity. but he shall returne too soone to loose his head on a scaffold. The Constable Clisson, at his first speech with the Duke of Bourgogne, is so cheekt and threatned by him, as swallowing this pill quietly, he steales out of Paris, & retires to his house at Montlhery, from whence with extreame danger he saues himselfe in Brittain, hauing the Duke for his capitall enemy. But hee had his son in Lawe there, the Duke of Anjou, the Earle of Ponthiure, and so many friends within the Country, as in the ende the equity of his cause shall draw the Duke of Brittain to reason, being his most dangerous enemy.

An alteration

thither.

After notice, that the Constable was fled. Begue de Villaines a gentleman of Beauvais, (who had married the Contesse of Rebelde in Castille) la Riviere and Mercier were coopt vp, but all escaped by sundry meanes, only Montagu in the end shall loose the mould of his doublet, although he seemed to haue better provided for his safety then all the rest. That we may hold for an vndoubted Maxime in all the resolutions which mans reason can set downe in greatest dangers, That what God keeps, is well kept. Yet not rashly to omit the lawful meanes of our preseruacion, neyther to rely ouer much vpon our owne wisdomes, no more then to a rotten planke in passing of a great riuer.

The Duke of Bourgogne had nothing lesse in his heart, nor more in his mouth then the sacred name of Iustice. Hauing the Court of Parliament of Paris at his deuotion, he begins to plant his artillery against the Constable, by this authority.

The Kings Aduocate (hauing framed a complaint against him) Comissions are sent into Brittain to summon him, who not finding him, they proceede against him by exceptionall formalities being obserued, they condemne him by a decree of the Court of Parliament (in the presence of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne) as guilty of high treason, hauing attempted against the Kings person by poison, and against the State by thefe and treason. That as guilty of these crimes, he was degraded of the office of Constable, condemned a hundred marks of siluer to the King, and banished the Realme.

A strange alteration, the which the History represents in these verses.
*Instant Fortune neuer stales, her motions turning are alwaies:
 The highest mounted on the wheele, is strangely cast behinde the heele.*

But truth corrects the vanity of this popular opinion. God is Iudge, he raiseth one, and casts downe another. Advancement comes not from the east nor from the west; but God doth raise up and pull downe by his wise providence: for God that hath made the world, should not he governe the world? the eye sees not the Sunne through a thick cloude, and yet it is in heaven, notwithstanding the weaknes of our sight. That which he ignorant call for tune in diuers euents of worldly things, is a secret operation of the wisdom of God, alwaies iust, euen when it is most vnknown vnto vs: the which is no more polluted with humane passions, then the Sunne beames with the most infected carion, whereon it works by his heat, O man, distinguish the rod from the hand that rules it: do thou thy dutie, and leaue the euents to God: feare God and thou shalt haue to need to feare fortune. An assured passport not only to a void the strange alterations of Court, but al other accidents of mans life, which hath nothing constant in it, but instantaneit selfe. But euery man treads on him that falls, saith the same history. Euery man speaks un-famously of the disgraced Constable: they crie out against him, as hauing bewitched the King. Thus the afflicted is alwaies held culpable, according to the censure of this wile world, which iudgeth onely by outward circumstances. But who would beleue, that Cliffon and his companions (who had so great an interest in the Kings health), would make him sick?

The issue wil shew the contrarie, verifing. That as Slander is the touchstone of verue, so there is nothing more couragious then a good cause, nor more victorious then the truth. Cliffon shirres not all this butte, he stands vpon his gird, pourchaseth friends, and attends the time, which in the ende brought him to a safe port, as we shall see hereafter. After his condemnation, the Dukes of Berry & Bourgonne hastened nothing so much, as to aduance one to this goodly charge, whereby they might tye some great person vnto them. They offer it to the Lord of Cossy, who reifeth it, wherevpon Philippe of Flanders Earle of Artois is aduanced, and for a confirmation of this new league, he giueth sonne to the Duke of Berryes daughter.

Thus passed the beginning of this newe authoritie, when as Charles, by rest a good aier, the coolenes of the winter, & good vsage, began duple to recouer his health, comming first to the knowledge of such as were ordinarly about him, & of his wife, children and Brother, who parted not from his bed whilst his vncles made this goodly wake at Paris.

Hauing recovered his health, & James Harfely dismissed with an honorable reward, all France was reuiued with incredible ioy, to see their King as it were raised out of the graue and giuen deuotely to his praiers. But he hath a greater relap into this miserable disease by a newe accident, and this was the occasion. Charles returned to Paris to his subjects great comfort, who sought to delight him with all kinds of sports, Euery man employed his wits thereto; So as there was a new inuention of a mask, of wild men, attired in fine linnen cloth, all couered with very fine flaxe, from the foote to the head, being glued to the clothe so artificially, as if it had growne to the skyn, & that they which did weare it had bene naked. They were sixe, and the King would make the seventh, to lead the daunce, for the auoiding of al danger of fire, which might easely take the flaxe. Commandement was giuen to put out al torches; but it chanced that the Duke of Orleans, vnacquainted with this maske, came into the Hall, followed by his pages, who carried torches (according to the vsuall manner): euen as these Sauage men (tyed one to an other like prisoners) present themselves vnto the Companie, the King (who marched first) goes presently to the Duchesse of Berry: she holds him, and refuset to let him go without knowledge what hee was.

And euen then the Duke of Orleans, with a quicker resolucenesse answerable to his age

A age and naturall wantonnes, takes a Torch and comes neere to these Sauage men, to know them by the lifting vp of their masks, when as fire takes hold of this flaxe, so suddenly as al were on a flame, not able to free themselves being all tied to one line. The violence of the fire kindled with the rozen, caused a most horrible crie, but generally all men crie out, Sauage the King, who they knew to be one of the Sauage me. The Duchesse of Berry wraps him in her gowne, being long & large after the manner of those times, and so drawing him out of the Hall, they led him into the next chamber, without any hurt to his person. But the amazement was such, by the horrible cries of these poore men which burnt in the flames, (not able to be helped well in so sodaine an outcry) as the King could not be stayed in this amazement. They lay him on his bed, but his spirits could take no rest. Thus the night passeth away, this poore Prince being much distempered in minde, and all his seruants distressed with griefe. There fell out another vnhappy accident. In the morning it was bruted through the city, that the King was dead; so as the people did run in flockes to his vncles lodgings, exclaiming against them for the ill gard they had kept of his person, whom they desire to see eyther dead or aliue: so as the Dukes of Berry and Bourgonne yielding to this violence, were forced (euen when as the King began to take some rest) to raise him out of his bed, and to leade him through the City to our Ladies Church, to pacifie the peoples fury. At this returne his spirits failed him: he falls into his former phrensie, and neuer after were they settled, notwithstanding all the helps men could apply.

C He languished twenty and two yeares in this pittifull estate, and in the tediousnesse of so long an infirmity the Realme was not without languishing. Sometimes he was in good temper, (as phrensies haue their respits, and do not alwaies distemper the faculties of the minde) but still he fell, and euen when as he thought to do best, he erred most, when as he sought to retaine the authority to himselfe, and that nothing should be done but by his command. Hence sprang the horrible confusions in this raigne, for that diuers passionate men ruled his weake braine diuersely, one vndoing what another had done, couering their passions with the Kings name and authority. And al the liberty to do ill, grew from this spring. But let vs retorne to the end of our painefull web.

The Duke of Orleans wonderfully perplexed to haue bin cause of this scandale, excuseth himselfe presently in the hall, and to the king his Brother: but all this did not satisfie. The Duke of Bourgonne reprocheth him, and exceeds the censure of an vncle: for he laies hold on this occasion, to make him odious to the people, as if it had bin done of purpose to kill the King.

This Maske of burning men (which chanced in the beginning of the yeare 1394) shall burne farther, and kindle a greater fire berwixt the vncle and the Nephewe, for the space of ten yeares, vntill the death of Philip Duke of Bourgonne, leaving this hatred hereditary to his posterity. There is no meanes which the Bourguignon doth not attempt to wrong his Nephewe of Orleans. Certaine Augustin Fryars vnder take to cure the King, by incisions in his head, when by he was in great danger of his life. These counterfets were brought forth publicly in their habits, and beheaded, but the scarres of these wounds will remaine in Lewis his face, who recommended them vnto the King.

The women are dealers in these actions. The Duchesse of Bourgonne perswades Queene Isabel, that Lewis his meaning was to kill the King her husband, & his children. These impressions are confirmed by the graue and sweet dissemblinges of the duke her husband, who by degrees settled a hatred in the Queenes minde against her brother in law.

Thus this faction is much fortified by the authority of Queene Isabel, and by her, with her husbands name, whom she makes to speake what she pleaseth, sometimes as her will directed him, but not alwaies. Yet this weake braine is the checker of all these courtly policie, by the meanes of women, who are continually about his bedde or his chaire, to distemper his braine with variety of newes springing from their wretched passions: and this poore Prince is sometimes won, sometimes lost, and alwaies tormented with these importune discourtes.

coniuring) would not yeeld to the brauadoes of these two Princesses: against whom she opposed her selfe, not only by her husbands degree, but also by a poliuke courage bred in her selfe, visiting the sicke king with such ciuill entertainment, as her greatest enemies could not finde any honest colour to deny her the dore. So as the King did not onely willingly see her, but did call for her, and in his greatest fits did know her onely, among all the rest, refusing to take any thing but from the hands of his good Sister of Orleans.

The more the Kings loue kindled a ieaousie in these two Princesses her enemies, the more it rayfed vp the mind of Valentine, and by hir meanes, of her husband: who remebring (too hatefully) the degree wherunto he was borne, and the wrong done him in relecting him: yet hauing neither dexterity, nor meanes to win many seruants, he gaue B the Duke of Bourgogne all aduantages, being graue, cold, pleasing and modest: so as by his wise reſer he diſolued the heate of the Duke of Orleans immoderate vehemencie, who tying himself with the ſhew of his greatneſſe, makes it known by effects, that all the authority was in the Duke of Bourgogne. for whoſoeuer had neede of any publike helpe he muſt paſſe through his hands. & what buſines ſoeuer chanced, either within or without the realme, the true rendez-uous was at his lodging. Thus the Vncle made his Nephew to walke horſes (as they ſay) although he chafed and ſtamped beyond all meaſure.

These diuisions troubled the whole court, making them to neglect the affaires of ſtate:
and what can we obſerue more famous in ſo diſordered an eſtate. Al buſineſſes are done in the Kings name, yet without the King, vnleſſe the parties would haue him to countenance ſome great paſſion.

I do purpoſely omit all that which paſſed in this raigne touching the ſchiſme of the Church, and the houſe of Anjou in the realmes of Naples and Arragon, not to break off the courſe of my intent, meaning to repreſent in due place all that concernes this ſortain hiſtory.

Richard King of England ſends his Ambaſſadors to Charles, to congratulate his recouery, offering him a generall peace, and demanding his daughter in marriage. The Kings relapſe delayed the conſolution for a time, but ſoone after, by the care of the Duke of Bourgogne, who had a great intereſt in this alliance, by treatie of his country of Flanders, it was concluded, in the yeare 1395.

Charles had ſome intermiſſions, by meanes whereof he could ride: Richard repaytes to Calais, and Charles to Ardres, whether Richard came to ratiſie the peace concluded betwix their Ambaſſadors, and to receiue his new ſpouſe. The Kings encountered one another with loue and kindneſſe, making ſhewes of great good will: but it was a ſhort ioy for either of them.

For as it ſeemed that the quiet of theſe two realmes had bene ſetled by this generall peace, ſcaled by this marriage, and ſeaſoned with ſo many reciprocall ſhewes of cordial affection betwix theſe two great Kings, behold a great combuſtion in England, which intangles both theſe Kings in this common calamity.

Richard being of himſelfe effeminate, careleſſe, voluptuous and idle, grew more delicate by this profound reſt built vpon the alliance of his enemy, who alone might haue quickned him. He is alwayes with his yong wife, imbracing her, dallying with her and attiring her, with ſuch contempt of his authority, abaiſſing himſelfe too much to his ſubiects, ſo as he grew contemptible vnto his enemies, who preſumed to attempt againſt his perſon. The ordinary warres of England againſt France, had cauſed many neceſſary impositions without any grudging of the ſubiects: but when as neceſſity ceaſed by this generall peace, the people require to bee relieved: William More makes an oration vnto the king in the name of all the Engliſh in generall, Richard hauing no meanes in theſe infinite exactions to ſupply the charges of his idle & voluptuous life, condemned his ſubiects requeſt: and in the ende preſſed vpon the ſame matter by the Duke of Gloceſter &c.
the Earle of Arondel, in the name of them all, he puts them vniuſtly to death. The Engliſh madde with rage for the death of their deputies, ſiege ſuch remedies as deſpaire giues to neceſſitie. From this general diſcontent ſprong a ſtrange Tragedie againſt Richard, for

Richard King of England
marrieth with Iſabell of France.

A for the Engliſh ſeeing themſelues thus deſpiſed by their King, they caſt their eyes vpon Henry of Lancaster his couſine: and hauing called a Parliament, they put Richard into prison, and crowne Henry of Lancaster in his place; Richard being forced in open alſembly to reſigne the Crowne, and to condemne himſelfe to perpetuall priſon, as hauing abuſed his royall authoritie and his ſubiects. But this tragicke change concernes the Hiſtorie of England. This may brieflie ſuffice for ours, in the conference of our eſtate with theirs.

Charles did greatly grieue at this deiection of Richard his ſonne in lawe, from whom he expected great loue and quiet for his ſubiects. But who ſeeth not the vanitie of this world, both in great and ſmall, to feare a ſhower euen when the Sunne is hottest: Hee ſends for Iſabell his daughter of twelue yeares old, whom Richard had not yet toucht, being content to behold her (like a puppet) vntill ſhe came to age, ſatisfying his humor by ſome other wayes, howſoeuer it were, it proued to the diſlike of his ſubiects, and ſcorne of neighbour nations.

Iſabell being returned to her father, ſhalbe married to Charles Duke of Orleans, ſonne to this Lewis who is now in quarter, and from her ſhall ſpring a goodly plant, which in the end ſhall giue vs many Kings in their order, to preſerue this Monarchie.

But as if France had bene the ſtore-houſe, or rather the common Sanctuarie of all Chriſtendome, to whom the afflicted Chriſtians might repaire in their greateſt extremities. It happened in thoſe dayes, that Sigifmond King of Hongarie intreated Charles to ſuccour him againſt the Turke, the common enemy to the Chriſtian name, who got footing in the Empire of the Eaſt. For, the ſchiſme in the Church, the conſuſion of the Empire, and the dayly warres betwix France and England, had ſo mortified all Chriſti-ans zeale, from all care to ſupport the affaires of the Eaſt, againſt the Turkes our ſwoine enemies, as the way was made eaſie for the planting of themſelues there to our ruine.
But all the fault was not in the Weſterne Prouinces: the Chriſtians of the Eaſt were in horrible conſuſions, and euen at Conſtantinople, whereas the Paleologues had in ſome ſort maintained the name of the Empire of the Eaſt, ſince the bad gouernment of our French.

All the Lords of Greece, vaſſalles to the Empire, ioyning with the Deſpote of Bul-D garia, againſt the Emperour, did ſtrive to ruine one another. This ciuill warre drew the Turke out of Aſia (where he was yet confined) into Europe, ouerthrew all the reſt of the Empire, and in the end ſhalburie the whole body of this great eſtate, with the Chri-ſtian name, in the ignominie of our diſordered paſſions, as in a common ſepulchre. It ſufficeth to note the motiue of this war, which was to expell Baiazet (of the race of the Otomanes, who yet hold the Empire of the Eaſt) being called in by Iohn Paleolog Emperor: but ſeeing ſo mighty an enemy entred within his dominions, vnder a colour to ſuccure him, he ſought to be freed from him by meanes of Chriſtian Princes his friends.
The neceſſity was Sigifmond King of Hongarie, who had reaſon himſelfe to feare this ouerflowing deluge, the which in the end hath ouer-runne Hongarie, being at this day E for the moſt part vnder the Turkes tyrannic. But the cunct was not anſwerable to his deſeigne.

Charles being ſolicited for ſuccours, granted them, as freely as his infirmities would ſuffer. But the Duke of Bourgogne made the prouiſion: the charge of the armie was giuen to his ſonne Iohn Earle of Neuers, being two and twentie yeares olde, and mar-

of their valour. Against the aduise of Sigismond, they cast themselves desperately into the midst of the Turkes auantcoursers, all the Christian armie being too farre behind to second them. But it chanced, that Baiazet (followed by a farre greater troupe then theirs) compassed them in easilie as with a Net, so as after they had fought valiantly, and made a great slaughter of Turkes, not able to withstand so great a force, they were all cut in peeces, or taken prisoners. John of Bourgogne, and all the aboue named Lords, were either slaine or taken, not one escaped the sword or slaueerie.

Baiazet moued with the great losse of his men, would haue slaine all the prisoners: but the greedie desire of ranfome was helpfull to some few of the Noblemen. The historie of Cermanie notes but fiew, all the rest were murdered after their taking, by the commandement, and in the presence of this Barbarian, who hauing resolved to kill John of Bourgogne as the head of the armie, was dissuaded by an olde Turke a Nemro- mar-tien, who sayd vnto him; Preferue this young man, who shall kill more Christians then thine armie. A Prince borne to the spoile and ruine of his countrie, whereof he shall be shortly a more cruell scourge then the Turkes. They spared him, but he spared not the bloud of his cousine germaine, to defile his incestuous hands, and to prophane the bosome of France, which had so greatly honoured him.

Engerrand of Couffy, a great man in his time, dyed in prison, and Philip of Eu Constable of France, (by whose death the Earle of Sancerre was aduanced to this great dignity,) but after him there shall be other Constables in this confused raigne.

This defeat chanced in the yeare 1396. before Nicopolis a Citie in Misia, neere to the which Traian vanquished the Danes. This victory of the Turkes had proceeded farther, by the terror it gaue to those countries: but God gaue those Christians some time of breathing before the last stroke, the which came but too soone for the scornes of God: yet after this ouerthrow, as Baiazet prepared to pursue his victorie against the Christians, Tamberlan, another scourge of mankind, ouerflowing Asia like a great deluge, ouerthrew him, and tooke him prisoner, and so God stayed the Ottomans force for that time. But the Christians malice (abusing the patience of God) prouoked his wrath, which being iustly kindled against them, he suffered the Turkes to take Constantinople, the capitall Citie of the Easterne Empire, as we shall see else where: but let vs returne to France.

Charles had some truce with his infirmities, who notwithstanding this indisposition of his body, was in reasonable good health of his body, so as he had children during this time. Before his sicknesse he had Isabell (of whom we haue made mention) and Louis the Dauphin Duke of Guienne. But John Duke of Touraine, & Charles Earle of Ponthieu, Michelle, Marie and Marguerite, two sonnes, and three daughters (a goodly issue to keepe the Crowne from being an Orpheline) were borne to him by Isabell of Bauerie, during the weakenesse of his spirit.

And much happinesse befell him. After the taking of Baiazet, and the returne of John of Bourgogne into France, hauing payed his ranfome: the Lord of Bouciquault, (being sent to Genes, to receiue it to the Kings obedience, to whom they had willingly giuen themselves) he made a voyage to Constantinople with a new armie, more happy then the first, seeing the Citie, and returning victorious into Italie.

Mil. belonging to Valentine, by the decease of John Galeaz her father, had bene surprised by Francis Sforce, but at the returne of the Marshall Bouciquault, it yeilded to the French obedience, and so did Plaisance and Pavia, cities in Lombardie. But these conquests continued not long with them, no more then the rest of Italie, by the farall influence which hath alwayes made it a Sepulcher for the French: so as this suddaine yeelding of those Italian Cities to the French obedience, was like vnto a fire of Strawe.

Verdun being ill intreated by the Duke of Lorraine (although it were an Imperiall Towne) cast it selfe into Charles his protection.

Charles, the sonne of Charles of Nauarre, rightly marked with the name of bad, made great instance for his Seigneuries of Eureux, Cherbourg, and other lands in Normandie, Normandie, the which Charles, 5. had taken from his father, who resigned his interest by an agreement made with him, for two hundred thousand franks that were giuen him, and the Seignurie of Nemours, then made a Duchie vpon that occasion.

But in these happy euents the ialousie betwixt the Dukes of Orleans and Bourgogne continued and encreased hourly, through the violent practises of their Prospiters, of whom we haue made mention: who failed not to bring fuell to this fire, not only making coales to scorche one another, but also a burning flame to fire both their houses & the whole realme. The occasion and meanes was very strange. Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (whome King Charles did know and loue during the sharpest fits of his infirmities, even when as he knewe not his owne wife Isabel) being in the Kings chamber, (whether she had brought her little sonne to play with the Kings children) she cast a faire apple, after the which the children did runne: but Valentines sonne caught it, and hauing eaten it, fell presently sicke, and within few daies after died. There vpon they concluded directly, that this child died of poyson, prepared for the Kings sonne: which confirmed the old opinion, That the King had bene bewitched by her: so as all respect laide aside, they cried out against her, as against a rauening wolfe. There was no other talke in Court, Paris, and through all the Prouinces of France.

The Duke of Bourgogne seemed very busie, & sent al complaints to the Kings Council, who decreed, That, to avoid a greater scandale, Valentine should retire from Court: the which she did to the Castell of Asniere, vpon the waie from Paris to Beauvais: the Duke of Orleans disdayning it much, who must needs be toucht with this ignominie, and the peoples hatred encreasing mightily against him by this new accident.

Whilest this home-bred hatred continued in Court, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew: the Constable Cliffon fortified himselfe in Brittaine, both with friends and means, hauing by his dexteritie gained the greatest Noblemen of the Countrie: by whose meanes he made a profitable peace for himselfe with John of Montfort Duke of Brittaine, to whom he had bene a capitall enemy. The manner of this vnlooked for reconciliation is worthy of memory, to giue after ages the subiect of a notable iudgment in so famous an example: The Duke prickt in conscience, and moued by necessity, hauing banded all his subiects against him, seeing apparently the notable wrong he had done to the Constable Cliffon, he resolved to be reconciled vnto him, and to winne his loue.

But foreseeing, that hauing so often deceyued him, he would no more trust him but vpon good assurance, he resolves to secure him by an extraordinarie means, sending him his eldest sonne as a pledge of his faith. The Constable seeing himselfe possessed of this younge Prince, without any other securitie then his fathers letters, stands amazed at so vnexpected a prooffe of the Dukes loue, and resolves to haue his reuenge by a curtesie not only strange, but lesse expected, for although he had all the reason in the world to distrust the duke, who had deteyned him prisoner vnder colour of a banquet, and had sought all meanes to ruine him: yet taking a newe aduise vpon this new occasion, he parts from his house, and bringing backe this yong man to his father, puts himselfe into his power. The Duke more amazed at this strange confidence of the Constable, so changed his mind, as after that time he became his most affectionate friend, hauing built a firme friendship vpon this foundation, the which continued betwixt them the rest of their daies, to the mutuall content of either, and the profitable quiet of their subiects, vntill, That Curtesie is a wise and happy Councillor of State: teaching great men, That patience triumphes in a good cause; and that we must hate as if we should loue, even in the greatest heat of passionate quarrells, being well said by the Ancients, That Hatred must be mortall, and loue immortall.

The hatred betwixt the vncle and the Nephew ended not so quietly. The Duke of Orleans hauing receiued this disgrace in the person of his wife Valentine, growing very impatient, redoubles his complaints with great vehemency, saying, that it was no longer time now to obiecte his age, against the degree where vnto both nature and the fundamentall law of State had openly called him, seeing it was now ten yeares since this borrowed authority of the Duke of Bourgogne, had giuen him respite to be of age to enjoy his right:

The Duke of Bourgogne did frustrate these complaints by his coldesse and authority: but the Duke of Orleans grew more vehement, falling from words to deedes: and hauing had conference with the Duke of Guedres, he raised a good number of men at armes by his meanes, and lodgeth them about Paris, where he enters with the said Duke, hauing aduertised no man thereof, but onely the King, who fauoured his brother exceedingly, when he came to his right sense. The Duke of Berry made shew to be a neuter: but seeing the Duke of Bourgogne to usurpe all to himselfe, tyred with his ambitious dissimulation, he inclined more to the Duke of Orleans his nephew, although in shew hee laboured to reconcile them. The Dukes of Bourbon and Anjou Princes of the blood were of the like humor. The Kings counsell labours by all meanes to ende this quarrell betwix these Princes, disallowing the gouernement of any one in particular, and confirming a command of all the princes together, supporting it by alliances: for, Charles the eldest sonne of Lewis duke of Orleans, married Isabel of France, the eldest daughter to our King Charles the 6. Lewis the Kings eldest sonne, Duke of Guienne and Daulphin of Viennois, was betrothed to Katherine of Bourgogne, daughter to John Earle of Nenvers, sonne to Philip. To John the Kings second sonne, Duke of Touraine, Jacqueline is promised, the onely daughter of William of Bauiere, Earle of Hainault and so his heire. To Philip of Bourgogne, son to the aboue named John, Michelle the Kings second daughter is promised: for these marriages were all but future promises, by reason of the yong age of the parties.

This was to ingage the faith to come, and now present to satisfie the discontented. Queene Isabel was double pleased, both in her children and her race, which by this meanes was transplanted into the royall blood of France, by her cousine, who also carried the name of Bauiere. But what? as ambition cannot be tamed, so in all these marriages, there was more alliance then friendship, and more dissembling then truth. God must needs reconcile them at the last by a stronger conclusion.

Philip Duke of Bourgogne dies, leaving his sonne John the heire of his passions, against Lewis Duke of Orleans, in the year 1404.

The beginning of the ciuill wars.

Thus Philip Duke of Bourgogne, raised vp with a new hope to maintaine himselfe against his enimie Lewis duke of Orleans, as well by the cement of this alliance, as by the increase of power which his sonne John brought him, (being his right arme, the true Image of his great and haughty courage, and a new firebrand of his ambition) dies at this time, when as hee dreamt least thereof: for he died at Hal, going to visit his Townes in Flanders, and to crosse the practises of the Duke of Geldres, who was a principall support to the Duke of Orleans. Marguerit his wife (a companion in his ambition) did not suruiue him a whole yeare, who fearing to finde her husband too farre indebted, renounced his moueable goods, laying downe her purse and girdle

A girdle upon the place appointed, according to the vsuall custome, and so required an act from a publike notary. Griefe for her husband did not hasten her death, seeing that she feared her liuing should faile after him. John of Montfort Duke of Brittaine (who had kept such a stir upon the Theater) died 4. yeares before him, yet more wife & happy in one thing, hauing mortified the hatred he bare to the Constable Cliffon before his death. So death doth sodainly stay mens desseines, which else sie most violently. How wretched are we to be thus blinde, in these goodly examples. But let vs returne to our discourse.

Philip of Bourgogne & his wife die.
Duke of Brit-
taine dies.

Philip left three sonnes, John, Anthonie and Philip; but John Earle of Nenvers, his eldest sonne succeeded him in his great Seignuries of Bourgogne and Flanders; and the chiefe heire of his hatred and other vices. He was equall to him in ambition, malice, B dissembling, & policy: but herein he did surmount him, That his father Philip hauing for the space of ten or eleuen yeares, crossed the desseines of Lewis his Nephew, yet he carried himselfe with such a cunning temper, as holding the helme and making him to carry the bable, he made his vnlawfull gouernement supportable by his modesty, & reasonably by the order which had confirmed him in this authority. But John continues his practises with such violent fury, as within three yeares (hauing giuen the Duke of Orleans a thousand crosses, and plunged France in a ciuill war) he murders his cousin germane most cruelly, defiles his country and his blood, and continues his furious desseine with so great presumption, as countenancing this murder with a free confession, & seeking to maintaine it by reason, he omitted no kind of mischief, but brought C in all disordered confusions, as if France had bene the Rendezvous of al villanie & impiety. A text, the comentary whereof may be read at large in the following discourse. Behold the beginning of a ciuill war among the French, both long and furious, bredde by the ill counsell of the princes of the blood, abusing their authority. A historie the more worthy the noting, for that it serues vs to marke the fits and accidents of diseases wherewith wee haue bene afflicted, to applie the vse thereof to our owne experience.

After the death of Philip, all the gouernement of publike affaires was without all controuersie deliuered into the hands of the Duke of Orleans. The King loued his onely D Brother deere, and desired to grace him what he could. The Queene (to please her husband) made shew to reioyce thereat, hauing no more a Duchesse of Bourgogne to incense her: reason gaue him this preheminance, and the French obeyed him willingly, as the lawfull gardian of the French Monarchie. All things fauoured this yong prince, if he had not failed himselfe: but this choler hatched in his brest, hauing for so long a time swallowed vp so many indignities, the immoderate heat of command, so much desired, and the ambition and couetousnesse of his wife Valentine; all these plucked from him the fruit of these fauourable occasions to settle his greatnesse, and gaue his enemy meanes to ruine him. These errors were accompanied with indiscretion, which commonly shakes the miserable. The Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, his vncles, had fauoured him much, during the Bourguignons raigne. and their age had greatly countenanced his authority, if he could haue vsed them rightly. But this yong Prince was so pleased with the sweet of command, as he was loath to impart it to any: the which must needs discontent them, although (being wife) they dissembled it, yet this dislike encouraged the Bourguignon his enemy to attempt against him.

The Duke of Orleans aduanced to the gouernement.

The Duke indiscreet in his gouernement.

The couetousnesse of Valentine prepared the way to these disorders. Lewis was desirous to purchase the Duchie of Luxembourg: his wife urged him therunto hourly: wishing him to deuise some meanes to make the King to paye for it. Vpon this aduice Lewis propounds in counsell, that for the Kings important affaires there must be a taxation made. There neuer wants some pretext to colour these exacti- F ons: but in effect it was for this purchase. John duke of Bourgogne opposeth for the good of the common weale. On the one side it was a goodly meanes to shew both his loue to the people, and his zeale to the kings seruice, and on the other, a reasonable subiect to make the Duke of Orleans odious. Yet this proposition passed in counsell through the absolute authority of the Duke of Orleans. The Bourguignon imbraceeth A this occasion, & flatters the Parisians, to joyn their forces, & to oppose the against his enemy, who could not be more odious then in this cause. And euen then they greue into such dislike of him, as they could neuer love him. This was spread throughout the Realme, and the Duke of Bourgonne hauing protested that this charge was imposed vpon the subjects against his consent, laying a good foundation of firme correspondence with the Parisians, heretures into Flanders, to take possession of his mother Marguerite inheritance and credit with that rich people, but in effect it was to build vpon the hereditary hatred he had against his cousin and capitall enemy.

To omit nothing that might auale him against the Duke of Orleans, being at Brussels hee sends his Ambassadors to King Charles, beseeching him, with all affection to confirmate the marriage betwixt Lewis his eldest sonne, Duke of Guienne & Daulphin of Viennne, & Katherine of Bourgonne his daughter. Charles thought it fit to content his cousin John vpon this demand: but his brother Lewis crossed this marriage, as prejudicial to the house of France, being already weakened by the uniting of Bourgonne to Flanders, the which would be much more fortified by this alliance with the Kings sonne. John Ambassadors (after long delays) returne home without any effect, making their matter acquainted with the cold proceedings of the Court, the which required his presence. In the end, he resolves to go in person, to sollicite a matter of so great importance. But being ready to march, behold the King of England sends an armie into Flanders, to besiege Seluse, which make him yeele to necessity, & to demand succours C of the King, as his tennement against the common enemy of the State, staying himselfe in Flanders, to prevent the enterprises of the English. Lewis of Orleans, pretending a truce betwixt France and England, causeth succours to be denied him: as if they should deaue a warre vpon France, being already tired with so great and long troubles. John held himselfe much wronged by this denial, & to haue the better meanes to returne to Paris, he compounds with the English, being desirous to make it knowne, that hee would oppose himselfe against the Duke of Orleans designs, taking hold of the occasion which he himselfe offered him to his great prejudice.

The imposition was leuied by the Duke of Orleans his commande, and commissions were brought into Flanders. At Paris it was exacted with all rigour: but John D commands his subjects of Flanders not to pay it, and goes well accompanied to Paris to assist the people, who greatly d'scontented with this burthen, durst not yett vnder their griefe, expecting the countenance of a greater commander. The Parisians incited against Lewis of Orleans, solcite John of Bourgonne to come to Paris, being resolved to employ all their means in the defence of this cause, which they held to be very important for their reliefe. John desired nothing more: for as redoubtling his courage at these calls, he goes in haste to Paris, & sties at Louure in Paris, gaung the Parisians notice to come vnto him. The King remained at Paris, as he was accusomed, the queene & Lewis of Orleans (hauing discovered the Duke of Bourgonne intent, & fearing least (being the stronger, & hauing the Parisians at his deuotion) he should force the king to marry the Daulphin Lewis, made sure to his daughter: they thought it best to conuey this young prince into Germany, to some place of safety. And going together from Paris they left the Daulphin with Lewis of Baure his vncle by the mothers side) who should conduct him secretly in a litter to Corbeil, where a goodly troupe attended him. The Bourguignons followers giue him present intelligence of their departure. John follows to speedily as he can, takes the Daulphin Lewis at Vlinisue, conducted in a litter by Lewis of Baure his vncle, & brings him back gently to Paris, where they receiue the Duke of Bourgonne with great ioy, and are glad of the Daulphins returne, going to meete them in great pompe, as at a ioyfull triumph. John being come to Paris, hath conference with them of this faction, and findes them at his deuotion. The Prouost of Merchants, and the Vniuersity, assure him of their faithfull seruice: they intreat him to vndertake the reformation of the State, a charge which he doth willingly unbrace, as if fit maske for his ambitious humor.

A He then presents a petition to the King, beseeching him to reforme the State, strangely corrupted by the ill gouernement of the treasure, whereby the subjects were oppressed with insupportable charges, and sacred iustice ill administered. the ordinary subject of the peoples complaints: but in effect it was to araigne the Duke of Orleans. The King forbore to make any answer vntill his brothers returne, being President of the counsell, and greatly interessed in this complaint: but these had bin words without effect, if force had not followed this admonition. The Bourguignon, had brought great troopes, vnder the conduct of John without pitty, Bishop of Liege, and the Duke of Cleues. The Duke of Orleans had also assembled an armie from diuers parts, by the Lord of Uspendanne, fortified with the forces of the Duke of Lorraine and the King of Sicily, being made ready for the voyage of Naples. Thus the Ile of France is full of souldiers of one liery, but of contrary humors, as the manner is in ciuill warres, French against French, and kinsman against kinsman, all making profession to maintaine the good of their country in ruining it.

John of Bourgonne in shew had the aduantage, being in the capitall City, and possessed of the peoples hearts: he had the King in his power, and (for a gage of this newe authority, which men honour like the sunne rising) the Daulphin of the house of France, whom he pretended to be his sonne in lawe. All these considerations made his heart swell, and his tongue to speake proudly. But Lewis Duke of Orleans founds forth the name of publike authority, which then remained in his hands, as in a sacred gird. The most passionate make a stay at the name thereof, to attend the euent of so great a quarrell. Such force hath the name of lawfull authority and order in a State, wherein it depends as on a firme foundation.

These armies thus lodged about Paris, the Generalls minds appeared in the deuises of their standards. In that of the Duke of Orleans was written. Je l'enueie, with a staffe full of knots painted in it, signifying that he would knock him on the fingers that should presume to touch his authority. In the Duke of Bourgonne was written in Flemish. Ik houd, that is to say, I hold it, with a toyers plane to make smooth the knotty staffe, & so to encounter the force that threatened him: yet these passions were suppressed by the only respect of authority, without the which all had tēded to a violent spoile. The Princes of the bloud (who were not engaged in these quarrels) labour to reconcile their cousins, seeing the Kings infirmity will not suffer him to vse his absolute authority.

Lewis of Aniou, King of Naples & Sicile, and Lewis of Orleans, were with the Queene at Melan, the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon and the King of Nauarre, are at Paris with the King, and all the faction of Bourgonne. The King of Sicile comes to Paris, hee leueth the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon vnderstand, how necessary it was to quench this fire in time. All these Princes are willing to mediate an accord, but the indiscretion of the Duke of Orleans had almost spoyled all.

At the first he grew amazed, but seeing no man to stirre, and hauing some feeling of his authority, he began to speake bigge, writing to Paris, and to the best Cities of the Realme, against such as had made this petition. And (contrarie to the aduise which the Princes his cousins gaue him, not to part from Melan) he resolves to come to Paris, and to oppose himselfe against the Duke of Bourgonne. The City and Vniuersity of Paris send an honorable deputation vnto him, excusing themselves, beseeching him to hearken to a good reformation: but he so checkt the deputies, as they returned ill satisfied to a people big, with a seditious humor. He shewed himselfe indifferet in two sorts: Excusing himselfe when no man accused him, which was properly to accuse himselfe, and in waking of a sleeping dog, incensing this mutinous people, who were then kept in awe by his onely authority, not daring to mutter against him but in secret.

The Bourguignon desired nothing more then to haue some apparent cause to drawe his people into mutinie, giuing it out openly that the Duke of Orleans came in armes to spoyle the city of Paris. Behold the Parisians are in armes, prepared both within and without, to withstand the Duke of Orleans comming: they beat downe pentiles within

The Chancelor of France, accompanied with the Presidents and Councillors of the Court of Parliament, go to the Pincies, aduertising the Duke of Orleans of the danger of a great confusion, if he did not foresee it. Herevpon Lewis commands his troupes to retire, and stayes at the Castell of Beauvillie vpon Marne, to haue the better meane to heare from his Vncles, who (by the authoritie of reason and alliance, after many voyages) reconciled Lewis of Orleans, and John of Bourgogne, hauing seene and embraced one another like kinde Kinsmen, with all outward signes of perfect & cordiall loue. This was but a coloured peace, the which in the end was so heauie a B burthen to them both, as it weighed them downe: and by their owne wilfull follies, as if they willingly sought their owne ruines, verifying this assured maxime: That man hath no harme, but what he seekes himselfe; confirmed by the truth of these Oracles. They haue no harme, but by their owne iniquitie: and; My people haue not obeyed my voyce: and, Israel woul' none of me: ratified likewise by the experience of all men, all estates, and all age. The Duke of Orleans sought his owne death, in prouoking his enimie without reason: and the Duke of Bourgogne in murdering him, erected a scaffold to shed his owne blood.

This agreement made; John of Bourgogne informes the King and his Councell, how much it did import to take the Towne of Calais from the English, where the com- C moditie of landing, and the neerenesse of the Kings estates, gaue the common enimie great meane to molest the prouinces of Flanders and Picardie, requiring aide and succours from the King to besiege it; the which he grants. Wherevpon he with all his Cites, make great preparations to fortifie the French armie: the which enters into Picardie, attending a comendement to beleager Calais. The artillerie and munition was ready to go to field, through the great diligence of the Duke of Bourgogne, stirred vp with hope to pull this thorne out of his foote, and to free the traffike betwixt his subiects and France; when as suddenly the King, Letters Pattentes come to the heads of the armie, commanding gall men of warre, of what condition so euer, not to passe any farther, vpon paine of their Lues. This unexpected countermand, accused the Duke of D Orleans as the author thereof; and gaue occasion to all men that desired the good of France to detest him, as seruing his owne passions, to the preiudice of the common weale: but aboute all it gaue too important a cause of discontent to the Duke of Bourgogne, who infinitely grieved with so inexcusable an affront, and such inhumane circumstances of a cruell indignitie (for whereto serues it to discouer in particular, the griefes of so apparant an iniurie) he resolues to haue his reuenge once for all. Thus farre the Duke of Bourgogne had reason to complaine of the Duke of Orleans, but he exceeds: from reason he flies to passion, the which is a dangerous counsellour; which presented vnto him a pernicious remedy, being then pleasing to his troubled minde, leaving him nothing but a late repentance, and his body taken in the trappe which he himselfe had made.

kill his cousin of Orleans.

Thus John resolues to free himselfe of his Cousin the Duke of Orleans, who he supposed would be a perpetuall and irreconcilable enimie. The motiues of this cruell resolution, are visible by the forepassed actions. But they added ialousie herevnto, an intestine fire, which consumes him that lodgeth it in his bosome. The originall of the historie speakes nothing hereof: for this shamefull iniurie (which the wife conceale) was not spoken of by those that were chiefly interested. But the learned obserue, that the Duke of Orleans had vsed his cousin of *Bourgogne*s wife too familiarly, when as her husband was in the voyage of Hongarie. A young Flemish Princeesse & browne, of whom they had made a song, the which the Duke of Orleans caused to be put into musick, and to be sung before the ialous husband, at a banquet which he had made him, hauing the Princeesse picture in his Cabinet, and vaunting that it was the triumph of his loue. These are stabbes which pierce the hearts of generous men with an incurable wound. This

A This they set downe for one of the motiues of the Bourguignons hatred against his cou- 1407. sin of Orleans. This vanity cost Lewis of Orleans deere, being giuen exceedingly vnto women: and as it was one of the causes of his death by the iust iudgement of God, so is it considerable for being slaine by his enimie, amongst his other vices, he shall reproch him of luxury, to iustifie the murthre. But let vs obserue the sequele of this Tragedie.

Lewis Duke of Orleans is slaine by Iohn Duke of Bourgogne, and in the ende Iohn makes a counterfeit peace with the children of Lewis, but it is the renewing of greater troubles.

John of Bourgogne hauing resolved to kill Lewis of Orleans his cousin Germaine, went to Paris, with so good a shew, as if he had no intent to breake the accord so solemnly made betwixt the. That which most troubled him, was to see his enemies authority confirmed by this reconciliation, hauing the absolute gouernment of the State, respected as the kings brother, and the first Prince of the blood. And (to giue him greater authoritie and power) the good King Charles had giuen him for a new years gift in the year 1407, the Duchie of Guienne for his portion, whereof the Dauphin then carried the title. This newe fauour and great aduancement, kindled the coale of iea- lousie in the Bourguignons braine, being already much transported, and holding it for certaine, that he should neuer by any ordinary course preuaile against so passionate & powerful an enimy, who as his meane did increase, so would his desire augment to raine him. He therefore thinke it conuenient to prevent him, and drawes vnto him me- ficio to audacious a murther, Rooulet of Autonville a Norman, an ancient seruant of his house, and discontented with the Kings brother, for that hee had taken from him the office of General of Normandy, and a Souldiour of Guines called William Corteheuze, with others of the same humour, to the number of eightene. This William had a brother called Sas of Corteheuze, a groome of the Kings chamber, who should be the instrument to draw this poore prince into the pittfall. The Queene laie then in childbed: the Duke of Orleans goes to visit her after supper, when as this Sas of Corteheuze goes to the Queenes chamber to tell him, that the King desired him to teapare presently vnto him for very important affaires. The Murtherers were lodged secretly in a house by the which the Duke shold passe. Being mounted vpon his melle, accompanied only with 2. Squires vpon one horse, and one that followed on foote, his pages carrying torches both before & behind him: as the horse (which carried the 2. Squiers) came before the house where this ambuscadoe lay, he began to snort & to run. The Murtherers issue forth instantly and charge the Duke: at the first they cutte off his hand which held thereines off his horse. He cries out, I am the Duke of Orleans, and they answer: E It is you wee seeke for. They double their blowes with such violence, as they beate him downe and cleaue his head, so as the braynes lay scattered vpon the pavement.

There was nothing to bee heard but cries and lamentations, whilest the murderers (hauing tyred a house and cast Calthrops in the streets) gette themselves into Bourgonne house. Thus the night passeth in miserable lamentations. Valentine doubles the terror of this horrible accident with fearful outcries. The Princes his Cousins runne thither to participate in this sorrow. All weepe and lament, all crye out in this mournful house. When the day appeares, they finde his hand on the one side, and his braines scattered on the other. The relicks of this head are gathered together with teares, and all is kept for an honorable funerall.

O head, howe many mischiefes attend thee? O murderers, thou shalt be murdered, B disloyall, thou shalt be disloyally slaine. I haue horror, yea I tremble to shed this blood againe by my report. The very enemies of Lewis were amazed at this audacious murder, foretelling the miseries that should follow. The Queene wonderfully passionate, causeth herselfe to be remooued to the Kings lodging, and doubles the guards. In the ende the King hath notice thereof, and apprehends it according to the weakenesse of his braine: but the Princes provided presently for his safetie and their owne: euey man fearing for himselfe in so strange an accident.

Such was the violent death of Lewis Duke of Orleans, traiterously slaine at Paris by John Duke of Bourgonne, the 20. of Nouember in the yeare 1407. who thinking to kill his enemies, slewe himselfe, and left this blood prodigiously shed, as a mournfull Legacy to his posterity: and hoping in his ouerweening spirit, to vsurp France from the lawefull heires, he lost Bourgonne from his posterity: neyther could hee hinder his issue whome he had so treacherously murdered, from the happy enioying of the whole realme: for Lewis Duke of Orleans left three Sonnes by Valentine the heire of Milan, Charles, Philip and John: from Charles the eldest (being Duke of Orleans), is issued directly King Lewis, 12. the father of the people, & of John Earle of Angoulesme, father to King Francois, 1. the father of the muses, who hath giuen fower Kings successiue to our monarchie. But of John of Bourgonne we can reckon but two successors, Philip and Charles. Philip was his sonne, who by the patience of God left Charles in his place: but Charles suffered for his grandfathers errors and his owne, for he died in blood: his pride was interred in an vknowne tombe, and Bourgonne was plucked from the felonious hands of this murdering race, and vnitid to the Crowne.

Nowe John of Bourgonne shall committe strange disorders during twelue yeares, from the date of this massacre, and it semes that blinde Fortune hath adorned his temples with bates and triumph, to guerdon these execrable crimes: but hee is not freed that drawes his halter after him. Hee shall soone pay both principall and interest to Gods iust iudgement, which slackes not, although it seeme slacke, but comes in due season, marching slowly: to take all excuse from the obstinate and impudent sinner, recompensing in the ende this apparent slacknesse of punishment, by the greame of eternall paine.

But let vs returne to this desolate house: Valentine widowe to Lewis, with her three sonnes, and Isabel of France the Kings eldest daughter, wife to Charles, the eldest sonne of Lewis, nowe Duke of Orleans, by the decease of his father, come all to our poore King Charles, (being sicke) to demande iustice. All cast themselves at the Kings feete, as much discomforted as themselves, for the cruell death of his onely brother, whome he had alwayes loued deerey both found and sicke. Lewis of Aniou King of Sicily and Naples, the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, with all the Princes of the blood, accompany them in this lamentable state, wherein Charles promised to giue them satisfaction.

The Kings Councell being assembled, they require an account of the Prouost, what hee had done in search of these murderers. He answers, that hauing done his duty he could not finde any thing. That there were no places vnsercht, but Princes & great mens houses, where if he might be suffred to enter, he wold do his best, to discover the

A the murderers. The Princes were all in Councell, and the Bourguignon amongst them, all promise it freely: John of Bourgonne (guilty of the crime) holds his peace: and as they beheld one another, he riseth, and drawing the King of Sicily and the Duke of Berry apart, he confesseth, that through the deuills motion he had committed this murder. These Princes (being amazed) conceale it for that day. The next day coming to Councell, the Duke of Berry willed him to retyre himselfe. Thus amazed he returnes to his lodging, and presently without any staie hee flies with five more into Flanders, where the murderers likewise finde a sure retreat.

That conscience which at the first had terrified him, is now hardened: and that which had moued him to confesse himselfe the author of this murder, doth nowe animate B him with new motions, to become obstinate, and to maintayne by vniust force, that which he had committed by furious violence. Hauing sought the loue of all the Cities of Flanders, he finds them willing to support him, in right or wrong in his necessity: vpon this assistance he calls an assembly at Gand, to leuy those succors wherof he stood in neede.

At the newes hereof, the zeale of iustice growes cold in Court: they seeke an accord with him whome they should pursue: the King of Sicily, and the Duke of Berry go to him to Amiens, being prouder then if he had done a meritorious act, where making open profession of his pride, hee had placed ouer the doore of his lodging, a table wherein were painted two Lances a crosse, wherof the one had a welsteed head for the warre, C and the other a but head for the Tilt, as giuing the choise of warre and peace: publishing generally that he not onely had done the murder, but that he would and ought to do it. And to the end, he might be mad with reason, he findes Diuines in those daies that confirme him in this passion, & protest to maintaine it by the Scripture, as the sequele will pretently shew. The Princes that were sent vnto him, (not able to moue him to confesse his fault, and to humble himselfe) they command him in the Kings name not to come to Paris. He answers them boldly, that he would presently go, to informe the King what reason had moued him to punish the common enemy of France.

And hauing reuiued his practises at Paris, by meanes of his intelligences, he gathers together a great army, and accompanied with his two Brethren and the Dukes of Lorraine & Cleues, he comes to S. Denis & lodgeth his troupes about this great City, who willingly stretch forth their hands vnto him, as to their redemer, who should purchase them perpetuall rest. The Princes go vnto him, & intreat him in the Kings name, not to enter into Paris, but with his ordinary traine of 2000. men. John makes them answer: That for the surety of his person, he could do no lesse then to go well accompanied: & the next day he arriues at Paris withall his troupes, being receiued by the Parisians with cries of ioy, as a new Monarke. He fortifies himselfe in Bourgonne house, where hee is visited by the whole body of the City and the vniuersity, who seeke to support this execrable murder. The next day the game is played with a strange praeludium. John Petit, a doctor of diuinity, maintayned (with wonderful impudencie,) that the Duke of Bourgonne had caused the Duke of Orleans his Cousin to be worthily slaine, by reason of many notable crimes, wherof he doth accuse him. The Originall of the history doth set downe these detestable phrenesies, to shewe how much disorder preuailes in an estate without a head. The Councell of Constans shall condemne this Impostor, being accused by the Colledge of Sorbonne, who shall disauowe this mercenary man, after the death of the Duke of Bourgonne.

The issue was answerable to his speech. The King being sick in minde, and the Princes fainting, John of Bourgonne is absolved of the murder committed on the person of his Cousin germaine. The King (to couer this bad act) declares by his letters patentes. That in case he died hee would that Lewis his eldest sonne, Dauphin of Viennois, should haue the gouernment of the realme, & after him John & Charles his younger sons, one after another, without any Regent. But the Bourguignon was ignorant, that this decree gaue him authority that should punish him: being also aduised (for some speciall considerations) not not to deale any more with the affaires of France, but with his owne. So he retires into Flanders, not daring to attempt any thing, being thus iustified and absolved.

This insolvency, accompaigned with some indignities against the Kings maiestie, displeased the whole Court: and not iustifiable by the Bourguignon faction, it caused Valentine and her Children to renew their complaynts to the Kings Council, who stoutly made a decree against John Duke of Bourgogne, for satisfaction of the murder committed by him on the person of the Duke of Orleans. But what auails it to report that which tooke no effect, but only to proue, That when lawfull authority is suppressed, iustice is of no force, and the stronger treads vnder foote the right of the weaker. As it proued in this ridiculous & imaginary sentence, giuen in fauour of the Children of Orleans against the muttherer of their father: for it was scarce recorded for the benefit of the interessed, when as newes came of the victorie which John of Bourgogne had gotten against them of Liege, in fauour of John of Baviere surnamed without-pittie, their Bishop.
This did quite change all their thoughts, countenances and words in Court; al Commissions for the leauing of soldiars, for the executiō of this decree, by force are reuoked.
There is no talke, but howe to warrant the King and Daulphin from the Bourguignon, who without doubt would (according to his humor, bring his victorious army to Paris, dissuall the decree vpon their heads that should mayntaine it. So as the Daulphin with the Dukes of Berry, and Bourbon conduct the King to Tours for his better safety, being vnwilling to leaue him in the Parisens power, who were affected partakers of the Bourguignon.

The Parisens are wonderfully discontented at this departure: they arme, drawe their cheynes, as in a time of war: and call in the Bourguignon: assuring him of their hearts and meanes. He comes speedily with a great army, and staies at S. Denis, countrarie to the Parisens expectation, who thought, he would haue kept more stire, hauing so great forces. But he wisely weighing the vanity of popular tumults, resolues to hufband this occasion, and to make his peace with the King and the house of Orleans, hauing so great an aduantage ouer them, to ratifie the abolition which he had obtained, against all euents. He then sends his Ambassadors to King Charles to Tours, William Duke of Baviere, the Lords of Saint George, Croy, Viesuille & Dolehaing, to treat a peace with him and the children of Orleans, making great shewes of humility and loue.

This new course moued the King, and Princes, the which they expected not from the Duke of Bourgogne, being so late a Conqueror: so as they easily yeeld to an agreement, vpon conditions: but stil to the prejudice of the poore widowe and afflicted orphans. In this confusion Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (seeing her paines lost in the pursuite of so iust a cause) dies for thought within fewe dayes after: leauing great trouble and fewe friends to her Children, and great ioy to the Bourguignon, seeing his cause wonne by the death of this courageous woman, who onely might oppose her selfe.

The King comes to Chartres, to solemnize this peace: hee sends for Charles Duke of Orleans and his bretheren, and for John Duke of Bourgogne, and al appeere at a prefixed day. A scaffold is made, where the King sits in his seate of Iustice, enuironed with the Princes of his blood, in great state. John Duke of Bourgogne (approching neere the King) kneeles downe with Dolehaing his aduocate, who speaketh thus, Liege Lord, behold the Duke of Bourgogne, your seruant and Cousin, is come vnto you, for that he understands you are much offended with him, for the deed done and committed on the person of my Lord the Duke of Orleans your brother, for the good of the realme and of your person, as hee re-die to let you vnderstand when soeuer it shall please you, & therefore my Lord, he doth humbly beseech you, that it would please you, to forget the wrath and indignation you haue conceived against him, and receiue him into fauour.

After these wordes, the King commanded the Duke to retyre himselfe: which done, the Queene, the Daulphin the Kings of Sicile and Nauarre & the Duke of Berry fall on their knees before the King, & the Queene sayed, Dread Lord we beseech you to grant the request of your Cousin the Duke of Bourgogne. The King answered, We will and

The Duke hauing thanked the King, tieth. Behind the Kings chaire stood Charles of Orleans with his Brethren weeping bitterly. The Duke of Bourgogne goes vnto them accompanied with his Aduocate, and hauing saluted them with a very humble countenance, the Aduocate spake thus vnto them My Lords the Duke of Bourgogne here presents intreats you, to put out of your remembrance that hatred which you may haue against him, for the outrage committed on the person of my Lord of Orleans your father, and that here after you will remaine good Kinsmen and louing friends. The Duke added: And hereof I pray you.
But they answered nothing. Then the King said vnto them, My fayre Cousins, I will haue it so. And they answered, Liege Lord seeing it pleaseth you to command vs, we yeeld thereto. for we will not disobey your commandements in any thing. The Duke accepted it, thanking the king and his Cousins of Orleans. Then the Cardinall of Barr brought the holy testament, whereon both parties did sweare a peace, neuer to remember what was past, and to hold a perpetuall League of friendship. And the King said, We will that hereafter you line like good Kinsmen and friends together, and we straightly charge you, not to wrong one another, nor any other person that hath fauored you: neither shew any malice or hatred, vnto them as you tender our displeasure, except such as committed the said murder, whom we banish our realme for ever. There are the very words faithfully out of the Originall of that age.
This happened the 9. of March. 1409.

C Then followed nothing but marriages: the Duke of Bourgogne married his two brethren, Philippe Earle of Neuers with the heire of Couffy, and Anthony Duke of Brabant with the heire of Luxembourg. He is greatly in credit both with the King and Queene:
his waye seemed greater then his masters. The bounty of his Kitchen drawes men from all parts: but he had not made his peace with God, neither in his heart with thiele poore orphelins, destitute both of friends and means: at whose coste this peace was made, the which was but counterfait and continued not long.

the same traine. For prooffe of a cordial friendship, the Queene doth openly fauour the marriage so long promised, of Lewis the Daulphin her eldest sonne, with Katherine daughter to the Duke of Bourgogne, which marriage was solemnised. Nowe John of Bourgogne is father-in-law to the Daulphin: it is he which 1409. (after their example) the greatest Noblemen in Court, are all on his side. There is nothing but feasting in his house, all joy, whilst the Orphans of Orleans weep. Paris honours him as their protector, and trusts none but him: and John doth affect nothing more carefully with the King and Dauphin, then the love of the people. He doth all he can to please them. The chiefe subject of his discourse, is to reforme the State, to seeme thereby more affectionate to the common weale. In a solemne feast, (where al the court was present) he gaue to his friends, in stead of a banquet, plomers of gold and silver, shewing by this figure, that his desire was to rule the State well: and to shewe the effect of his words he procured this notable occasion.

All men cried out of the Treasurers, as horseleeches of the common treasure, & the chiefe causes of bad husbandry, whereby the King and people were so much impoverished. We haue made mention before of one of the Kings chiefe mignons called Montagu, who had too soone fled the storme: beeing returned he growes in greater credit with the King then before, who gues him the office of Lord Steward, and marries his eldest sonneto the sister of the Lord of Albert, his Constable, although Montagu were but of a meane calling. The shew of his trayne exceeded Princes houses, and made him odious to all in generall, so as they accused him to haue robbed his Prince and the publike Treasure.

The Bourguignon begins with him, in the reformation of the State. The Princes of the bloud were easily drawne to allow of his proceeding: so as Montagu as taken, examined, condemned & speedily beheaded. Whether this were done by commissioners, or iudicially (as it was said to be iustified after his death) it is not certaine. This is a good lesson for meane men, that growe rich by the publike treasure, not to abuse their wealth by excessive pompe: to keepe their credit in Court, and to flie the fury of great men, vnder his protection that hath power of life and death, arming themselves with a good conscience and vnreproueable in their charges.

But the Bourguignon had a farther reach then Montagu: for vnder colour of the publike good, he reuenged himselfe of him who else might haue crost his desseines. His meaning was not to reforme the State, but to gouerne it absolutely. Thus he seeks to vsurpe all: and in the ruine of Montagu, he will haue all men knowe that he hath power to hurt and helpe. This first insolencie furthered his enemies, beeing in manner forsaken of all men, euen of their owne bloud. For John Duke of Berry (carried away with the vent of this newe fauour) had subiected himselfe to the Bourguignon. But finding himselfe contemned by him, who tooke all to himselfe, and reiected such as had serued him to rise, John resolues to ioyne with the house of Orleans, and to oppose themselves against the Duke of *Bourgonne*s greatnesse.

This is the beginning of the two factions of Orleans and Bourgonne, which troubled all France during this raigne. This league (whereof the house of Orleans bare the name as the first and most interested) was concluded at Gyen in the year 1410. the tenth of March, beeing defensue and offensive against the house of Bourgonne. The chiefe were Charles Duke of Orleans, and his bretheren, John Duke of Berry, Lewis Duke of Bourbon, John Earle of Alencon, Francis Earle of Clermont, Bernard Lord of Armagnac, and Charles Lord of Albret: Constable of France, with their friends and followers in great numbers.

The League of Armagnacs and

Of the Bourguignon faction, were John Duke of Bourgonne with his brethren, Charles King of Navarre, (sonneto that wicked, of whom we haue made mention) the Dukes of Lorraine, Frabant and Brittain, the Marquis of Pont, the Earls of Neuers, Vandemont, S. Pol, Ponthieure and many others. This mournfull diuision continued vnto the year 1419. in the which John was slaine, but it ended not so. During these eight yeares wee shal see diuers changes, one in, and an other out, as they could enable themselves with the Kings authority, which is the strongest battery of ciuill warres. Now the Duke of Bourgonne is in quarter, and plants his ordinance against the Orleanois, as guilty of high treason. but shortly hee shalbe dispossessed, and they of Orleans shal take their tunc.

The

The Duke of Orleans complains, that they are not respected according to their degree: they be to be admitted to the priuileges due to Princes of the bloud, and that the Duke of Bourgonne, should not command absolutely, holding (as they saied) both the bodies and wiles of the King, Queene and Dauphin in captiuitie. They attemble in great troups, first at Chartres, and after (to manage their affaires with greater shewe) next vnto the capitall Citie of Paris they lodged at the Castell of Wincester, then called Bicetre, but now ruined. The Duke of Bourgonne accused the Duke of Orleans for practising to take the Crowne from the King and Dauphin, in forcing the King to what he pecaied against them, as against rebels and disturbers of the publicke quiet. This five continued but seuen or eight moneths, wherein there chanced no memorable accident, but only the death of Lewis the good Duke of Bourbon, who died for greefe in the beginning of this warre, being accused as the motiue of these troubles.

1410. The house of Orleans complains of their wrongs.

Queene Isabel labored to reconcile these Princes, but she preuayled not, being suspected by the Orleans faction, whom she had left without cause, to ioyne with the Bourgonne. After some Edicts of confiscation, not executed (like Canon shot spent in the aire) a peace was made by meanes of the Duke of Berry, vpon condition that he and the Duke of Bourgonne should ioyntly haue the Dauphin in gard, and the house of Orleans should be respected in their degree: and that Peter of Effiards (a sworne enemy to their partie and a most passionate seruant to the Duke of Bourgonne) should be no more Prouost of marchants. This was concluded at Wincester, whereof it bears the name, the twentieth day of November in the same yeare, hauing contended this sommer abt. at Paris only, to the hurt of the poore people, discontented chiefly with the Giscons that came out of Armagnac, who gaue their name to the troups of the Orlean faction, called for this occasion Armagnacs, wearing for their colours a white scarfe, the which they haue vsed in our last troubles.

The peace of Wincester.

This first peace continued not long, neither were al promises performed. The Bourgonne did eate the cake alone, and yet he complained first, as hauing to doe with children. He sends the Lords of Croy and Douries, to the Duke of Berry, to disioyne him from the Duke of Orleans his Nephew: who hauing intelligence of their negotiation and passage caused them to be surprised in Sologne, and brought prisoners to Blois. But John backed Douries, and deteyned Croy, as suspected to be guiltie of his fathers death, and by consequence punishible by the treatie of peace. The King commands him to set him at libertie: and he demands iustice of his fathers murderers. Here vpon they go al to armes. They caute the King to summon him by his Edicts: wherevnto Charles Duke of Orleans answers, by a challenge to the Duke of Bourgonne, as the murderer of his father, and the author of all the miseries which then rained in France.

Beginning of the second Warre.

Thus began this second warre, the twentieth of July the yeare following, 1411. the Princes passions giuing the poore people scarce seuen monethes respite to breath in so many calamities, which they suffered through their voluntary diuisions. The Orlean faction assembles at Gargeau vpon the riuer of Loire, to resoluue of the meanes to make warre against John Duke of Bourgonne, whome they challenge by a publike cartel, as the murderer of a Prince of the bloud, the Kings only brother: and as vsurper of the roiall authoritie, holding the persons and wills of the King and Dauphin Captiue. John Duke of Bourgonne had great aduantages, the Kings authority, and the Dauphins, who was heire apparent to the Crowne of France; the capitall Citie of the realme, the approbation of the best Cities, most of the Prouinces, and without comparifon greater meane of himselfe, both for men and mony.

This second warre continued a yeare, it began in July, 1411. and ended the yeare after, 1412. in the same moneth, far more variable and violent then the first; and memorable in this, that the vanquished was victor and the victor vanquished. The same authoritie which had supported the stronger, was in the ende fauorable to the weaker. Such as most pleased their masters humor, receiued death of him for their reward. Very necessary obseruations to iudge of these ciuill warres.

The Orlean faction went first to field. They were about seuen or eight thousand horse.

The

1411

The number of their foote is not specified. Charles Duke of Orleans makes the body of his army in Gastinois: the Duke of Bourbon in Bourbonois, and the Earle of Alençon in Vermandois. Peronne, Chauny, Neele and Han, yeeld vnto them. Clermont, (which belonged to the Duke of Bourbon), is fortified: they seeke to surprise Reteil and Bapaumes, but in vaine. This was the first fallly begun by them of Orleans. But the Bourguignon takes an other course, he prepares the Kings Edicts against them, he employes the peoples force within the Citties, and armes in field, and all auails him at the first. He had a great army, both of horse and foote, the which doth presently march into Picardy, where the Orleans had begun, and easily recouers what they had gotten. Han standes resolute: they beseege, take, spoile and sacke it.

The Flemings which were vassalls to the Duke of Bourgogne, being laden with spoile, craue leaue to returne home, neyther could the Dukes promises, nor threats retayne them, but they leaue his army and depart. This had almost ouerthrowne his affaires: he abandons Mondidier, the which was presently surprised by Peter of Quefnes, Lord of Gannes, of the Orleans faction, and putting his army into garrisons, doubting the event of this warre; he sends with all speede to Henry the 4. King of England, crauing succors in this necessity. Henry makes his profit of these ciuill dissensions in France: he presently sends twelue hundred men to the Bourguignon, to supply the Flemings want. vnder the commande of Thomas Earle of Arundel. The Orleans loose no time: and for their neerer approach to Paris, they surprise Saint Denis, and Saint Cloud, places of importance, and fortifie Corbeil for the passage of the riuer, of purpose to famish this great Cittie, C which liues by dayly prouisions brought from diuers parts.

But hee findes one to countermine his practises, vjing the same instrument he had employed to hurt him. The Orleans keeping the field about Paris, must neede be the cause of great calamities. And all this was acted in the viewe of the King and Daulphin.

John informes the King of his enemies insolencie, who (without appealing to his Maiestie) presumed to spoile the heart of France, as if they were strangers or enemies. Charles apprehends this error but too easily, desiring nothing but rest: but Lewis the Daulphin especially is incensed by these informations, and his choller entreaseth dayly against his Cousins of Orleans. The Bourguignon saied, that they played the Kings, and could not conceale their intention, which was to seize on the Crowne, seeing they presumed to take armes against the King.

There are rigorous Edicts made against the Orleans faction, as against rebelles and guilty of high treason. All their goods, honours and persons are confiscate which remaine in this army, if within fiftene dayes after publication of the Kings letters patents, they retire not themselves to their houses. And to begin with the greatest, Charles of Albret Constable of France, and Arnolde of Corby the Chancellor, are dispossessed of their dignities, and the Earle of Saint Pol preferred to the first place, and Dol haing the Duke of Bourgogne aduocate to the last.

This storme makes worke at Paris, they seeke out all of the Orleans partie, and E presently cast the into prison. Peter of Essars being restored to his place, remembers the article made against him at Winchestre, and armes the people against them. Wholoeuer is found out by the Parisians, being of the Orleans faction, hee is brought with hazard of his life to prison. All is lawfull in this popular rage, so it bee against the Armagnacs.

All these engins forced from diuers parts, do strangely shake the Orleans partie. Such as were restrayned within any Townes, durst not breath: and many in the army slippe away daily, fearing the rigour of these Edicts, which were executed withall severity.

Charles Duke of Orleans (hauing taken counsell of the Princes, and Noblemen, his F associates, what course to followe in this alteration, before a greater inconueniency) resolves to drawe the Bourguignon to battaile, although he were fortified with these new forces from England. So as hauing passed the riuer of Oyse, vpon a bridge of boats

The Bourguignon craues aide of the King of England.

The King & Daulphin incensed against the Duke of Orleans.

The Parisians mutine against the Orleans faction.

A (all the passages being seized on by the Bourguignon in the Kings name) he presents himselfe before the gates of Clermont in Beauuosis, where John his capitall enemy remayned.

The Orleans army yet faire, beautified with the presence of great personages: the Duke of Bourbon, the Earles of Alençon, Clermont, Albret, Vertus, Vienne, Bouciquant, the Archbishop of Sens, (brother to that Montagu, which was beheaded) Craon, Montbison, Hargell, with many Barons, Knights and Squiers, all resolute to end this quarrell by battaile: and to that end (hauing defied the Duke of Bourgogne) they attend him, betwixt Clermont and Cathenay. But the Bourguignon leauing them there to spoile that goodly and fertill country of the Isle of France, whereby they increased the hatred and curse of the people, more incensed then euer against these Armagnacs, exclaiming of him as of a coward that durst not fight, he arrives at Paris, to the peoples great content, who attende him with all deuotion. Hee presently takes Saint Cloud and Saint Denis from the Orleans partie, to their great losse, notwithstanding any diligence of Charles their head, who proclaymed a victory before the combate. Thus Paris is freed without any restrainte, and all the Orleans partie brought verie lowe.

Neyther Charles nor his Associates, talke any more of fighting with the Bourguignon: they had worke enough to retyre themselves, and to defend their Townes, expecting a present seege. John of Bourgogne failes not to husband this good successe: and (to countenance his forces) hee doth intangle the King and Daulphin in the pursute of his enemies halfe vanquished. So his victorious army enters into Brausse, turning head towards the Country of Orleans, the inheritance of his chiefe enemy. Esampes yeelds to the King. The Duke of Bourbon is there taken prisoner, and sent presently into Flanders.

Whilest that all things succeeded thus happily for the Duke of Bourgogne, Henry the 4. King of England calles home the troupes he had sent to his succour, vnder the Earle of Arundells commande, intreating the Duke to hold him excused, if he did vse his owne at his neede. Hee had no meaning to fauour the stronger party, but to succor the weaker, as experience did soon teach. This sodaine alteration did somewhat stay the Bourguignons desseine to attempt Orleans: but making warre aduisedly, he attends his enemies proceeding, and taking an honest leaue to retyre, by reason of the winter, he comes to Paris, where (not to loose any time) he continues the Kings thundering Edicts, and executes many of his prisoners, to flesh the people. To flesh he addes Ecclesiasticall excommunications against the Armagnacs: whilest the Orleans take cold by making warre in Charolois, and sending for succors into England, seeking for releefe in the same place where their enemy had found a scourge to whippe them.

Certaine letters (carried by a monke from the Duke of Orleans to the King of England) were intercepted, and brought to Paris, being examined in full assembly of the vniuersitie, and from thence imparted to the people, with the Bourguignons commentaries. They made the Orleans faction so much the more odious, as if the Dukes of Orleans, Perry and Bourbon (combined together) had sought to take the Crowne from the King and Daulphin, and to dismember the realme in giuing part of it to the English, and to deuide the rest among themselves. Strange newes without any subiect, which vanish at their breeding: but yet they serue to purpose, according to the desseine of their Architect.

The King and Daulphin (being possessed by John of Bourgogne) haue no thought but to ruine the Orleans party, and puste vp with this first successe, hoping to finish the rest, they employ all their meanes to leuie a great army, the which (through the Bourguignons care) was held to be a hundred thousand men. A notable number, after so many miseries, and in so great a confusion.

The Cittie of Bourges was of great importance, for the vniing of the Provinces on that side Loire, where the Associate Princes had their greatest supplies of men.

The English troupes leaue the Bourguignon.

1412

The Bourguignons greatest malice was against the Duke of Berry, who not onely had forsaken him, but (for his degree and age) vnderstood much in his enemies affaires. They resolute therefore to beleage it, to make the way more easie for conquest of the rest. In the beginning of the Spring, the King and Daulphin go from Paris to their army, which assembled in Castinois: being entred into Berry the lesser Townes yeeld without question, Dunle Roy, Fontenay, and Sancerre. Bourges being summoned, makes answer. That neither the King nor Daulphin did make this warre, but the Duke of Bourgonne, who holding their persones, and willes captiue, would deprive the Princes of France of their right, hauing imbrued his murdering hands in the blood of the first Prince of the Crowne, seeking to vlturpe the State.

The King & Daulphin beleage Bourges by the Bourguignons meane.

There were very many good soldiars within the Cittie, which were supplied with all that might be wished for in along sege. They intreated the enemye (in skorne) that hee would approach neere the Cittie, and leaue their gates open in a brauery. Many fortunate sallies are made by them, crying in field, God saue the King. They take many prisoners. The waters abroad are poisoned, and many die before they discover the cause.

Berry made discoloure.

All things out with military raylings of Armignats and Bourguignons: but the greatest defeat is in spoyling of the Country. All the prouision being carried into the Cittie, what a spoile shold an army of a hundred thousand men with their followers make? and (to increase the miserie) all the houses of the champion Country were eyther sackt, or burnt. The Englisb (being victors in France) neuer committed greater spoiles then these French armies.

The Daulphin discontented with his father in Law: the Duke of Bourgonne.

As the Duke of Berry (the Lord of that Country) was much grieved to see these spoyles: so the Daulphin (the heire apparent of the Crowne) was discontented with his father in Lawes ambition, growing odious vnto him. His blood (which could not degenerate) moued him to compassion, and the blood vniustly shed, troubled his conscience. For, to what ende should they ruine a whole realme to maintain to execrable a murder? If zeale to reforme the State (saith hee) bee the Bourguignons intent, is this the way? His father (being sicke) could not apprehend these things, by reason of his infirmities: what reproch then were it for him (being his eldest soane) to suffer himselfe to be baffed by his father in Lawe, like vnto an infant? These apprehensions moued this young Prince, who nothing dissembling his conceptions, told his father openly, that he was not pleased with these confusions, & that they must finde out some meane to pacifie them. It chanced one day, as they aduertised the King that in a fallie made by them of the Towne, they had slaine some one of his seruants, the Daulphin cried out in the presence of the Bourguignon: Shall we neuer haue an ende of these miseries? I am resolved to make them cease. The Bourguignon hauing before discovered some coldnesse in this young Prince, found his mind now to be wholly changed. He therefore replied mildly: That it should be well done, so as they of Orleans would acknowledge their error. How (saith the Daulphin) shall they acknowledge their fault, if wee do not knowe them for our blood? And then they resolved to make a peace.

The Duke of Berry had layed the foundation by Lignac, great master of Rhodes, who sayled not to imbrace this occasion, seeing the Daulphin so well affected. The Earle of Sauoy had sent his Ambassadors, to exhort both parties. After a monethes sege they begin to treat of the meanes to pacifie these troubles. The Bourguignon makes haft to bee the first in all things, and parles with the Duke of Berry, betwixt two barres. One accuseth, the other excuseth: but in the end a peace is concluded by deputies.

The Princes, at an enteruue imbrace one another, with all shewes of cordial loue, such as their blood makes shewe of, after long bitternesse. The Bourguignon onely is troubled, doubting this peace to them would be a warre to him, for that hee had no peace in his owne Conscience.

The

A The King entres into Bourges, where the peace is signed, and for that reason it was called the Peace of Bourges, the 25. of Iuly, in the yeare. 1412. A Parliament is called at Auxerre, to constitute it by sollemne oath. The Princes are received into fauour with the King and Daulphin, all Edicts made against them, were disannulled and of no force. They and theirs restored to their degrees and dignities. All things to bee forgotten. The names of Armignac and Bourguignon. (as in famous marks of ciuill dissention) forbidden vpon paine of death: and the Englisb (come to the succor of the assaiat Princes) to bee satisfied out of the Kings treasure. Without the Cittie of Auxerre, neere to the Abbie of Saint Mariana, a stately scaffold was made, where the King sitting in his seat of Iustice, environed with his Princes, the officers of his Crowne, and the chiefe deputies of the Parliament, the peace was proclaimed with as great ioy, as the warre had bene tedious, and mournfull. To confirme this peace with John of Bourgonne, Philip Earle of Vertus married his daughter: but all this could not reconcile him to the house of Orleans.

The Daulphin reioyced much at this peace, and made all shewes of loue to his Cousins lately reconciled, being grieved to haue bin so long dissentio betweene them: desirous to repaire what was past, & aboue all to maintaine an inuolable peace within the Realme. The good sicke King present at all, yeelding his consent and authority, sometimes inclined to good, sometimes to ill. Queene Isabel held with the strongest. but all these good motions were crossed by the Bourguignon: so as all the confusions of this raigne are not yet ended.

John of Bourgonne seeing him selfe crost

by Lewis the Daulphin, and the house of Orleans restored to grace. stirres up newe troubles from the yeare 1412. vnto 17. when as the Daulphin died, but the troubles ceased not.

E

Rance began to hope for better, by the meanes of Lewis the eldest Sonne to King Charles: hauing a desire to make a peace against the Bourguignons will. But this was not all they expected of the Daulphins first resolution: yet the weakenesse of the sicke King, and the inconstancie of his young Lieutenant gaue the subtil braine of John of Bourgonne too great an aduantage to suffer the French to enioy the fruits of peace so much desired, who neuer yeelded to bare threats, but grew more resolute,

The Bourguignon pr. chieft in Court.

And notwithstanding this alteration of the Daulphin his sonne in lawe, yet he left not the Court, being alwayes neere the King, keeping the Councel in breath, who were for the most part all on his side: and although they worshiped the Sunne rising, yet seeing the spirit of this young Prince to be weake and inconstant, and the Bourguignons firme resolution, they stood vpon their gard, doing nothing that might openly offend eyther the one or the other, but vnder hand they sought to please the most popular and redoubted maister: who else might proue a most cruell and dangerous enemye.

1412

Thus were affaires handled in the Kings counsell. And as not only the Court, but the whole world, is an ebbing and flowing of diuers humors, the which doe change according to occasions: and the scaffold whereon dissembling, treachery and treason play their parts diuersly: so at that time the Bourguignon (a principall artisan of these goodly shewes), found an ample subiect wherein to imploye his sly trade. But although he seemed to haue gained all, whatsoever he desired that should come to passe, and to haue attained the full of his desires, yet all his enterprises came to nothing, and in the end he paid (with the price of his blood) the great debt of his horrible wickednesse.

The estate of the Court vnder
Lewis the Dauphin.

But this acte shall haue manie Scenes. In the first our History shall set downe the new gouernment of Lewis the Dauphin. This yong Prince was not capable of so great a charge, hauing an idle braine, being carelesse and voluptuous, giuen to his owne will, obstinate, taking no aduice from any but of himselfe, or from yong men of his owne humour: loth to yeeld to any that vnderstood more then himselfe, and especially to his vncles, whose graue haire he disdaind: neither could he loue his father in lawe, being resolu'd to gouerne the realme alone. The Queene seeing her Sonnes humour inclyned to loue the house of Orleans, made shew to fauour them: but in effect she was indifferent, being wholly giuen to flatter which her husband, and to gouerne him according to the time.

The Bourguignon dissembling his sonne in Lawes wayward humours, was alwayes neer the King, giuing him such goodly reasons as the good Prince could not gainsaie him. The subiect of his futes was pleasing to the Parisiens, whose good liking he entertained carefully, but alwayes with an intent to bee reuenged of his enemies, vnder this goodly name of the common wealth, as the soueraigne ende of all his desseins: but in effect he held still one of the cheefest places, not yeelding in any thing, to gouerne them which seemed to rule, and to keepe backe such, as might crosse his authoritie. By the peace of Bourges the Constable of Albret should bee restored to his dignitie, and Arnoldot Corbie to his Chancellourship. They delaie them from daye to day, but in the ende they are restored with much difficultie.

The meanest haue many delaies, more troublesome then a flat repulse, being more willing to leaue al, then to make these fruitlesse poursuites. Arnoldot Corbie being honorably restored to his place, resigned it into the Kings hands, to auoide the danger of so confused a time: more wilfully then Henry of Marle that succeeded him, being slaine at the massacre at Paris, with the Constable of Armagnac. But the Bourguignons flew a higher pitche, then to preiudice the house of Orleans in their goods and honors, or to crosse their affaires and their followers. He found no better expedient, then to do as he had doone with Lewis their father, for a dead Lion doth no harme. To this ende he assembles some of his most trustye followers at Paris, to finde meanes to murder the Dukes of Orleans, Berry, and Bourbon. But Peter of Effars (one of his most viciou persians,) discovered this practise, for the which hee soone after smarted.

The Bourguignon
on.

By the treatie of Bourges, the English (which came to the Duke of Orleans succour) must be satisfied. They presse for paiement, one part being discharged (to the Duke of Orleans great hindrance) he was forced to leaue his brother John Earle of Angoulême in hostage for the rest. Being carried into England he was in the end redeemed, after much trouble and many delaies.

In this article the Bourguignon made shew of his good husbandrie, soliciting the English vnder hand, on the one side for to presse Charles his principall debtor, and on the other side he cried out against the disorder of the Kings treasor, so all gouerned as there was not sufficient to furnish the ordinarie expences of his house: pretending all these great summes to be wasted, either by the Tresorers; in gifts, or in superfluous expences. This complaint was very plausible, but it was a pitfall to catch his enemies, & to murder

A murine this discontented people, by reason of their great oppression, being easie to be moued at the name of the common weale. He soone obtayned from the King a generall conuocation of the chiefe Citties, to reforme the abuses of the Realme, and especially of the treasure, for the releefe of the poore people. To make this partie good, the City of Paris must make the first point: but the vniuersity which stood as a new-ter (dealing with nothing but their bookes) should make the proposition, and first instance.

The Bourguignon
resolued
on Paris.

The cause was vehemently set downe by a Doctor (chosen for the purpose) and auouched by the Cittie and deputies of the Provinces. Such as were subiect to accumps, were much terrified, and the greatest number fled. Such as were taken, lost their heads at the Halles or Greue, to the peoples great content, who highlie commiend the Duke of Bourgonne, as the onely Prince which loued the good of the realme. The Dauphin growes iealous at the found of the prailes (as preiudicall to his honour): vowing neuer to suffer the Bourguignon to attempt any thing against his authoritie. Such as were interestted, fedde the yong Princes humor: Who (by the meanes of Lewis of Bauiere his Vncle by the mother side) perswade him to take the name of Regent for a marke of his greatnesse.

The Dauphin
takes vpon him the name of Regent.

He takes this title, and giues notice to the Duke of Bourgonne, that it is nowe high time he were knowne in his degree. The Bourgonne (protecting that hee hath no other obiect but the good of the Realme) makes no shewe to deale in these affaires, leauing the government thereof to whome it appertayned: yet vnder hand he caused the Parisians to arme, and (least the better sort should be called into question) he imployes the basest, being led by one Caboch a butcher, followed by a multitude of rascals, who (being armed) come in troupe to the Regents lodging, and require of him by rowle the chiefe enemies of the Bourguignons house, who they sayed had gouerned the treasure, or had bene enriched by excessiue gifts. Amongst the which was Peter of Effars, who (without any long proces) lost his head, receyuing a iust reward for his great wickednesse, by his hands, who had then caused him to commit them.

A strange sedition in Paris.

But this was not one dayes furie: the next day the people assemble in great multitudes, and taking white cappes for their badge, they come to Saint Pol, where the King lodged, and demand audience, hauing seized on all the passages to his lodging, after a terrible manner. A Carmelite Frier was speaker for the people, accompanied with the Deputies of this multitude as his rustians. Being entred into the Kings chamber, after many tedious speeches, he demands reformation of the State, protesting they would not be fed with words: they vrge the King to punish such, whose names they had conteyned in a list, being guiltie of capitall crimes.

The Parisians
insolent
behauer.

The Duke of Bourgonne makes a good shewe, and answers: That the King would consider thereof. This Frier replies impudently: that they would not depart before they had such as they demanded. Their rage was such, as the King and Princes tooke white cappes, the marke of the seditious. They demand the chiefe seruants of the King, Queene and Dauphin: not onely men, but also women which had bene in any credit: and aboue all, Lewis of Bauiere the Queenes brother. There was not any one but stood amazed at these audacious impudencies.

The Queene comes weeping, shee intreats the King, the Monke and the deputies of the people. They answer: it is their charge, and they cannot alter it. The people crie from the base Court with a violent noyse, that if they deliuer not these prysoners, they will force the lodging. So as after all these intreaties, Lewis the Queenes brother with the rest (specified in the rowle,) both men and women, yeeld vnto the mercie of these madde and furious men, and are by them led into diuers prysons.

the secret practises of all these insolencies.

This night passed not without many murders: many were strangled, and many cast into the riuer, without any other formes of iustice but the Bourguignons secret commandement: who (with his cold and graue countenance) made shewe to haue no interest in the action. The City was neuer in so lamentable an estate, by this shame A full contempt of Law, order, & of the King, Princes & Magistrates. There is no talke but of blood, killing, hanging and drowning of poore prisoners.

14 14

The vniuersity dislikes of these disorders.

The horror of this confusion toucht the hearts of the most passionate. The vniuersity (which had bin the mouth of these captious complaints) repaires to Henry of Marle the first president, & to John Iuuenall of Yrins the Kings aduocate, protesting that they were not guilty of these infamous disorders. And hauing taken aduice, they resolve to go to the King, as well to purge themselves of the suspition of these abhominable confusions, as to intreat him to giue care to a good peace. They giue him meane to winne the heads of this popular faction, and set vp an Ensigne with the Kings armes, & crie in all parts of the Citie. Peace, peace good people: an inuention which preuailed much p in this action.

The people pacified.

Ill counsell is most hurtfull to him that giues it: the Bourguignons practises light on his owne head. The people seeing themselves disauowed by the vniuersity (who then had great credit for their esteeme of wisdom and knowledge) hauing the King and his parliament opposite, being abandoned by their Tribunes, they hide themselves in Bourgonne, and he himselfe feeling the storme to approach, retires to Compiene, attending the euent.

The King incensed against the Bourguignon and the people for sake him.

The Orlean faction repaires to Paris with speede, and were receiued ioyfully by the people, as the Anchor of their hope. All the world exclaimes of the Bourguignon as the onely motiue of the troubles of France, and vnworthy to hold so honorable a rancke among the Princes of the bloud. The Queene feedes this dislike, for the interest of her brother imprisoned, and the King thunders forth his edicts against the Bourguignon, the which are seuerely executed vpon such as are apprehended. Scaffolds, riues and streetes witnesse the reuenge of the murders committed by the Bourguignons vpon the Orleanois. All Officers preferred by the Bourguignon are displaced, and all such as had supported him are ill intreated. Valeran Earle of S. Pol, is put from the dignity of Constable, Guichard Daulphin of Auvergne, from that of great Maister, & Charles of Rambures from being maister of the crossebowes, the which is at this day as the colonell of the infantry. Three hundred men and women of the Bourguignon faction are banished by a decree of the Court of Parliament. John Duke of Brittain leaues the Bourguignon & D comes to court against him.

The Bourguignon faction disgraced and banished.

To conclude, all bandie against the Bourguignon, yet he is nothing amazed, but continues constant against all stormes. He craues ayde of his cities in Flanders in this necessity: being thus perplexed, there fell out a fauourable occasion to raise him vp againe. The Queene being much discontented with him, incenseth the Daulphin. This young Prince had some of his household seruants from the Bourguignon: she vsing the authority of a mother, takes them from him, and puts them in prison: the reason was, for that she feared these men were of the Bourguignons faction. The Daulphin takes this as an affront, and writes to his father-in-law to assist him. The Bourguignon imbracing this unexpected occasion, calls a newe assemblie of his subiects, and shewes them these letters. And making his profit thereof, he giues them to vnderstand how needefull it was to leauy an armie, to free the King and Daulphin, whom the Orlean faction held in captivity: and vpon this cause he writes to all the Citties of the Realme, intreating them to assist him in so good a worke, and worthy of good subiects to their Prince.

The Queene discontented the Daulphin, so as he writes to the Bourguignon.

He abuseth the Daulphin letters.

Hereupon he leaues an armie, and goes to field, making a publike declaration, That he takes armes to set the King and Daulphin at liberty, and is followed by many French, so as his armie increaseth daily. Hauing passed the riuer of Somme he enters into Compiene, & doth summon Senlis, to send him the keyes of their gates, as marching for the Kings seruice: but a countermand comes from the Daulphin, which doth frustrate his desire.

The Daulphin disauowes the Bourguignon.

The Daulphin (wonne by the Orleanois) protesteth that he had neuer written these letters, and disauowes the Bourguignon: He writes letters vnto him of a contrayte tenour, requesting him to forbear to torment the people vpon so vnjust a cause: protesting

A protesting that he was not onely in full liberty, but doth also inioy his authority, by vertue whereof hee commands him to dismisie his troupes, and to leaue France in quiet.

The Bourguignon goes on his course, meaning to enter Paris, and to stirre the people to a newe edition, and so hee marcheth with his troupes neere to the city. and stayes at S. Denis, but his proiect had no successe. The Daulphin assures the City walles and the peoples hearts against him, who seekes by all meanes to speake to the King or people, approaching himselfe neere the city, sending his Heralds with letters, planting his colours neere the gate, and in the ende conuaies a staffe with letters to him, but all this would not preuaile.

He is not admitted into Paris.

B The King doubles the battery of his Edicts against him, as guilty of high Treason, and a disturber of the publike peace: commanding all men that were in his armie to leaue him, vpon paine of confiscation. Hereat the greatest part of his troupes fle away, yea his Flemings abandon him, who had alwayes protested vnto him in all his assemblies, neuer to carry armes against the King nor Daulphin. In the ende the King and Daulphin, accompanied with the Princes of his bloud, march with a goodly armie, they besiege Compiene (where the Bourguignon had left a garrison) and takes it by composition, from thence they march to Soissons a Towne of greater strength: hauing taken it by force, and Enguerand of Bourbonville his right hand in it, he leaues the town in peace, and cuts off Bourbonvilles head at Paris, with many of his companions, to the C peoples great content, glad of this new bloud: and in the ende he passeth to Arras, the which he beseegeth with his victorious armie.

Proclaimed guilty of high treason.

The king marcheth with an armie against the Bourguignon.

The Bourguignon amazed at these vnexpected euent, demands peace of Charles, & obtains it with much intreatie, by the meanes of the Countesse of Hainault his sister, and the Duke of Brabant his brother. It is called the peace of Arras, being made at that siege. This was grieuous to the Dukes of Orleans and Berry, who said, that both the King and Daulphin had promised them, not to laye downe armes, before they had vtterly ruined the house of Bourgonne. But God, wiser then they, would vniue all the French, to oppose themselves with a common consent, against the English their common enemy: and will soone shewe, that it is a meere vanity for mortall men, to nourish immortal hatred against their enemies, to satisfie their insatiable reuenge. D We haue said, that Henry the 5. King of England watcht all oportunities to feede the confusions of this miserable raigne: and to that end he did sometimes succour the Bourguignon, sometimes the Orleanois, still supporting the weaker. And knowing well the Duke of Bourgonnes humor, seeing the Daulphin incensed against him, he leaues a goodly army, to make a benefit of these diuisions. The euent fauoured his desire, but not his proiect: for meaning to assist the Bourguignon, hee findes that he had made his peace with our Charles.

He sues for peace.

Hauing landed at Harflew, a sea Towne seated vpon the Riuer of Seine, he sends his Herald to demand his daughter Katherine. This was a matter farre fetcht, and a strange course: but this daughter must be the ground of many miseries for this Realme, and likewise an occasion to free this Realme absolutely from the English by a strange meane, and (as wee may say) admirable, as the course of our History will shewe.

From the King of England, comes an armie and demand Katherine for the Kings daughter.

Henry takes Harflew by composition. Before he takes possession of this conquest, he goes bare footed to the Church, to giue God thanks. He had not his whole armie with him, one part attended him at Calais, hauing an intent to ioyne with them, & so to fortifie his troupes. With this resolution he lodgeth at Fauille, & passing through Caux to the county of Eu, he comes to Fimeu, to passe the riuer at Bunquetacque, (an infamous place by our losse) where the passage being surprised, he takes his way towards F. Arianes, & from thence to Raillu in Fimeu, seeking to passe the bidge at Remie: but not able to force it, he recouers Hange vpon Somme, and so passeth the riuer at Poyenne & Brathencourt, places ill garded by them of S. Quintin, and then he lodgeth at Mouchy in Gabets towards the riuer of Mirumont.

He marcheth into this way.

and French armies.

He had in his army six thousand horse and twenty thousand foote. That of King Charles was far greater of it selfe, besides the Bourguignons troupes (which were drawne together for another intent then to fight with the English). They were in al aboute twentie thousand horse and threescor thousand foot: and therefore Henry did shunne the battaile and sought how to saue himselfe through the fennes. Our accustomed rashesnes, and wilfull forgetfullnes of two experiences past against the same nation, and in the like occurrents, made vs to note with blacke and mournful letters that ouerthrow and calamitie. Henry demanded passage to returne into England, yeelding vp Hartley and other places conquered in this voiage: but we sought our owne decay. The Constable Albret comanded the foreward that day, and with him were the Dukes of Orleans & Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and of Richemont, the Lord of Bouciqualt Marshal of France, the Lord of Dampierre, Admiral, The Battaile was led by the Duke of Bar and the Earles of Alençon, Vaudemont, Neuers, Blamont, Salines, Grandpre and Rouff. The Rearward by the Earles of Marle, Dampmartin and Fouquembergue.

The King of England forced to fight.

Henry (being denied passage by the Constable) resolues to fight, putting his trust in God and in his owne valour, determining to vanquish or to die. He made choise of a place of hard access, and the better to fortifie his archers, euery one had a sharpe stake planted before him. The French ordered as before, attended their enemies, either looking who should begin the game. Impatiencie forceth the weaker like desperatemenc: the English Archers being in fight with such a furie, as the French forward cannot endure the violent fall of this furious storme, the Constable Albret was slaine fighting in the foremost ranke. The Duke Anthony of Brabant, brother to John Duke of Bourgonne, (seeing this disorder) leaues his troupe to redresse it: but he was also slaine by the English bowe men, with his brother Philip Earle of Neuers. The battaile was likewise forced after a great fight. The rearward fled, and saued them selues in the neereft places of retreat.

And gets the victory.

So as the losse was not so great as the shame and ouerthrow. They numbretten thousand men slaine: but their rashnes was inexcusable. The head smarted for it, and the Bourguignons brethren had there an honorable tombe. Charles Duke of Orleans & Lewis of Bourbon, the Earles of Eu, Richemont & Vendosme (the strongest pillars of the Orlean faction) with many Noblemen and Gentlemen, were taken and led into England. This defeat chanced the 20. of October in the yeare, 1415. called the euill Battaile of in Law, and a terror to the Bourguignon) was little lamented of the people, and lesse of his father in Law, who hated him to the death. A Prince of little valour and much tole, more buied with himselfe then with the affaires he managed, the which he made troublesome by his insufficiencie & presumptiō to know much: vnwilling to learne from others what he vnderstood not, for the good of the State and his owne duty.

The Duke of Berry dies.

John Duke of Touraine his brother, succeeded him in the first degree of the Prince of the bloud, and the Earle of Armagnac was made Constable, in the place of Charles of Albret, who shall minister good occasion to speake both of his life and death. John Duke of Berry brother to our Charles the 5. augmented these losses. A wife Prince and louing Learning, comendable in al things, but for his couetousnes, the which made his vertues of lesse fame. A blemish very il becoming a generous and heroicke spirit. These great losses should haue made the Bourguignon humble, but he became more insolent, making new practises to raise him selfe, hauing no competitor. Imbracing this occasion, he gatheres together what troupes he can, with an intent to go to Paris. The Queene and Constable of Armagnac (vnwilling he shoud come armed) comand him in the Kings name, not to aproch. The Parisiens were not then so well conceited of the Bourguignon, being restrained by the court & vniuersitie, but especially by the Kings authority being present, who spake whatsoeuer his wife & the Constable would haue him, being then alone in authority in the Kings Councell.

Th:

A The Bourguignons troupes kept the field, committing all kinde of insolencies and spoyles against whom the King made Edicts as against common thecues, giuing the people liberty to kill them. But this did nothing mollify the heart of this reuengefull Prince, borne for his Countries misery, hauing no other intent but to afflict it with new calamities. To this ende (as in the Kings sicknesse the Daulphin had the name and authority of the State) he sought to winne the fauour of John, succeeding in the right of his brother deceased, This occasion was offered, but the issue was contrary to his desire.

the warre.

B The misery of our France was such, as the common duty of humanity, moued forraine nations to pittie, foreseeing our ruine, if the warre betwixt France and England continued. In this common desire, the Emperour Sigismund (by the consent of the Germans) came into France. His traine and the good worke he vndertooke, deserued an imperi- all Maiestie: but the ende will shew his intent to be other then he protested. Being arrived in France (to the great content of all the French) he findes our Charles at his deuotion, who receiued him with all the pompe he could giue to so great a Monarch: making shewe of the great desire hee had to make a peace betwixt the French and the English, for the generall good of both estates. But this accord was but halfe made.

The Emperour
Sigismund comes into France.

C The Emperour (hauing remained some time with Charles) goes into England, where he findes Henry of an other humour, puft vp with the happy successe of his affaires & the weakenesse of ours: and in trueth the measure of our miseries was not yet full. So Sigismund (hauing perswaded Henry in vaine) returnes into France. Charles (to honour him) sends his sonne John Duke of Touraine and Daulphin of Viennois into Picardie, to meete him, hauing married the daughter of the Earle of Hainault, as great a friend to the Bourguignon, as ill affected to the French.

The Emperour seeing his labour lost, in seeking this reconciliation, takes his shortest course into Germany: leauing a reasonable subiect to the cleare-sighted, to iudge that he had another intent then to settle a peace in France, by countenancing of the Bourguignon, the instrument of her miseries: for after this yong pince had spoken with the Emperour, he is wholly changed in fauour of the Duke of Bourgonne, and resolues to bandy with him against the Duke of Orleans. This foundation beeing laid by the Emperour, it was fortified by the Earle of Hainault, father-in-law to John the Daulphin. Nowe he imbraceth the greatest and most dangerous enemy of all true Frenchmen with a wonderfull affection.

The Daulphin
John fauours
the Bourguignon.

But the subtilt is taken in his own snare, & the end doth often bewray the intent. As all things tended to a manifest change by meanes of this yong Prince, inchaunted by his charmes, hauing a spirit like vnto waxe apt to receiue any impressions, from so subtilt an artisan as the Bourguignon, behold death cuts off all these hopes, cast in the mould of this newe authority, buried in *John*s tombe, who died during these practises, at Compiègne, when as the fire began to kindle in fauour of the Bourguignon, and to the apparent reuiuing of troubles in France.

The Daulphin
John dies.

E To John succeeded Charles Earle of Ponthieu, the yongest sonne to our Charles the 6. He remained also the first Prince of the bloud, with the prerogatiues of the fundamentall lawe. A Prince that shall minister much matter to talke of his life in the course of our history, guided by the singular prouidence of God, to raise vp this monarchy, almost ruined. The least, but the happiest of all his brethren: for this is that Charles the 7. who (hauing corrected that furious giant of Bourgonne) in the end shal expel the English, and leaue a faire way to his posterity, to restore this estate to neere the ruine. But this shal not bee without many painefull difficulties, the which the order of our history commands vs to represent in their due places

The Queene

her the Regence.

Who hauing declared her selfe Regent of the Realme, makes warre against her Sonne Charles the Daulphin, seiserth vpon Paris, and there commits a cruell massacre, where the Constable of Armagnac, and Henry of Marle Chaucellor of France are slaine.

But this John of Bourgogne is in the end swaine by the Daulphin.

From the yeare, 1415. to 1419.

A strange confusion, the mother against the sonne.

Newe kind of misery now supplies the stage, to despight Nature by the frantike drunkenness of our confused passions. An vnaturall mother forgets her onely Sonne: she bandies with his capitall enemy, against her owne bloud, seeking to transport the hereditary Crowne to strangers: a Crowne inalienable by the lawe of State: to the ende this Medea might fight both against nature and the Lawes of the Realme. A horrible phrentie, a fit of ciuill warre, that is to saie, of the assured ruine of the State. They call it ciuill (being the ruine of Cittizens) but very vnciuill indeede, for if we shall iudge thereof by the barbarous and brutish cruelties, what is therein the whole world more vnciuill? But alas! behold the image of vnkinde confusions, whereof the fury of our warres hath made vs eye witnesses: for haue we beheld lesse: hauing seene the Crowne set to sale, and our Kings blood shed vpon our Scaffold. But the History requires audience, to report things in their order, as they haue chanced according to the causes and motives.

Charles an enemy to the house of Bourgogne.

Charles Earle of Poitiers had married the daughter of Lewis of Anjou, King of Sicily, a capitall enemy to the Bourgignon. So this young Prince bred vp from his youth in hatred against the house of Bourgogne, must be the instrument to ruine him and his whole race. He loued his pleasure much, and sometimes he gaue himselfe vncare with too great a scope: yet he could employ himselfe well to serious affaires, and force his spirit in necessity; firme in his resolutions, and immouable in his designs, wherein he happily ended his daies, restoring the Realme strangely shaken by the errors and losses of his predecessors.

In this beginning of his new authority, he was faithfully (though not profitably) assisted by the Constable of Armagnac, one of the chiefe pillars of the Orlean party, & almost alone, since the imprisonment of the Duke of Orleans & the death of the Duke of Berry, the King continuing in his infirmity, sometimes better, sometimes worse, but alwayes weake both of body and minde.

The Bourgig-
nons practises.

The Bourgignon had his troupes together, to the great spoyle of the countrey, who complained still without any redresse. This Prince being resolute in his course seeks all occasions of new garboiles, his hatred encreaseth daily against the contrary faction, seeing them advanced in credit, being out of hope to haue any interest in this new Daulphin, who was wholly possessed by Armagnac, an old foxe and an unconciliable enemy.

He hath practises in Amiens, Abbeville, Peronne and all other good townes of Picardy: who by reason of neigbourhood are easily drawne to his party, making goodly protestations to maintaine them in peace and liberty vnder the Kings obedience. He writes likewise to all the good townes of the Realme, complaining of the death of John Duke of Touraine a Prince whom he assured to be wholly given to the good of the State: and for this cause had bin poysoned by the enemies of the publike quiet.

But

A But his trauent was, to make such odious as were in credit about the King, person, although he named them not in his letters. but in noting them, he made a subtil and dangerous warre against them, encouraged by his forces and periuasion: who entering the Citties freely, and causing his letters to be publike'y read, he moued their hearts by the feeling of former confusions, the blame whereof the Bourgignon laied vpon his enemies.

B The King, (that is to say) his Councell, being incountred both by writings & force, should like wile oppose armes and writings against the Bourgignon: but he sends the Lord of Caux to treat with the Bourgignon: which negotiation was fruitlesse, both for that the person sent vnto him was odious, as also by reason of his charge which was not pleasing vnto him. He had an intent to put Caux to death, but the respect of his master withheld him, making answer to all his instructions, specified at large in the original of this historie. But what auails it to repeat many vaine words without any effect? In briefe, these are but accusations and excuses, plaints, and counterplaints. All protest to be the Kings seruants, and all ruine the King, in troubling his realme. What plane. Commentarie can we desire of these factions, then what we haue heard and seene in our time? The Bourgignon made a more dangerous warre then with Papers; he had secret practises within the Citties, to winne the inhabitants. He also drew the English to armes, and armed himselfe, ioyning their forces together, but with diuers intentions, yet their generall desseigne was to afflict France: fishing in a troubled water, making their profit of our confusions, and building their affaires vpon the ruine of the realme.

C The Daulphin Charles playes an other part, he had scarce knowne the Count, when as he was forced to go into Anjou, to the funeralles of Lewis Duke of Anjou King of Sicily his father in lawe, and to assure the Duchie, being in some danger, by reason of the neigbourhood of the Duke of Brittain, a doubtful friend in the incertitude of those confused times. Being arriued, beheld a charge of difficultie for the first suites of his new authoritie. The people were mutined at Rouen, they had slaine the Count, the Aduocate and the Kings Proctor, and besieged the Castell: and to multiply the afflictions, the Bourgignon is in field, and besiegeth St. Florentin. The Kings armie is not dismissed, but dispersed into diuers parts, according to the necessity of his affaires. The Daulphin hauing need of the greatest part for Rouen, read the letter to the besieged. but the succours being weake and slacke, St. Florentin yielded to the Duke of Bourgogne. This hard beginning might haue bene prejudiciall to his affaires at Rouen: but they succeed better; for the chiefe of the citie mette with the Daulphin, and excuse themselves of this tumult, imputing it to the people over-charged: they beseech him to pardon this fault, and to receiue their voluntarie obedience. Thus he is honourable receiued into the Citie, already pacified, and settled all things with mildaesse.

A mutinie at Rouen.

E But there are other newes of harder digestion; for the Bourgignon marcheth to Paris with a great power, and the English takes port in Normandie with a thousand faile. There were reasons on either side to ballance these great difficulties, and to trouble the Daulphin, for whether shall he go first? if he march to Paris, the English will come without resistance. If he make head against the English, then Paris is lost, being wisely inclined to the Bourgignons practises: who sees not but the losse of the capitall citie of the realme would be his ruine, and the overthrow of all his desseignes? But Charles did not foresee a greater difficultie at hand by his mother, more warlike and dangerous then all the rest: yet must he auoide all these three stormes, not without great danger. That the providence of God, (the preseruer of this Monarchie) might then it selfe more admirable, restoring this estate, being in the vtterly lost. For Charles who in so sharpe an encounter reaped so worthy a victory, owes the homage vnto God, who gaue him meanes both to fight well, and to vanquish happily. The Daulphin standing doubtfull betwixt these two great extreames, resolves to go to Paris to defend the Citie against the Bourgignons practises, and to assure the Kings person, whom 14 17 he knew would speake whatsoeuer he pleased, being in his power. Henry of Mark A Chancellor of France, remained at Paris with the King, being wholly at the Daulphins deuotion. The people stirre not, being kept in awe by the Parliament and Vniuersitie, who werethen well vnitied. But experience will soone discouer the inconstancie of humane attempts, when they seeme most assured: and the vanitie of a multitude, being the actors of great mens proiects.

The Bourguignon makes a declaration.

The Bourguignon at one instant, doth publish his protestation, and displaies his colours, causing his troups to marche. He makes a declaration, containing the causes for the which he takes armes, That is; To reforme the state, extreemly desolate, by the ill gouernment of such as (abusing the Kings infirmity) managed the affaires of the realme at their pleasure, and without pittie of the poore people, oppressed them with extraordinarie charges, B against all right and reason. He protested to haue no other intent, but to restore the realme to her former libertie. But he shall change his coppie, imposing new exactions, to the preiudice of the people: and shall grow offended with such as shall oppose themselves: so as it seemes, all this was but a maske to abuse the people, vnder the goodly shew of ease and libertie. But as at the first all seemes goodly, so these glorious beginnings wonne him great credit with the French nation. Thus his armie begins to marche through Picardie towards Paris. All Citties open their gates, where he doth presently proclaime an exemption of all Subsidies and other charges, except of Salt, as the gentlest imposition, seeing that all men without distinction payed their part. But above all, he was very carefull, that his armie should lue orderly and modestly, without any oppression to the poore people, being his ordinarie discourte, as one greatly grieved for their afflictions, and being very desirous of their quiet and content.

These examples proclaimed his vertues, and wonne him the peoples hearts. Other Citties in Picardie follow this example: Beauuais yeelds willingly vnto him, and shoute out for ioy at his entrie: he goes presently to Senlis, kept by Robert Densné for the Armagnacs. The Cittizens (desirous to imitate the rest) seize vpon their gouernour, open their gates willingly, call in the Bourguignon, and receiue him with all ioy. From thence he marcheth speedily to Beaumont, the which hauing indured some Canon shotte, (being subiect to the house of Bourbon,) yeelds vpon an easie composition. Ponthoife and Melun obey without any dispute. So by degrees he comes before Paris, and to shew his armie to the Parisians, he lodgeth at Mont-rouge, but to approach nearer, he incampes lower, in a place called The withered Tree, vnto this day; by reason there stood a great dried Tree. A presage what should after befall his greene and flourishing desseignes. Being there, he writes his letters to the King and Cittie of Paris, full of cunning admonitions, beseeching the one, and exhorting the other, to hearken seriously to a good reformation of the State, the true and soueraigne end of his armes.

In the meane time hee looseth not an houre. John of Luxembourg (during this his necessarie abroad at Paris) goes with a part of the armie, to trie the voluntarie Citties, and every day made new conquests. Chartres, Estampes, Gaillardon, Montlehery, Auneau and Rocheport obey, and after some dayes of rest (to annoy Paris) he besiegeth Corbeil, a place of importance for the victualing thereof. But whilst he pressed Corbeil with exceeding hast, behold he sodenly abandons it against the opinion of all men.

The Daulphin and the Constable of Armagnac supposed, that seeing that he had lost his labour at Paris, hee would seeke to possesse himselfe of places of easier conquest, according to his course begun. But the effect will shew, that his rising was to an other intent, which bred a horrible combustion throughout the whole realme. for Isibell Queene of France, (discontented with her sonne Charles) intreates the Duke of Bourgonie to free her from captiuitie. She was then at Tours, with some guard, by the Kings commandement, for the which she blamed her sonne, and the Constable, who then had the gouernment of the Court. They kept not so strict a garde of

A of the Queene, but she had libertie to walke both within and without the City, euen to the Abbie of Marmouster, where she had her speciall deuotion. This was a meanes to giue intelligence vnto the Bourguignon, and to slip into his hands, as we shall shewe. Reason requires, the history should set downe the motive of so vnnatural a discontent: but she is silent, and reports onely a very light occasion, That the King coming from the King of the Queens, who held her state at Pois-de-Vincennes, and returning to Paris, hee met Lewis Bourguignon Knight, going to Bois-de-Vincennes, who coming nere to the King, bowed himselfe on horse-backe, and so passed on lightly, without any other reuerence. The King sends presently his Prouost of Paris after him, commanding him to apprehend him, and to keepe him safely. The Prouost executing his charge, tooke the said Knight and brought him to Chastelet where by the Kings command, he was cruelly tortured, and downed in the riuer of Seine: and some fewe dayes after, by the commandement of the King, the Daulphin, and such as then gouerned at Paris, the Queene (accompanied with her Sister in Lawe the Duchesse of Buierre) was sent to Blois, and so to Tours, to remaine there in meane estate. William Lorel, John Picard and Lawrence Dupuis, were appointed for hergard, without whose consent shee durst not attempt any thing, no not to write a letter. These bee the wordes of the Original.

The King
discouers of the

The Queene
sent with a gard to Tours.

This her imprisonment, was aggrauated by a newe rigour. All the treasure which she had in Churches, or priuate houses within Paris, was seized on by the Constable of Armagnac, a free executioner of these proceedings. This shewes a notable dislike betwixt the husband and the wife, and the mother and sonne: but the cause is not specified. If it be lawfull to serch into this secret, shall we say, that Queene Isabel mother to our Daulphin, louing the one better then the other (as the variety of the mothers affection to her children is too common) had strained all her credit to countenance John, after the death of Lewis, being thus ingaged with the Bourguignon, whome she did hate deadly, by reason of the imprisonment of her brother Lewis of Buierre: but as she had first loued, and after hated him: might she not in like sort receiue him againe into fauour, as the diuersitie of her passions did moue her by newe occasions, to loue or hate the same man?

The Emperours Sigismonds proceeding, made it very suspicious, becing the greatest instrument of the allyance betwixt John and the Bourguignon. And, to what ende did the Bourguignon go to him into Sauoie after all this? It is likewise to be considered, that the sodaine death of John increased this womans furie against her sonne Charles, holding it for certaine, that by the Constables counsell hee had caused him to bee poysoned. Ambition and choller are furious beasts, not to be restrained by respect, especially in a woman, in whome hatred and reuenge make deepe impressions. Jealousie might likewise be a violent counsellor vnto Charles. As if Charles (animated by the Constable of Armagnac, fearing least his mother had some great practise with the Bourguignon and his associats) had incensed the King against her, hauing moued him with some other pretext. But in effect it was wholly to restraine this womans power, depriuing her both of libertie and treasure. But the euent will shewe, that she was not alwaies busied at her distaffe, or in her deuotion. The search of the motives is necessarie in a History, especially in famous actions, but the doubtfull coniectures are free to euery mans iudgement. This is all the certaintie of this action.

The Bourguignon becing called by Isabel, leaues the siege of Corbeil, lodgeth his footemen in the Townes of Beauisse, that were most fauorable vnto him: and with his horse (which were about ten thousand) hee goes into Touraine; when as behold The Bourguignon comes with the Queene,
(the Queene, becing one morning at her deuotion in the Abbie of Marmouster, according to her custome,) hee arriues with his horsemen at an hower appointed. He meetes the Queene, receiues her and enters the Cittie with her, without any difficultie, hauing first cunningly seized vpon the gats. Being entred, he proclaimes an exemption of charges in the Queenes name, and (being accompanied by the people) hee presents himselfe before the Castel, which opens vnto the Queene, being exceeding glad,

1418. to see her selfe at liberty and to command freely. She referres her self wholly vnto the Bourguignons will; who likewise seekes to vie her name to make his desheine more plausible. Having therefore assured Tours, they march to Chartres, a more conuenient Towne for their affaires, lying so neere vnto Paris. Being there, & hauing assembled all the clergie, Nobility, three estates and such Citties as they could of their faction, the cause of Philip of Morueliers to make knowne vnto them, That by reason of the ill gouernement of the Realme, through the great weaknesse of the king her husband, and according to the degree whereunto God had raised her, being Queene of France, she desired infinitely to reforme it. And the rather for that Charles her sonne (corrupted by the ill counsell of the enemies of the state) shewed her not the dutie of a child, to her great griefe. So as to provide good and wholesome remedies for the preservation of the state, and for the seruice of the king her husband, by the good aduice of her cousin the Duke of Bourgoigne a Prince of the bloud she declares her selfe Regent of France. The which was pleasing vnto them all, with this title: Isabell by the grace of God, Queene of France, hauing by reason of the king my Lords infirmity the gouernement and administration of the Realme, by an irrevocable graunt, made vnto us by our said Lord and his counsell. And for confirmation of this new authority she caused a seale to bee made, whereon was grauen her image, standing right vp, with her armes hanging downe to the earth, as one without comfort and requiring helpe: on the one side were the armes of France, and on the other that of France, and Bauiere quartered, with these words. This is the seale of Causes, Soueraineties and Appellations for the King.

The Queene declares her selfe Regent of France.

There were two Soueraigne Courts of Iustice erected, one at Amiens, and the other at Troye in Champaigne, with expresse charge not to go to Paris. The office of Constable was giuen to the Duke of Lorraine, by the deprivation of the Earle of Armagnac, and the Chancellourship of France to Eustache of Bastre, by the giuing ouer of Henry of Marle.

New Courts erected & new officers made.

As these things began to kindle a new fire of miseries, there were certaine Bishops which laboured to reconcile the Queene and Daulphin. The Bourguignon accepts of the motion: but the Constable of Armagnac breakes off the treaty. An article which shall make him more odious with the people. The Bourguignon hauing retired his armye and put his men into garrison, goes into Sauoy, where at that time the Emperour Sigismund was, (who erected the Earldome of Sauoy into a Duchye) and there did confere with him at Monmellain. This was not without some great desheine.

In his absence Philip of Bourgoigne his sonne held a Parliament, to resolute vpon the meanes to make warre with more aduantage. Thus the Bourguignon wrought for his part. The Daulphin seeing the fields freed and without any enemy; thinks good that the Constable of Armagnac should besiege Senlis, and the better to countenance his armes, the King himselfe goes with the armye. The Towne being pressed, they take a day to yeeld, if by the 17. of Aprill they be not releued. John of Luxembourg (whome the Bourguignon had left in Picardy, for the surety of those places) gathered together what troupes hee can and comes at the day prefixed: at which time the townsmen made a great sally vpon the Kings Campe, fying their tents and pauillions. The Constable (moued with this affront) cuts of the heads of some of their hostages, and they kill six and forty of his men that were prisoners. In the meane time John of Luxembourg approacheth towards Creill, meaning to fight with the Constable, vrging him by sundry skirmishes, hauing sent Charles Dailly towards Dampmartin with a good troupe to stoppe the passage.

The siege of Senlis.

The Constable retires with dishonour.

The Constable (fearing the event of a battaile, being loth to hazard the King) would not ioyne, but desirous to finde some honest colour to auoide the fight, hee sends a trumpet to know who commanded these troupes. And vnderstanding it was John of Luxembourg, hee answered in a brauery. Seeing it is neither the Duke of Bourgoigne, nor his sonne, they are not for vs, let vs go to Paris. So he retires without

A without fighting whether the cheete of his affaires drew him, not fore seeing the mischeete which attended him, by reason of this retreat being to preiudiciall to his honor: for the Parisians who hated him, and yet feared him for the reputation of his valour, beganne now to contemne him, nothing in this retreat a kinde of couardise, as hauing refused to encounter John of Luxembourg, who had so brauely offered him the battaile. The brute of this shamefull departure was published by the Bourguignon faction to their masters aduantage. They embrace this occasiō being loth the peoples heat should growe cold by any better successe, obseruing likewise that the King, Daulphin, Constable, Chancellor, and all the cheete of that partie were at Paris, to be all surprised together. The Duke of Bourgoigne was vpon his returne from Sauois, but he departed not with out good instructions from the Empire.

Division of the multitude at Paris.

But leauing the Bourguignons army in field, let vs note the estate of that great City of Paris Perrinet Cleric a smith; John Thiebert a brother Perrin Bourdichon a Cooper (such were they whome the Bourguignon had made his Colenells at Paris hauing practised all their friends with great secrecie and engaged many; they aduertise the Seignor of Lisle Adam (who was gouernour of Ponthoise for the Bourguignon of their enterprife; the which was to deliuer him a gate, and a good troupe of the Inhabitants within the hart of the Cittie, so as they might haue soldiars to second there attempt. Lisle Adam accepteth thereof, and the euent was answerable to the desheine: for these vnder-takers assigne him *Saint Germain*s gate: Perrinet hath the Keyes. Lisle Adam presents himselfe at midnight, being the houre appointed, with eight hundred armed men. He finds the gate open, and Berrinet attending him. Then he putts his men in battaile, least he should be taken in disorder, Perrinet shuts the gate and casts the Keyes into the ditch: and then without any noise he marcheth with this troupe to the lesser Chastelet, where he had left a Squadron of fower hundred men vnder the great vault, to lie more couerlie.

The Burguignons partisans

Lisle Adam hauing wined his troupe with the Cittizēns, (so as the one might assist the other) he sends forth diuers troupes to giue the alarm in diuers quarters of the Cittie, with charge to moue the people to armes. Euery troupe marcheth speedely to his quarter, as he is commanded, crying out with a terrible voice in the dead of the night Rise good people, peace, peace, God saue the King and the good Duke of Bourgoigne. At this noise all rise, some to hide themselves, others to arme: so as in short time a great multitude (being armed) wander vp and downe the streets ready to fight. Their Capitaines appoint them what houses of the Armagnacs they should force. The first troupe must seaze vpon the King but before all was ready, the alarm was generall. Such as had most interest are soonest vp. Tanneuy of Chastelet, Prouest of Paris a very trustie seruuant to the Daulphin wrapps him in a sheet and carries him into the Battaille. A good Leuiane which shall one day raise the dow, and the hand of him that kneds it. Some others also retired themselves thither, which shall serue in this Scene. John Louet, Robert Masson, the Vicont of Narbonne & Bouci-quaut. The Constable Armagnac in a disguised weed saues himselfe in a neighbours house.

Sedition at Paris.

The King taken.

The Daulphin takes himselfe.

But all this troupe flies to the Kings lodging at Saint Pol. These tribunes cause this poore sicke Prince to rise with out any respect: they force him to promise what they please, and to ride through the City, crying: God saue the King, and peace, thinking by his presence to increase their troupe, and to countenance their confusion.

This done euery troupe seekes his quarter: and manie are taken. The chancellor of Marle is surprised in his lodging and Raimonet De la Guerre, whome were good supporters of the Armagnac faction, many presidents, Councillors and masters of the Accowmpts were taken, with out any respect of persons. The Cardinals of Bar and Saint Marc, the Archebishop of Rheims, the Bishops of Senlis, Bayeux & Constance were carried away and imprisoned, all the prisons are filled with honorable persons. But what is become of the Daulphin and Constable? they serch, they hunt in all places:

The Chancellor taken.

1418 yet finding nothing, they commande, by sound of trumpet, that every man should presently upon paine of death, discover the Armagnacs. The Daulphin was safe, but the Constable (discovered by his host) is taken, carried away by one of these Tribunes and imprisoned, hee was in danger as he past through the streets, riding behind him that had him in gard.

The Constable taken. Thus was the night spent untill day, yet without any murder, and it seemes this was by commandement. This happened in the yeare 1418. the 25. of May, a pleasant day, the forerunner of a mournfull winter. The Daulphin having escaped this danger miraculously, by the good aduice of Tannequy of Chastell, he resolues to do his best in retrying himselfe else where, and not to hazard his person with this furious and murderous people. By the faithfull meanes of this good seruant, he goes forth secretly in the night, and slips into Melun, leaping from place to place like a bird that flies from bough to bough. From Melun he goes to Nemours, whether hee sends for his most trustie seruants, of whose helpes he had neuer greater neede. The Marshall of Rieux comes vnto him with many of the Nobility: they consult of the meanes to recover Paris, before it be supplied with soldiars.

The Daulphin seeketh to recover Paris. So they gather together fifteene hundred horse with all speed. The Marshall of Rieux hath the charge to leade them: while the Daulphin preleues the fortune of France in safetie. A dangerous enterprize, which had no successe, but the honor to haue attempted a thing altogether impossible, the which was executed with much lesse losse then the danger was great. The Bistelle held Saint Anthonies gate sure, for the Daulphin. The Marshall of Rieux enters it with his troupes, and marcheth boldly to the Kings lodging, but hee finds it empty, the King beinge retyred to the Louure. The alarum is giuen throughout the whole Cittie: they must thinke of their retreat. Stones, tyles, arrowes and all things else flie from the houses and windowes: the chaines are drawne, and the streets full of armed men: all crie, kill, kill the Armagnacs. The Marshall of Rieux leads his men happily in this retreat, and fearing Saint Anthonies gate, he drawes them forth so closely, as he escapes this great and imminent danger with little losse.

Many townes mutine. This alarum had put the people into armes, who hauing chased their enemies out of the heart of their Cittie, were quiet for that time, expecting some further commaund from the Bourguignon, and an ende of this terrible tumult, whilest they take breath: others are drawne into the like mutine by their example. All the Townes of Picardie, fauoring the Bourguignon greatly, make bonfiers. Compienne, Creil, Saint Maxence, Monchy le Preux, Pont a Choisi, Noion, Laon, Soissons, Chauny, Peronne and Cisors (expelling their garrisons) declare themselves of his partie. Some dayes are spent thus quietly, since the first taking of prisoners.

But behold a newe tumult like vnto a violent winde, which chanced the twelfth of Iune. In the morning all the people arme by the commaunde of the Leaders. This furious multitude go forth off their houses: (like a swarme of bees creeping from their combs) armed with all sorts of weapons. In short time there are fortie thousand men assembled in the streetes and market places. Iohn of Luxembourg, James of Harcourt, the Vidame of Amiens, Lisle-Adam, Fosseaux, Chastellus, Cohen, Lambourg the newe Prouost of Paris, (with many others most trustie seruants to the Bourguignon) are on horse-back in troupes, to second this multitude on foote, readie to fight as in a day of battaile: when as about foure of the clock (like as when the heauens darkened with thick clouds, and the ayre ouercast, the thunder rumbling in the ayre, sodenly when the lightning appeeres, the crake breakes forth and tears a Towers toppe,) this furious multitude, flocking from all parts of the Cittie with a sylent stillnesse, buie forth into diuers parts. They open the prisons and kill such as they meete without any pittie.

They murder Iaylors, their wiues and children, men and maides, but especially the poore prysoners are their obiect. In this tumult, all crie all howle, all are amazed. The confused cries of the murderers and murdered rebound vp to heauen. The Constable

A Constable of Armagnac, and Henry of Marle (being brought forth with shouts and reproches) are beaten downe and layed by for the triumph. The Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Evreux, Senlis, Saintes, and the Abbot of Saint Cornille go the same way. The Earle of Gandré, Raymond de la Guerre, Hector of Chartres, Enguerand of Marcon, ss. Charles Poupard: the officers of the Court of Parliament, Chambers of Accompt, Requests, & Treasure: to conclude, all that are of any account are massacred. The blood streames through the Cittie, the streetes, and walles ouerflowe. The noted Armagnacs are thus murdered: but the furie of this madde multitude extends farther, euen against such as had bene with them, and of their owne faction: for many affectionate Bourguignons were beaten downe: every man seekes his enemy to kill him vnder this pretext. The rascals fall vpon the rich, and killing them as Armagnacs, they spoyle their houses, as a lawfull prey of their conquest. The eye of this furious multitude spares neyther sexe, age nor quality. The Duke of Bourgonnes followers are lookers on of this spectacle, and watch that none escape.

The historie makes mention of sixteene hundred cruelly murdered on this miserable day, noted to the dishonour of these detestable murderers, and to the griefe of France, to see her owne bowelles thus defiled with her blood, and her memorie blemished with this crueltie. This furie continued from fower of the clocke on the twelfth day, untill ten the next day, nothing ceassing for the nights rest. These madde men (hauing refreshed them selues) seeke out the rest to finish their most cruell worke.

The prisoners of the great Castelet made resistance against their furie: they are be-seged, forced and massacred: the greatest part are cast from the toppe of the Tower, and fall vpon their pikes, halberds and other weapons. The bodies of the Constable & Chancellor, lying naked vpon the stones, are carried to the marble table in the Pallace hall. To noate the Constable by his accustomed scarfe, they fice a bend of his kinne and doe it about his bodie. This spectacle is drawne about the Cittie three dayes together, and then carried out in a dung-cart, to a place where they cast all their carrion and fish called the dunghil, without any buriall.

The Bourguignon was at Dion during this tumult at Paris, who was presently aduertised thereof. This Historie sayes, that he semed very glad of the taking of the Cittie, but very sorie for the murder of the prisoners: but God who kept a true register, shall one day put him in minde thereof. And in truth, he that shall duely consider all the circumstances of this confusion, cannot imagin, but it was done by his commaunde.

He gathers all the forces hee can together, to gard the Queene to Paris, as it were in triumph. The Parisians meete him with great pompe: they offer him their most affectionate seruice, and present the Duke of Bourgonne and the Earle of Saint Pol his Brother with purple velvet gownes, pouldred with Saint Andrews crosses, the which at their requests they presently put on, and so (drawing neere the Queenes coach) they enter the Cittie of Paris, the people attending at their entrie, and crying: God save the King and the good Duke of Bourgonne, the Coach being covered with flowers which they cast vpon it. And this was the Queenes and the Duke of Bourgonnes entrie after the massacre.

But this Parisienoy was soone turned into heauinesse, for within three monethes after this butchery, the plague entred the Cittie, and slewe about foure score thousand persons in three monethes. The Historie obserues, that Ferrinet and his companions, (after they had eaten what they had gathered in together by spoile) perished miserably, little enioying their thefts. Most of the Noble men and gentlemen which had assisted these murderers died of the plague, except Lisle-Adam, who was refused to receiue his punishment from King Henry of England, although vpon an other occasion as you shall see here after. And was not this God who reuenged this crueltie? But let vs returne to our discourse, for seeing the punishment was so sodaine, we might not well remit the rehearsal to any other place.

Charles looks but coldly vpon his wife, whom he loved not, neither in health, or a sicknesse. Hee welcomes the Duke of Bourgonne with a cheerefull countenance, who had wonne his heart, by framing himselfe to his weakenesse with mild speeches, shewes of honour and apparant humility. Impressions of common sense, whereof phrensie for the most part doth not deprive mad men.

The Bourguignon alters all at Paris.

The Kings counsell assembled presently: many things were propounded the first day, they began with Officers; the Constables place was confirmed to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Chancellors hip to Eustache of Laistre. Lisle, Adam and Chastelus are made Marshalls of France, for their well deferring at the massaker at Paris. Our Bourguignon creates Charles of Lens Admirall of France, being Captaine of Paris, and Phillip of Moruilliers the Queenes Aduocate, first President of the Court of Parliament.

The English take all Normandie.

During this confusion, Henry King of England makes other worke. He was in Normandy, taking Townes and Castles without any resistance. Touques (a Castell held impregnable) was forced by him, during the passions of our mad-men, as the first fruites of his conquests, Louiers, Pont larche, Caen, Cherbourg, Falaise, Argenton, Alexon, Constance, S. Lo, and other places followed, to make the way open to Rouen without any great difficulty.

Rouen besieged & taken.

Rouen is besieged in a manner the very day of the massaker at Paris. Henry doth assault it with all the force and policie he can, as the Dungeon and chiefe strength of all Normandy. The citizens give a testimony of good and faithfull subjects, by their valour and constancie. They demand succours from the King, with a protestation of the euent. The Court makes shew to stirre and to provide for their defence: but what remedy can the dead give vnto the sick? In the ende after all their resistance seeking to maintaine themselves vnder the obedience of France, Rouen yeelds to Henry King of England vpon hard conditions. To paye him three hundred sixty thousand Crownes of gold, and three Citizens at his choise to doe his pleasure. And so he suffered them to enjoy their priuileges. Of the three which he had chosen to punish, he pardoned two, and caused Alaine lanchart, Captaine of the commons to bee beheaded, worthy to be eternized in our history, dying for the seruice of his King and countrye, in a time so famous for so desperate a confusion. The sequels were great, for not onely all the Townes of Normandy yeeld vnto him, but also the Isle of France was so amazed, as all obey him euen to the gates of Paris, where the fure of our miserable dissensions prepared a Throne for the sworne enemye of our Realme.

All yeelds vnto King Henry.

I am weary to report our shamefull losses, as retaining our old soares. Henry might haue grauen in his triumph. Isame, Isane and ouersame, onely Mont S. Michel in Normandy was maintained vnder the obedience of our crowne, through the valour of some Gentlemen Normans, whose names the last ny owes to posterity. John of Montfort Duke of Britanie (seeing this happie successe,) makes composition with the English, throweing him selfe vnder his protection, but he shall soone leave him, when a more happie season shall make him turne to the Daulphin. In this shipwrecke the Queene and the Bourguignon had meane to glut their ambition and furie at Paris, beholinge the ruine of France, hoping that in all extremities they should make their peace with the King of England at their Countries cost, hauing a daughter for a peace and confirmation of this accord.

The Bourguignon treats with the English but in vaine.

They send Ambassadors to Henry King of England being a Conquerour, and for a baite they carry the portrait of Katherine of France, the Kings daughter, a Princesse of excellent beauty, who must likewise bee the Leuit of our miserie. But Henry finding this figure to be faire, desires to see the essentiall substance, so as the Queene and the Bourguignon (gouerning the spirit of this poore sick King) conducts him a person with his daughter, to their enemy neere to Meulan, to aduise of a meane for a generall peace; but they departed without any conclusion, by reason of the great demands

A demands which Henry made, putt vp with this victorious successe, seeking to sell his friendship at too high a rate. Yet the image of Katherine had made an impression in his heart, being much discontented that they had refused her with these conditions.

The Bourguignon likewise found lesse kindnesse then he expected, and returned malecontent, for that Henry putt vp with these fortunate encounters, and carried away with hope of future victorie, spake more proudly then the Bourguignon could well digest, which was the cause of his destemperature. He growes discontented and seeks to reconcile himselfe to the Daulphin. Henry said in his choler, That he would haue both daughter and Realme, whosoever said nay, and that there was no sufficient security for what they promised, seeing the Daulphin did not consent therunto. A pill which the Bourguignon could not easily swallow. So he chewed vpon this speech of the English, which drew him to his mine, for euen then he beganne to study by what meanes he might reconcile himselfe vnto the Daulphin, hoping to finde a better composition with a yong Prince his kinsman, and weary of the warres, then with the English growne insolent by his victories. Charles was not quiet in minde, fearing least in these treaties, they should conclude something to his preiudice. So as they both inclined to an accord, but vpon diuers causes, to oppose against their common enemye with a common force. But before we shewe the effect of this common desire, we must see both the estate of our Daulphin (since hee retired himselfe from Paris) and of the Bourguignon, since hee became Tribune of the people.

Although this terrible storme might haue shaken the young yeares of the Daulphin, Charles, vnacquainted with the affaires of the world, and his disposition (inclining to pleasure) seemed vnfit to indure much paine and toyle: yet the effects at need shewed his constant resolution against all difficulties. They attribute this constancie and resolution to the faithfull counsell of his seruants: yet was it much for him to follow it. Tanneguy of Chastell, John Louuet president of Prouence; the Vicont of Narbonne, and Robert Masson, were those which serued him most for Councell in the beginning; but God soone after did raise him vp strong hands to mannage armes courageously and valiantly, La Hire, Pothon of S. Treille (whom commonly they call intrailles), D the Bastard of Orleans, with other braue and fortunate Captaines which shal be famous in the course of our History.

The Daulphin estate.

But the Realme was fitly diuided into these factions. The Kings authoritye and the Capitall City were for the Queene and the Bourguignon. Picardy, Bourgonne and many Townes in Bry, Champagne and Beauisse obey them absolutely after these massacres. Only Sens in Bourgonne held out, the which they could not pull from the Daulphin.

The Bourguignon estate.

The Prince of Orange (of the Bourguignon faction) makes warre for him in Daulphine and Languedoc, to crosse the affaires of our Charles, who notwithstanding had the greatest part of the country at his deuotion, with the friendship of Auignon, and of the Earledom of Venaisioin or of Venese. The English possessed all Normandy, and a great part of Guicenne, but Rochell, Poitiers, S. John d'Angey, Angoulesme, Fontenay and some other Townes acknowledged the Daulphin. All Aniou was his, Anuergne, Berry, Bourbonois, Forreest, and Lionois obeyed him. So as they are deceiued which thinke that he onely held the city of Bouges in those dayes: vnder colour that his enemies called him King of Bouges, because he made his chiefe residence there, when as his mother called her selfe Regent. He likewise tooke vpon him the name of Regent. A name which fortified his title with great authority, and did countenance his affaires in those difficulties and confusions.

The Queene and the Bourguignon seeks vnto the Daulphin.

The Queene and the Bourguignon laboured by all meanes to winne him: they sent him his wife honourable attended, with all her iewells, promising him his place with respect and obedience, but theyr meaning was to bee ridde of him, not able to know how to conforme him to their humours. In keeping himselfe faire from them, hee preferred his head for the Crowne; the which attended him, 412 him: he preuented the ambitious desseines of his enimie, and made himselfe to bee a more respected throughout the Realme.

At these horrible massacres, his Captaines roused vp their spirits. Bocquiaux seized of Compiene, Pierre-Fons vpon Soissons for him, who (molesting Pitardy and the Lie of France with their dayly roads) held Paris in ieaiousie. He himselfe had part of the honour in the execution of these conquests, not leauing all to his seruants: for hee leaped out of Anion into Touraine, besieged and took the City of Tours. The Duke of Brittaine seeing the happy successe of the Daulphins affaires, leaues the English, and ioynes with the Daulphin, as the strongest part.

The Duke of Brittain leaues the English, and ioynes with the Daulphin

Behold the estate of our Daulphin, who growes constant and resolute amidst these tempests. And what was the estate of our Bourguignon? In the beginning his partisans were al fire and flame, for the zeale of his seruice: but finding not what they expected at his hands, nor any successe in his affaires, but rather the discommodities of Paris, and other places vnder his obedience to increase; this heat abated dayly, finding by experience that the cause of these waies was light, beeing but humors and priuate quarrells, very preiudiciall to the State, the which the English did fappe, vndermine and rume, seizing dayly vpon whole Prouinces, without any difficulty.

Thus Henries victories were plaine demonstrations to the most passionate, to discover the Bourguignons dissembling: for, who sees not but his end was to gouerne, to the ruine of France. In the end euery one comming to his right witts, findes that of a Frenchman he is become an Englishman. The folly or fury of a faction could not mortifie the feeling of lawfull obedience, vnder which they were borne. To what end (saies the common sort of these cleere-sighted) shall we vndoe our selues, for the passions of the Duke of Bourgonne, opposing himselfe against the lawfull heire of the Crowne? Thus the Bourguignon sees the affections of his partakers to growe dayly colde. A worme which tormented him hourly, hauing grounded his chiefe hopes vpon their constancies, who promised to stande firmly to him at all euents. Doubtlesse, whatsoeuer the Giants of States haue imagined, setting one hill vpon another, the Pirenees vpon the Alpes, with all the Appanin, to scale the throne of the French Monarchy, promising vnto themselves euents according to the mouldes of their imaginations: yet cannot the French yeeld to any strangers command, no more then to change nature and become a stranger.

The people grow in dislike with the Bourguignons.

But, to increase the Bourguignons heartes griefe, his chiefe instrument not onely failes him, but is ready to turne violently against him. For what hath he not attempted to winne the loue of this multitude at Paris, and of the greatest Citties of the Realme, making them beleue, that he burnt with zeale of their good, and the publicke weale, the onely ende of all his desseines. feeding them with these goodly and popular promises of exemption of charges and impositions? But they begin all to mutine, seeing he spake onething, and did thinke another, and oppressed them more then those whom he had condemned as the causes of publike oppressions: for whatsoeuer he imagined, yet had he neede of money. For howe could hee else make warre? how could he entertaine his great traine? his partisans, and his reputation among Strangers? And where should he raise it, but vpon such as obeyed him: to seeke it at such as could resist, were to mistake, and to make his reckoning alone in vaine.

Moreover, this people (whome he had so much countenanced, making themselves maisters by his power, to become by their meanes maister of his enemies) would be generally obeyed, and why? not of the Bourguignon, seeing hee had opposed himselfe, and prescribed a lawe to a sonne of France? If the Bourguignon doth worse then he hath done, shall not the people reduce him vnto reason? He hath promised exemptions of subsidies, and they are more grievous then before. We haue preuailed (say they) against a Constable, against a Chancelour of France, yea ouer the King & Queene, making them to yeeld her brother, and most

A most trusty seruants, and shall wee not suppress some few galliants, seruants to the Duke of Bourgonne? This was the Parisians ordinary discourse: and their Tribunes (who were not so well entertained as before) begin mutinie. They resolueto seize vpon some of the Bourguignons favorites, and to punish them, who had perswaded him to renew the impositions, contrary to his promise.

These men (the concealing of whose names, notes the basenesse of their qualities,) hauing intelligence of this search, fled into the Basille, and the people followe after as if they would overthrow it. A great multitude begins to vndertake it, & had preuailed, if the Bourguignon had not instantly come much discontented, who seeing himselfe inuironed with so great a troupe of armed men, fearing the losse of his head, hee was forced to deliuer his seruants to the people, who put them all to death, to teach the Bourguignon that they had no lesse authority and power ouer him, then ouer the King and the Daulphin his sonne.

The Parisians mutine against the Bourguignon faction.

They kill the Bourguignons seruants.

This occasion thrusts the people into greater fury, (who being thus armed) choose a head, called Cappeluche Bourrell, to finish their executions vpon some such as might receiue these impositions and publike charges. They march through the cittie, and enter into many houses to robbe and spoile, vnder colour of apprehending of such as had assisted at these innouations. The rich men feared for their own particulars, but the Bourguignon more the all, knowing himself to be the Author of this disorder, hauing thrust the people into armes, for what successe should this disordred liberty haue but to fall vpon the Authors thereof?

Hauing therefore won some of the chiefe Commanders, they choose out a troupe of the most wilfull mutinous, to be fired off them, vnder colour of sending them to the warre against the Daulphinois, which had surprised the Castle of Montlehery, and began to invade euen to the gates of Paris. Yet they retheyned Cappeluche Bourrell, vnder colour of some speciall seruice. But the Bourguignon beeing growne the stronger, with the chiefe of the Cittie, he causeth Bourrell to bee taken, and hanged with some number of his associates. This multitude being at Montlehery, discontented with the Bourguignon, leaues the siege, and returnes to be reuenged, but the gates were shut, and the wailes well garded, so as all passed without any more adoe. But the Bourguignon was much perplexed, beeing troubled in minde to haue put a sword into a mad-mans hand: beeing afraid of an vsure gard, and a foretelling that his Empire should not continue long.

So, the repulse hee receiued from the English, the coldnesse of the Nobilitye of his party, and the peoples change, were the motiues which made him wishe for the Daulphins friendship, who now preuented him, although hee had often refused it. That which moued Charles thereunto, was necessity, and the hope of a greater desseine, finding no better meanes to stoppe the current of the English victory and the Bourguignons treachery, then to ioyne with him, attending some better occasion.

The successe fauoured this counsell of his followers. He sends Tanneguy of Chastel to the Duke of Bourgonne, to make the first proposition, and after him the Lady of Gien (in whome the Bourguignon had great confidence) to appoint a day and place for a parle, and to seeke the meanes of a good peace. They meete at Pouilly the strong, nere vnto Melun, in the open field with their gardes. The Bourguignon talked to the Daulphin on his knee, and held his stirrup, although Charles refused this submission. Proofoes to shewe with what necessity hee sought his friendship: as a man that is beaten with all windes and out of breath. So they conclude an inuiolate peace, and to bandye themselves against the common enemy of France, promises are made on eyther side, with all demonstrations and protestations of a firme and inuiolable friendship. The articles of their accord and contract are set downe at large in the Originall of our Historie.

A peace betwixt Charles the Daulphin and John of Bourgonne.

This peace betwixt Charles the Daulphin, and John Duke of Bourgonne, was made nere to Pouilly the strong, vpon Ponchiell, a league from Melun, in the yeare 1419.

All

All France reioyced, as after a long and sharpe winter, when the sun appeareth in a pleasant spring. The King and all the Parliaments ratified this accord, which euery man held for the gage of firme friendship betwixt these Princes, and their loue for a firme pillar of the Realmes quiet. But the prouidence of the protector of this French monarchie had otherwise decreed.

These reconciliations could not serue for sufficient cautions against his iustice worthily incensed against the Bourguignon, being guilty of horrible crimes, and the willfull abuse of his patience. The counle which Charles held to be rid of his enemy, is not commendable: but in one and the selfe same worke, we must wisely distinguish of that which is of God, & that which is of man, to approue the good which is alwayes iustified in Gods ordinance, and to blame the ill alwayes to be blamed in man: that we may stoppe our mouths and open our eyes, and not to reply against the iust iudgements of God, but vewe the strange and extraordinary punishment of the Bourguignons strange and extraordinary crimes, who during the weakenes of our poore King, hath so much troubled the Realme.

We haue said, (and the course of the history will shewe it very plainly) that the Dauphin Charles suffered himselfe to be gouerned by his seruants. By their aduice hee had made this accord with the Bourguignon, wherein they had eyther of them feuerall respects: although eythers intent was to make his profit with the others losses, in circumuening of his companion. But he that made his accompt to deceiue (hauing not yet changed his minde, although the present necessity made him to change his countenance) was deceiued: and which is more, he which built his greatest desires vpon murder, is murdered, being the onely expedient the Dauphins seruants could deuise to free him from these troubles, in dispatching the Bourguignon once for all.

The resolution was very great, but to perswade this prince thereto, was of greater difficulty. A yong man, iust, wile, moderate & of a very milde disposition, so as they had much adoe to perswade him to so bold and violent a remedy. Why my Lord (say they) can you beleue that the Duke of Bourgogne is any thing amended? although he stou now to necessity, can he bend his heart to reason? Haue you forgotten what he did to your father? He did not kill him and maintained it as well done? braued the King in Paris, armed himselfe against him, and forced him to iustifie this execrable murder? He masked himselfe with a shewe of good meaning to make his accord with your poore Cousins of Orleans, but was it not with an intent to ruine them with the more facility seeking to diuide them from your deceased father? The Duke of Berry, incensing the King and your eldest brother against them, making Edicts against them, as guilty of high treason and pursuing them with cruell force? When as your brother (discouering his wickednesse) had forsaken him, and that he (yeelding to necessity, as he did now) concluded a peace, did he not arme himselfe by a newe deuise, to ruine your bloud, opposing both Paris and the States of the realme, under the name of the common weale, to put to death the best seruants of the King your father, incensing the people against them, becoring the famous executioners of his execrable rage? And when as he found these popular furies not succeed well, hath he not stid to force? yea seeing his great enemy your cousin of Orleans prisoner, and your wife of Berry dead, hath he mortified his cruel desires in these common calamities? He hath rather stirred up the Emperour to trouble the State, laboured to draw your deceased brother into his humor, to kindle newe fires and to consume you in them. You my Lord are he who only trouble him, who only may frustrate his desires, and therefore hee stoues to take away your head, and sit your Crowne vpon his, what hath he not attempted against you? His last actions are worse then the first. There he sought to abuse your brother with your Cousins: here he opposeth your mother against you. There hee did openly fight against the law of state, here he doth openly oppugne the law of nature. There (by his policie) he did nourish enuie betwixt kinsmen, here by his audacious violence he teares in sunder the wombe where in you did lie, to ruine the State. For to what ende doth hee begine the Regency to your mother, (the King your father liuing) and you being borne Regent during his life, and King after his death? To what ende should hee stie to a furious multitude, to decide your controuersie? He hath

The Dauphin proceeding against the Bourguignon not commendable.

Reasons to induce the Dauphin to kill the Bourguignon.

A armed fortie thousand men, in the capitall cittie of your realme; and accompanied them with his men at armes. To what end serued all that, but to make a tragical execution of his cruel paysons: why did he cause that massacre to be made when you were in the cittie and sought for you so carefully, but to vse you as they did your Constable and Chancellor, and as many of your good seruants as fell into their hands? And after all these exploits, the Bourguignon must call the English King into France, to giue him your sister in marriage: nay rather to take your Crowne from you by peace-meales, for seeing he cannot haue it all, he seeks to diuide it. This is the Apple for the which he sowes so much dissention. The Lawe releets him, and he appeales to faith, to shadow himselfe with her cloake, and to deceiue you with more open shew. He therefore kisseth your hand, he kneeles, he holdes your St. rop, to hide his treacherie with a shew of humilitie. Will you beleue (my Lord) that he is in bad termes with the King of England. They are both at one common obiect. They haue sworn both to take away your life: but the Bourguignon may effect that which the English cannot. And that which they cannot weakly open so: ce. they pretend to effect by policie, couering it with this goodly shew of peace. What effects hath he giuen you of this reconciliation? What Towne hath he rendred? nay what man hath he dismissed? Continuing still in armes, he discouers his intent. He meanes to ruine you with his forces being lodged in your bowels. His desseignes being well knowne vnto you my Lord, will you suffer him to preuent you? We ought to watch for you and seeke the meanes to crosse him. It is lawfull to repell craft by policie. Faith is a holy thing, but who can with reason say, if a theefe denies his name to circumuent vs, but that it is lawfull to surprise him with his owne armes? To draw an enemy into a mischief which he had prepared for a good man, is no treacherie, but wisdom, especially when there is question to preserve the state. Are you (my Lord) a priuate person? All this great body (whereof God hath made you the head) stretcheith forth the armes, and craues your aide against this theefe, which hath sworn the ruine. He attends but the houre to dispatch you, and to seize thereon. The safest course is to preuent him: your enemies head shall preserve yours, and all your good and faithfull subjects. My Lord, we protest there is no priuate interest of ours. All is yours, and the publike weales. The faith we haue vowed vnto you, commands vs to deliuer our free aduise. We haue lined, doe liue, and will liue; your faithfull seruants, euen vnto the death. The heart makes the mouth to speake, but our hands shall execute your commandments.

The Dauphin (incouraged by these perswasions of his seruants,) resolves. Wee haue said, that he parted from Tours, to parle with the Bourguignon; but after that accord, he made a voyage into Berry to assure those places, and to leuie men: in shew to ioyne with him, and to oppose against the English with their common forces: but in effect, it was for the murder of his greatest enemy. He had then twentiethousand fighting men with him. With this troupe he comes into Soulogne, approaching neere vnto those places where his men might be best employed. Monstrean-saut-Tonne, (a Towne in Brie, where the ruer of Yonne loseth her name, ioyning with Seine) held for him. From thence he sends Tannegey of Chastell (a very sufficient man of his houshold, and his trustie seruant) to Troyes in Champagne, to the Duke of Bourgogne, desiring him to come vnto him to Monstrean, to reioine vpon the effecting of their accord, and to imploy their common forces against their common enemy, hauing brought them to that end, protesting that he should be much grieved to see them burthen some vnto the people without vse. Moreouer he had some very priuate affaires to impart vnto him, as vnto his best and dearest friend.

Tannegey had no other answer from the Bourguignon, but that it were better for the Dauphin to come to Troyes to the King and Queene, his Father and Mother, to conclude things in their presence, and by their authoritie, the which should be very necessary, to reduce the affaires to some good course. Some dayes are spent in refusing and reintreating. The Bourguignons conscience caused him to feare, and the proceeding was suspicious, but that the apparent dislike betwixt the Mother and the 1419. Sonne, needed the mediation of such a friend as the Bourguignon. This was a goodly pretext, to draw the Duke of Bourgogne to be a mediator of peace, betwixt the Queene and the Daulphin; and the charge of their armies, (being idle,) was not small, the which vrged this interuiewe.

The Lady of Gias (of whom we haue spoken) was employed againe to sollicite this treaty. So as the Bourguignon comes to Bray vpon Seine, whether the Daulphin sent the Bishop of Valence vnto him, he was brother to Charles of Poitiers, Bishop of Langres, in whom he had great confidence. This Bishop had in the ende power to perswade him to go to Monstreun, where the Daulphin attended him.

The Bourguignon goes accompanied with five hundred horse, two hundred Archers, and many noble men, among the which was Charles the eldest Sonne of the Duke of Bourbon, whom the Duke of Bourgogne had corrupted, to weaken the Daulphin's party, being a Prince of the blood. The Daulphin had prepared the Castle for the Bourguignon, but he vnfurnished it of all munition for warre and victuall; and causeth the bridge to be fortified with three turnepikes, to stoppe their free entrance into the Towne, whether the Bourguignon must come by dutie vnto the Daulphin.

This succeeded according to his desire, but it carried the shewe of an enemy. The Bourguignon sends three gentlemen of his household to the Daulphin, Thoulouze, Ernoy and Soubretier, to aduertise him of his coming. They giue him notice of the two barricadoes made vpon the Bridge, and with him not to aduenture. Having referred it to his Counsell, all being on horsebacke, he resolues in the ende to passe on: he lights at the Castle where his lodging was assigned, and fetts his gages at the entry of the gate towards the Towne. Hereupon Tannequy of Chastell comes vnto him, who after a due reuerence saluted him from the Daulphin, saying, that he attended him at the bridge foote, at the towne gate.

Then John of Bourgogne, hauing chosen out ten of his most trusty followers, (Charles of Bourbon, the Lords of Nouaille, Fribourg, S. George, Montagu, Vergy, Auer, Pontauillier, Lens, Gias, and his Secretarie Seguinat) hee approcheth to the first barre, where he incoounters with some from our Charles, who intreat him to enter vpon their maisters word, and assure him by oath. Before he enters, (as if his heart had foretold his harme) he stayes sodainely, and askes aduice of his company, who incouraging him to passe on, he enters the second barre, the which was presently locked, and then he caused some to go before him and some behind, he remaining in the midst. Tannequy of Chastell comes to receiue him, and the Duke laying his hand vpon his shoulder very familiarly. This is he (saies the Duke) in whom I trust. I will conclude this bloody Catastrophe with the very words of the Originall. And so he approached vnto the Daulphin, who stood all armed with his sword by his side, leaning on a barre. Before whom he kneeled with one knee on the ground, to do him honour and reuerence, saluting him most humbly. Whereat the Daulphin answered nothing, making him no shewe of love, but charged him with breach of his promise, for that he had not caused the war to cease, nor draw his men out off garriison, as he had promised. Then Robert de Loire tooke him by the right arm, and said, Rise, you are but too honourable. The Duke hauing one knee on the ground, and his sword about him, which hong not to his minde, somewhat too farre backe, kneeling downe he laid his hand on his sword to pull it forward for his ease. Robert said vnto him, doe you lay your hand vpon your sword before my Lord the Daulphin. At which word Tannequy of Chastell drew nere vnto him on the other side, who making a signe said, It is time, striking the Duke with a little axe so violently on the face, as he cut off his chinne, and so he fell on his knees. The Duke feeling himselfe thus wounded, laid his hand on his sword to draw it, thinking to rise and defend himselfe: but hee was presently charged by Tannequy, and others, and beaten dead to the ground. And sodainely one named Oliuer Laye, with the helpe of Peter Fortier, thrusts a sword into his belly vnder his coate of Maile. Whilest this was doing, the Lord of Nouailles drew his sword halfe out, thinking to defend the Duke: but the Vicomte of Narbonne held a dagger, thinking to strike him.

The Bourguignon comes to the Daulphin.

The Daulphin causeth John of Bourgogne to be slaine.

A hau, Nouailles leaping forceably to the Vicomte, wrested the dagger from him, being so sore hurt in the hinder part of the head as he fel downe dead. Whilest this was doing, the Daulphin (leaning on the barre) beholding this strange sight, rettyred backe as one amazed, and was presently conducted to his lodging by John Louuet, and other his counsellors. All the rest were taken except Montagu, who leaped ouer the turnepike, and gaue the Alarme. There were none there vpon the place, but John Duke of Bourgogne and Nouailles: S. George and d'Auer were hurt. The Dukes men charged home vnto the turnepike, but they were easily repulsed. His troups rettyring to Bray, are pursued by the Daulphin's, with losse, and in the ende the castle is abandoned by him that had it in gaid. The Dukes body (stript off al but his Doublet and Bootes,) is drawne into a Mill, and the next daye buried. This happened the tenth of September, in the year 1419. Behold the ende of John Duke of Bourgogne. Seeing then this murder troubled the Daulphin, who had caused it to be committed, what stonie heart would not be amazed thereat? Truly the breach of faith is vnexcusable, how soeuer it be disguised: for as faith is the ground of humane society, so doth it extend euen vnto enemies, with whom it must be inuiolably kept.

This blowe shall be deere to Charles. Through this hole, the enemy shall enter so farre into the Realme, as he shall put him in danger, and in the ende he shall be forced to confesse his fault, not able to excuse himselfe without accusing of his counsellors. But from vniust man, let vs ascende to the wisdom of that great Iudge of the world, who is alwaies iust. The Oracle cries, He that strikes with the sword, shall perishe with the sword, and, The disloyall to the disloyall. They loued misery, and misery found them out. And, wise antiquity saies, God punisheth great wickednes with great paines, euen in this life. And, Hardly can tyrants descend into the graue with a dry death, that is, without blood or murder. O iustice of God, alwaies iust, alwaies wise and alwaies good. Thy iudgements are righteous O Lord. I condemne the error of men: yet I held my peace, because thou didst it. Draw the curten. John of Bourgogne hath played his part vpon this Theater. He had slaine the Duke of Orleans traitorously: and now he wallowes in his owne goare, being treacherously slaine by the Daulphin Charles. Now let vs see the care his son Philip Earle of Charolois had to be reuenged of Charles for this cruell murder: but all is not yet ended.

The exploits of the Dauphin and of Philip of Bourgoigne after this murder.

After this tragicall and strange murder of John of Bourgoigne, Philip his sonne, Duke of Bourgoigne, by his decease, seekes to be reuenged vpon Charles the Dauphin, and Charles to defend himselfe. Philip was then in Flanders. The Parisens (passionate partisans of the Bourguignon) who had seene the Duke of Orleans murdered without mouing, and they themselues had massacred the chiefe Officers of the Crowne, and had shed the blood of many good men for his pleasure and passion, hauing repayed the blood so treacherously slaine by him in the same coyne, they nowe growe into a greater mutinie then if the King himselfe had bene slaine. They send their deputies to Philip, and promise not onely to bee faithfull, but to assist him with all their meanes, to reuenge the murder committed on the person of his father. And at the same instant, Montagu, being escaped from the Turn-picke, writes to all the Cities vnder the Bourguignons obedience, of this accident, the which he could report as an eye witnesse. Charles on the other side, writes to all the good Cities of the realme, yelding a reason of this murder, and imputing the fault to the Bourguignons bad dealing, who would haue slaine him at a parle, exhorting the people not to mourne for the iust execution of a man borne for the ruine of France, who had willingly thrust himselfe into this mischiefe: offering all his meanes to settle the realme in peace according to the authoritie whereunto God had called him. But in talking, hee seekes counsailes Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Poton of Xaintrilles, winne Crespy in Laonois, and Caradoz of Quesne with Charles of Flauye take Roye, places very important to trouble the Cities of Picardie, where the Bourguignon was chiefly obeyed. The strong Castell of Muin opposite to Crespye and Roye is surprised by the industry of his seruants, & keepes all Vermendois and Laonois in alarume. This beginning caused Philip to seeke al speedie meanes to crosse Charles his proceedings, being resolute to continue what he had begunne: yet the Parisens feared, pressing Philip againe not to abandon the seruants of his house, the which made him more prompt in the execution. Philip being assured of his Flemings, obtaines a suspension of armes from Henry the 5. King of England, and a day and place appointed to treat a general peace betwixt the two realmes. Then marching with his army through Picardie, hee recouers Crespy, Roye and Muin, to the great content of his partisans: and so he arriues at Troyes in Champagne, the appointed place for this treatie.

Isabel Queene of France (a cruell Medea, and an vnaturall mother,) continued her tragike choller against her Son, who hauing defaced the common feeling of nature, did soone forget the honor she had receiued to be married into the house of France. Being thus wedded to the Bourguignons passions, she tormented her poore husbands spirits, being exceeding weake, perswading him, that his best course was to disinherit this wicked son, to declare his daughter heire, and (in marrying her to the greatest King vpon the earth,) to giue her likewise the realme after his decease, & to her issue, as descended from the blood of France. Philip comming to the King, found newe works: for presently Henry the 5. King of England concludes a peace with King Charles the 6. weddes Katherine his daughter, and doth obtayne by letters pattents, That establishing a firme and free peace in both the Realmes of France and England, in regard of

A marriage of Catherine of France, he is declared Regent of the realme during the life of King Charles, to whom the title of King remaines, and to Isabel his wife the title of Queene, during their liues. But presently after the Kings decease, the Crowne & realme of France with all their rights, and dignities should remaine vnto him, whom King Charles the 6. calles by his letters patentes, his most deere and welbeloued sonne, and to his heires in chiefe. They cause this poore like King to sweare vpon the holy Bible, & to promise this for him and his, withall exemptions and necessary clauses in so great and important a businesse. This goodly act (the suite of the furious passions of ciuill warre) was made at Troye, the 27. of may in the yeare 1420.

This done, the French and English forces ioyning, and marching vnder the same colours, acknowledge one Comander, and for their first exploit they win Monstreau faut-Tonne, where they take vp and bury John of Bourgoigne againe, and so marching on as against Rebels, they take Melun, Meaux and Morist, and beseege Compiene. But least matters should growe cold, Henry of England (whome they call Regent) returnes to Troye, and with a goodly traine, conducts the King, Queene, and his newe wife Catherine to Paris, being better followed and serued then the King himselfe. The Parisens toly did wonderfully imbrace the comming of this newe royaltie, promising vnto themselves a newe heauen, but this humor lasted not long, hauing tried the power of foraine Princes, and the commande of their Kings by very contrary effects.

The Regent held a Councell presently in great state, in the Pallace of Saint Pol, being the Kings lodging. Two thrones were erected for the two Kings, and a seate vnderneath for Philip of Bourgoigne. The Kings councell (being fewe in number) is supplied by the Court of Parliament, and the vniuersity. Philip demandes iustice of the murder committed on the person of John of Bourgoigne his father. His Aduocate Edm made this instance. The Kings Aduocate, and the vniuersitie assisted him in the publike. King Charles promiserh iustice against his Sonne the Dauphin, and to deal goodly for King Henry his newe Sonne.

This was the first act of the newe Regencie, against the onely Sonne of his house. And, moreouer they decreed, that hereafter all the treasure should be gouerned by the Regents authoritie and commande. Henry resolues presently to call a Parliament for the necessity of his returne into England, whether he ment to conduct his new Spouse. A Parliament was held, according to this decree, but all were amazed at this sodaine alteration, euen the very report of my Historie hath some fealing thereof, for what canst thou see herein gentle reader, but frozen ice, in the remembrance of these confusions, renewed by the fealing of our owne. Thus the Regent caused Charles Duke of Touraine, and Dauphin of Viennois to be called to the marble table. All solemnities observed, and he not appearing, by a decree of the Councell, and of the Court of Parliament, he was banished the realme, and iudged vnworthy to succede in any of the Seignuries, as well present as to come. The Dauphin appeals from this sentence, To God and his sword, who in the ende doing him iustice, shall blesse his sword, and make it victorious ouer his enemies.

The Parisens (discontented with the violent courses of the newe Regent,) began to abate their joy within fewe dayes after, before Henries returne into England. Philip of Bourgoigne Earle of Saint Pol, Cousin germaine to the Duke of Bourgoigne, was gouernor of Paris, by the appointment of King Charles. Henry displaceth him, and appoints Thomas Duke of Clarence his brother. He sets English gards in all the strong places of the Citie, and displaceth the French and Bourguignons, and yet durst they not mutter. The Lord citizen Adam made Mareschal of France, (for that he had assisted at the taking and massacre of Paris) was as much out of fauour with this new King, as he was pleasing to the Parisens. The Regent sends men to apprehend him, whom (as they led to the Priselle) the people made an offer to rescue, but they were sharply repulst by the English, and well beaten: a iust reward, hauing wished for a strange King: but they shall soone after haue other employments, to teach them to knowe newe bread from olde, which they had so much disdayned. Thus Henry the 5. made the Parisens to knowe

On the other side the Daulphin faints not at the first brunt of this new royaltie, but growing resolute against all stomes, he looeth no opportunity to aduance his at- taires. We haue shewed how that Aniou obeyed him. The new Regent commands the Duke of Clarence his Brother to make warre in those partes. So he enters the Country with his army, as it were to take possession of his owne. He presents him selfe before Angiers the cheefe Cittie of that Prouince, presuming that all would presently obeye him. but the issue did not answer his hopes, for he found all the French resolute to defend themselves against a stranger, & to obey their naturall King. Here vpon the French ioyne together, they arme and go to field. The English being out of hope to take Angiers, turne head against the French army lodged at Little Bauge, which attended resolutely the force of a mighty and victorious enemy. On the other side the imaginarie hope of victorie thrust on the Duke of Clarence against our men, whom he held to be halfe dead, but he finds them reuiued, ready to sell their liues at a deare rate. The battaile was very bloody, the one fighting for Empire and honor, and the other for their liues and altars. The event was vnfürfortunate for the English. The Duke of Clarence was slaine, and the English army lost, 15000 men vpon the place, for the first fruits of their new Regencie, and a gage of their pretended royaltie. This famous incounter hapened in the year, 1420. the ninth of Aprill. As in the fit of a dangerous disease the first motions of nature are very important, so is it in State. A light beginning after a great daunger, drawes a great consequence either to good or euill. This first action had a great traine. Charles his partie began to rise, as if the good hap of the lawefull heire reuiuing, had taken a newe forme in setting his authoritie. John of Montfort Duke of Brittain fauored this first successe of Aniou. After that the English had seized vpon Normandie, he put himselfe vnder his protection: but now he turnes rayle and allyes himselfe with our Charles against him, in a defensiu and offensiu league. What remaynes of the historie of Brittaine, I will reſerue for another place: let vs new returne to our discourse.

At the same instant James of Harcourt leaues the Bourguignons partie. He makes war in the Countie of Vimeu and takes diuers places, Pont Remy, Saint Riquier, la Fati, Mareuill, Diancourt, Araignes and other small places. The Bourguignon goes to field: the smallest Townes yeeld vnto him. He beseegeth Saint Riquier being well defended by the Lord of Offemont, but newes comes that the Daulphin his armie approacheth. The Bourguignon resolues, to meete them: he sendes forth part of his forces: they are dispersed vpon a false alarm that the Duke of Bourgonne was dead. As they were in this disorder, behold he shewes himselfe to his soldiars full of resolution, & so fitly, as hauing tal- lyed his men and encouraged them, he not only reuelles his enemy, but defends them, takes Saint Riquier and frees Picardie from feare. Such is the variety of our incounters: the Conquerour here is conquered.

The great exploits of Henry.

The Bourguignon being in field, our newe Regent comes from his realme of England E with newe forces: he hauing resolved to imploy all their meanes ioyntly to ruine the Daulphin, before he should fortifie himselfe with any new successe: they disperse their forces into diuers parts of the realme, hauing more men and money then the Daulphin. The Prince of Orange held the Daulphin in awe. The Lord of Roche-baron made war in Forest and Auvergne, and the bodie of the armie with the Regent and Duke marched against the Daulphin, who was retyred to Bourges a strong Cittie, and of a fit situation, lying in the midst of such Prouinces as obeyed him.

This army marching with a victorious shewe, beseegeth Dreux, and takes it by composition. Chartres yeelds willingly: from thence hee marcheth with an intent to drawe the Daulphin to fight but the Regent (seeing him retyre to a place of hard access) resolues to free all the Townes about Paris, but especially Senlis and Soissons, townes of importance. Hee hoped to vanquish him by degrees, and in the ende to giue him the mate.

But all enterprises succeede not: Man purpoſeth, but God disposeth: who ment to trie, A but not to ruine France. All succeds not wishfully to the English, being King of France in conceit. The Prince of Orange is beaten in Linguedoc, and Tanneguy of Chiffell Seward of Fenestre, hauing happily recotiered Port Saint Esprit, a towne of importance, vpon the passage of Rosier all the rest yeelds to the Daulphin his command. So as he could hardly keepe his Towne of Oranges. Anjou fauored the Daulphin. Roche-baron was taken at Seruerette by Imbert of Gros Seneſhall of Lion, and so Auvergne and Forest were subiect to the Daulphin: who seeing himselfe without any enemy, and forces ready for his defence, he beseegeth La Charité and takes it. From thence he goes to Cosne, where he findes great resistance, yet he doth presse it with such violence, as they are forced to part. They promise a certaine day to be succoured by the new Regent, or to yeeld to the Daulphin. The Regent assures them of releefe, exceeding glad of this occasion, to draw our Daulphin to the combate, wherein he hoped to vanquish him.

But he had not made his accompt with death, who holds his assignements more certaine, then all monarches: for reſolving vpon this voyage, although he had many other affaires in hand, he fell sicke and of a strange disease, which the vulgar sort terme Saint Flac, and Paritians Phthisie, which is a Gowte with a Craupe: Enguerand affirms, that the cheefe disease whereof he dyed, was Saint Anthonies fire: but it is more credibly reported, that he dyed of a Plurisie, a disease in those dayes so rare and vnkowne, that Physicians beinge not therewith acquainted, nor with the cause, hence it proceeded, could not prefer be nor apply any remedy therefore.

Henry hauing his minde fixed vpon this voyage, and his supposed victory, partes from Senlis, hauing taken leaue of the King, Queene and wife, (whom he shall see no more,) he caused himselfe to be carried to Melan in a litter. but feeling himselfe prest by his infirmite, he returned to Bois-de-Vincennes, where hauing taken his bed, he sent his army into Bourgonne vnder the commande of the Duke of Bedford his brother and the Earle of Warwicke, commanding them to pursue the Daulphin. At the baire of this great armie, the Daulphin Charles leaues Cosne and retires to Bourges: and to that time was freed.

Henry was not to freed from his sickness, the which increasing daily, made him to thinke of his ende, disposing as he pleased touching his sonne Henry the 6. of that name, whom he had by Katherine the daughter of France, and the Duke of Exeter his Vnle to be Regent of England, commanding them expressly to live in concord with Philip Duke of Bourgonne, and neuer to make any peace with Charles of Valois (for so he called him) unless they might haue Normandie in soueraignty, neither to releafe the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, vntill his sonne were of a competent age.

And thus Henry the 5. dies, beinge neare about forty yeares old, in the vigor of his age and spirit, borne and aspiring to great matters, hauing already giuen proofe of dies, what he might haue done if he had liued longer. But God would punish France by an English man, yet would he not suffer France to haue any other king then a French man. This v unexpected death, in the great counſe of Henry the fifts victories, hapened the last day of August, in the year, 1422. followed soone after by one lesse memorable. For Charles the 6. our good King, (but subiect to the miserablest raigne that France had euer seene to that day) fell sicke & dyed the 22. of October in the same year, 50. daies after the decease of Henry of England. A sickness & death remarkable in so great a King, for after that he had languished in so long & infamous an infirmity, he died in a manner alone. They name but the Chauncellour, the fift Chamberlaine, his Almoner with some groomes of his chamber which were present at his end. After his death he was visited by such as had caused him to die liuing, and by his miserable life had made all the realme to languish. At the funeralls of this poore Prince, all the herald had proclaimed The King is dead, an other cried, God save the King, God send a long & happy life to Henry the 6. by the grace of G O D King of France and England our soueraigne Lord. To the end that passion might triumph ouer the infirmity

1422. of our King, even in his graue. This Henry shalbe crowned King at Paris soone after. But where is that Isabel, or rather Iezabel, who had so much tormented her poore husband? I seeke her in all the corners of this history, yet cannot finde her. She which caused so great diuisions, dies without any memory, but to haue liued too long for France and her children. Oh the vanity of this world, which doth interre the most busie in the forgetfullnesse of the graue, when as they thinke themselves raised to the toppe of their desseines.

Thus Charles the 6. reigned, thus he liued, and thus he died, miserable in his raigne, miserable in his life, but most happie in his death, as well to free himselfe from paine, and by his occasion, his whole realme from confusion, as also by death to change his tumultuous and miserable life, into a quiet rest and eternall happinesse for what else can we say of him, whose misery gaue him the title of welbeloued, hauing nothing reprochfull in his life but his afflictions?

This is all I can speake touching the iudgement of this raigne, after the repetition of so many miseries: so as measuring others by mine owne apprehension, I thinke to ease them in not reuiving so tedious a subiect, noting that this raigne was alwaies miserable, both in the minority and maiority of our King. His manners, his race, his raigne and his age do appeere by that which wee haue written. He liued 54. yeares and reigned 42. He had many tonnes and daughters. Katherine is famous, hauing by the mournfull gage of many miseries. Of three Sonnes which came all to the age of men, Charles onely remayned successor of his Crowne, but not of his fortunes, for hee shall settle the realme, redeming it out of Strangers hands, as shall appeere in the following discours.

Charles

CHARLES the seuenth, the 54. King of France.

After the long and painefull Carriere of the fore-passed raignes, ^{1422.} were it not time now to breath? Since the vnfortunate battaile of Cressy, we haue felt nothing but thornes, tempests, forces and shewes of ruines. And if wee shall abate that little happinesse which Charles the 5. brought vnto our Ancestors, there are not lesse then seuentie yeares of confusion. But all is not yet ended: we must passe thirty yeares more before the conclusion. And, as if we felt the crosses of our fore-runners, we must shut our eyes, recouer new forces, grow resolute against all stormes, and ende courageously with them. The remainder of this painefull course, in the troublefome discourse, which we shall finde in the beginning of this raigne, to see in the ende a happy Catastrophe in the restoring of this Estate, and the vnion of the Church, diuided by a long and dangerous schisme, which disquieted Christendome, during the troubles of this raigne.

Notable particularities of this raigne.

Here our Frenchmen may reade with admiration and profit, that, as it is not now alone, that France hath bene afflicted, so God doth not now beginne to warch ouer it, deliuering it by miraculous meanes, when as it seemed neere to ruine. Here Charles the 7. the least and last of his Brethren, shall deface the ignominie of France, and triumph over the victories of a stranger, who had in a manner dispossessed him of his Realme. of a truth God ment to punish vs by meanes of the English, but not to ruine vs. The French cannot be commanded but by a Frenchman. The Ocean is a strong bar to diuide these two Estates, content with their owne rights. This raigne abounding in miraculous accidents, is the more considerable being the perfect Idea of the raigne of Henry the 4. vnder whom we liue.

But

1422.

The order of this discourse

But to represent so variable a subiect with profit, it is necessary to distinguish it in order. There are three parts famous both for the subiect and successe. The first shewes the confused and troublesome beginning of this raigne, vntill our Charles was solemnly installed King, and thereby acknowledged of all the French, for vntill that day the greatest part called him Earle of Ponthieu, or King of Bourges, in mockerie; and such as were more modest termed him Dauphin of Viennois.

The second parts him in possession of his royall authoritie, shewing by what meanes he reduced the Citties subdued by the English to his obedience, beginning with the Cittie of Paris, and so proceeding to the rest of the Realme, expelling the English from all, but onely Calais. The third shewes the ende of this raigne, discouering the Kings domesticall discontents, which hastened him to his graue, after the happy euents of all his difficulties.

So this raigne continued thirty nine yeares, variable in good and euill. The beginning difficult, the middest happy, and the ende mournfull. This is the Theater of mans life, where ioye, sorrow, happinesse, and misfortune, play their parts diuersly both with great and small. Charles the 7. was one and twentie yeares old when hee began to raigne, and reigned 39. yeares: for after the decesse of his father Charles the 6. hee rooke vpon him the name of King of France. (notwithstanding the pretension of the English) the 22. of October in the yeare, 1422. & he died the thirteenth of Iuly. 1461.

Charles his raigne.

He was married at a leuen yeares of age, to Marie the daughter of Lewis of Duke Anjou and King of Sicile. By this marriage hee had three Sonnes and five Daughters. His sonnes names were, Lewis, Philip and Charles. Lewis the eldest shall succeed him to the Crowne. Philip died very yong: Charles liued somewhat longer, but without any great successe, hauing only the titles of the Dukedomes of Berry, Normandie and Guene. His daughters were Radeconde, Yoland, Catherine, Iane and Magdaleine. The first died, (being betrothed to Sigismund Duke of Austria.) Yoland was married to Amedee Duke of Sauoie: Catherine to that great Charles Duke of Bourgogne, who shall behis owne ruine: Iane to Iohn Duke of Bourbon, and Magdalein to Gaston Earle of Feix: and this was his race.

His children
His manners and disposition.

His manners will appeere by his life: he was of a tractable and gentle disposition, capable of counsell, but louing his ease too much, and suffering himselfe to be often carried away by his seruants. And yet as God would vse him for the establishing of the French Monarchie, so did he bring him vp in the schole of affliction, to fortifie him against all difficulties, assisting him with great & worthe persons, both for warre and counsell, by whose meanes he did raise vp this estate, yet with great and confused combats, and by a long and painfull patience. But let vs proceede to that which hath chanced vnder his raigne, most worthy of obseruation.

The miserable estate of this raigne, vnto the Coronation of Charles the 7. during seauen yeares.

From the ende of the yeare. 1422. vnto. 29. in the moneth of Iune, when as hee was solemnly installed King in the Cittie of Paris.

UCH was the estate of Charles, when his fathers death called him to the Crowne. Wee haue seene after that the miseries of France had caused his mother Isabell to forget her owne bloud, making him to be reiectd from the Crowne, and Henry the 5. King of England substituted in his place, yet he fainted not in these extremities, but did valiantly withstand the pretended desseignes, by whose death God soone laid the foundation of this realmes

A realmes restoring. Yet after the death of King Henry the 5. Charles was incountred with infinite difficulties. He had small meanes, fewer friends, and many mighty enemies. He scarce enioyed the least part of his estate, followed by intreatie, and obeyed by halues, euen of such as made profession to be most faithfull. The Citties had diuers motions, as priuate interest drew mens mindes to that partie which they held most profitable. There were but too many which followed the fortune of the English, being a Conquerour, the corruption of man inclining commonly to the stronger. But amidst these vncertaine humours of people, he had enemies which incountred him with advantages apparently victorious: for Henry the 6. although he were very young, yet did he exceed him in all things: he had a realme hereditarie and absolute: the best part of the French Monarchie: the assistance of the Duke of Bedford his Vncle, with many worthy men, and great meanes. To these enemies were ioyned some great men, which fished in a troubled streame, euery one imagining to haue a part of this garment, building their desseignes vpon the Sepulcher of Charles, and the alteration of the State. Among the chiefeest were Philip Duke of Bourgogne, Amedee Duke of Sauoie, Peter Duke of Brittaine, with his Brother the Earle of Richemont. Diuers instruments vnder that great engin of England, but all these motions were to ruine France, and to build their greatnesse vpon her ruines.

The Burguignon (who had a great hand in the State) was most interessd and most opposit to Charles, being apparently the author of his fathers murther. Yet Philip (a iudicious Prince) so hated him, whom necessitie commanded him to hate in this accident, as if he should loue him in time, not wedding himselfe absolutely to the English: yet did he so worke for him in shew, as making himselfe in effect the stronger, he might counterpeise him if necessitie required, and strike the last stroake for him to whom the French should incline. Reason likewise taught him, that the people would respect the lawfull heire of the Crowne, louing their Prince naturally, and in the end would reiect the Stranger, as an vnlawfull Tenant, who made himselfe daily insupportable by his imperious carriage. Amedee Duke of Sauoie being on the Stage, and farre from blowes, kept the stakes, and entertained Charles, as if he should be an assured mediator in these quarrels, to end them with more aduantage then any Christian Prince: and so he nourished this diuision, by a strict intelligence which he had with the Bourgugnon. As for the humour of the two Brethren of Brittaine, the course of the Historie will soone shew it. Thus Charles charged by many enemies, had few faithfull and confident friends, and in that golden age, so small meanes to entertaine his friends, as he could hardly supply the ordinary charges of his traine, selling and ingaging peece after peece, of his inheritance. So as he had nothing more assured then the equite of his cause, and his resolution in this great necessitie. He had yet some good friends remaining in Scotland, whom he bought dearely, aduancing them to the greatest dignities of the realme: for he made Charles Steward Earle of Bouquiam his Constable, and Iames Earle Du-glas Marshall of France: and to honour the Scottissh-mens

He had likewise some friends in Spain and Italie, who succoured him in due time, according to their meanes. We haue shewed what Prouinces followed the partie of our Charles, amongst the which Languedoc was a principall. The importance of this countie did much aduance his affaires. This reason moued both the Bourgugnon and the Sauoier against this Prouince. The instruments fit for this enterprise, were Iohn of Chalons Prince of Orange, and the Lord Rochebaron, a Nobleman of Velay, one of the 22. diocesses of Languedoc. The first by the commodity of his neighbourhood did win Nismes, Pont saint Esprit, Aiguesmortes, and all the rest of base Languedoc, vnto Beziers, except the Castell of Pezenas, the tower of Villeneuve by Auignon, & the castell of Egaliers, now wholly ruined, neere vnto Vaux. This losse was somewhat repaired by the fidelitie of the inhabitants: Aiguesmortes set vp their ensigne of libertie, by the direction of the Baron of Fauuerbe, and killed the garnison of Bourgugnon, which the Prince of Orange had placed there.

Warre in Languedoc.

To 1422.

A strange cruelty whereby they are called Bourguignon falls to this day.

To this day they shew a great tub of Stone, wherein they did salt the Bourguignons. The example of this strong and important City, awaked the rest, and euen vpon the approach of the Earle of Foix, (who came with a goodly armye) all the Townes yeld vnto him, except Nismes and Pont S. Esprit, Townes of great importance in that countrey, the one being the head of that Seneshauce, the other a passage vpon the Reyne towards Daulphiné.

But as the libertie of time made the seruant presume about the Master; so it changed, that the Earle of Foix (hauing tasted the sweet of command, and transported with the common humour of men, seeking to make their profit of the common confusions of France) detained the reuenues of Languedoc, by his absolute authority, imparting none to Charles, being exceeding poore in this confused time. This necessity was accompanied with a cruell warre, stirred vp in Velay, by the Lord of Roche-baron, a partisan to the Dukes of Sauoy, and Bourgonne, who furnished him both with men and money, for this rebellion: for it was rather a horrible theuery then a warre. These two occasions, drew Charles into Languedoc, to confirme his authority, and his voyage succeeded according to his intent: for he chased the Prince of Orange out of Nismes and Pont S. Esprit; he pacified the troubles of Velay, and put the Earle of Foix from his gouernement, giuing the place to Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a Prince of the blood, to the great content of all the people.

Charles
mournes for the death of his father.

Hauing thus happily provided for his affaires, he takes the way of Velay, to returne into France: being arrived at Espaly, (a Castle belonging to the Bishop of Puy) he is advertised of his fathers death, after Henry the 5. his Competitor. He falls presently to teares and mourning, yet he buries not his affaires in care. His Councell aduise him to change his blacke robes into Scarlet, to set vp the banner of France in his name, and to proclaim himselfe King, for the first fruites of his coronation: the which being performed at Puy, to the peoples great ioye, Charles goes to Pouiers, where he caused himselfe to be crowned King, and receiued the homage and oathes of the officers of the Crowne, Princes, Noblemen and gentlemen that were about him, with such pompe as the strictnesse of time would permit. Then he intituled himselfe King of France, and made shew of more authority and greater pompe. But on the other side, the Duke of Bedford beganne to bandy more strongly against him. Henry the 6. his pupill, a yong infant, was in England. He caused him likewise to be crowned King, till the seauen yeares after he should be solemnly installed at Paris, in the yeare, 1430. He set his name vpon the money of France, making a new stampe, but without any other change, then of his name.

The Dukes of Bedford and Bourgonne
hold a counsell at Amiens.

So that hereafter two Kings, two factions, two armies shall contend for this goodly Crowne. The heire being the weaker shall fight against a strong pretender. Law fauours the one, and force the other: but the Protector of this estate, will giue a fauourable doome for the weaker, that the honour of so memorable a preservation of this monarchy, apparently drawne out of the graue, may be giuen to him, who rules the deluge of our confusions, by his miraculous prouidence. Scarce had Charles receiued the first fruites of his royall authority, when as the Dukes of Bedford and Bourgonne his capitall enemies, assemble at Amiens, to crosse his new dignity in the breeding.

There shall be seauē yeares of exceeding bad time, but after this sharpe winter, there will come a goodly spring, when as all seemed lost, and in the ende, Sommer shall follow with a plentifull haruest of rest, to this Realme, whereof the lawfull heire shall remaine in quiet possession, and the pretender expelled with losse euen of that which he might haue ciuilly inioyed.

A great league against King Charles confirmed by alliances.

In this assembly at Amiens, great plottes are layde against Charles, whose nine was their soueraine end. All is done at the charge of the English. Peter Duke of Brittaine and Arthur Earle of Richmont his brother, are there present. Amedee Duke of Sauoy, and the Dukes of Bedford, Brittaine and Sauoy, make a defensue & offensive league against Charles. The souerainty of the Crowne should remaine to the English: the command

ties to the Dukes. They fet the scale of marriages to this alliance. John Duke of Bedford marries with Anne the sister of Philip Duke of Bourgonne: and Marguerit his other Sister takes Arthur the Earle of Richmont. Then they seek the fruits of this alliance with the preiudice of Charles. Enery man takes his quarter, to torment him on all sides. The Bourguignon undertakes Picardy, where he settles John of Luxembourg, to expell the Daulphins out of some places which they held there. Henry of Lancaster Earle of Salisbury, went into Champagne and Bry, to cleanse the Country about Paris, and to bide Orleans. The Earle of Warwick undertooke Guienne, to make war against those townes that held the Daulphins party. Lewis Prince of Orange, had charge to arme in Languedoc and Daulphiné. Behold a great storme rising against the lawfull heire of this

What remedy
Charles may giue to these troubles.

By course.

Amidst all these difficultyes, Charles must needs be in great perplexitie: but I reade with ioy, that he whom God had chosen to restore this estate, was not amazed, nor daunted, but hauing commonly in his mouth this Oracle, We must haue God and reason on our side. He hath recourse vnto God, and falls courageously to worke. Hee flies to Roche, to assure it vnder his obedience. Being in the Towne, there happens a notable accident, as he was in counsell, a part of the chamber funke, and James of Bourbon with diuer others were slaine in this ruine. The King was but hurt. From this danger, he passeth on to the chiefe of his affaires. He sends into Scotland, Milan, and Castile, to summon his friends to succour him, who speedily will send him notable aides. He prouides for all the passages vnder his obedience. He assures himselfe of Languedoc (from whence he drew his chiefe helpees) by the Earle of Clermont: from Daulphiné, by the Lord of Gaucourt, from Lions, Lyonnois, Forrest, Beauueuais and Maisconais, by Imbert of Croque, Seneshall of Lions, from Gascogne, and other countries of high Guienne, where he was acknowledged, by the Vicont of Narbonne, and the maister of Ornall. He sendes James of Harcourt into Picardy, accompanied with Pothon of Xintrailles, or S. Treille, & Stephen Vignoles, called la Hire, the flower of his capitaines. And likewise the Bourguignon sent thither the greatest part of his forces. Ambrose de Lore goes into Maine & Perche, Freemont of Cottin, into Champagne. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of the house of Orleans) keeps Orleans. The townes lying vpon the riuer of Loire, about & beneath Orleans, were vnder the obedience of the French, La Charité, Cyan, Jargeau, Meung, Baugency, Bon Amboise, Tours, Samour, diuerse small townes in Beauvais, La Ferté of Caulles, Jannville, Espermy, Pluniers. And in the countries of Gastenois & Vrepois, Montargis, Chastillon, Milly, neerer vnto Paris, Mont-leheri, Orisy, Marcouffy (very strong places then but now desolate) kept Paris in alarme.

Thus the Cardes were shuffled, but the English had the better part, keeping the great cities and the Kings purse: and (as the stronger) he begins the game, which had this issue for the remainder of that yeare. The English besiege and take Bazas: and the French in Meulan, vpon Seine, with great slaughter of the English: but the Duke of Bedford loth to endure such a thorn in the sides of Paris (doth presently besiege it. Charles sends thither succors, vnder the command of the Earle of Aumale, the Constable Boucquart, & Tanneberg of Chastel. Too many comandars, to do any great exploit. Iealousie of command breedeth a confusion, as all these troupes marched in disorder, no man acknowledging but his priuate comandar. Here vpon the English army arriues, who had an easie conquest of these disordered troupes, & then Meulan yeelds to the Duke of Bedford.

The French deserted by the English & Charles yet
ded.

The sharpnes of winter could not temper the heat of these warriors. & as the fortune of the warre is variable, one wins, another looseth, Ambrose de Lore & John of Beauvais (thinking to take Fresnoy le Conte) lost a notable troupe of their men. The Lord of Fontenay hath his reuenge vpon the English, & defeats eight hundred of them at Neufville: and John of Luxembourg, a Bourguignon defeats the Lords of Gamsches and Aumale with their troupes. The Earle of Salisbury, takes the Townes of Vertus and Espermy, and the strong places of Montaguillon and Osny neere vnto Paris. The composition is strange: the souldiers yeelding at the Regents discretion, are brought to Paris, bare-headed, halters about their necks, and swords at their breasts.

James A street to go to the Tournelles, where the Regent was lodged, and from thence to bee drawne to the place of execution, if the Duchesse of Bedford (moued with the pity of a French woman, at so pittifull a spectacle) had not begged the lues of these poore condemned men, of hir husband.

Charles hath diuers loiles.

Thus that yeare passed, wherein Charles the 6. and Henry the 5. died, but God to restore our Monarchie, beganne in the same yeare to lay a leuaine against the attempts of Strangers, who fought to ruine it. Iaqueline of Bauiere, Countesse of Hainault and Holland, the onely heire of those two states, had married with Iohn Duke of Brabant who by a blind and ambitious auarice, gaue her selfe to Humphry Duke of Glocester, yncle to the King of England, and married with him, reiecting her lawfull husband. Her excuse was, that the Brabantin was her cousin germaine, but this shal be a meanes to dissolue the alliance so cunningly conioined by the dukes of Bedford & Bourgogne, who shall breake vpon this occasion. The yeare begins while that losses came by heaps vpon Charles, as the current of an vnauoidable ruine. whatsoeuer he vnderooke, succeeded not.

In Picardie.

Iames of Harcourt was Gouernour of Picardie, placed there ouer some remaiuers of the shipwrack of that country: he surpriseth Dommart in Ponthieu from the Bourguignon, and spoiles the neighbour Abbaies, and the country. Hauing ruined these poore disarmed men, he is charged by Ralfe Butler an English Capitaine, looseth all his conquest, and escapes hardly with his life, sees Crotoy taken before his face, the chiefe dungeon of his desheines, Rue, S. Valery, and in the ende the goodly Cittie of Abbeville, insufficient to stay the English forces, if it had bin garded by good men. After these hamfull losses he comes to Charles to excuse himselfe: hee pardons him, but GOD made him soone paye the interest of his thefts: beeing the cause of his owne ruine.

Hauing no place of aboad, he retires to Parthenay, to his vnclie, who entertained him courteously, but Harcourt not content with this kind viage, would be maister of the Castle. his practise fell vpon his owne head, beeing slaine by the gardes, suffering the punishment of his treachery, as he had done of his couetousnesse & cowardise. A lesson for bad seruants to their Princes, detestable either for their robberies, or for their treacherous cowardises, whom God payes in due season.

In Maine.

The entrance of this yeare was also infamous, in two shamefull losses, happened to two great Capitaines, To Ambrose of Lore, who looseth the Castle of Tennuye in the country of Maine, and to Oliuer of Magny beaten by the English, at the Bishops parkenere Auranches: but from small accidents, we must come to great actions. Champagne was in no better case then Maine. The Earle of Salisbury made warre with all violence, against Pregent of Coytivy, who defended the Kings party the best he could: but not able to beare so great a burthen, he flies to Charles, who sends him his Constable with forces, the which were employed both in an other cause, and with other successe then hee had desired, for behold the towne of Creuant in Bourgogne, (situated vpon the riuier of Tonne, vpon the frontiers of Champagne) is surpriseth by the bastard of Baume, for the King.

In Champagne.

Bourgogne.

The Constable flies thither, but too late, for la Baume, not able to take the Castle, abandons the Towne. In the meane time, the brute thereof drawes forces thither, from all parts, as a cupping glasse doth humors. The Dowager of Bourgogne (mother to duke Philip) lends a goodly troupe vnder the conduct of Toulangeon Marshall of Bourgogne. The Duke of Bedford doth sodainely furnish a notable supplie, for the respect hee bare to the Duke of Bourgogne his brother-in-lawe: Charles fearing least his Constable should miscarrye, assembles what forces hee can with all speede, and sends them vnder the conduct of the Lord of Senerac, Marshall of France, the Earle of Ventadour, the Lord of Fontaines, Yelay, and Gamaches.

The notable bataile of Creuant vn-fortunate for France.

The number was very equall, but the incomber fell vpon our armie. And this was the occasion, The Constable hauing made his choyse of a little hill, a place

A place of aduantage to attend his enemy. The English come with a conquering brauerie, as he that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: he forceeth our gard, placed vpon the bridge to keepe the passage. Hauing thus passed in vewe of our army, impatience seizeth on our men by this proud contempt, and they crie to the Constable, who galled with despight for this affront, resolues to the combat. So all with one furie leaue the hill, march towards the English, and offer him battaile.

The Earle of Salisbury makes a stand, to temper the heart of our French, who durst not approach very neere, fearing the furie of their English arrowes. This first motion thus slackt, the Earle of Salisbury giues the signe to battell. Those of Creuant halfe madde, hauing bene some dayes beseeged, issue forth, and charge on the one side. On the other side, the bodie of the English army, doth march with such violence against the Scottes, (which were in the first battailon) as not able to withstand this storme, they open, and giue them entrie against the French, who hauing fought resolutely, in the ende they leaue the place to the victors. All are in route. The Marshal of Senerac, forgets his honor, and flies in this disorder. They accompt the losse about three thousand men. Of marke, the Lords of Fontaines, Guitry, and la Baulme: of Scottishmen, the Lord of Karados, nephew to the Constable, Thomas Seton, William Hamilton, with his Sonne David, and Iohn Pillot, all worthy of the memorie of France, seeing they died for her in the bed of honour.

The euerthrow at Creuant.

C There were many more taken prisoners then slaine, by the resolution of the Capitaines, who in this generall ouerthrow, (rallying their troupes) intrenched themselves, and fought for their lues with the English, and saved themselves honourable with their armes. The chiefe prisoners were the Constable of Bouenham, and the Earle of Ventadour. It is a thing worthy remembrance, that either of these two lost an eye in the battaile: this was the 29. of Iuly. The gaine of this victorie to the Bourguignon, was, that Mescon, a Cittie of the French obedience, yeelded vnto him without any force, but feare.

This continuance of so many losses, was exceeding greuous: but as God ment to chastise France, and not to ruine it; so he counterpeiled these great losses with some small gaine. These victorious troupes returning without feare, all disordered, were defeated by the Earle of Aumale, sent by the King to preserue the rest of Champagne: eight hundred English were slaine. But this checke awaked the Earle of Salisbury, Gouernour of Champagne for the English: who hauing recovered new forces, goes to field to cleere the countrie. He besiegeth and taketh the strong Towne of Sedan, in the Countie of Vertus, and then Rembouillet in Brie, and Neele in Tartensis. Then the tide flowes for the French. The Bourguignon exceeding glad of the seizure of Mescon, (a Towne very important vpon Saone), commanded Thoulangeon his Constable, to rid all that the enemy held thereabouts, and to leaue the trafficke free. La Buisiere a most strong Castell betwixt Tournus and Mescon, did much annoy it. He resolues to take it by one meanes or other. But he did not foresee, that in seeking to take, hee should be taken. He had some familiaritie with the Capitaine of the place, And trusting to the usual practises of those times, he did confidently hope to corrupt him with money. He founds him, and findes it pregnable: They agree vpon the price, but hee was ignorant of the Capitaines meaning, to haue more then his money. A faithfull seruant to the King, and worthy to be named in this Register. The Capitaine doth aduertise Imbert of Crosee, the Gouernour of Lions, of this trafficke, who wisely provides to take him.

Some English
come.

Louis of Cullant Admirall of France, was then happily at Lions, attending some horse for the King, from Philip Marie Duke of Milan. The plotte is laide to surprize the Constable of Bourgogne, and the successe is answerable. Thoulangeon comes to Buisiere at the appointed houre, and brings with him men and money. He enters the Castell, with as many men as he held sufficient, and coumpts the money to the Capitaine. He hauing left his troupe in the field, behold the Lionsis issue forth their Ambul-1423. Ambuscado like Lions indeed, some seize vpon the Castle gate, and assure the place. Others charge his troupe, which was easilie defeated. The Constable with the chiefe that had followed him into the Castle were taken. a countercharge which shall deliuer the Constable of Boucgham and the Earle of Ventadour, soone after the battell of Cullant.

Pothon of Xantrailles taken prisoner

And almost at the same instant, Stephen of Vignoles, called La Hire, and Pothon of Xantrailles, roused themselves. Vignoles, surprised Compi gne, and Pothon, Han, vpon the riuier of Somme. But this ioy lasted little, for John of Luxembourg, gouernour for the Duke of Bourgonne, in Picardy, flies thither, besiegeth, and recouereth both the one and the other with a happy celerity. Pothon saues himselfe with much difficulty in Guise, (being pur tied by the Bourguignons, to their cost that were ill mounted.) Luxembourg managing his victory wisely, attempts other places: he takes Ossy, Broissy and other small Townes of Tir-sche, and in the ende he besiegeth Guise, where John Protiff commanded for the King: Pothon to anoy the besiegers, issues forth of Guise, but being too late engaged in the fight, he is taken prisoner, to make the siege of Guise the more easie: but Protiff doth his best indeauour to defende it. The Towne belonged to René of Anjou, Duke of Bar, and brother to the King of Sicile. He intreats the Duke of Bourgonne to leaue it him in peace, but it was in vaine. The sieges vehemently continued, so as in the ende Guise fallies into the Bourguignons hands, and so hee remaines maister of all Picardy.

And, as if this storme had fallen vpon Charles from all parts, la Charité, (a very important Towne vpon the riuier of Loire) is surprised by Perinet Grasset, for the Bourguignon: and so the terrour of the warre came into Perry, much troubling, the quiet commerce of the Court: for that the King most commonly was resident at Bourges, or at Meung.

The horrible estate of these times, a true
image of ours.

The like mishappe fell vpon La Hire at Vitry, the which he yeelds to the Duke of Bourgonne, by a composition very preiudiciall for the King and the Realme. And at the same time Perceumont vpon Ossy surprised by the French, was taken againe by the English, with much blood and sacke. In like sort the fort of S. Michells Mont, is besieged by the English, and well defended by the French, which caused the victory of Grauelle, happily taken by the Baron of Colances from the English, as it were to coole the heat of our continuall feuer with some little water. In sooth the Estate of France was then most miserable. There appeared nothing but a horrible face of confusion, pouerty, desolation, solitarinesse and feare. The leane and bare labourers in the countrye, did terrifie euen theeues themselves, who had nothing left them to spoile but the carkasses of these poore miserable creatures, wandring vp and downe like ghosts drawne out of graves. The least farmes, & hamlets, were fortified by these robbers, English, Bourguignons, and French, euery one straining to do his worst. There was no speech but of sorts and contributions. All men of warre were well agreed to spoyle the countreman and the naked Marchant. euen the cattell accustomed to the Larum bell, (the signe of the enemies approach) would run home of themselves without any guid by this accustomed misery. This is the perfect description of those times, taken out of the lamentations of our Ancestors, set downe in the original. Who seeth not here the image of our times, during the confusions of our viciuall warres?

Lewis the xi.
the eldest son of Charles
boine.

But amidst this horrible calamity, God did comfort both the King and realme, for about the ende of the yeare, he gaue Charles a goodly Son by Queene Marie his wife, a happie gage for the establishing of this realme, whereof hee shal be a peaceable King. He was borne at Bourges, and there was honorably baptized in Saint Stephens Church, and was named Lewis, King of France after the decease of his father. Charles would haue John of Alençon a Prince of his blood, and then his trustie friend, to be his Godfather. But alas, both by this Godfather, and this Godson, shal growe a horrible confusion, euen when as Charles expected an ende of all his troubles. Which by we may learne, that there is nothing but vanity in worldly affaires, remarkable for great men, in that which seemeth most firme in mans life.

Ths

A This was the flux and reflux of this yeare. The beginning of the new yeare shewed a better countenance: but these small gleames of good happe, were soone ouercast by horrible loties, which seemed to giue the last wound to this Monarchie, and to alter the name, if God had not stayed it with his mightie hand. In laying a foundation whereon he shal build the meanest to restore it to her ancient beautie, without any thew of the industrie or force of man, when as all things seemed desperate. But the prouidence of God creepes on insensibly by degrees to perfect his worke.

The losse of the Scottes was verie great in the vntfortunate battaille of Cullant. To reaire this losse, Charles sends into Scotland, Renauld of Chartre his Chancellor and Archbishop of Rheims, accompanied with the Earle Du-glas, Marshall of France.

B And being reduced to a miserable want of mony, hee ingageth the Duchie of Tou-raine vnto him. A title which Du-glas shall not long inioy. But whilest they make this leauing in Scotland, and shal returne to his companies, let vs consider the humor of the French and English during this medlie.

New impulses come out of Scotland.

As the successe of the English was happy, so their hearts swelled with pride, and they exceeded dayly in Insolence, especially in great Citties, where they braued it disdainfully, as treading the name of Frenchmen vnder foote. This contempt bred an extreame discontent, euen in the most senselesse, to see themselves thus intreated, their kings suppressed, and their Lawes abolished. There were not two yeares past of this newe royaltie, and yet disputable. How farre, say they, will this English Empire exceede, being augmented and fortified by the authoritie of many yeares? Shal it be either to trans-

of the English.

C port new Colonies beyond the Seas, or to plant others heere, and in the ende to extinguish the name of the originall French, to the ende that no man shall dare to repine at the ruine of his Countre, reduced into the power of Strangers? These imaginations were generally in all mens mindes, but complaints in the mouths of fewe, and that they whispered softly to their well assured friends: but the time was not yet come, although the blood, (which cannot degenerate) shewed many signes of hearts discontented with this seruitude, both at Paris, and especially at Rouen, where the English gouernment was most heauie. One Michell Lallier, was the beginner of this liberty, and was put to death at Paris, and a woman was burnt, worthy to lue amidst the flames, and to shine in the goodly light of our Historie.

Some French men executed
by the English.

The Nobility of Picardie was much discontented with this newe command. Tour-nay began first to stirre for the Kings seruice. So immouable is the French obedience to their Kings, and so sweete and pleasing is their command. It was a capitall crime to speake of the King of England, but as the lawfull King. Spies were set in all places, to restraints the libertie of the French. These executions were threatnings of worse, if any should mutine. Yet the Nobilitie of Picardie were so wearied with the English and Bourguignon yoke, as they resolute to free themselves at what rate focuer. The heads of this resolution, were the Lords of Longueval, Saint Symon, Mailly, Mancourt, Recourt, Blondel, and many other gentlemen which had followed the Bourguignons partie. These are named. The original should not conceale the rest, whome I could not specific without some Author.

Behold the first fruits of the French libertie. These Enseigne bearers assemble at Roye, they fortifie themselves for the King, against the English and the Bourguignon, and take diuers Townes in Picardie at a prefixed day. John of Luxembourg, thunders against them that were suspected, and some hee takes and hangs. At these terrors, some dawe backe, and left this league: Yet the greatest part remayned constant, though with the apparent danger of their liues. These were the pure and true sparkles of the French fidelity to their King, but the day spring was not yet come, which mounting to our horizon, should in the ende shewe forth the goodly light of libertie to all France.

Complets against the English.

F These first motions put Charles in some hope of a better estate: but behold a newe checke which cooles his courage. At the sametime that hee made his leaue in Scotland, the Duke of Exeter prepared a great armie in England, to releeue the Duke of Bedford, his brother, that hee might haue meanes to contynue the warres in France. There comes vnto him eight thousand archers, and eightene hundred men at armes. For the imploying of these men, he beseegeth Galardon, & taketh it at his first approach, and without the losse of any houre, hee plants himselfe before Tury: and at the same instant all his forces come to him, vnder the commande of the Earle of Salisbury. The army being thus increased, he presseth the siege. Girault of Paliere, held the Towne for the King.

The Duke of Bedford summons him to yeeld it. Girault demandes respite to aduertise the King. Charles was then at Tours, well accompanied both of his subiects and forraigne friends: for after the defeat of Crenant, foreseeing that the English would pursue the cause with more violence, hee had prouided men to oppose against them. The Marshall Douglas, Duke of Touraine by his newe purchase, had brought him succors from Scotland. The Vicount of Narbonne a goodlie troupe from Languedoc, the which was the flower of the whole army. The Duke of Alençon, the Earles of Aumale, Vendour, Tonnerre, Douglas, Moiry, the Vicount of Mardonne, the Lords of Fayette, Tournon, and other Noble men of Marke with their followers were readie to do their best endeauor. So as hee had eightene thousand fighting men. The rendez-vous is in Perche, and they were shortly to march to Tury. The King stayes at Chastellaudun.

The Constable of Boucbingham sends to vewe the enemies countenance. The skourts report the greatnesse of the English army and their diligence at the siege, who being discouraged and pursued, hardly escape. They resolute, that in steede of charging the English army, they should beseege Vernueil, (a Towne obeying the English), eyther to take it, or to make a diuersion from Tury. The first succeeded, for our men approaching to Vernueil with a victorious countenance and bragge, as if the English army had bene defeated, Vernueil opens the gates without any question, and yeelds to the Kings seruice. But this shewe of victory cost our French men deere, who had done better to succour Tury, then in loosing it, to hazard their owne ruine, as it happened afterwards.

Vernueil yeelded to the French.
Tury yeelded.

Girault of Paliere, hauing long and in vaine expected succors, and doubled the prefixed time, hee yeelds to the Duke of Bedford, who hauing nowe no other impediment, he resolues to fight with our army at his aduantage: for the effecting whereof, he had the better meanes, by their long itay. Hauing in-intelligence of the Estate of our Armie, he resolued to drawe them to battaile, knowing howe much it did import to send a victorious soldiar, against one, whome he hath vsually beaten. Hee therefore sends a herauld to defie them, giuing him charge to direct himselfe to the Duke of Touraine, a Scottish man being Marshall of France. To whome he saies. The Duke of Bedford my master commanded mee to tell you, that he comes to drinke with you. Douglas answers him. That he should be welcome, but hee must make some hys, for that diner was readie. Vpon this brauado they go to Counsell. The mischiefe was, the army had no head, hauing indeede too many. A multitude of commanders and commaunders, is a plague to all good order, and especially in militarie discipline, which consists wholly, in authoritie. Euery one had varied in his opinion. Somewere of aduice to attend the enemy, others thought it fittest to take him at his worde, without induring of these brauadoes.

The Duke of Bedford sends a challenge to the French army.A diuision among the heads of the French army.

Thus their diuided opinions diuided the armie, and those which in shewe made the armie, ouerthrew it. Douglas and Narbonne. Douglas sayed, Seeing the army is well lodged, hauing a good Towne to backe it, to what ende should they runne rashly against a victorious enemy? The Narbonnois replies, To endure these brauadoes, were to take away the hearts of the French Soldiars, and to coole their courage without any reason: and what greater indignities might a vanquished man beare? The Duke of Alençon: and the Constable were of the first opinion. but the contention grew so great, as the Vicount sayed, That if the wiser had no minde to fight, hee would go and defend the honor of France with the hazard of his life: so being rettyred to his quarter, he commanded armie.

The French

A to found a marche, notwithstanding the Duke of *Alençon*s intreatie to stay and march together. On the other side, the Duke of Touraine, discontented at the Vicounts choller, keepes back the Scottes. But necessitie drew forth the whole armie, one Battaillon after another. This disorder was the cause they could not chosse a fit place of armes, nor dispose of their Battaillons. All were in grosse confusely, without any vanguard. The chiefe of the armie were on foote. They place two wings, and to euery wing a thousand horse. The Italians had the right, and the French the left. In the fore-fronte of this battaile they planted foure hundred horse, to beginne the skirmish.

The Duke of Bedford had oportunitie to dispose better of his armie, he makes a bode all on foote, where he placeth his chiefe force, and lodgeth there himselfe. In the front of this body, he placeth great store of Archers, and euery Archer hath a stake it clein the ground, to withstand the charge of the horse: Vpon either wing he plants the choise of his most resolute Archers. Behind, are his vnarmed people with the baggage: the horses being tyed close together, taile to taile, with two cordes or withs. but for their gard he left two thousand choise Archers. In this order he attends the French, whom he discouers comming a farre off, resolute to fight, with the countenance of conquerours. They were long before they could set their troupes in order, and ranne a full gallop to their death. So as in these sturres, and in their hast to fight, they were out of breath before they came to blowes. All the morning is spent in approaches, the two armies fronting one another: a little after noone, a signall is giuen to the battaile; our aduenturers go to the charge, to trie if they can force the gresse of the English armie.

The foure hundred Italian Lances (lead by Cameran with one eye) made the point, and at the first charge beate back the English Archers that were in the front. At the same instant, our two wings of horse, charge the English armie in flanke, seeking to breake their rankes. The fury of the fight was violent on either side; our men struing to enter into the body of the English foote, and the English labouring to withstand our men with a continuall stonne of Arrowes. Then, behold our Launciers, hauing forced one side of the battaile, begin to crie, Victorie. but the first rankes being forced, they are seconded by the rest without disorder: and with the like impression, the whole body of the English armie raise a great crie, and aduance to the combat. Thus the two armies ioyne with a horrible confliet, which continued aboue an houre, one fished against another with a cruell and bloudie furie. And (sayes the originall) there were neuer seen: two parties of so great power, fight so long without knowledge who were victors. But behold a new change in our Armie, our French and Italian horse appointed to force the English battaile, being valiantly repulsed flie, and leaues our footemen open to the English shot.

Both the battailes had continued long in fight, and that which had made it equally was not onely the equalitie of their forces, but the counterpeize of horres, which seruued honourably. But the English had a supply of 2000. Archers, referued at the taile of his armie to garde the baggage. The Duke of Bedford seeing our foote naked of Launciers, resolues to imploy them. So as this fresh squadron, doubling a fearful cry, fall violently vpon this wearied troupe, and being halfe disordered, disperfeth them. Then all are in a route: some flie, others kill. The massacre was exceeding great in the first furie, kindled by the obstinacie of the fight. Yet after this first heate, the English accustomed to our bloud, fell to take prisoners. Vernueil was the neereft retreat, but the gates were shutte, fearing least the English should enter pel mel with them that fled; so as the Ditch serued for a graue or a prison to many. Thus the English had the victorie, but they bought it full dearely, for they lost aboue fiftene hundred men: our losse was farre greater. Our Histories confesse fiftie thousand, the English report fiftene thousand. Yet all was not lost, for Xaint-railles and La Hire gathered together a good number of them that fled, and saued them in Mans, the neereft place of retreat.

A braue retreat of the barr.

There happened a memorable thing in this route. The Italian troupe which had fled, being intrenched in a neere village, to fight for their liues, hauing a false aduertisement that our men had wonne the victory; they presently part, and come to the place of battaile. being knowne, they are charged by the English, but their retreat was exceeding hardy, for in despite of their armie they faued themselves. Being to passe a riuer at the end of certaine hedges, by so narrow a passage as they could go but one after an other, these Lombards plant their Cornets there, as the marke of their way, with sixteene armed men to make a stand, while the troupe should passe. All escape this way without any other harme, then feare. So much order preuailes euen in disorder.

The Noblemen that were slaine.

This ouerthrow chanced the sixt of August. The losse was the greater, for that it did aggravate the former: many great personages were slaine. The Earle of Bouquingham Constable of France, the Marshall Du-glas, (a short time Duke of Touraine) the Earles of Aumale, Harcourt, Ventadour, Tonnerre, Moyry; the Lords of Grauille, Montenay, Combreff, Fontenay, Bruneil, Tumblet, Guirry, Peissy, Mathe, Rambels, Lindesay, Gamasches, Malstroict, Boyn, Rembouillet, Harpedane, la Treille, Fourehouinere, la Salle, Lappe, Rochebaron, la Tour, and many other in great numbers. The Vicount of Narbonne (a rather instrument of this misfortune) was taken by the Bourguignons, and presently hanged, for a punishment, hauing assisted at the massacre of John Duke of Bourgogne. The chiefe prisoners were, John of Bourbon Duke of Alençon, and the bastard of this house, the Marshall of Fayette, the Lord of Hormid, Peter Hersson, Lewis of Vaucourt, Roger C Broussert, Hines of Saint Marc, James du Puy, and many others; from whom the English drew great summes of money. Vernueil (to augment this misfortune,) was yielded by Rambures, vpon an honourable composition, with their liues and baggage freed, except that which belonged to the armie. The insolent English, spoiled the poore Souldiars, when as the Earle of Salisbury arriuing, slue one of these treacherous wretches, causing these poore vanquished men to bee conducted into Berry or Touraine in good safetie.

With many other places.

After this notable victorie, the Duke of Bedford hauing triumphed at Paris, managed this profitable accident to our losse. Hee presently deliueys these victorious troupes (carrying in their hearts and foreheads, the fortune of England) to the Earle of Salisbury, one of the wisest and most valiant Captaines of his armie, who implored them with great successe: for he tooke from Ambrose de Lore, (a braue and valiant Captaine) the Fortes of Saint Susanne, Mahannes, la Hines, la Ferte-Bernard, as the remainders of this Shipwracke, and in the end he carried it to the Towne of Mans, although the fidelitie of the inhabitants yeelded him their obedience more slowlie, and with greater difficultie. The English insolencie increased daily and apparently, like the swelling of a riuer. Watches were set to obserue all such as did but murmur for their libertie. The Lords of Maucourt and Rocomp were put to death, as guiltie of high treason. The goods of such as were absent, were confiscate. In France it was a great crime to be a Frenchman.

The miserable estate of Charles in di-uers sorts.

But as one mischiefe comes not alone, and griefe vpon griefe procures no health, these misfortunes which touched the members, had almost ruined the head: for this lamentable battaile of Vernueil, (which made all France to mourne) had almost thrust Charles into his graue. Besides these generall losses, this poore Prince was furcharged with many difficulties: the incredible burthen of his pouertie, and the reproches of his subiects, accusing him as the author of these banquerout losses, which chanced daily to his armies and Townes. Thus he was abandoned both of himselfe, and his subiects, his great and many afflictions hauing killed his courage, and lost his credit with the people. In this disgracefull necessitie, there was no speech but of ingaging the reuenues of the Crowne, to pay the garrisons of places, which else would be lost. The Kings table faled dully: hee ate no more in publike, but sparingly in his Chamber, attended on by his domesticall seruants. The Historie notes, that as Pothon and la Hire came to him to Chasteaudun, to require succours, they found him at Table with with a rumpe of Mutton, and two Chickens: and yet in this extreame pouertie of his, the great men snatch on all hands. The Duke of Alençon had Niort in Poitou. and the bastard of Orleans the County of Gyan, for money they said had bin lent for the Kings seruice, who anowed all and paide all, for nothing. But that which was of harder digestion, was the continuall discontent of his subiects against him, as if (neglecting his affaires) he had abandoned himselfe to the loue of faire Agnes. A blot which doth yet blemish the name of Charles the 7. in the generall conceipt of the French nation, registered as a certaine truth, by the writers of our time, which haue described that raigne. As it is my coultie to seareh the originalls, and not to alledge any new writer for an Author: so haue I carefully noted what the Ancients did obserue. Alain Charretier the Kings Secretarie, saies nothing: Monstrelet speakes but vpon occasion, in the end of this raigne.

The King re-proched for the loue of faire Agnes.

And for as much (saith he) as the King did see her willingly, the common fame was, that he kept her dishonestly, for the vulgar is more inclined to speake ill then well. But the loue which the King did shew her, was for her pleasing behauiour, and eloquent speech, and also for that she was of all faire creatures the fairest. The Historie of S. Denis, written by the Historic grapher of France, doth cleerly excuse him in these termes. A Chronicler, desiring to write the truth, haue duly informed myselfe, and without falsifying of the truth, doe finde by Knights, Councellors, Physicians, Surgians, and other domesticall seruants, examined by othe, as appertained to my charge, to the end to free the people from scandall: That during Charles yeeres that faire Agnes liued with the Queene, the King neuer frequented her but in great companie nor in the absence of the Queene: he neuer used any lasciuious countenance vnto her, nor touched her beneath the chinne. And after his sports, Charles retired himselfe vnto his lodging, and Agnes vnto hers. But he loued her for that she was pleasant and young among the fairest, seeking all kind of delights to sweeten his thoughts and cares. These are his very words. But how soeuer, this scaire remaines vpon Charles his face, that he neglected his affaires, loosing both his time and iudgment with this woman, and in his Gardens; the which blemished his reputation much, euen with his enemies, who held him for an idle person, and of small valour. But as this report made him contemptible, so the insolent behauiour of his Mignons made him hatefull, for that vnder his authoritie, these Horse-leeches oppressed the people, and tooke all reward from such as had ventured their liues for the Kings seruice.

The subiect discontented against Charles.

Thus this poore Prince, furcharged with many difficulties, was so discouraged, as he had not any care to preferre himselfe by armes how soeuer, but employed all his spirits to finde some meanes of an accord, at what price soeuer, with the Duke of Bourgogne and Brittanie. But he was much deceiued, for they had all conspired his ruine, and euery one pretended a part in this confiscation. The Duke of Sauoy looked for a share, and Lewis of Chaalon Prince of Orange, was in hope to make himselfe great with the remainders of this spoile. But where the wisdom of man ended, there the prouidence of God began, who prouided meanes for Charles, the which he could not foresee, neither by his industrie or authoritie finde out; that the restoring of this realme might be knowne to proceed from the miraculous bountie of God, the Gardien of this estate.

The League with England shaken.

We haue shewed, with what care the Duke of Bedford had built an vnion with the Dukes of Bourgogne and Brittany, to confirme the English affaires in France. Arthur of Brittanie Earle of Richemont, brother to the Duke of Brittanie, began to make a breach in this alliance. He had married one of the Burguignons Sisters, and Bedford the other. This Arthur was a Prince of good iudgement, who gouerned his brother peaceably, and had a great interest in his Brother in lawe of Bourgogne. Hee shall helpe much in the restoring of this estate, vnting the hearts of Princes distracted from the King; but his foure complections did much distemper Charles, who shall pay deere for the fruites of his seruice; as the course of the Historie will declare. The Duke of Bedford being at Paris, mightily puffed vp with his victories, plaid the King this insolent greatnesse, which made him odious to the French (although they durst not shew threw it) was likewise hatefull to his owne people. Man hath alwaies the miserie that he seekes, and is the plotter of his owne misfortune. This pride bred a iarre betwixt him and the Earle of Richemont, and made a way to the generall diuision of these confederate Princes, and reunion of the whole realme. Richemont was come vnto him, to be employed in some honorable charge, fit for his house & person, making great esteeme of his loue, whereof their alliance seemed an assured gage. But he found nothing but discontent. Arthur was of a French humour, nourished in the mildnesse of our Kings, bred vp in their armes, and had bene prisoner for them at the battaile of Azincourt: the time onely had withdrawne him from the Kings seruice, whom euery man held lost. The pride of Bedford reuiued in him this first affection: so as not able any longer to accord with the English, he resolues to seeke all meanes to recouer the Kings good grace and fauour, and to intangle his brother the Duke of Brittaine.

Thus he leaues the Duke of Bedford, and retires to his house with this discontent. There fallies out a fit occasion to aduance this businesse, to the good liking of Richemont, for the office of Constable was void, by the death of the Earle of Bouquham, slaine in the battaile of Vernueil. Charles sleeps not at these newes; but as if he had attended some good opportunitie, hee presently sends a trustie Gentleman to the Earle of Richemont, to offer him his loue, and for a gage thereof, the dignitie of the Constable of France, with all aduantages that a King may honour his seruient with. This first summons Richemont tooke reasonable well: but he answered; That he could not doe any thing without his Brother the Duke of Brittaine: with whom hauing conferred, he would presently aduertise Charles of his resolution: But, as the Kings urgent necessitie made him to reckon the minutes, so the tediousnesse of the Britons answer made him to languish.

His counsell likewise allowed well of this league; the which shall proue more troublesome vnto him, then honourable, and more preiudiciall then profitable vnto France. Charles, (without attending any answer from Richemont) sends John Louet, President of Prouence, one of the chiefe fauourites, then in credit: but he remembered not that he was in dislike with these Princes, so as Louet returned without any effect. Yet Charles (lothe to loose this opportunitie, and to giue the English time to reconcile himselte to these Britons,) sends to him with all speed a very honorable Ambassage, which was Yoland of Arragon, Queene of Sicile his mother in lawe, with Tannequy of Chastell, being very acceptable to these two bretheren. Their comming did greatly aduance this businesse. They preuailed so farre as the Duke of Brittaine, & the Earle of Richemont his brother were both ready to imbrace the Kings friendship, and to doe him seruice, so as the Duke of Bourgogne would yeeld vnto it: and in the meantime (to draw this businesse to some good end) Richemont should go and treat with his master, vpon good hostages for his safety. This condition was accepted by Charles: and to loose no time, the Lord of Albret and the bastard of Orleans, were sent vnto him for hostages, and the townes of Chinon, Loches, Lusignan & Meung, were giuen him for assurance vntill the end of the treaty, and ample passports made to go and come with all liberty. This worke began this yeare, in November, and shal end the next yeare with a notable successe.

But the Duke of Bourgogne imbraced an other notable occasion, which shall more preiudice the English, then this occurrent of Brittain. We haue said that this leuain was layde in the yeare 1423. by the marriage of Isauelme, Countesse of Hainault, Holland & Felnd, a wife contended for by two husbands; the Duke of Brabant, cousin germane and a deere friend to the Duke of Bourgogne; and the Duke of Glocester brother to the Duke of Bedford, and vncle to Henry the 6. King of England, two great parties which shall diuide the Dukes of Bedford & Bourgogne, and shall be the meanes to reconcile the Bourguignons to Charles, & reduce him to the obedience of this crowne, expell the English out of France, and restore the realme. But the prouidence of GOD which goes insensibly by degrees aboue mans conceipt, must be distinctly considered. About the ende of this yeare, Isauelme of Hainault comes out of England with

A the Duke of Glocester her second husband, fortified with an armie of fise thousand English. She caused the Nobility and the Cities to renue their othes, both to her and the Duke of Glocester her lawfull husband. All the Nobilitie obeyes this commandement, except the Earle of Conuersan, John of Lumont, Angilbert of Anguien, and all Townes, except Hals. The Duke of Bourgogne greatly affected this quarrell. The Duke of Bedford foreseeing the danger that might growe by the Bourguignons discontent, labors to suppress it in the breeding, and to that ende he drawes them to Paris with their friends, but in vaine. The one strues to inioy his estats: and the other to hinder him. So as whilest the cause is disputed in the Court at Rome, the armies prepare on eyther side to ende it by blood and spoile. The Glocestrian begins, & the Bourguignon follows. So the end of this yeare is the beginning of a warre of foure whole yeares, but it shalbe ended in fauour of the Bourguignon. This newe yeare shalbe spent in the altercations of the Court and Brittaine.

The Earle of Richemont comes to Tours to Charles, as he had promised to the Queene of Sicile, but not able to resolue any thing without the consent of the Duke of Bourgogne, (as we haue sayd,) the King seeing it very necessary he should go to him, doth sende to him with a very honorable Ambassage, James of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont and a Prince of his blood, the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishop of Puy. The ende of their negotiation was double, That the Duke of Bourgogne should like of the alliance betwixt the King and the Princes of Brittain, and that hee himselfe should bee reconciled vnto him, to liue and continue good friends, as they were neere in blood. The first was fully concluded with the Bourguignons consent, the other was surseased. The causes are specified, for that Philip could not with honestie let slippe the death of his father, whereof Charles was the Authour, this reconciliation could not bee well effected, vntil that Charles did chafe from him all such as had dipped their hands in this massacre, eyther as fauours or as executioners. They were specified by name, John Louet President of Prouence, Tannequy of Chastell, William d'Anaugour, John of Gyac, son to that Lady of Gyae, who perswaded John Duke of Bourgogne, to go to Charles at Monfresau-sant Yonne, where he was slaine. But these were but colours, for notwithstanding their absence from Court, yet the Bourguignon seemed to be nothing inclined to the Kings seruice. In effect, he stood watching the oportunitie to effect his desires, and so entertayned time, to keepe the stakes, as the whole course of the Historie will declare. Charles imploying all his friends and meanes, intreats Amedee, Duke of Sauoye to be a mediator of this accord. In respect hereof he comes to Monnel in Cresse, but in truth this was but a shadow. They all sought to get from Charles, and so watched for oportunitie. Yet the Bourguignon made all shewes of his seruice vowed to the King & the establishment of France, which he lamented infinitely to be fallen into the hands of Strangers. He spared no cheere nor entertaynement for the Ambassadors, and for a gage of sincere loue. Philip giues his yongest Sister Anne, in marriage to the Earle of Clermont, but with an intent to winne a Prince of the blood neere the King. Thus the Bourguignon leueled alwayes at this marke, & did nothing but with an intent to maintaine his greatnesse at what price soeuer.

In the meane time the meeter smart for the follie of great men. At the returne of these Ambassadors, the Court is in an vpror, Charles greues to chafe away his seruants, which could not be done but in contempt of his authority. And yet the Ambassadors cryed out, that without it they should not effect any thing: and the more they feared the execution, the more they hindered the Kings seruice. d'Anaugour parted first with the good liking both of King and Court. Gyac made his peace, by the mediation of the Queene of Sicile, who had all power in this action. The King was wonderfully discontented for the departure of Tannequy of Chastell, whome hee called Father. A man beloued and of amiable conditions. But there was no remedy. Hee had giuen the chiefe stroake to John of Bourgogne. So likewise hee protested without any difficultie, to retyer himselfe whether soeuer his maister should command him.

He

1425. Hee beseeched him to giue him an autentiell testimoniall, that it was not for any fact of his, but for the good of his seruice. He obtains it, and a promise withall, that his offices should be continued him. Thus he retyers to Beucaire in Languedoc, and the office of Prouost of Paris remayned to him still, with the fee, and a good reputation with all men, to haue bene a good seruant to the King, and carefull of the publicke good. John Louuet President of Prouence, disputed his departure with some bitterness and obstinacie. What iniustice is it (saith hee) to condemne a man without hearing? What breach, to vse the Kings seruants thus, for an others pleasure? But not onely the Bourguignon and the Britton hated him to the death, but also the Court and people did detest him. A man of a high minde, cunning, obstinate, reuengefull, cruell. Great men hated him, as crossing their affaires with the King, abusing his tractable disposition: and meane men, as the horse-leech and the sponge of the publicke treasure, and a man without mercie. The Bourguignon hated him as the first motor of his Fathers murder; and the Britton, as hauing giuen counsell to the Earle of Ponthieu to take him prisoner at Chantonneaux. Hauing gotten great welth and impouerished the King and the Realme, hee had matched his Daughters in good houses. The one, with the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans, the other with the Lord of Soyse. The respect of this alliance saued his life. He was safely conducted to Auignon, and from thence hee retyres into Prouence, without any other fame then to haue gouerned the King ill. His daughter of Soyse died with thought, for her fathers disgrace. Cyac returns into grace more then before, hauing purchased the fauour of the Queene of Sicile: But hee shall soone pay for these imaginations of his happinesse, not onely succeeding the President in his misfortune, but also loosing his life after an ignominious sort.

The Duke of Brittain comes to King Charles.

The Duke of Brittain, who came to Charles to Saumur: he tooke the othe of fidelitie, offering him all seruice. The Bourguignon speakes not yet one word for the King; onely he forbears to make warre against him, hauing a plausible excuse, for his not lending any more men to the Duke of Bedford, being busied for the Brabantine, against the Glocesterian, in the warre of Haynault and Holland. So this accident bred some ease to Charles, but no releefe. During these confusions in Court, Mans was lost, and after it the rest of Mayne obeyed the Earle of Salisbury. But the Constable of Richmont, (being freed from those domesticall crosses which might hinder his credit with the King) would make prooue of his valour, in arming the Brittons against the English. And as in the beginning all is good; at this first command all Brittaine riseth, and runnes to this warre. But these troupes being raised, and not yet ioyned to frame the body of an armie; behold the Earle of Warwicke marcheth suddenly with a goodly armie, gathered out of all the garrisons of Normandie, the inhabitants of Townes, and the Nobilitie of the Countie, with great speed, who besiegeth and taketh Pontorson, a towne vpon the confines of Normandie & Brittaine, neere Saint Michels mont. This prickt forward the Constable, to whome this scorne belonged. After that Warwicke was retired, hauing left a garrison in his conquest, behold the Constable comes to Pontorson with his Brittons, he besiegeth it, beats it, and takes it by force, making a great slaughter of the English.

This successe gaue him courage to passe on: the Towne of Saint James of Beuueron did much disquiet that Countie. Hee attempts it, hoping to be succored with men and mony from France. But hauing words alone without effects, his Brittons (being for the most part voluntaries,) slippe away dayly, notwithstanding any preuention of the Constables, who resolved (before this warlike multitude had abandoned him) to make profit of his presence, and to giue a generall assault. The neerenesse of Auranches (where the Earle of Suffolke with Scales, (famous captaines among the English army, armed with goodly troupes) gaue him occasion of feare, least they should charge his men in the heate of the assault. To this ende, he sends forth two thousand men out of the body of his army, to meete with these imagined English.

The

A The Comanders hauing discouered euen to the gates of Auranches, and found nothing, they resolve to returne to the army, not giuing the Constable any other advertisement. The Brittons being at the assault, seeing those men come, suppose them to be English, and fearing to be coopt in, hauing an enemy both before and behind, they resolve to leaue their ladders, and retyer to their Campe. Their retreat was very difficult, by reason of a poole with a narrowe Causey, which they had wonne with great labor and paine. The beseegeed seeing the Brittons forsake the walls, sally forth courageously after them, recouer the quarter abandoned, where there was a point that flanked the poole, in the which they plant threescore archers. There were eight or nyne hundred Brittons shut vp betwixt the walles and the poole: so as from this recouered point, they might choote them one after one. The rest of the English garrison issuing forth the Towne furiously, put these amazed Brittons to the sword, who are cyther gauled with English arrowes, like beasts in a toyle, or with a desperate courage leape into the poole. Thus lesse then five hundred men, ouerthrew about eight thousand. The Campe was abandoned and spoyle, eigheteen ensignes lost, with the banner of Brittain. Many prisoners were taken, after the English had bene wearied with killing. The principall that were slaine, were the Lords of Molac, Coitivy, la Motte, & many captaines of marke. The artillery, engins and all the rest of the munition remayned for a payne.

The Brittons defeated by their valour.

C This vnseasonable alarm, greatly troubled the Constable, who was now become all the hope of the French, as if hee carried all France vpon his shouldiers like an other Atlas. To repaire this ridiculous disgrace, he raiseth newe forces in Brittain with all speed, he ioynes vnto him the troupes of Ambrosi of Lore to be assisted with his valour, and hauing giuen them their pay, hee causeth them to march into Anion, where hee takes la Flesche, Galerande, Ramsfort, Malicorne, and so reuiues the hearts of his men after a notable losse, and kept his enemy in awe. From thence he goes to Court, where there were other desseings then to fight with the English. A man fitter to braue it in a counsell of State, then to dispute a battaile or the leege of a Towne. He came to Court to be the author of many confusions during this yeare: and on the other side, his brother the Duke of Brittain, before it passe, shall leaue the party of France, and reconcile himselfe vnto the English: that the honour of our deliuerance might bee giuen to God, the gardian of this Monarchie, and not to these Princes of Brittaine, to whome Charles was too much affected, in buying their friendship so deere being euen then vnprofitable, when as hee had greatest neede yet in their season, all these instruments worke to restore our decayed estate. But these were the Constables good seruices. After this shamefull disgrace, hee seekes to couer his fault, exclaiming first against the King, as if hee had bene the cause of this infamous disorder happened at Saint James, & hauing too freely discouered his griefes vnto the King, he presumed to take John of Malestroit Chancellor of Brittain prisoner, as beeing particularly charged to solicit the payement of such money as was appointed for this Britton army. Charles was much offended with this presumption, and in despite of the Constable, caused Malestroit to bee presently released, and sent into Sauoy. The Constable was greatly discontented with this proceeding, the which he tooke as an affront done to his person, and resolves to be reuenged. So great were the confusions of that age, as the seruant durst prescribe a Lawe to his maister: and his counsell bandie against him to controule his will. Yea the Princes of the bloud (so great was the corruption of that wretched age) were the chiefe controllers of the Kings actions. Then was there nothing more miserable then France, who discontented with her King, nourished the ambition of many Kings. This ielous ambition did nothing cure the infirmities of our Estate. Charles found it lost, he could not raise it alone. To debase his authority was no meanes to cure the confusions of the realme. And as there is nothing more troublesome then affliction, the French nation beeing then extremely afflicted, did nothing amend their condition; in casting vpon the King the reproches of their calamities.

Richmont stirs up new troubles in Court.

He exclaims against the King.

A dangerous waywardnesse to make the King odious or contemptible.

Na

This

1426.

This was to deprivie themselves of their head, wherein consists the whole life of the bodie. An vnreasonable discontent. The whole body of the State was sicke, and this distastd people would haue their head sound. A notable circumstance, for it is strange, that (after so many miseries,) this domestical confusion had not bene the vter ruine of the State. But let vs returne to our discourse. The Constable had great credit with the counsell, whome in the beginning the King had greatly countenanced: but the priuate practises, and the generall discontent of great persons, had made him halfe a King: the people detested them, as managing all things at their pleasure, to the preiudice of the common weale. There were two Mignons that did greatly vex them. Gyac, and Camus of Beaulieu. They resolue by a generall consent to dispatch them.

The Kings
Mignons slaine by the Counsell.

The Princes, with the Lords of Albret and Tremouille (who had a great interest in the State,) were of the partie. But the Constable must do the execution. The matter concluded betwixt them, was thus executed: Gyac was taken in bed with his wife, carried to Dun le Roy: condemned and executed: that is, he was put into a sacke and cast into the riuer. The Constable performed this office, without any other forme of lawe, then his bare commande. Afterwards Camus, borne in Auvergne, as hee walked in the Kings lodging, was venturously slaine, by a soldiari belonging to the Marshall of Bouffiac. Charles vnderstood it, and in a manner, toucht the bloud of his two domestical seruants, being wonderfully discontented. but the time (which did authorise these confusions) caused him to swallowe this pill quietly. Tremouille married Gyacs widowe, the heire of Lisle Bouchart, and entred newly in credit with the King, giving him to vnderstand that all was for his seruice, so as there was no more speeche there of: every man shut both eyes and cares. But Tremouille shall haue his turne: hee shall leaue some of his haire, and hardly saue the mould of his doubled. Thus the affaires of Court ebbed and flowed, the which raiseth vp one and cast downe another. In this deceytfull manner of life, there is nothing certaine but incontinencie, fauours being given not by desert, but most commonly by a blind appetite, which hath no other iudgement, but the apprehension of weake heads, diuiding the happinesse of a Countie life into quarters, this day to one, and to mortowe to another. A goodly lesson for such as are fauored in Court, not to bee transported with vaine hope, toyes to deceiue the indifferente. The surest gards of prosperity, are Integritye, wisdom, modesty, and patience: to remember aduersity in prosperitie, according to the precept of the wife.

This was the good gouernment of the Constable of Richmont, a bolde practicer of these domestical confusions, whilest the Bourguignon plied his businesse. We haue made mention of the sute of Iaqueline, Contesse of Hainault and Holland, for Humfry Duke of Glocestier, her pretended husband, against Iohn Duke of Brabant, her lawfull husband, for so had Pope Martin pronounced it, in fauour of the Brabantin. but from lawe they go to armes. The Bourguignon supported the Brabantin. These Princes (hauing prepared their forces,) begin by writing. The Glocestier accuseth the Bourguignon of couetousnesse and trecherie. The Bourguignon giueth him the lie. But from reproches they fall to armes. The Bourguignon offers the Glocestier to ende the question by combate: and by that triall to auoide the effusion of their sold a bloud.

The Glocestier accepts it: all is prepared for the combate, but the Duke of Burgundie interpreteth his authoritie. To this ende hee calls the cheefe men of all estat to Paris, to quench this fire, and by common aduice decrees, That, that day should be disannulled, neither should it bee preiudiciall to eyther partie. That is to say, As being well veued and considered, there was no iust cause for eyther to call the other to this wilfull combate, from the which they could not depart, although it were accepted, without great preiudice to both their honours. In the meantime neither the Popes authority, nor the Regents decree, by the generall aduice of the

A States, could preuaile, but all burst forth into open waire. The Bourguignon proued the stronger: so as the Glocestier leauing Iaqueline at Mons (posted into England for newe forces, but all was in vaine, the Bourguignon making his profit of this Princes absence, did easily effect his desire, hauing no oposite but a woman, dishonored for her infamous adulteries. Hee failes not to enter Hainault with a stronge army, and with all force to reduce this people to reason.

The Country seeing it selfe pressed by the Bourguignons forces, (neither hoping for nor desiring any succors from England, and perswaded that Iaqueline supported a bad cause) resolue to obey the stronger. Hauing to that effect protested vnto their Lady, what they thought fitting for their dutie, they seize on her person, and deliuer her into the hands of the Duke of Bourgogne. Philip receiues her honorably, and promisseth her all offices of friendship to comfort her. From Mons hee carrieth her to bee conducted with a goodly traine to Gand, by Lewis of Chalons, Prince of Orange, a braue Noble man. The Cantois employ their best meanes to honour her. This great liberty gaue her meanes to make an escape from this goodly cage: so as hauing practised some for her guide, shee disguiseth her selfe in the habit of a man, and retyres from Gand to Breda, where shee doth assure the riuer of Garide, and doth solicit the Townes of Holland by her Agents. The Bourguignon (foreseeing by these beginnings a long continuance of trouble) flies thither with his army. He enters the Countie: at the first they all resist him, for the respect the subjects bare to their Lady. But as the inconueniences of warre increased dayly, and that Philip did shewe by publike writings and priuate practises, that whatsoeuer hee did, was to maintaine the right of the lawfull husband, many Townes yeelded vnto him. At this time Iohn Duke of Brabant, the lawfull husband of Iaqueline, dies in the Castell of Lenenure, hauing instituted Philip of Bourgogne his heire. The Citties seeing the Bourguignon supported both by force, and right, followe him by a common consent, as twise a Conquerour, and perfwade their Lady not to oppose her selfe obstinately against so reasonable a necessity.

So without any other force, but the happy successe of the stronger, an accord was made, betwixt Philip Duke of Bourgogne and Iaqueline Contesse of Hainault and Holland, vpon these conditions: That Iaqueline doth acknowledge her Cousin, Philip Duke of Bourgogne, for the lawfull heire of her Countie, and from thence forth doth make him gouernour of Hainault, Holland and Zeland. All these Estats should take their oath and gouernance of fealtie vnto Philip. All fortresses should bee deliuered into his hands, and she promise neuer to marrie without his consent. This Philip was honorably receiued throughout all these Estats, to the content of some and discontent of others, according to their diuers humours: but force controuled all. Iaqueline made a good shewe, yet greatly discontented to see him her maister. Such was the Tragical Comedie of this long sute, for the quiet of these Estats and the greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgogne, who made his profit of all sides, for soone after William Earle of Namur, left him the Earldome of Namur, whereof he takes possession, to the great discontent of the Ligeis, as wee shall see hereafter. This greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgogne bred ieaousie in the Duke of Bedford: hee being assisted by the Duke of Frisland, his open enemy, and the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, whome hee sees hourly to growe great in his authority.

Thus hearing more mischeefe to fall vnto him by that meanes, hee resolues to fortifie himselfe with newe helpes, and to this ende hee goes into England, leauing the affaires of France, in charge of the Earles of Warwike, Suffolke and Salisbury. His stay was not long, necessity pressed him. Hee obtaines both men and money, fit remedies to preuent a storme. Hee returnes into France with ten thousand men, and a notable summe of money for their pay. For the good employment of these newe forces, hee resolues to beseege Montargis, a dangerous thorne, both for the neerenesse to Paris, and the conuerse of the Bourguignon, who continued his desings, notwithstanding the stil ieaousie of these Princes.

1426. The charge of this seerge was giuen to the Earles of Warwicke and Suffolke, with A three thousand men: therell were disperfed in Normandie, and in Townes bordering vpon Picardie, for feare of the Bourguignon, in whome he had no confidence. Montargis is befeeged, and although the waters hindered their approach to the walles, yet within fewe dayes it was fierly battered by the English, and valiantly defended by the French.

The seerge of Montargis happie for the French.

The Constable loth to go to the releefe of Montargis. They cie out for succour, but the affaires in Court were so wonderfully confused, (by the inextingine ialousies of the great men) that one gazed vpon an other, yet no man stirred, although Charles continually cried, to armes. In the ende they began to march: and although the Constable had busied himselfe in this leuie, yet fearing the example of Saint James, hee would not hazard himselfe in the leading thereof, alleaging many colour: to saue himselfe from blowes. For want of him, the charge was giuen to the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans: to William of Albret Lord of Oruall, to the Lords of Gaucourt, Guitry, Grauille, Villar, la Hire, Cyles of Saint Simon, Gaultier of Frossard, Iohn Stuard a Scot, and other valiant Captaines, wholed sixteene or sixteene hundred fighting men. Their purpose was onely to vittell the befeeged, whilst the King raised greater forces in the Countreies of his obedience. The Constable remayned at Largeau attending the issue, which succeeded more happily then the desseine of to sligh a succour. The Earle of Dunois doth aduerse the befeeged of his approach.

Montargis beleued and the English decaied.

The ruer forced the English to make three lodgings, those within the Towne had cunningly surprisid the bridges vpon the ruer of Loing: and after the succours had secretly recovered the Rendez-vous, those within the Towne stopped the counseil the water so artificially, as the ruer ouerflowes the bridges. At the same instant all the troupes charge the English: la Hire leading the first troupe, chargeth the quarter where the Lord de la Poole, brother to the Earle of Suffolke commaunded, &c crying Montioye S. Denies he fills all with confusion, killing, burning and spoyling. de la Poole with much adoe saues himselfe with seauen more, in his brothers lodging in the Abby, without the Towne, vpon the way to Nemours. The Earle of Dunois (whose rendez-vous was towards the Castle) hauing ioyned with the Townesmen (who were issued forth with great resolution) chargeth the body of their Campe, the which he wholly ouercame.

The slaughter was great, for so small troupes, for they numbred sixteene hundred slaine vpon the place. In this charge the Earle of Suffolke fauored by the waters, gathers together al he can in his quarter, and recouers the hilles, to make his retreat to Chisleau-Landon, and Nemours, places vnder the English commaunde, and of neereft retreat. The honour of this happie successe, was attributed to the Earle of Dunois whereat the King receyued an incredible content, as a refreshing to this burning feuer, and the Constable Richemond a greuous discontent, being absent: and so this yeare ended.

The Constable seeks all meanes to crosse the King.

But the newe yeare will shewe what fruits Brittain yeelded to France during her great necessities. This checke at Montargis did somewhat coole the Duke of Berford heat, but the Constables ambition nothing at all: who hauing vnderaken to play the King with the King, sought to crosse all the humors of this Prince: hee hated what hee loued, disallowed what hee allowed, and disprayed what hee commended. After the violent death of Gyac (of whome wee haue spoken) hee had fauored Tremouille, to plant him in the Kings good fauour. But as Ambitious hath neyther faith nor honestie, Tremouille finding himselfe inward with the King, retaynes all fauour for himselfe, little esteeming both the Constable and the Princes.

Newe troubles in Court by the Constable.

Hee did onely associate vnto him in credit, Prie and la Borde, men of small account, to vse them at his pleasure, Iealousie mounts againe vpon the Stage: the Princes, Constable and cheefe officers of the Crowne, in steede of taking counsell to pursue the good successe of Montargis, they combine together to worke their wills vpon Tremouille.

A mouille, and his partians, as they had done vpon Gyac. The plot was orderly layed. 1427. James of Bourbon Earle of Clermont, and Charles of Bourbon Earle of Marche, Princes of the Bloud, become heads of this league against Tremouille and his companions. The league is thus plotted. Forasmuch as the King is gouerned by base people, to the contempt of the Princes and officers of the Crowne, and to the great oppression of the poore people, the confederates meane to punish these Flaterers, abusing the Kings name and authority, and to approach nere vnto his maiestie, to gouerne the affaires for the good of his seruice, and the ease of France. The execution must beginne with the seizure of Tremouille, and continue with Prie and la Borde. The Constable should take Tremouille, and the Princes were to seize on the City of Bourges, where Prie and la Borde were in the great Towre, and so to punish them.

The King discontented with the Constable and the Princes.

But this enterprise came to naught, for Tremouille hauing intelligence of this desseine, not only preserved himself, but hauing perswaded the King, that this complot was made against his owne person and authority, it so troubled Charles, as he came in person to Bourges, and preuented the Princes entry, and without any more disguising he was strangely incensed against the Constable, as the author of these troubles and confusions, forbidding the citties to receiue him.

The Constable notwithstanding smothered this disgrace, and to shew the deuotion he had to the Kings seruice, he goes to field, gathers together a goodly troupe of Brittons, and puts himselfe into Pontorson (a Towne abandoned:) he fortifies it, and mans it with a good garrison, vnder the command of Monsieur de Rostrenan and Beaufort. This doone, he dismisseth his Brettons. The Earle of Warwicke watched all occasions to surprise the Towne, when as behold these two gouernours minister a fit meanes: for (making a roade towards Auranches) they are both taken. Warwicke marcheth presently to the walles of Pontorson with his army. The Constable sends Bertrand of Dinan, Marshall of Brittany speedily with great succours. Yet the siege continues obstinately. New supplies are sent them by the Duke of Brittaine, the which were cut in peeces. Pontorson beeing painefully parled with in the ende yeelds to the English, the besieged departing with bag and baggage.

Pontorson yeelds to the English.

But this was not the ende of this victory: the English armye increased both in number and courage by this happy successe: and threatens Brittaine with fire and sword. They prepare to enter, Iohn Duke of Brittaine wearied with so many losses, and fearing worse, making no account of the succours of France, (to whom he was coldly affected) takes part with the Duke of Bedford, renounceth all other alliances, promitteth to acknowledge the King of England for King of France, and to take the oath of obedience, such as his predecessors were accustomed to doe to the Kings of France. Behold the great good which Brittaine brought to our country in her extremest afflictions, after so many hopes and imbracings. This yeare is painefull, shamefull and confused, but the forerunner of a worthy deliuerance. Take courage then my countreimen in the remainders of this tempest.

They threaten to enter into Brittaine.

The Britton leaves the alliance of France.

We haue said, that after that miserable battaile of Vernueil, the towne of Mans yeelded to the English. The inhabitants, not able to beare the imperious command of the English, resolue in the end to shake off that yoke: For the effecting whereof, they seize vpon a gate, giuing intelligence thereof to the Lord of Oruall, brother to the Lord of Albret, who happily arriues, takes the Cittie, and cuttes the English in peeces. The Earle of Suffolke was within the Castell. Talbot (that renowned Captaine) was at Alencon, he aduertiseth him of this surprise. Talbot prepares his succours with such silence, and flies thether with such speed, as he arriues at Mans, the third day after the surprize. Our Frenchmen (transported with ioy for so noble a conquest, and fearing no enemy among so many enemies, both politick and discontented) slept securely in their beds after the French manner, without feare or gard. When as Talbot (hauing entered the City by scaling) surpriseth them in their beddes, and killes them without resistance,

Mans surprised and the English cut in peeces.

Mans lost againe by the French.

1428.

A notable example, both to imitate and to flee: to flee, that through carelesnesse we suffer not our selues to be surprized like Swine. It is the very terme wherewith the Historie doth blemish this brutish loath. To imitate, not to hold any thing impossible, when as resolution doth accompany him that hath any notable attempt in hand. But this victorie staves not at Mans: the Earle of Suffolke, with his braue Talbot goes to field, they marche to Laual (a Towne of importance, vpon the confines of Anjou and Bretanie,) they take it easily, by the onely terror of their victorious armes, incounting no enemy to withstand them.

Domesticall confusions.

The whole Court was in confusion, the Princes of the bloud and our Constable, studie not to make warre against the English, but against the Mignons. It was their proiect, as if the whole state depended vpon the Kings fauour, who lost daily, to the general discont of all the French. So this yeare had nothing memorable, but that our warriours had lost both iudgement, courage, and force: that through their defects God might raise vp some extraordinarie meanes, for the deliuerie of this Monarchie, almost ruined. Our Captaines then did some exploits, taking Roche fort, Bertan court, Iannill, Chisteau newf, Puiset, Tourry, Mompieau, Nogent le Retrou and Lude, but what toyes were these, in regarde of the stately triumphes of the English.

Tournay yields to the French.

That which was most admirable this yeare: amidst all these domesticall discontents, and all these ruines and desolations of the State (which might well haue quailed the best affected) those of the City of Tournay, (after long contentions) in the end abandon both English and Bourguignon, protesting solemnly, not to acknowledge any other King, then Charles the 7. sonne to Charles the sixt, as the true and lawfull King of France; and by consequence their lawfull Lord: yet they made a truce with the Bourguignon, being their neighbour, with the Kings good liking. In the meane time, the Duke of Bedford leuies what men and money he can, both in France and England, for some great attempt. Charles hath intelligence from diuers parts, but what could he doe in so deepe dispare of his affaires, and in so visible an impossibilitie.

The famous Siege of Orleance.

ALL the Citties of this side Loire, from the Ocean Sea, were lost, with the whole countries of Normandie, Picardie, the Ile of France, Brie and Champaigne. He had nothing left but the Townes lying vpon the riuer of Loire, from Cyen to Angers, for La Charité held for the Bourguignon. The chiefe was Orleance: this being wonne, what could hold out long for the French: Bourges could make small resistance, if the English had forced Orleance? The enemies of our State (who called Charles King of Bourges) threatened to take from him this small and languishing royaltie. Orleance then was the marke wher at the Duke of Bedford aimed, who hauing wonne the Britton, it greatly fortified the English affaires in France. As for the Bourguignon, he had in a manner recovered the Estates of Holland, Hainault, Zeland and Namur. And although ambition and couetousnesse may neuer be bridled: yet these Princes (nothing friendly among themselves) but as comon enemies to this Crowne, agreed

A agreed well in this; to make their priuate profit by the ruine of our state. But man purposeth, and God disposeth: we shall soone see how much he scornes their vanities. In this lamentable time, mans reason could not discern by what means Charles should resist to mighty enemies. But in the weakenesse of this Prince, I read with joy the words of the Original, which saith. During the time that the English held their siege before the noble City of Orleans, King Charles was very weake, beeing abandoned by the greatest part of his Princes and other Noble men, seeing that all things were opposite unto him: yet had he still a good trust and confidence in God. He was not deceiued in this hope, as the sequele will shew.

The charge of this siege at Orleans was giuen to the Earle of Salisbury, a wise & valiant Captaine: hauing giuen good testimonies of his sufficiency, for the well managing of this siege, he resolved to take in all the forts neere vnto Orleans, that obeyed the French, & beginning with the weakest, parting from Paris, (taking his way through the Countie of Chartres) he seizeth vpon all the smal Townes, wherein our Captaines had so much toyled but a fewe monethes before. Nogent le Retrou, Puiset, Roche fort, Fertran court, Iannille, Tourry, Mompieau, the Castell of Plunie, and la Ferte de Gaules, and approching neere the Cittie, (both aboue and beneath) Meung, Baugency, and Largau. In the ende he plants himselfe before Orleans, the 6. of October, in the yeare 1428.

The Earle of Salisbury sets downe before Orleans.

A day to be obserued, for that the 12. of May the yeare following was the last fit of our disease, which changed the estate of our miserable country, like vnto a pleasant spring, after a long and sharpe winter, when as a goodly summer crownes all our labours with abundance of peace and plenty: So this siege continued iust 7. monethes. The bruit of this great preparation did wonderfully disquiet both court, and country, vnder the French obedience: in the weakenesse and confusions of the state. The King, after the taking of la Charité, was commonly resident at Poitiers, he now retires to Chinon, to be neerer to Orleans. The townes willing y contribute, men, money, and victuals. Many great personages flee to this siege, to defend the chiefe strength of our King and Kingdome. Lewis of Bourbon the sonne of Charles Earle of Clermont, the Earle of Dunois, ballard of Orleans, the Lords of Boussie and Fayette, Marshalls of France: John Steward, Constable of Scotland, William of Albret Lord of Oranill, the Lords of Thouars, Chaigny, Grauille & Chabannes. The Captaines la Hire, Naintrailles, Theolde of Valpergue, & John of Lesfego, Lombards, with many other great personages. There were not any of the Prouinces of Daulphiné and Languedoe for that the Dukes of Bourgonne and Sauoy at the same instant prepared a great army, by the meanes of Lewis of Chaulons Pante of Orange, to invade those Countries being wholly in the Kings obedience. The Orleanois resolues to defend himselfe. He presently beates downe all that might accommodate the enemy, suburbs, howses of pleasure, wine pressies, yea and the temples themselves.

Salisbury doth likewise vse great dexterity and diligence to plant his siege, towards Paris, and the port Banniere: he builds a great Bastille, which he calles Paris. Another at the port Renard which he names Rouen. Towards S. Lawrence, another to the which he gaue the name of Windsore. At the port of Bourgonne he fortified a ruined Temple, called S. Loup, and neere vnto it an other, named S. John the white. At the Porterai hee built a great fort vpon the ruines of the Augustines Church, calling it London: from the which hee wonne the Towre vpon the bridge, and all with wonderfull speede. All the cittie is inuironed, hauing neyther issue nor entry, but with sore fighting. And in these toyles they spend the rest of the yeare.

The Earle of Salisbury builds vp forte

The first day of the new yeare, the English (for a new yeares gift to the cittie) bring their scaling ladders courageously to the Bulwarke at the port Renard, but they were valiantly repulsed by the defendants: the next day the Admirall of Cullant hauing passed the riuer of Loire at a foord (winter being very drie this yeare) visits them of the citie & brings the diuers necessities: vpon his returne, he incounters some English troupes 1429. troupes which came stragling from forrage. He chargeth them, cuts them in peeces, A and so retires without danger. Thus the moneth of Ianuarie passeth, without any other memorable exploite. But there happened a strange accident the 20. of Februarie following. The Duke of Bedford sent Lenten prouision to the Earle of Salisbury, with some munition of warre, vnder the conduct of Iohn Fastfall, and Simon Bowyer, with 1700. men for their garde. The Duke of Bourbon brought a goodly succour of foure thousand men to the besieged. He resolues to charge this English troupe, hauing well viewed their numbers. It was likely the stronger should haue the victorie, but the issue was contrary to the desseigne. For it chanced (as his men marched confidently, as it were to an assured victory, without any iudgement,) the English seeing them in doubt how they should fight, either on foote or horseback, and irresolute, in the end they resolute to charge the French: it falling out many times in this exercise, that he which begins, winnes. To conclude, without any farther aduise, the English embracing this occasion, charge our troupes, who were so surprised with this unexpected impression, as they presently giue way to the English Bowe-men. All flic, some here, some there, without order, without command, and without courage, and few fight. Such as made head were slaine. The rest saue themselves within Orleans. There were five or six hundred of our men slaine vpon the place. The English lost but one man called Brisantenn. The chiefe of our side, were the Lord of Oruall, of the Noble house of Albret, Iohn Stuard, Chasteaubrun, Montpipel, Verduisant, Larigot, La Greue, Diuray, Puilly, with better then a hundred Gentlemen.

This ouerthrow was called the battaile of Herings, for that they carried them to the besiegers. The amazement was greater then the losse, for that the Earle of Clermont, a Prince of the blood, who should haue beene a ring-leader of resolution and magnanimitie, in these extreame accidents, was so amazed with this losse, as he retired with his men, leauing the Cittie to the bastard of Orleans, who resolues to attend the end of this siege, at what price soeuer. In this gallant resolution, he was veremoullie seconded by the Lords of Guitry, Gaucourt, Graville, Villars, La Hire, and Xaintrailles, lights of great hope in this cruell storme, and worthy of eternall memorie in that they dispaired not of this monarchie; in so apparent dispaire. And that which is chiefly to be obserued herein, the King (vnderstanding this retreat of the Earle of Clermont.) said, that he did see no meanes to saue the reit from shipwrack. To increase this feare, the Duke of Bourgogne comes to Paris at the same instant, with a troupe of six hundred men at armes richly appointed. Our Commanders (being full of resolution) were not onely to incounter with the English, but with the confusion of times; the Kings misfortune, and (which was worst of all) the amazement of the men of warre, who discouered plainly the disorder of the State. They were loth to cast the helme after the hatchet, but sought the most assured meanes to saue the Cittie in this storme. They aduertise the King hereof, who was so irresolute, as he referres all to their discretions. They resolute to deliuer the Towne into the Duke of Bourgogne hands, to keepe it for the Duke of Orleans, or the Duke of Angoulesme his brother, being then prisoners in England, with the Kings good liking. Pothon, Xaintrailles, and Peter of Orson, (wise and valiant men) go to Paris to the Duke of Bedford, vpon his assurance. He heares them, and returnes them presently, both for that he distrusts the Duke of Bourgogne, and held the conquest assured. The Burguignon was greatly discontented with the Duke of Bedford for his refusall, whom after that time he neuer loved.

The English triumphed thus as a victor, so as our Ambassadors could hardly saue themselves with their passport. Then the English (saith the originall) being in great prouidence, had no consideration that the wheele of fortune hath power to turne dryly. But the holy veritie of the church, which drawes vs to the wise prouidence of God; cries. I haue said to the fooles, play not the fooles: and to the wicked. Lift not up your hornes speake not with so great pride, for greatnesse comes not from the East nor West, neither from the North: it is God that raiseth up, and casteth downe. He holds a cup of Vine in his hand, he imparts it to euery

The King in dispaire of his affaires.

Orleans stands vpon termes to yeeld to the Duke of Bourgogne.

The Duke of Bedford refuseth the Deputies, and discontentes the Burguignons.

A euery one as he pleaseth. Truly the pride of the English, who possessed of this Monarchy, being drunke with his good fortune, was nowe come to his height: there remained nothing but the hand of the soueraigne Iudge to suppress him, but he shall not long hold it.

Our country, forget not the time of thy visitation, read in this true discourse, the estate of thy predecessors. Remember their afflictions, behold their feates, see the image of that time wherein thou hast borne a part, and iudge if now, onely thou beginnest to be afflicted. In this extremity, as the French were exceedingly distressed, so the English were transported with ioy, for their late victory, and reioycing with a new hope as if all were wonne, they cry to the besieged. Will you buy my faire herings: At the same instant the townsmen issue forth vpon the shoare. The Earle of Salisbury stood at a window in the tower vpon the bridge beholding the skirmish, when as one of his Captaines named Gladius, said vnto him. My Lord, behold here your city: here may you view it plainly. But behold a Cannon charged with stones was shot from the Towne, which ayimed at the Earles head, strooke him and left him dead in the place. This unexpected blow (comming as it were from heauen) changed this exceeding ioy of the English into mourning, being a man of great valour, who by his carriage had wonne great credit among them, beloued & honoured of all, for the mildenesse of his manners. So this losse troubled both the wits and affaires of the English armie, the which had greatly disbanded, if the Earle of Suffolke, Talbot, Iohn Fastfall and Seales, famous Captaines, had not chappily bene there, to reuue their spirits and forces, attending the Duke of *Bedford*s pleasure, who gaue the charge to Talbot, beeing the choite of their best men, with new forces. So as the siege is continued with more vehemencie then before, with great presumption, that all would go worke with the besieged.

In this occurrent, Charles knewe not what to doe, to whom should he flee? his Princes forsake him. Orleans beeing taken, whether should he retire? Bourges was ready to yeeld, and withall the Country adioyning. He had no whole Prouinces vnder his obedience, but Languedoc and Daulphiné. And at the same instant the Burguignon and Sauoyard prouide worke for him in those countries. The taking then of Orleans (which in reason seemed vnauoydable) was the ouerthrowe of Charles and his estate. There was no winking at that which was too apparent. That (considering the estate of his affaires in generall and of his house in particular; If Orleans should be lost) all the cities vpon the riuer of Loire, and in like sort the rest (already warring would abandon him.

Amidst these fearefull considerations what could the braue and Noble Commanders within Orleans doe; but plant their hopes in God and in themselves, A soueraigne remedie in extreame daungers. So (to purchase an honourable and profitable composition) they set a good face on it; giuing the English to vnderstand, that if they desired their liues, they should buye them deere. France reduced to so great an extremitie, and truly such, as men could doe no more, behold God raiseth vp an extraordinary meanes, the which meanes reason could not foresee, and much lesse prouide. A meanes which reuiued the daunted spirits, changed the face of our affaires, and dismaied the enemies. And to conclude, by a miraculous meanes gaue a happy successe both to our King and Realme: and this was the occasion.

A young Maiden named Ioane of Arc (borne in a village vpon the Marches of Parre) called Domremy, neere to Fauconleux of the age of eightene or twenty yeares: issued from base parents, her father was named Iames of Arc, and her mother Isabell, poore Country folkes, who had brought her vp to keepe their cattell, shee said with great boldnesse, That shee had a reuelation, howe to succour the King: how he might be able to chase the English from Orleans, and after that to cause the King to bee crowned at Rheims, and to put him fully and wholly in possession of his Realme.

After shee had deliuered this to her Father, Mother, and their neighbours, she 1429. she presumed to go to the Lord of Baudricourt, Prouost of Vaucouleurs. the boldly delivered vnto (him after an extraordinary manner) all these great misteries, as much wished for by all men, as not hoped for. especially comming from the mouth of a poore country maide, whom they might with more reason beleue to be possessed by some melancholy humour, then diuinely inspired, being the instrument of so many excellent remedies, in so desperate a season. After the vaine strivings of so great and famous personages. At the first he mocked her and reprov'd her, but hauing heard her with more patience, and iudging by her temperate discourse and modest countenance, that she spake not idly, in the ende he resolues to present her to the King for his discharge. So she arriues at Chinon the 6. daye of May, attyred like a man.

The disposition of Joane.

She had a modest countenance, sweet, ciuill and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retyred, her actions cold, shewing great chastity. Hauing spoken to the King or Noblemen with whom she was to negotiate. Shee presently retired to her lodging with an olde woman that guided her, without vanitie, affectation, babbling or courtly lightnesse. These are the maners which the Original attributs vnto her.

The matter was found ridiculous both by the King and his counsell, yet must they make some triall. The King takes vpon him the habit of a countriaman, to be disguised: this maide (being brought into the Chamber) goes directly to the King in this attire, salutes him with so modest a countenance, as if shee had bene bred vpon Court all her life. They telling her that shee was mistaken, shee assured them it was the King, although she had neuer seene him. Shee begins to deliuer vnto him this new charge, which (she saies) she had receiued from the God of heauen, as shee turned the eyes and mindes of all men vpon her.

This matter being referred to counsell, it was concluded, they should take the aduise of diuines. They answer, that in desperate diseases, the prouidence of God doth commonly raise vp extraordinary remedies, and imployes women, when as men grow faint hearted: as in the afflictions of Israel, he hath mightily vsed Deborah and Abigail. The one to teach the people, the other to kill a furious tyrant: and Judith, which was that great tyrant in the midst of his army. So as necessity, which made them to seeke all sorts of remedies, caused the King to try if this maide spake truth, but without the hazard of any thing.

Joane held to be an impostor or mad.

This Joane, holden for a prophetisse by many, is reported by Girard, called Lord of Haillin, and sundry other French writers, & plainly said to haue bin induced to this imposture by three Noblemen, who had incited hir thereto, and layed that plot, only to encourage King Charles to battaile, displaying of his state.

She is armed and sent to Orleans.

She desires of the King, that she may be conducted to Orleans, to begin the worke which she said she had in charge. A word remaining in Touraine, in a place called S. Katherine of Fierebois was brought vnto her, to bee armed therewith. They gaue her armes and horse, with a sufficient troupe to enter the City. Lewis of Cullent, Admiral of France, and James of Rieux Marshall, had charge to accompany her with some vi- Etualls to the besieged, and to haue a care, that all should bee wisely carried without hazard. She prepares her colours, & being armed at all points, she went to take leaue of the King, with a grace worthy of a great Captaine: beseeching him to trust in God in whose name she spake. Thus she parts from Chinon the 12. of Aprill.

Now they reckoned the sixt moneth of the siege: the besieged cri'd out for hunger. This victualling prouided at Blois, is conducted by the abbe named communier, with great care, as well for feare of the English, (who had their sentinells in all places) as for the distrust they had of this new commander. She marched in the foremost rank betwixt the Admirall and the Marshall, very watchfully carrying the countenance of a very resolute personage. They arriue (with this prouision) safely at Orleans, the English making no shew of arming, although she passed before their forts, in viewe of their army, yet had they scarce six hundred men in this supply.

The power of Gods prouidence is admirable in the hearts of men, making them to yeeld

A yeeld insensibly to what he hath decreed. This first blow stirred vp the spirits of the French. Orleans begins to reioyce at the sight of this maide, attired like a man, standing vpon the point of yeelding. This first releefe was not sufficient for so great a multitude. They resolued to fetch more victuals, and to that end would returne to Blois. But before their departure, the Maiden writes this Letter following, to the chiefe of the English armie, and sends it by a Trumpet. I haue truly set it downe out of the originall, in the owne proper stile, both for the reuerence of antiquitie, the noble courage of this Virgin, and the truth and state of the subiect.

King of England, doe reason to the King of Heauen, for his blood royall; yeeld up to the Virgin the Keyes of all the good Cities which you haue forced. She is come from heauen to reclaim the blood royall, and is ready to make a peace, if you be ready to doe reason. Yeeld therefore, and pay what you haue taken. King of England, I am the chiefe of this warre, where soeuer I encounter your men in France, I will chase them, will they or no. If they will obey, I will take them to mercie. The Virgin comes from the King of heauen, to driue you out of France. If you will not obey, she will cause so great a stirre, as the like hath not bene these thousand yeares in France. And beleue certainly, that the King of heauen will send her, and her good men at armes, more force then you can haue. Go in Gods name into your countrie, be not obstinate, for you shall not hold France of the King of heauen, the Sonne of Saint Mary, but Charles shall enjoy it, the King and Lawfull heire, to whom God hath giuen it, he shall enter Paris with a goodly traine. You William de la Poole, Earle of Suffolke, John Lord Talbot, Thomas Lord Scales, Lieutenants to the Duke of Bedford, and you Duke of Bedford, terming your selfe Regent of the Realme of France, spare innocent blood, and leaue Orleans in libertie. If you doe not reason to them you haue wronged, the French will doe the goodliest exploit that euer was done in Christendome: vnderstand these newes of God, and of the Virgin.

This Letter (being deliuered to the Earle of Suffolke,) was read with laughter. Charles and his Counsell were scorned, as seeking remedies without reason, and transported with folly in following of these vanities. They now assure themselves of a speedy victory, seeing that Charles is vncertaine what to doe. The Trumpeter is imprisoned, against the lawe of Nations, ready to be burnt in the sight of the besieged. When as suddenly there was other worke prepared for them. A new supply of victuals is made at Blois, through the care of Renold of Chartres, Chanceller of France, and Archbishop of Rheims, a great personage in his time. The Virgin goes to field for the sake conducting thereof to Orleans, but with a greater troupe then before: for the fame of her actions, and of this new successe, had drawne together seven or eight thousand men: like vnto a cheerefull Spring, which causeth trees being dead in shew, to sprout and spring againe. The commanders were not greatly moued with these popular brutes, giuing but cold beleefe to the Virgins visions and promises, so as they passe an other way for their greater safetie. The Virgin lets them go, forbearing to speake any thing before their comming to Orleans: Then she said, I will hide your selues from me, as if I were ignorant of your intentions, but you must not doubt of the performance of that which God hath decreed. This was the 20. of Aprill.

Orleans being thus fortified, both with men and victualles: the Earle of Dunois, Pothou and Maistrailles, holde a counsell what was to be done: they call her, and intreat her to deliuer her opinion.

My aduise is (sayth shee) that without any further delay, wee charge the English, that be iugers, for that (GOD being on our side) they cannot escape us: but before we proceed, let every man dispose of his conscience, and banish all lewd and naughtie persons out of the Armie. Although there were small hope or likelihood to vanquish a Conquerour, yet the Commanders resolute to accept and imbrace her counsell as an Oracle from God.

The Earle of Dunois made choise of fiftene hundred strong and lustie men for the fight, meaning to beginne with the Forte at Bowgonne gate, called Saint Loup. The Virgin goes in the foremost ranke, with the chiefe Captaines of the Armie. The

The besieged talles forth by the Virgins persuasion & takes a Forte. The 1429. The souldiers encouraged by her presence, assaile this fort furiously, beeing garded by A foure hundred English: neither arrowes, pikes nor halberds could stay the planting of their ladders. The virgin enters the fort first, crying, Moutiay S. Denis, the fort is wonne.

The English abandon their defences and suffer themselves to be slaine, by the French.
who (seeing themselves maistres of the fort, and wearied with the execution) take many prisoners. The artillery and munition beeing drawne forth, they set fire on the fort.
This chanced the 4. of May, a remarkable day, being the first frutes of the deliuery of Orleans, and the generall restoring of this Realme.

Thus the Virgin returns into the Cittie with her victorious souldiers. All the people followe her with cries of victory: she can hardly retire to her lodging: All the world runs to see her, and to commend her, both men women and children: all ene out confusedly with a ioy mixt with teares. Blessed be the Virgin which comes to deliue-us. On the other side, the English (seeing their men carried away like Chickens before the Eagle, and their force consumed as with fire from heaven) were greatly amazed, being in so great possibilitie to vanquish the French on all sides, Suffolke and Talbot make Orations to their men, to reuiue their spirites, daunted at this new and strange spectacle. But we must proceed, and not suffer the courage of the victorious Souldiers to growe colde. The Virgin goes to counsell with the chiefe of the Cittie, causing them to resolute to continue the next day, what they had so happily begunne.

At the breake of the day, the Virgins colours are carried through the Cittie: she C resolues to passe the riuer, and to take the Fortes on the other side. She passeth happily betwixt the Forte of Saint Loup that was ruined, and the new Tower, where she furiously assailes and winnes the Forte called Saint Iohn the White, and cuts all the Sould-diars in peeces: from thence she marcheth to the Portreau, where the great Bajun of London was built, vpon the Augustins Church. This place was valiantly combated through the resolution of both parties, but in the end it was forced. The victorie was double, in vanquishing of the enimie, and in deliuering of friends, for there were manie French prisoners found therein. There now remained the Tournelles, and the Ba-sion vpon the bridge, being the dungeon of their principall defence. The Virgin held this exploit sufficient for that dayes worke, leaving the rest vntill the morrow, to giue D the Souldiers breath. So the Fortresse being besieged, they prepare for the last attack.

The next day (being Saturday, the sixt of May) ended this dangerous tiege, which had continued seuen moneths. The sharpest Thorne remained yet behinde: the Tournelles adioyning to the bridge, was kept by Glacidas (one of the most resolute Captaines among the English), hauing well encouraged his men to defend themselves, and to fight for their liues. The skirmish begins at nine of the clock in the morning, and the Ladders are planted. A storme of English Arrowes falls vpon our men with such violence as they recoile. How now (saith the Virgin) haue we begun so well, to end so ill: let vs charge, they are our owne, seeing God is on our side. So every one recovering E his forces, flocks about the Virgin; the English double the storme, vpon the thickest of the troupes. The Virgin fighting in the foremost rankes, and encouraging her men to doe well, was shotte through the arme with an arrowe: She nothing amazed, takes the arrowe in one hand, and her sword in the other. This is a fauour (saies she) let vs go on, they cannot escape the hand of God. At this womans voice, amidst the sound of warre, the combate growes very hote. Our men greatly encouraged by this Virgin, runne headlong to the Basion, and force a point thereof. Then fire and stones raigne so violently, as the English being amazed, forsake their defences. Some are slaine vpon the place, some throw themselves downe headlong, and flie to the Towre vpon the bridge. In the end this braue Glacidas abandons this quarter, and retires into the bafe F Court vpon the bridge, and after him a great troupe of his Souldiers. The bridge greatly shaken with Artillerie, tried by fire, and ouer-charged with the weight of this multitude, sinkes into the water with a fearefull crie, carrying all this multitude with it.

accustomed to vanquish, but when they were vanquished. An example of mans vanitie, who (drunke with their victories,) cannot conceiue that the rodde of the Iudge of this world may touch them. The English lost in these three dayes skimi-shes, about eight thousand men, and we scarce a hundred, the which was Gods handle worke. If the ioy of Orleans were great, and the Virgins honour proclaimed in this happy successe, being proofes of her true foretellings. If her triumph were the double, when as passing through the Cittie (hauing her arme honourable hurt) she was murthered by the Earle of Dunquis, Pothon, Xaintrailles, and all the most famous Captaines: the perplexitie of Suffolke, Talbot and Scales, was not lesse, fore-B seeing the vnauoidable proceeding of their misfortune, if they should obstinately defend the other fortres that were towards Beausse, although a good part of their armie remained there. So they take counsell from danger: to abandon all these Fortes, to retire into some place of safetie, and to aduertise the Duke of Bedford of their misfortunes.

The same night they gather together with great silence, about nine thousand men, and take the way to Baugency. The Orleanois are watchfull, obseruing their departure, prepare to charge the enimie, but the Virgin would not consent thereto. And in truth this remainder was appointed for other victories. The inhabitants thus freed, issue early in the morning out of the Cittie, they come to the Basions, where hauing C gathered together great store of armes, victualles and baggage, they cast these great monuments of the English labours vnto the ground. They giue sollemne thanks vnto God, the author of so miraculous a deliuerie: and to the end this singular benefit might be celebrated yearely, they erect a monument for this memorable successe, King Charles the seventh armed, and Joane the Virgin likewise armed, both kneeling vpon their knees. Truly, thanksgiving for so excellent a good, is due to God onely, and this memory ought to bee religiously consecrated to posteritie, as the first frutes of the restoring of this Estate, then halfe dead through the force and might of Strangers.

To confirme this goodly victorie, the Virgin parts well accompanied from *Orle-
Dans*, and goes to the King to Chinon, to yeild him an account of her Commission.
It cannot be spoken, with what ioy this Prince beheld her, and what credit she purchased by this miraculous successe. But, My Liege (saith she) This is but a beginning, we must finish the God of heauens worke, causing you to be crowned at Rheims, and chas-sing your enemies out of your state. This is the commandement I haue received. And so by her aduice Charles assembles all his forces. The Constable of Richemont, (who reuer durst shew himselfe after the quarrell with Tremouille) is now reconciled by the Virgins intercession, and hereafter shall doe very good seruice to this Crowne. Charles of Fourbon, Earle of Clermont, is now wonderfully discontented, to haue retired himselfe from the battaile of Herings, hauing not honourably assisted in these exploits, in E the which he had held the first ranke. But Iohn of Bourbon Duke of Alencon arriued happily out of prison from England, (he had bene taken at the battaile of Fernucil) to be commander of these goodly troupes, which go resolutely to take possession of the Citties of Champagne, being all then in the possession of the English. Men post from all parts to this banker. Their hearts being reuiued, their countenances change, and their affaires take a new forme. They then plot, saying.

But whilest the King prepares for his Coronation at Gyen, and to be neere his chiefest affaires; let vs suppress these English which remaine, after that great defeat of Orleans, and let vs take from them those Townes which are neere about. The Earle of Suffolke was at Largeau: the Towne is besieged and taken, all the English are either slaine, F or taken prisoners. one of the Earles bretheren was slaine in the fight, another of them drowned, and he himselfe was taken vpon the Bridge as he was flying away.

The Duke of Bedford gathers together what forces he can, to present the rest of the Townes from shipwrack, sending a troupe of foure thousand men to fortifie them. Talbot with Thomas Ramelson haue the charge. This troupe was presently subiect to our victorie, and when as they finde that neither men nor Townes can hold out for them, they seeke to retire themselves: but they are incountred at Pataj, a small village in Beauusse, where all are slaine or taken, yet our mens furle being past, many are spared, both in the fight and in prison: that the English might haue a testimony of our mildenesse. The great Talbot is taken, and brought to Charles, who vseth him with great respect. John Fastoll flies shamefully, and is therefore degraded by the Duke of Bedford.

This chanced the 20. of May. Wee had all the tokens of an absolute victorie. The Commanders slaine or taken, the field wonne. A hundred and ten Ensignes brought to our Temples. Their Canons, Artillerie, and all other habillements of warre, are seized on: and moreouer, the hearts of the King and the French were resolved to end the matter. Behold the first fruites: the harvest shall be gathered in time, as the Historie will shew by degrees. But let vs go to Rheims, to Crowne Charles according to the Virgins appointment.

THE CORONATION OF CHARLES the seuenth.

King Charles crowned at Rheims.

Y this happie successe, the way was made to Rheims, although the Kings Councell framed many difficulties to hinder this voyage, as superfluous, and almost impossible: for why, say they, should Charles be crowned? The lawe of State made him to bee borne a King, and he was Crowned at Poitiers. But if (to please the people) it must of force be so, where is the meanes to effect this decree? Rheims and all the Townes of Champagne bee in other mens possessions. Thus did many discourse. The Virgin answered. We must go to Rheims, to crowne the King. It is true, the King is the lawfull heire, but his right is called in question by the English, this maske deceiues many, and makes them disobedient: As for the meanes, leaue that to the God of Heauen, he will provide for it.

This aduice preuailed, as an Oracle: all things are prepared in readinesse for the Coronation. Charles retires to Bourges for this intent, as if the preseruer of the Monarchie would mocke his enemies, who called him King of Bourges in jest: For shortly after hee partes from Bourges to bee proclaimed King of France. But whilest hee attends there, vntill that all things may bee made fitte for his journey to Rheims: behold an encrease of good newes to crowne his late and happy victorie against the English; That the Bourguignon and Sauoyard, who would haue seized

A seized vpon Daulphine were defeated. The particular of this discourse is: The realme being set to sale to Strangers, and that euery one sought to haue his part: the Dukes of Bourgogne, and Sauoie had layed a plott to appropriate vnto themselves both Daulphine and Languedoc, with other Prouinces that obeyed Charles, vsing in this negotiation the helpe of Lewis of Chaalons Prince of Orange. a man of valour and credit, especially in those Countreies, by reason of his principality which laie neere vnto them. The diuision of this marchandise was thus made betwixt them three. The Bourguignon had the Viennois, neere vnto Lions and that which depended on Lions: whereon hee had cast his eye, to make profit of that goodly Citie. Grismaudan with Grenoble euen to Romans, Ambrunois, Gapensois, Briançonois and all the Countreies of the Mountaynes were the Sauoyards part.

B The Orangeois (to enlarge his principality,) had Valentinois, Dyois and the Baronies, where hee held some land vnder the obedience of this Crowne. This portion was allotted to him for his paines. They all arme vpon this proiect, euen when as the English pressed Orleans most. The best houses of Bourgogne, and Sauoie, contribute to this warre, as to a flecte that goes to the East, or the West Indies: but they had not assured their venture in the port, with an intent to haue all the profit. This leuie is made with great shewe: the Duke of Sauoie sends fise hundred Lances, vnder the command of the Lord of Varenbon, besides voluntaries, and three thousand foote. The Bourguignon (with his mothers assistance) a thousand Lances. Many Noblemen repayre thither, as to an assured gaine. There were leuied in his territories nine or ten thousand foote. The Princes of Orange assembles a goodly troupe, as well of his subiects, as of his friends in Prouence, where hee had a good portion: and for his beginning, hee seizeth vpon Enton, a Towne vpon the Rosne, a fitt passage for Sauoie and Bourgogne: and Colombiers, a Castell of great importance neere vnto it. Hauing brought sixtene hundred men thither, he attends the troupes of Bourgogne, and Sauoie, which repaire vnto him daylie. Hee putts fortie men at armes into Colombiers for the gard of the place, and keepe the rest of the troupes about him with great securitie, fearing no enemie, in this generall amazement of the Kings affaires: but the successe was contrarie to his desseine, for Raoul of Gaucourt, gouernour of Daulphine, resolues in this extremitie, who (attending no succors from the King, being visibly ingaged, and in great danger,) doth husband such forces as hee could gather together within his gouernment, from Lions and Viuares, Countreies that were vnder the French obedience. Imbert of Grosse, gouernour of Lions and Marshall of Daulphine, John de Lewis Baron of la Voute, the Lords of Joyeuse, Turnon and Crusol (great men in the Countreie of Viuares) did their best deuoir, the Nobility of Daulphine (renowned alwayes for their fidelity and valour) assisted as much as could bee desired in so great a necessitie. The Baron of Maubez is noted about the rest for his well deseruing. Don Roderigo de Villandras a Castillian was there with a goodly and valiant troupe.

E The Lord of Gaucourt resolues to charge the Prince of Orange with this troupe, giuing him no leisure to assemble the body of his Armie, the which increased daily. So (without any further delay) he besiegeth Colombiers, and takes it by force, before the Orangeois had any intelligence of his approche. Hauing this good successe, hee would giue the enemie no time to take breath, but desirous to make his profit of this happy beginning, he partes sodenly with these resolute troupes to drawe the Prince of Orange to fight; who was then parted from Enton, hauing intelligence onely of the siege, but not of the taking of Colombiers, beleeuing confidently, that the very brute of his forces would make our men to hide themselves: but hee was deceiued. Hee had foure thousand men with him, and Gaucourt had about two thousand: yet (notwithstanding his small number) being nothing amazed, hee chargeth and defeateth them. The neerenesse of Enton saues many. There were fise hundred slaine vpon the place, and two hundred of the brauest Souldiers taken prisoners. The Prince of Orange hauing recouered Enton, passeth the Rosne 1429. in a boate, and faues himfelfe. The common report is that hee paffed this violent ftream on horfebacke all armed. The people of that Country do beleue it from thither to Sonne, that this horfe was kept & died at Orange, hauing along time been nourished there by the Princes commandement, acknowledging the feruice he had receiued of this beaft in his extreame neceffity. Monftrélet fayeth, That he parted in great diforder, and was chased euen vnto Authun. Alain Charretier, Secretary to our King Charles, writes in exprefse words, That he paffed the Rofne at the ferrie of Enton. He fetts downe, that the boote was aboue a hundred thoufand Crownes, befides many notable prifoners of Bourgogne and Sauoie, which came to bee fpoyled, thinking to do the like to our Charles.

This defeat happened the twentieth of May, the fame day that the Engliſh (which retired from Orleans) were defeated at Patay. To credit the worke, againſt ſuch as made their accompt alonewithout God, who ſecking to raiſh an other mans goods vniuſtly, loſt their owne deſeruedly. Thus GOD workes ſpeedily, as may appeere by the courſe of ſo many happy exployts, linkt one to an other in this moneth of May, as a prediction of the reſtoring of this eſtate in this Realme. The Bourguignons and the Sauoiards deſeigne being diſappointed by this defeat, Gaucourt reſolues to haue his private reuenge of the Orangeois, beeing the factor of this filthie traficke. To conclude (without giuing him any reſpit) hee paſſeth the Rofne with his victorious armes, takes many places from him, the which he ſackes and burnes. But not ingaging himſelfe farther in the Franch-Conté, (where thoſe of Chaalons haue many goodly places,) he came to Oranges his cheefe houſe, whereof hee carries the name, as ſoueraigne Prince. He takes both Towne and Caſtell, and all that he held in Dauphiné vnder the Kings obedience: yet the Cittizens of Orange (wonderfully affected to their Prince) within fewe monethes after chaſe the French out of the Caſtell, and become maſters thereof, for the ſeruice of their Prince, to whome they yeeld it. Such was the end of this enterpriſe, ſhamefull for the Authors, and ſhamefully preiudiciall for the inſtrument.

Amedee Duke of Sauoie, (fallen from ſo viſible a hope, to fiſhe in a troubled water: and ſeeing on the other ſide the happie ſucceſſe of Charles) hee growes ſo much diſcontented, as his whole diſcourſe is to abandon the world: but heereafter wee ſhall ſee his actions. At this time hee returnes in the midd-way, without effecting of any thing. Our Bourguignon flewe a higher pitch, and had more then one deſeigne in his head. But let vs now returne to our King to Bourges. The preparations for this Coronation were royall and verie admirable after ſo great affliction, but aboue all it was beautified with great perſonages. There were preſent, John of Bourbon Duke of Alençon, Charles of Bourbon Earle of Clermont, Princes of the bloud, (who had faithfully and profitably accompanied the King in his greateſt afflictions,) Arthur of Brittaine Earle of Ricmont, Conſtable of France, Charles of Anjou ſonneto to the King of Sicile, and brother to the Queene. The Earle of Dunois baſtard of Orleans, Charles of Albret Earle of Perdrie, a yonger brother of the noble houſe of Armagnac, the Lord of Cab-lant, Admirall of France: the ſoure Marſhalls of France, the Lords of Bouſſac, Lohes, Rieux and la Fayette. The Lords of Tremouille, Laval, Chauigny, Chaumont, Lamſan, d'Aulin, Serrant, Crufol, Saint Chaumont, and many others, with Pothon, la Hire and the virgin, excellent peeces of thiſt triumph. Many could not come in time to this ſolemnitie: great troupes came poſting from all parts, notwithstanding the danger of the enemy, which was great in diuers places. Such was the deſire of the French to aſſiſt at this wiſhed aſſe: loyaltie remayning in their breſts, as the ſeede doth in the boſome of the earth during winter. But Charles (before he parted from Bourges to Reims) provided for the publicke ſafety, leaſt the Engliſh ſhould attempt any thing during this ſolemnitie. Hee ſends his Conſtable into Normandie, and the Earle of Perdrie into Guienne with ſome troupes, and reſerues ten thouſand men for his Coronation, as well to make his paſſage through Townes that ſhould reſiſt, as to honour the ceremony. A very doubtfull iourney yet moſt happie.

Gaucourt takes Oranges from the Prince. He recouers it againe by the meanes of his ſubiects.

Preparatiues for the coronation of King Charles.

A Thus he begins his voyage: The firſt Cittie that was ſummoned by his commandement, was Auxerre: they excuſe themſelues by reaſon of the truce lately obtained by Tremouille: intereſſion. A preſumption very preiudiciall in the example, euen now in this firſt triall of obedience, vpon this ſame of victorie, whereof none could make any queſtion without apparent danger. Euery man did ſee this error; but no man durſt open his mouth, for that the King did countenance Tremouille, euen with the preiudice of his affaires. So Charles entred not into Auxerre, he onely tooke their words, that at his returne they ſhould doe as the reſt, and furniſh the Kings armie with victualles for their money. From Auxerre the King comes to S. Florentin, which yeelds without any queſtion. Troyes was ſummoned next: at the firſt they reſuſed, like vnto Auxerre, through the practiſes of ſuch as were of the Engliſh faction: but as Charles prepared for the ſiege, behold a notable troupe of the choiſe Cittizens aſſemble themſelues, aſſure the Cittie, and gree the King to vnderſtand, that they are ready to receiue his commandements, and without attending any anſwer from the King, a goodly company goes forth to meete him, and to offer him their obedience. Charles then enters into Troyes, to the vnſpeakable ioy of all the people, being wonderfully glad to ſee their Princes face, after ſo long captiuitie. Chaalons follows their example, and all the reſt of the Townes, with great alacritie and willingneſſe.

But the chiefe combate muſt be at Rheims, the chiefe Rendez-vous of this voyage. The Lords of Chaffilion and Sauenze, with their Partifans of the Engliſh humour, did what they could to hinder the Kings entrie. But the good Cittizens preuaile, who (being ſtronger then the Engliſh faction,) could hardly keepe the people from tearing them in peeces, being loth to ſhed any bloud. They agree and ſweare by common conſent, to obey the King, and to that end ſend him the Keyes to Chaalons. The way being thus made, and the gates of Rheims open, he goes thither with the beautie of his Court, and is receiued with the vnſpeakable ioy of all the people, who come to meete him in great troupes. the fields, gates, and ſtreets ſound out; God ſaue the King. Charles accompanied with his Princes and officers, appears like a goodly Sonne after a ſtorme Winter. But in the greateſt beautie of this triumph, Joan the Virgin is beheld with admiration, and loden with popular bleſſings.

D Two dayes being ſpent in the preparation of the ceremonie, Charles was annointed and crowned King the eight day of Iuly, in the year 1429. by Renold of Chartres, Arch-biſhop of Rheims, Chancellor of France: a date to be obſerued, being the beginning of great good to this realme. This was the ſeuenth year after the law of State had called Charles to the Crowne, whereof he was heire, but the violence of Strangers reſtrained and held moſt of the French from their obedience. So this coronation was added to confirme the generall approbation of this law full authoritie, not onely in their common beleefe, but in the tongues of the French, as the ſequell will ſhew, that this ſolemn publication did greatly aduance the Kings affaires againſt his captall enemy.

E But as the Sonne, riſing higher in his Horizon, increaſeth both in brightneſſe and heate, ſo the beames of the French libertie were more apparent, and the ſubiects deuotion to their naturall Prince kindled dayly, after the long and ſharpe Winter of the Engliſh command. This was a reuiuing both to their hearts, State, and manners: the image of a golden age, after the horrible tempeſt of a long and mortall confuſion. The French did ſtraine to receiue their King, and the King to receiue them with a fatherly loue. The Kings commandements (generally proclaimed to lue modeſtly without oppreſſion of the people) were freely executed, and the people made the beſt chere they could to ſo pleaſing gueſts.

F This acte did greatly daunt the Engliſh, all the Prouinces taking a new reſolution to ſubmit themſelues vnder the obedience of their naturall Prince, as the ſequell of the Hiſtorie will ſhew. But before we ingage our ſelues in ſo long a diſcourſe, order doth command vs to obſerue the eſtate of the Church and Empire; hauing paſt it ouer in ſilence, ſince the year 1364. towards the end of the raigne of Charles the 5.

1429. All Champa-gne yeelds to King Charles.

The fruites of this ſolemnitie.

1429. Doubtlesse we were sufficiently troubled with our owne confusions, vnder the miserable raigne of Charles the 6. imbarcking our selues in forraigne stormes. We are therefore briefly to note, according to our stile, what hath happened since about fiftie nine yeares, in these two great bodies.

The estate of the Empire. We haue left the Empire in the hands of Charles the fourth, an excellent Prince, but exceeding more in lawe and valour, then in iustice and vertue: yet hee vsed the counsell of Barthol, an excellent Lawyer, hauing gouerned the publike affaires of Germanie and Italie, twenty and sixe yeares, amidst many confusions: and in the end he purchased the Empire, with the preiudice of the Empire. His Sonne Wenceslaus, whom he had caused to bee crowned King of Hungarie, and Bohemia, at the age of two yeares, hauing bought the Empire for him, hee caused him to bee installed, B and liued two yeares after, dying in the yeare 1378. hauing left a wretched successor of so great and royall a dignitie: deformed in minde and body, a foole, idle, voluptuous, and a coward; hauing no other care but to wallow in the most infamous filthinesse and sinnes of dronkenesse and whoredome; nor other minde, but to doe euill and mischiefe; as malicious and cruell, as without valour and vertue. So (contemning his affaires and businesse) he grew contemptible: in hating of his subiects, he grew so hatefull, as in the end, the Germanes and Hongariens (being wearie of such a scorne,) take him prisoner: and at last, after a painfull and shamefull patience (they hauing suffered him 22. yeares, and a huge masse of diuerse and sundrie confusions, which grew by his ill and wicked gouernment) they depriue him of C the Imperiall dignitie, by a common consent. And yet to shew, they bare no malice to the house from whence he was descended, they choose in his place Iosse, Marquis of Brandebourg and of Bauiere, the Sonne of Iohn Henry, brother to Charles the fourth, and so Cousine germaine to Wenceslaus: who liued in that State but sixe moneths, and had nothing of the Empire, but that hee was buried with the Imperiall ornaments of that country.

He is degraded by the Germanes,

Then Rupert Count Palatine, Duke of Bauiere, and first Elector, was chosen Emperour, after many controuersies and dissensions: a man of small stature, but of great iudgement, vertuous, valiant, and louing the common-weale. Hee laboured and tooke great paines to redresse the confusions of Italie, then exceedingly disordered, D through the quarrells of Galeaz, Duke of Milan, the Venetians, Florentines, French, and Aragonais, vpon diuers and sundry occasions: but finding that whatsoever he could doe, he lost his labour, (euen by the disloyaltie of such as employed him,) hee suffered them to ruine and spoile one another, and retired himselfe home: where (after he had happily gouerned the Empire ten yeares) he dyed in the yeare of our Lord 1410.

Sigismund King of Hongarie and Bohemia, a Prince of happy memorie, succeeded Rupert, by the generall consent of all the Germanes, who loued and honoured his vertues: and although hee fought against the Turke with ill successe, when as he borrowed forces of Charles the sixt (as I haue saied) yet his losses did nothing blemish his reputation, nor his vertues, whereof he gaue great prooffe in the gouernment of the Empire. But that which troubled him most, was the estate of the Church, then plunged in Tragical confusions, bred by the long and scandalous Schisme, which dismembred it by peece-meales, through the dissention and controuersies of sundrie Popes, which were chosen in diuers places, and that diuerslie at one instant.

The estate of the Church.

Order commands vs now to represent it, as carefully as the subiect is of importance. I tremble to rippe vp these shamefull and detestable wounds. I will endeavour to represent it plainly and sincerely, following the steppes of Platina, Naucler and Thierry of Niem: who hauing remained in the Court of Rome, Secretaries to sundrie Popes, one after another, and managed the affaires from the beginning of the Schisme, neere vnto the end; ought to be held for an vnreprouable witnesse in that which he hath seene. This Schisme continued fiftie yeares: it banded all the Christians

A horrible Schisme.

Christians of Europe, diuided Kings and Princes, nourished their diuisions, bredde 1429. and brought forth horrible scandales, toucht the hearts, opened the mouthes and dispensed with their hands to a newe faction, referred to our latter age.

Six Popes seated in Rome one after another, had euerie one his opposit in Auignon, with the same name or title, and in the profession of the same authoritie. Three Popes at one instant in three seuerall places. Foure Councells were called to remedie these confusions, being generally detested of all men, both great and small, seeing the Popes (who had so long contended with the Emperours, vntill they had chased them out of Italie) contend now among themselves: and this was the cause of the Schisme.

The cause of this Schisme.

We haue sayed, that the vnfortunate successe of the voluntarie quattrell moued by Bonifate the 8. against King Philip the faire, ministred occasion to transport the Pontificall sea from Rome, to Auignon, where hauing bene vsually resident 74. yeares, and the Popes chosen out of the French nation, Gregorie the x. a Limosin, grew desirous to go to Rome, and to transport his Colledge thither, consisting for the most part of French Cardinals. After his death, (being to choose a newe Pope, the Clergie and people of Rome being vnited, protest vnto the Colledge, that they will haue a Romaine or an Italian, and no French man. If they do it not willingly, they threaten force. The French are the stronger in the Conclau, being thirtene against foure. But what could they do against the mutinie of a multitude armed with furie? To conuie this storme, the French and Italian Cardinals agree to name an Italian Pope, with whome the Pontificall dignity should bee left in gard, vntill they might choose one by a free election of the whole Colledge.

They all consent to choose Bartholomew of Naples, Archebishop of Bary in Apulia, esteemed a learned man, graue and modest. The reputation of his vertues made them proceede to confirme him in the election: so as all by a generall consent, (especially Peter de la Lune, and the Cardinall of Saint Agrene in Viuarez) crowne and adore him, for a finall conclusion of his Popedom, assuring themselves that hee would continue vertuous, as he had a fouretime begun vertuously. But honors change manners.

Two dayes were scarce past after this sollemne reception, but this Bartholomew, (who shall nowe be Vrbane the 6. in changing his degree and name) did also change his humors and manner of life. Hee which was accustomed to humble himselfe to all men, doth nowe braue all them which had newly rayfed him to this dignitie. He threatens to keepe them vnder, and checks them with reprochfull wordes. Otho Duke of Brunswick (husband to Ioane Queene of Sicilie and Naples,) comes to congratulate his election, and for a prooffe of his great humilitie, (as Vrbane called for wine) Otho takes the cuppe from his taster, and kneeling before the Pope presents it vnto him. Vrbane takes it, leauing him on his knee with a frowning countenance, without speaking any thing. This insupportable arrogancie displeased the whole Colledge, but especially Queene Ioane, (holding this disgrace done to her selfe) and made Vrbane so odious, as they all resolute to depose him, and to choose another Pope: wherunto Ioane doth promise her assistance. They all ioyntly resolute to retire themselves quietly out off Rome, into some place of libertie. So vnder colour to auoide the heat of Sommer, they take their leaues to go to Anagnia: where hauing sojourned some weeke, they go to Fundy, a Cittie in the Kingdome of Naples, a fit place to enioy their liberties vnder the Queenes protection. Then began they to plant their battell against Vrbane. They set downe for the grownd of their right, that the condition specified in the election of Vrbane, should bee auailable to those that did choose him, to declare him incapable of the dignitie whereof hee shewed himselfe unworthy: and (to obserue all formalities,) they cite Vrbane before them, and write vnto the other Italian Cardinals, that their meaning is to name an Italian: A means to drawe them to increase their number. Being assembled, they depose Vrbane by the plurality of voices: and being to choose another, at the same instant

The Pope changeth his manners and discontents the Cardinals.

The pride of Pope Vrbane the 6.

Pope Vrbane depose by the Colledge: Clement chosen, 1429. they aduance Cardinall Rupert of the noble house of the Earles of Genewa, and call him, A Clement the 7. This bred a great alteration both at Rome and in Vrbans minde for Rome is presently abandoned, and Vrbans so amazed as hee knowes not what to do. Behold two Popes in one chaire, which is too little for them both, seeing the world will not suffice them: for in choosing Clement, they found no more clemencie, then Vrbans civility and ciuill conuersation in Vrbans. Clement yeelding nothing to the vices of his competitor: an ambitious man, willfull, audacious, sumptuous and poore, hauing nothing rich but the heart, puffed vp with the greatnesse of his house. These two do worthy exploits, especially Vrbans, whose name the people changed, and for Vrbans they called him Turban: that is a troubler of world, to note his barbarous and fierce nature, louing troubles and confusion.

Clements disposition.

And that which made a way to this mischeefe, Kings and Princes (who should haue employed their authorities to quench this fire) were nothing affected therewith: for the Emperour Charles the 4. died soone after the breeding of this Schisme, leauing an insufficient successor. France and England were too far ingaged to determine their owne quarrells by the sword. As for the particular of France, during the imprisonment of John, the infirmity of Charles the 6. and the halfe shipwrake of Charles the 7. what helpe could the French bring to these confusions, being almost drowned in their owne? In the beginning Clement had all aduantages ouer Vrbans. The authority of the ordinarie and ancient Colledge, Canonically chosen, followed by the Court of Rome, and the Castle Saint Angelo, by the which he might enter the Citie. All the French, the greatest part of the Italians, many Germanis, all the Spaniards and English which were at Rome repaired vnto him, and consequently all those nations followed him. France, Spain, England, with a part of Germany and Italie. There remayned the Hongariens & some Germanis, who for feare of the affaires at Naples (not daring to trust themselves in Anagnina) were forced to continue in Rome, a leuaine which shal soone cause great diuisions. Vrbans as much daunted in aduersitie, as he was puffed vp in prosperity, humbled himselfe to all men: he weepes and deplores his miserie, and craues ayde of euery man, promising all fauour if they did helpe to restore him. There is neyther Hongarien, German, nor Italian, which belong vnto the Court, but hee sues vnto him. By their aduice and direction, hee flies to the Emperour Charles the 4. and to Lewis King of Hongarie, D

Pope Clement vith the Emperours Ambassadors disgracefully.

Pope Vrbans makes a new Colledge of 26. Cardinals.

intreating them to be mediators to the Colledge of Cardinales, who were discontented with him. But Clement (growen ouer proude with this first successe) gaue him means to repaire his estate. He hath a desire to surpris Rome by the Castell: but as Bernard Cazal, with a troupe of Neapolitans would haue seized vpon one of Rome gates, hee was valiantly repulsd by the Inhabitants. The Emperour Charles the 4. and Lewis, King of Hongarie, sent their Ambassadors to Clement and to the Colledge of Cardinales, to treat an accord. Clement vseth them without all clemencie, hee checks them, puts them in prison, and in the ende sends them away with many indignities. This affront moued Charles and Lewis, so as by their means, both Germanie, Hongarie, Poland, Denmarke, Sueden, Norway, and Prusse, were all affected to Vrbans faction. Charles was a spectator of this first Scene, and died three monethes after, leauing vpon the stage dangerous actors against Clement. Vrbans being thus fortified grewe high minded, and for a marke of his authority, hee creates a new Colledge of six & twentie Cardinals, all created in one day, being Italians, Germanis, Hongariens, Polonians, and other nations that fauored him, to haue a support of this authority in all parts. Clement works likewise, and to haue his reuenge, (for that hee could not seize vpon a gate of Rome) hee resolved to send an armie to field, to vex the Romans, and to force them to obedience: but the successe of this desire was not answerable to his desire: for hauing sent the Lord of Montioux his Nephew with goodly troupes furnished by Queene Iane: the Romans, led by Alberic of Barbiane defeated this army, and tooke Montioux prisoner, whome they beheaded, as a disturber of the publicke quiet, and so they chase the French out of the Castell Saint Angelo.

Clements forces defeated by the Romans.

Clement finding himselfe nothing safe at Fuudy, meanes to retire to Naples, but the Neapolitans

Neapolitans would not receiue him, notwithstanding the Queenes perswasions: and so 1429. he passeth to Auignon, whether he brings the Pontificall sea, for the second time, as Clement the 5. had done at the first. It was in the year 1384. that the Popes second sea was planted in Auignon, five yeares after that Gregory had retired himselfe. Clement frustrate of all hope of his returne to Rome, faints not in these first difficulties, finding himselfe in a place of safety, where he might command at pleasure, being proud by nature, by reason of his great birth, and by his forces vnitd in two great kingdoms. So euery one armes, for a sharpe encounter, according to the forces they could raise. First eyther of them prouides his battery of excommunication. Clement the 7. cures Vrbans before him and his Colledge of Cardinales canonically chosen, with his Cardinals vnlawfully elected by him who had beene desposed from the charge which had bene giuen him but to keepe; declaring all that he had done, or should do, to be of no force. Vrbans, on the other side, encounters Clement with the like excommunications. He declares him Antipope, a schismaticke, and an Heretike, and all them that should follow him, guilty of high treason, both against God and man. Their goods, honours, liues, bodies and soules confiscate.

Clement comes to Auignon.

Two Antipopes in armes & their courtes.

The crueltie of 2 Popes.

This first point performed, they come to the effects. Clement makes search throughout all the territories of his obedience, for those of Vrbans faction, whome hee imprisons, condemnes, and kills with sword, fire, and water: many are strangled, massacred, drowned and burnt with extreame cruelty. Vrbans shall doe no better: but hee proceeds by degrees. He makes his peace with the Florentines, Perusins, Milanois and Genouois: the Venetians onely he could not winne. The Emperour Charles the 4. being dead, he could not preuaile much with Venceslaus, an vnworthy Prince: but he made his profit of Lewis King of Hongary, a capitall enemy to Ioane Queene of Naples, the soueraigne object of Vrbans choler, whom he sought to ruine, as the sole motiue of all his crosses. But amidst the disorders of these confused passions, the diuers effects of Gods prouidence are remarkable, who drawes light from darkenesse, and order from disorder, in such sort, as it is most commonly vknowne to man, but alwaies iust and admirable in his iust effects.

Vrbans (presuming that the force of Hongary would fortifie his proceedings) doth D excommunicate Ioane Queene of Naples; declares her incapable of the crowne, and calles in Charles of Durazzo: of whome we haue made mention. But who sees not, that this belongs properly to the history of Naples, whereof we intreat accidentally, matters being tyed together by a necessary vniō. In the ende Ioane lost both goods and life, through the power of Charles of Durazzo, who remained absolute maister of the Realme of Naples, by the death of Lewis of Aniō; whom she had adopted; but Lewis thinking to reuenge her death, lost his owne life; and drew France into great miseries, whereof this vnseasonable adoption was the leuaine. Behold the ende of the first Ioane Queene of Naples, who shall be soone followed with a second Ioane, to continue our voluntary languishing in Italy.

Vrbans proceeding against Ioane Queene of Naples.

In the life of Charles the 6.

E But the ende of this Proserpina was the beginning of a second trouble, through the ambition of Vrbans, the which hauing no limits, transported his spleene against Charles of Durazzo, whom he had drawne out of Hongary. He is not satisfied that Charles should do him homage, but hee will haue some places in his absolute power, and that Charles should inuest his Nephew Butillo (a man of no estimation, hauing nothing rare in him but his extraordinary vices) in the principality of Capua, & the Duchy of Durazzo, seeking to get so firme footing in the state, as he might dispossesse Charles at his pleasure.

Pope Vrbans discontented against Charles of Durazzo whom he had opposed against queene Ioane of Naples.

Durazzo, being loath to labour for another man, excuseth himselfe to Vrbans; who takes no excuses for payment, but citeth him before his Consistory, threatening, that if he appeares not at the day prefixt, he will proceed against him by excommunication. Charles who feared more the losse of his new purchase, then the lightnings of Vrbans, makes him vnawares a prisoner, hauing placed many Souldiers about him for his guard. Vrbans seeing himselfe braued by Charles, euen within Naples, complains of of this affront, and by his suffrance, he retires to Nocera, from whence he sends excom-munications against Charles, who laying aside all respect, opposeth a goodly army, & comes to besiege Urban with Ensignes displayed in Nocera. Hee sends a trumpet to aduertise him, that he was come according to his assignement. In the meane time he takes information of *Urban*s abuses, (being knowne and detested of all the world) and moreover he tried the opinions of the Cardinalls, to censure or depose Urban, who being aduertised hereof, was so moued, as (not able to be reuenged of Charles,) he imprisons seuen Cardinalls (the most sufficient of his Colledge) without any other iust matter to charge them with, but that they were the learnedest and of greatest courage: and to make triall of his forces, he sends his Nephew Buttolo against him with a troupe, which this great Captaine suffered to bee ouerthrowne, and him selfe to betaken. This successe daunted the courage of Urban, and inforced him to craue leau of Charles to retire himselfe: the which he easily obtained, by the intercession of the Seigneurie of Genes, (whether Urban pretended to go) departing from Nocera, he led with him these Cardinalls prisoners, and desirous to be rid of them, hee caused one to be slaine vpon the way, pretending that he was sicke, and abandoned his bodie:

he caused fise others to be sowed vp in sackes, and to be cast into the sea, as he passed to Genes. Being there, he commanded three others to be apprehended (being iealous that they had intelligence with the rest) and in the presence of all the people, hee caused them to be knockt on the head, & then hee dries their bodies in an Ouen, and preserued them in chefts, the which he caused to be carried before him vpon moyles, when as he did ride: and for a marke what they were, he set their red hats vpon the chefts. The originall notes this extraordinary ciuility in Pope Urban.

In the ende Charles dies in Hungary, but *Urban*s spleene continues against his children. He had left two, Ladislaus and Ioane, who by the vertuous protection of their mother Marguerit, kept both themselves and their estate out of his hands. Urban sleeps neyther day nor night, thirsting continually after their ruine. And for that hee found by Charles, that the Hungarians feared not his spirituall lightnings, he grounds his deseines vpon temporall armes: and knowing they are not to be raised without money, he seeks the meanes to leuie a great masse. To this ende he ordaines a Iubile, as a solemne feast for all Christendome, and to draw more people therunto, he sends newe indulgences and pardons, into all parts vnder his obedience. A deuice to get money, the people being perswaded by his Bulls that it was the onely meanes to purchase Paradise, and to auoide the paines of purgatorie. He also challengeth the right of first fruites, which giues the first yeares reuenues of all benefices to the pope, and so continues vnto this day.

But as he gathers together this money with a wonderfull greedinesse, behold hee fall from his moyle and bruseth himselfe. The worke of heauen, answerable to his insolent ambition, who soaring too high makes him fall lowe: dying when his hatred was greatest to ruine his enemies. He languished 27. dayes in his death bed, dying by degrees, suffering the paines which he caused his poore Cardinalls to indure: not able with his death, to wipe out the immortall hate of his detestable life, disgraced by all writ-ters. Thus Urban the sixt, the first guidon of Schisme, died in the eleuenth yeare of his Popedom. In whole place Peter Thomael, named Boniface the 9. is chosen Pope, successor to *Urban*s couettousnesse, as his life and death doth witnesse. Niem obseues a memorable act. Boniface lying at the point of death, someone (to comfort him) saide that he should do well. A brutish custome, as if to speake of death to a sicke body, were to pronounce the sentence of a Iudge, to deliuer him into the executioners hands. I should do well (saide he) if I had money, and yet he had full howses, hauing then but ten howres to liue. So he dyed the tenth yeare of his Popedom, not lamented of any, but that he liued too long, and by his impudent couettousnes opened the gate to all impunity of sinne.

Innocent the 7. succeeded in the place of Boniface, no more innocent then the former, verifying the beauty of their names by the bounty of their liues. A sworne enemy

A to the vniou of the Church, causing two Romaine Cittizens to be put to death as seditious, for that they moued him therein, as Platina doth obserue. He continued but two yeares: & into his place, Angelo Carrier a Venecian, called Gregory the 12. was aduanced:
a subtil and dissembling man, coldly ambitious, and faintly holy, hauing no piety but in shew; so as for his crooked manners he was called Errorius: for Gregorius, that is to say a Deceiuer, drawing men into error with his goodly shewe. All this was done at Rome by the Italians: in the meane time what doe our Popes: sea at Auignon? Clement the 7. making profession of the same authority which the Pope did at Rome, was no better then the other, although the history notes not so many priuate acts of his excessie.
In generall, he was cruell in the beginning, & couettous during all the time of his Pope-dome. He was exceeding ambitious and wilfull, vnder colour of modestie and humili-lity. He furnished him but two yeares. After the death of Clement the 7. they create a new Pope, to oppose against him at Rome, which was Peter de la Lune, a Spaniard borne: but hauing liued long at Montpellier to study the law. A man of sound iudgment, learned, active, patient in shew, but in effect very ambitious, a dissembler, giuen to his owne will, and tyed to his profit: free from cruelty (whereof he is not taxed) giuing free scope to couettousnesse. So great was the impudency of Marchandize in the Church, (sayes Niem, and Platina) set to the view of all Christendome, that the authority of the keyes and Apostolike learning was contemptible to the whole world. Truly all diseases growe by degrees through surfeits taken vnadvisedly, and bad humors which creepe insensibly into the body. euen so in these miseries of the Church. All was set to sale, all sorts of benefices, especially Cardinalls hats, were for them that would giue most. The reuenues, impro-priations, and all things else, were sold to him that offered most: Sometimes one benefice was sold to many, and all their money fell into good handes, that had learned to receive and not to restore againe. The composition for all sorts of crimes & whole Townes were sold by the authority of the Soueraigne pastor. I write but a part of that which the Popes Secretaries haue set downe at large, and tremble to report the iudgment they make of these abominable confusions.

To conclude, all christendome (tyred with these disorders, committed by such as had the authority to order) complained much to their Kings and princes, who wishing a redresse, exhorted the Popes of both seas, Gregory the 12. and Benedict the 13. to leave their priuate quarrells, for the generall good of the Church. Benedict makes great shewes to desire it: That if he must needs yeeld, he is ready to leave the dignity wherwith the Church had honoured him, yea his owne life, (these are his very wordes) for the peace of Gods Church. Gregory speakes more coldly, yet hee promised the like:
but when it came to performance, they were but shiftes, delayes, and other deu-ises to winne time, and to retaine still their authority, which neither of them would leaue.

In the ende, at the great instance of Kings and Princes, the Colledges of Rome and Auignon agree to meet at Pisa, to finde some meanes to determine of this reprochfull confusion. Benedict yeelds: but Gregory opposeth. Notwithstanding his refusall, all meet at Pisa. Thus all assembled (whether the Emperour, the Kings of France, England, Spain, Scotland, Portugall, Hongary, Denmarke, Sweden, Pologne, and Norway, send their Ambassadors, and the Churches of the east their deputies) hauing debated the conuersion depending betwixt Gregorie and Benedict, they depose them both, as nourishing a schisme in the Church, and refusing to obey the Councell, whereas neither they nor their deputies had appeared. In their place they choose Alexander the 5.
a Canaiot, held to be learned and vertuous: but he died within the first yeare of his Popedom. So as the Colledge of Cardinalls (retiring to Bologne) created John the 23. in his place.

F But neither Gregory nor Benedict omitted any thing of their traine, scorning the decree of the Councell. So as for one Pope, they had three, the one at Rimini, the other at Bologne, and the third at Auignon: and the last being worke then the first, shall giue a reasonable good cause of further inquiry to Christian 1429. Princes in an other season, the which we will attend by order of the history, and will A returne into France, to our Charles the 7. in the ioye of his Coronation: which was to him and to all his subiects a happy fore-telling of the restoring of his Realme, but this excellent worke was not so soone ended.

We must now see by what degrees Charles recovered the possession of the Townes subdued by the English, and how he expelled them out of this Realme. The second par-cell is set downe by vs in the front of this discourse.

BY VVHAT MEANES AND DE-GREES, THE TOWNES SVBdued by the English, returned to the obedience of this Crowne, and how the English were chis-ed out off this Realme.

From the yeare 1429. to 1454. after the ebbing and flowing of many actions, and the accord of the Duke of Bourgogne with Charles, long debated and in the ende obtained by the meanes of the Duke of Bourbon, Paris yeeldes to the King. The other Citties and Prouinces of this Realme, one after another, in diuers seasons, and by di-uers occasions, returne to the King, as to their head:
and expell the stranger, who held the state.

TO THE REDVCTION OF PARIS ARE 7. YEARES: TO THE FULL RESTORING OF THE REALME, 18. AND IN ALL 25. YEARES AFTER HIS CORONATION.

His happy beginning of the Kings affaires, seemed to bring with it a generall restoring of his whole Realme, by the absolute bedience of all Townes and Prouinces. But God which gouerns nature by seasons, and giues not harvest when as they sow the seede, he doth likewise gouerne the society of mankind by degrees, that the force of mans industry, of it selfe, may ap-peare vaine and nothing, and not successfull but by his grace, without who man can do nothing. We haue hitherto seeme into what distresse the preseruer of this estate hath drawne both the King and Realme, but in the ende his prouidence shal appeare no lesse admirable in preseruing it.

The Duke of Bedford wonderfully discontented with his happy success, resolves to stop the courre, both by force and policie. To this ende hee sends to Engsuccors both of men and money: he leaues all he can in France, and practiseth with the Duke of Bourgogne, who was held of both parties, to haue power to strike the last stroke in this equality of affaires: So as finding himselfe fought vnto by them all, hee certaines them all, giuing Charles secretly to vnderstand, that he was for him, and yet he presently takes armes for the English. A man wholly addicted to his affaires, hauing no other object but his owne greatnesse: yet shall he effect no wonders, being now so much fought vnto.

Charl

A Charles parts from Rheims, to obserue his enemies way, he passeth by Soissons, Chasteau, 1429.
Thierry, Prouins, Couffy in Brye, and comes to Crespy in Valois: all these Townes shake off the English yoke to obey him. Bedford was at Senlis, with an armie of ten thousand men, from thence he writes letters of defiance to Charles, as to the vsurper of the realme. He represents vnto him at large, the compassion he had of the poore French people, so long oppressed with warres, and doth challenge him to appoint a day and place, to end this long miserie, eyther by a peace or battaile. A part ill acted by a Stranger, for who could beleue these protestations, in the mouth of a Stranger, against the heire of the Crowne?

Charles answers him by effects, and offers himselfe to the combat: the English armie was before Senlis, being lodged in that renowned Temple of victorie, the anti-ent monument of the valour of Philip Augustus. The French armie was opposite against them without hedge or bush, in a large Plaine. The King called a Councell, whether he should giue battaile. The Virgin held opinion they should not hazard these happy beginnings vpon a doubtfull combat, being sufficient to stave the ene-mie, in shewing him the Armie, without striking. So as these two Armies stood two dayes together in battaile, looking one vpon another without mouing, although many skirmishes seemed to offer occasion to drawe them to a generall fight. In the end there was a confused charge of some fore-lorne hopes, Picards and French, but the battailes stood firme.

C After this countenance, Bedford takes his way to Paris, to auoide the alterations which the Kings approche and prosperitie might breed. Charles hauing receiued the obedience of Compeigne, Senlis, Creil, Beauuois, Pont Saint Maxence, Choisy, Gournay, Remy, Neufville, Mognay, Chantely, Saintes, and other places thereabouts, with the homages of the Seigneuries of Mont-morency and Mont, he marcheth towards Paris, vpon promise made by the Bourguignon, to be receiued by the Cittizens. Being at Saint Denis, he not onely findes Bedford in Armes without the Cittie, but also the Cittie well garded by the Inhabitants, so as the Virgin seeking to surprize Saint Honories ditche, had like to haue bene taken, being fore wounded, and loosing a goodlietroupe of her best and most resolute souldiars. The inconsiderate desire which D Charles had to winne the loue of the Duke of Bourgogne, did much preiudice his affaires, for all Picardy held him in great esteeme, especially the great Townes of Amiens, Abbeville, and S. Quintin: but the respect he bare the Bourguignon, made him to neglect these occasions to his great hurt. Hauing therefore found this passage to be very perilous, he retires into Berry, and the Duke of Bedford (freed from the feare of his forces) goes into Normandie, where the Constable Richemont had surprised Eureux, Aumale, Chasteau-gaillard, and Audely, places of importance in that Prouince.

But during these alterations, the Duke of Bourgogne married with Isabell, daughter to the King of Portugall, adding this third wife, to his two former deceased. The Duchesse of Bedford was at this marriage, not in regard of the feast, but for her husbands affaires. The Bourguignon conducts her to Paris with foure thousand armed men, where he renews the League more strongly, (somewhat shaken through the affaires of Isabell Duchesse of Hainault) with his brother in lawe. There hee made the order of the Golden Fleese, as if he had already conquered the Gardens of Hesperides, like a second Iason: but hee determined to make violent warre against Charles the yeare following: and returning into Picardie, hee tooke Gournay and Choisy, places lately subdued to the Crowne. Melun, Sens, and Villeneuve le Roy, gave a happy beginning to this yeare, yeelding to the Kings obedience, but the losse of the Virgin Ioane, and the taking of Pothon, two of the greatest and most valiant heads of the Armie, quailed all the ioye of these conquests. The Tragedie was thus acted. The Bourguignon hauing taken Choisy by force, hee buies Soissons of the Captaine that commanded: and so hee marcheth against Compeigne with his

The Virgin issues forth with a notable number of the best Souldiers, to charge the besiegers, who being too farre engaged in the fight alone, was taken by the Bastard of Vendosme, and presently brought to the Duke of Bourgonne. Hee reioyced much at so notable a prize, as hauing conquered all Charles his good fortunes, and referues her as a triumph for the Duke of Bedford, whose proceedings we will now set downe.

Joane the Virgin taken at Compiegne by the Bourguignon.

Pothon was then taken vnaduisedly. The Archbishop of Rheims being Chancellor, with the Lords of S. Seuer and Boussac, Marshalls of France, being at Beauuais; behold a young Shepheard comes vnto them, assuring them, that God had reuealed vnto him a meanes to take Rouen. They (taking the vanitie of this foole for present payment) as if God had raised vp a new Oracle, in the declining of the other, by the the surprize of the Virgin) arme inconsiderately, singing a triumph before the victorie. The Englisb (aduertised of their departure and numbers) meetes them, and doth surprize them, at Nully neere vnto Beauuais, when as they looked least for them, finding them like men newly dislodged, without order or feare, and ouercame them easily. Pothon striving to make head with a squadron of 25. Lances, presteth so farre in among the enemies, as he is taken: and by Talbot himselfe, whom he had taken at the battaile of Patay, and so well intreated, as Talbot made him a good requital; for hauing imbraced him as a brother, he honourably gaue him his libertie, and sent him in safetie to Beauuais. Thus honestie and humanitie reapes what it hath sowne. A good tyme is neuer lost among men of honour. An example for such as manage armes honourably, in whom there is nothing more vnworthy then crueltie, especially against the weakenesse of a prisoner. Crueltie is fitter for theeues and Canniballes, whom they call Antropophages, or eaters of men, but curtesie becomes good Souldiers, who are twise Conquerours; winning their hearts by curtesie, whose bodies they had conquered by force.

Pothon taken and deliuered.

Curtesie most commendable in a Souldier.

The Virgin brought to Rouen and condemned.

The Virgin Joane was not so well intreated by the Duke of Bedford, who hauing bought her for ready money, of John of Luxembourg, as the best prisoner of the armie; he causeth her to be brought to Rouen, being resolved to put her to death. The honour of the law of Armes, and the consequence which made all them guiltie, which should hereafter be taken by the French, did contradict his will; but the vnurly passion of the deadly barred conceited against this maiden (as hauing ruined his affaires in France) preuailed aboue reason. And hauing no colour to put her to death, as a prisoner of warre, he resolves to make her a prisoner of Iustice: but the Magistrates would not heare of it. Vpon their refusal, he hath recourse to the diuines. And as the Oracle of Apollo spake according vnto the money that was giuen, sometimes for Philip of Macedonie, sometimes for the Athenians; so the Diuines (being pensioners to the Englisb in this acte) made their diuinitie Englisb.

After they had grauely consulted and resolved on the matter: they declare her to be against kinde, hauing abused her sexe, beating the habit of a man, against the expresse worde of God, a witch working by deuills, without the which she could not haue performed so many extraordinarie deedes, nor obtained such a memorablenecessitie, and so by consequence an Idolatresse, a seismatike and an heretike. This was decreed in the vniuersity of Paris, with many hands to the Sentence. This conclusion (being carefully procured by the Duke of Bedford) was presented by him to Peter Cauchon Bishop of Beauuais, whome hee requested to proceede speedily in the cause. The Bishop assembles the deane and Chapter at Rouen, he calles the Abbot of Fescamp thether with a newe supply of diuines, for the execution of this decree. There is no thing more easie then to do euill. And although they were all possessed with Englisb passions, yet could they not so soone resolve themselves against her; so as they were long in suspence, before they could condemne her, for the answered pertinently to all their accusations. In the end violence preuailed, the which (being muffled with the

A cloake of religion and Iustice,) condemned Joane (as guiltie of the abouenamed crimes) to perpetuall prison: but in the ende being deliuered by the Bishop to the secular power, the Duke of Bedford caused her to be burnt at Rouen, in the year. 1431. And burnt the 6. of Iuly.

Thus shee happily serued France one whole yeare, and was prisoner somewhat more, leauing a great greefe to those that liued then, to see her so intreated: and a memorie of immortall praise to come, hauing bene so profitable and necessitie an instrument, for the deliuerie of our Countrie being almost ruined. But the wise providence of God had limited both her labors and her life. He would onely vse her in the beginning, to shewe that Charles hath not bene the Author of the restoring of this citate, but God himselfe, who would shame men by a maide, most worthy to be honored by our posterity. I haue reported at once what was acted in two yeares, being all of one subiect: not to breake off the order of my discours in matters which followe after. And nowe I will returne to Compiegne besieged by the Bourguignon.

As all the French were much amazed for the losse of Joane, so the Englisb and Bourguignons were greatly incouraged to presse the seige of Compiegne with greater force. This important Citie (seated vpon the riuer of Oise, at the entrie of Picardie) had greatly furthered the Bourguignon, who for this reason was resolute to haue it cyther by loue or force.

Hee doth againe negotiate with Charles, assuring him of his loue. Charles (bewitched with the charmes of this Bourguignon) giues care to his newe deuises, and (forgetting that hee had bene abused,) hee promiseth to deliuer Compiegne into his hands. The Bourguignon accepts it: and the better to play his part, he drawes his Portuguesse to Noyon, being one of the cunningest women in the world, and most affected to her husband, as a gage of the loue he had promised to Charles, the which she should manage. The Lord of Flauy, Gouernor of Compiegne, had receiued seuerall commandments from the King to deliuer it. But hee excuseth himselfe, desiring to haue a more ample warrant from the King. Hee shewes him the importance of the place, and the wilfulness of the inhabitants, and so denying his maister honestly that which might bepreiudiciall vnto him, he discharge the dutie of a good seruant. Trulie it is a good seruice to denie the maister, when as hee commands that which is hurtfull vnto himselfe. This policie succeeding not for the Duke of Bourgonne, to surprize Compiegne, hee resolves to haue it by force. Bedford sends the Earle of Huntington with a thousand Englisb Archers to fortifie this seige. John of Luxembourg (who was there for the Bourguignon) builds great forts to keepe them from succors, and for a retreat he doth fortifie the Abbies of Venete and Royaulieu. The Inhabitants were in great extremitie, yet were they resolute to endure all vnder their wife and faithfull gouer- nor, rather then to fall into the hands of strangers, whose gripes they had formerly felt.

The Bourguignon proleth loue to King Charles.

The gouer- nor refuseth to deliuer Compiegne to the Bourguignon.

If they were fiercely besieged by the Englisb and Bourguignons, so were they as well succored by the French, vnder the happie commande of the Earle of Vendosme gouer- nor of Beauuais, and the Marshall of Boussac, who (hauing valiantly forced the first battions,) enter the Towne, & hauing visuallied it, they issue forth, with great resolution, so as they take all the other forts, to their enemies great losse. So Huntington and Luxembourg retyre with disgrace, leauing not onely that Countrey free, but their victualls, artilerie, munition & habillements of warre in their lodgings of Venete and Royaulieu, sauing themselves with some difficultie, at Pont l'Esque, through the fauour of Noyon. The Bourguignon was so amazed, as hee retyred into Arthois, hauing as bad successe by force as by policie.

Compiegne re- leued by the French.

The Bourguignon cha- led from Compiegne.

Our French forces being maisters of the field, they recouer all the Bourguignons con- quests. Choyssy, Gournay, Bertueil, Garmigny, Reffons, Pont Remy, Pont Saint Maxence, Longueil, Saint Mary, la Boyssiere, Ireligny, Verduel, and other places, where hee had gathered together all the corne and cattell of the Countrie, the which was restored to the poore people, to their great content. The Bourguignons, pride thus taken downe (after 1430. so many victorious hopes) was a principall part of this victorie. But hee refused to haue his reuenge of this affront. Being come to Arras, hee gathers together all the forces he can: and from thence hee goes to Peronne, to attend the bodie of his amie. His intent was to recouer what hee had lost in his last warre of Compiègne, meaning to begin at Garmigny, which did greatly anoye all that Country. He sends a troupe of 600 men before, vnder the conduct of Thomas Truell an English man. Girard of Brimen Governor of Roye augments this troupe with a hundred of his men. In this order they go to the siege of Garmigny as to a marriage: but Pothon (who had his spies in all places, and had put himselfe into Garmigny, at the brute of this siege,) slept not. Having therefore sent to discover the enemies countenance, hee learns that these Picards (being neere to Bouchoire) did hunt after hares, (whereof there are great store in those parts,) and that this troupe was wholly in disorder, running vp and downe with great noise. Pothon embraceth this occasion suddenly, and hauing drawn his men to field, he surpriseth these hunters, being dispersed and out of breath, and becomes a hunter of his peace: hee defeats them, kills them, and in the ende cries, that they take the runner waves. The Commander is taken, with most of their best men. Antoine of Liège and the Lord of Hully (being greatly lamented by the Bourguignon) were first led to Garmigny, and then to Compiègne in great triumph.

The newes heereof did greatly trouble the English, especially when as the Earle of Fland went with the French army to brauen him at the gates of Roye, offering him battaile. He made shewe to accept thereof, but naming called a Councell, he framed a reasonable excuse, that his soldiars were not willing he should fight in the end of the yeare. With these affronts the yeare ends, and with the death of a sonne which hee had by his new wife, whome hee loued deere, his spirits were so opprest with sorrowe for this losse, as this Prince (being too passionate) had speeches vnto the grauie of his person, and the greame of his blood, quen weeping and wishing for death. Doublesie it often falls out, that he which is too much put vp in prosperity, is easily daunted in aduersity. A goodly lesson for carmen (who cannot learne but by great examples) that their greame should not rise them from the common condition of mankind, that they are men and must die like men. O man what fouler thou beest, behold good remedies against the troubles of fortune: to be dronke with profperity, nor drowned in aduersity. Hee that succeeding years haue nothing memorable, but an entry to the obsequies in the Church of Paris, which shall give example to all the rest of the realme. The want of parties was necessary for the making of an accord. The Duke of Bourguignon could do much, but his infinite offends had transported him beyond the clouds, without some check. The same disgraces did greatly lessen his credit with the Duke of Bedford, who expected much more from him than hee felt by the effects: but that which made a breach in their friendship was, the foloweth of Arche Duke of Bedford sister to Philip Duke of Bourguignon, the more of their cold friendship, which till then was very necessitate but after marriage it was but upon a small, although in this occasion their league was not apparent. The one weeps for his wife, the other for his sister. The beginning of this warre was noted by the taking of Montargis from the French, through the notable treachery of a woman, whose entrance to the English, and who presently reaped the fruits of her treachery. But let vs attend the yeare following, where wee shall see a more notable change in this miserable Towne. At the same time, in recompence of Montargis Charles returns to the Kings obedience. The meanes is worthy observation, being put in practise in our times in many places. A Carter being at Chartres had a brother resident in Court with a Treasurer. The familiarity this Carter had with brother came into the Towne, made him both desire and to lay the plot of so memorable an enterprise. Neere vnto the gate there was an olde turned house, in the which there was a great vault haile filled vp with rubbish: there they lodge a hundred men: on the other side they conuay a thousand men, secretly in the night, into a house nere vnto the Towne. The Carter comes at the breake of day with his Cart vnto the gate

Charles returns to the King.

A where he ouerthrows it of purpose, faining that a wheele was split. While the gard labours to helpe him, the Ambush issues forth out of these ruines, and surpriseth the Port, and the rest second them with such speed, as the Cittie is wonne. This had bene done without any effusion of blood, if the Bishop had not animated the inhabitants to fight against their King, where hee himselfe was slaine with some of the Citizens. About this time, René Duke of Bar, brother to Lewis Duke of Anjou, and King of Sicily, (who shall make himselfe famous in the following raigne) received a great check. He had a notable quarrell against the Earle of Vaudemont, pretending the Earldome: from words they go to blowes. René fortifies himselfe with the forces of France: Vaudemont with those of Bourguigne. René being farre stronger in shew, besiegeth the Towne of Vaudemont, and when as the Earle, with the helpe of his friends, would haue raised the siege, René drawes him to fight, defying him, and promising to himselfe an assured victory. But God (the soueraigne Iudge of these factions) gaue it to the Earle, and René remained prisoner in the hands of the Duke of Bourguigne, to whom hee paid a great ranfome. In the end, by the Dukes meanes yeelding him his libertie, this quarrell was ended, marrying the eldest sonne of René with the daughter of the Earle of Vaudemont. But let vs reserve the rest to the following raigne.

About the end of this yeare, a solemnitie was done in Paris, which carried more shew then substance. We haue said before, how that Henry the 6. King of England, had bene crowned King of France, when as our Charles was crowned at Poitiers, after the decease of his father. Henry was but two yeares old, and came not out of England, vntill that Charles had bin solemnly crowned at Rheims, to the great ioy of all the French; but when as the Duke of Bedford found, how much this autentike publication aduanced the affaires of Charles: he caused Henry to be brought into France, and to be crowned at Paris, with an extraordinarie Maiestie, to out-countenance Charles his Coronation, by a greater shew of pompe. But the bloud of France cannot dissemble: no man was moued thereat, no more then to see a Tragedie acted vpon the Stage. This yeare is very barren of all memorable exploits, but that this silence noted an entrance to an accord (both parties being weary of pleading) yet with great slacknesse, as we see in diseases which come suddenly, and passe away slowly: we must therefore crosse this rough way before we come to Paris. Montargis taken by the English, as we haue said, was not recovered by the French, but after a diuers manner; for the English lost the Towne by the Castell, and the French the Castell by the Towne, yet were they three moneths in winning of the Castell. Hauing taken all, they lost all by the same meanes that made them so much to gape after the Castell, which was the want of money. This shamfull losse greeued many of the greatest in Court, and bred a new trouble by this occasion.

Tremouille was yet in great credit with the King, hauing by this meanes a great hand in the State: they accused him to haue heaped vp great treasure, to the preiudice of such as daily employed their lues for the Kings seruice. The greater men reioice to take Tremouille prisoner, and to punish him like vnto Glac, and others before mentioned. The King was at his Castell at Chinon: Tremouille followes him as his shadow, but it chanced, as he was in his chamber, the Lords of Brueil, Coytuy and Fetard, taken with 400 armed men, enter and take him: not one of a hundred of that fort could escape. But six thousand Crownes saved his life, hoping to returne againe into credit. The Constable of Richmont growes into greater fauour then before. Thus misfortune is good for some thing. Bedford putt vp with the successe of Montargis, takes Milly in Gassenous, but hauing besieged Lagny in Brie, he was repulsed: and at the same time, John of Luxembourg (of the Bourguignon faction) is dispossessed of Ligny in Barrois, by the Gentleman of Comecy. A disgrace which shall draw the Bourguignon to a composition so much desired; together with the happy successe of the French, in the County of Arthois, the taking of S. Valery in Ponthieu, and the generall wauering of these Citties in Picardy, tired with these confusions, being so great, as no man was assured of his person, of what partie sooner, if he were the weaker. The confusion of the warre.

1432. were so shuffled, as an English man would become French, to take a Bourguignon, and a Frenchman become English, or a Bourguignon, to take a Frenchman. These vnkind treaties, cheries were vsuall, especially at Amiens, Abbeville; and throughout all Picardie, where the warres had been most licentious. Which outrage hath been reuiued in our miserable age, through the crueltie of these wretched warres, which causeth men to make shipwracke both of faith and honour.

This year had a plausible beginning, but without any great effect. The Councell of Pisa being assembled (as we haue said) to redresse the confusion of Antipopes, and to reduce the Church (diuided by this Schisme) vnto vnion, sends the Cardinall of Auxerre vnto the Kings of France and England, to exhort them vnto peace. Charles protested that he desired nothing more; the English said the like. They assemble to this end at Auxerre in great troupes, but at their first meeting, all this treatie was broken off, for both the one & the other, stood vpon the qualitie of King of France, being the fundamentall point of all their quarrell. The Duke of Bedford spake more proudly then Charles himselfe, as if the law of State (which maintained this Monarchie) had bene made in England, an Iland become firme land, and France changed to the Isle of Albion or of Brittanie: of such force is error euen in matters of State, when as passion ouer-rules the light of reason. So as they all depart without any effect: They onely conclude a truce, for the great want of the poore people, who could suffer no more. But this truce was a pit-fall for many, trusting the countenance of this courteous warre, which making profession to meane nothing so, is more to be feared when the smiles, then when the frownes.

We haue said, that John Duke of Bourbon was taken prisoner in the battaile of Azincourt, whom they could neuer redeeme at any rate. This year he dyed in England, and his sonne Charles succeeds him. He had to wife the sister of the Duke of Bourgonne, but they fall to words for their rights, and so to warre. Charles takes from Philip, Grancy, Aulon, Perepertuis, Mucy-l'Eucluse, Chaumont, and other places. The Bourguignon had his reuenge, and besiegeth Belleuile in Beauuenlois, belonging vnto Charles. Mary Duchesse of Berry, labours to reconcile these Princes, and draws them to a peace, the which shall soone be a meanes of a generall accord betwixt the Bourguignon and France, by the mediation of the Duke of Bourbon, a profitable instrument of so good a worke. This occasion not prevented, was seconded by an other; for the Duke of Bedford, after the death of his wife (being sister to the Duke of Bourgonne) marries with Jaquelin the daughter of Peter of Luxembourg Earle of S. Pol, who was no friend to the Bourguignon: and moreouer the youth and beautie of this new spouse, had so bewitched Bedford, as he was easily drawne from Philip, whose loue he entertained with great difficultie, yet in respect of the generall cause they made a good ther, and had met at S. Omer to that effect: but this enterview encreased their discontents.

In the meane time, the truce (being ill obserued on either side) is conuerted into a languishing warre. Bedford makes warre in the Countrie of Maine by Seales and Willelme, two renowned Captaines, which besiege S. Celerin. Charles succours it by the Lord of Bueil, who hauing lodged some troupes at Vuain, (a village of small account) made it famous by a notable peece of seruice. Seales aduertised of these troupes lodged in this hamlet, hastes thither, surpriseth them, and cuts them in peeces: but the Lord of Bueil had his reuenge: for falling vpon the Conquerours, who returned in disorder, he puts them in route. Chartier notes it for a notable seruice, that fortie lances overthrowed a thousand five hundred men, which were all slaine, or taken prisoners: of such force is disorder and amazement in warre. The siege of Saint Celerin being thus raised, to the great disgrace of the English, Bedford much greeued for this affront, sends the Earle of Arondell thither with new forces. It was at the same time when Charles went into Daulphiné: the fame of this notable victorie, holding mens minds in suspence, so as Arondell takes S. Celerin by force, and from thence he marcheth to Silley le Guil-lume. The Gouernour fearing to want succours, treats with Arondell. That if by a prefixed day, the French were not the stronger, at a certaine Elme nere vnto the place

A place, hee would then yeeld vpon the Towne, and for assurance thereof giues him hostages. The Court was troubled at this summons: all post thether, fearing to continue their shame with losse, Princes and officers of the Crowne, the Dukes of Alexon and Anion, the Constable of Richmont, the Marshalls of Bouffac, Rieux, & Retz: the Lords of Laheac, Graville, and Bueil, with his good fortune. Being all come to the Elme at the day appointed, they summon the Earle of Arondell to deliuer vp his hostages and to fight with them, but he yeelds vp his hostages and leaues the sege. The last of the omitted voyage makes our men to post presently to Court. Arondell returns to the sege of Silley, and not able to take it hee surpriseth Beaumont le Vicomte, but pressed with sicknesse hee retyres to Mans, a Towne then vnder their obedience.

The voiage of Daulphiné was performed. Charles comes to Vienne passing through Auvergne. The reason of this progresse was to settle matters in Daulphiné, Lionnois and Langnedoc, which Countreies had serued him faithfully and profitably in his greatest afflictions. All the cheefe of those Countreies attend him, and hold their Estates by his commaundement. The ioy both of Charles and his subiects was exceeding great after so long and dangerous a storme. Charles did gladly imbrace his ancient seruants, the Earle of Fois, Gaucourt and Groslee, with the Nobility of Viwarez and Daulphiné, who had giuen him so great testimonies of their faith and valour. All men were confirmed in their gouernments, no man was denied of what hee demanded: which giues them courage to do their best endeauours in his seruice. The States graunt the King a notable summe of money for the maintenaunce of his warres.

We haue obserued the humour of Amedee Duke of Sauoie, who during the doubtfullnesse of the French affaires, had carried a watchfull eye, to make his profit by their confusion. Being well informed, that Charles loued him not, he fortifies himselfe by alliances. Hee had giuen his eldest daughter to Lewis of Anion King of Sicile, and now he marries his Sonne Lewis Earle of Geneue with Anne the daughter of John of Lusignan King of Cyprus, from whence the title of the realme of Cyprus comes to the house of Sauoie. This marriage was honored with the presence of the Duke of Bourgonne, the Earle of Neuers, and the Prince of Orange. These were good cautions for Amedee, against Charles: but wee shall soone see that hee will finde an other expedient against alleuents. As a tree in the sappe sheweth that the spring is neere, so diuers popular accidents chancing this year foretold what should happen. There were 60000 men in armes against the English in Vexin-Norman, and in Caux 20000. Charles doth carefully imbrace those occasions, and encouraging them both by letters and messages, he sends them notable Commanders, the Duke of Alanson with the Lords of Lore and Bueil, braue and Valiant Captaines. But as a tree that sprouts forth through the fauour of a warme season, is stayed by a sharpe winde: so all these popular braueries were soone daunted, and this streame was soone turned. The Townes that were mutyned yeeld to the English force, but they keepe their hearts for their King, vntill they may shake off the English yoke.

But the wise prouidence of God, who gouerns the worke for the restoring of this estate, raised vp means which all the humane policie of Charles or of his Councell could not foresee, who had labored by all meanes to winne the Bourguignons loue. He harbored in his heart a resolute discontent against the English: to whome hee imputed the cause of all his crosses and disgraces. The Liegeois crosse him many waies, in the possession of Namur newly fallen vnto him. Antwerp and Arras are discontented, and ready to rise against him. The English (in his opinion) is the author and fauor of these discontents, and it may be did all he could to molest him, what shewe soeuer he made. But how focuer it were, the Bourguignon (meaning to make an open breach with him) compounds at quarrels with this discontented people, intending to make a firme peace with Charles. So the year of 34. passeth without any great alteration.

This year of 35. shalbe more happie for the French then the former, Charles beseegeth

Exploits of warre.

1435 Gerberoy by Pothon and la Hire. The English come to succor it, led by the Earle of Arondell, being a thousand against lesse then five hundred. Our men therefore resolute to retyre to Beauvais, but they must accompt with the stronger. There is but one meane of safetie, to hope for no helpe. So these braue warriors resolute to fight, and are victors for the English troupes are defeated: seauen or eight hundred slaine vpon the place, and all the rest prisoners. The Earle of Arondell (being greuously wounded) dies at Beauvais, a braue and resolute Captaine, dying in the bed of honour. This was the beginning of the yeare: the winter was verie sharpe, but it daunted not the courage of our warriors. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of Orleans) was the ring-leader in many exploits: he causeth Saint Denis to be surprisid by Captaine Degenulle, and hee followes well accompanied to keepe it. In going along he takes Houdan, and then hee fortifies Saint Denis with men and vittells, and leaues the Marshall of Rieux to gouerne it. And for that hee would loofe no time, hee imployes his troupes to take some places there abouts, as Pont Saint Maxence, Orville and Menlan. The English had fortified Saint Ouy, to keepe the Countrey in alarme: Occasions are oft of dayly skirmishes, and daylie the English are beaten. But the long stay of this little army, and this thorne of Saint Denis, stured vp the people of Paris, who loth to be so restrained, prepare a great power to force Saint Denis at what price fouer. The Marshall of Rieux, loath to ingage himselte, (being in all shewe the weaker,) retires honorablie to Menlan, without any losse. The English beat downe the defences of Saint Denis, being a common retreat to all men, without any more labour, eyther to keepe it, or to recouer it.

The English defeated and the Earle of Arondell slaine.

The accord of Philip Duke of Bourgogne with Charles the 7. King of France.

An Assemblée to treat of a peace.

In the ende behold an agreement made with Charles, so much expected, so vnprofitable fought after, and nowe freely offered by the Duke of Bourgogne. The deputies of the Councell presse both French, English and Bourguignon, to ende al quarrells, by some good composition. The Citie of Arras is allowed of by them all, to treat in. The Assemblée was great: from the Pope and the Councell of Pisa there came the Cardinalls of Saint Croix and Cipres, with twelue Bishops: For the King of France there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, the Earle of Vendosme, the Archebishop of Rheims, Chancellor of France, the Lords of Harcourt, Valpergue, la Fayette, Saint Pierre, du Chastell, du Bois, Chastillon, du Flay, de Baillou, de Rommet, Curselles, and de Cambray first President of the Patliament at Paris, with many wife and learned men, as, John Tudart, Blesset, John Charetier, Peter Cletel, Adam la Queux, John Taise, and la Motte. For the King of England the Cardinalls of Yorke, Winchester, the Earle of Suffolke, the Bishop of Saint Davids, John Ratcliffe keeper of the great scale, the Lord of Hangerford, Ralse the wife, the Official of Canterbury, and some Doctors of diuinity. For Philip Duke of Bourgogne, there came the Duke of Gueldres, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishop of Cambray, the Earle of Farnembourg, the Bishop of Lige, the Earles of Flandemont, Neuers, Salines, S. Pol, and Ligny, besides the deputies of many of his best Townes. The pompe was great, both on the deputies behaile, & of the Duke of Bourgogne, who intainted the with all the honour & good chere that might be wished. But leauing these circumstances I make hast to the principal matter.

The Kings of France and England began the treaty. The fundamentall question was, to whom the Crowne of France belonged? The English did challenge it, both for that he was issued from a daughter of France, as also by the graunt of Charles the 6. who did issue Henry the 5. and his successors, heires of the crowne, & had disinherited Charles the 6. whom he termed an usurper. The deputies for Charles answered, that they ought not to call in question the ground of the Estate, which cannot stand firme without that heire to whom the lawe appoints, and therefore without prouing of that which was apparent of it selfe, they came, to offers for the ending of all controuerfies. That if the King of England would both disclaime the title of King of France, & yeeld vp the countries held by him in diuers parts of the Realme, he should inioy the Duchies of Guienne and Normandy, doing homage for them vnto the Kings of France, as his fouerrange, and with those conditions which his Ancestors, Kings of England had formerly inioyed then. They stood vpon very different termes: their authority was limited, and possession putt vp the English. But sometimes he refuseth that after sues. He that sweareth to haue all, most commonly loofeth all. One moitie in effect had more auailed the English, then all in imagination, who in the ende shall finde, that the soveraigne Judge, the preferuer of the lawe, eard of States, giues and takes away, appoints and disappoints, according to his good and wise will, and that there is no force, nor wisdom but his. The matter was soone ended betwixt the Kings of France and England: seeing right could do no good, the sword must preuaile.

The question for the crown of France.

Charles & the English cannot agree.

Thus the Ambassadors of England, returne without any effect, those of France stay to treat with the Duke of Bourgogne and his deputies, amongst the which he himselte was the chiefe, as well for his owne interest, as for his iudgement in affaires. A man exceeding cunning, who could imbrace all occasions to make his profit by an other, as the discourse of his life hath made manifest. But to what ende serues all this murther, and so great workmanship, to frame a building which shall be ruined vnder his forme, and that bury him in the ruines thereof? It is a foolish reason which thou calledst reason, having no ground of reason, and doest not hearken to the voice of heaven. O Foole, altho' riches be taken from thee this night, if thou walkest in shadow, he toys in vaine, to make his name immortal in the graue, he hunts with infinite labour and takes nothing.

As for Charles, he sought to retire the Bourguignon from all league and alliance with the King of England, and taking from him all occasions of discontent, so to ingage him by gifts, & honours, as he should resolute to follow his faction, as the most profitable knowing that his own priuate interest was the chiefe end of his designs. Matters were carried in shew according to the humour of that age, the disposition of the court, and for the honour of Charles, who must aske the Duke of Bourgogne pardon, having committed his father to be slaine against his faith. But was it not true, must not the crime be committed by him that was culpable? Charles therefore resolves to send him a banke, & the next day testifie that the Bourguignon filed it with so many vnreasonable conditions as it is strange so great a monarch should stoop so much to his subject & vassall, but necessity hath no law.

Charles sends a banke to the Bourguignon to insert what conditions he pleased.

A preface for great men, not to attempt any thing against reason, least they bee constrained to repaire it with reason, and yet to know that it is an amendment of a fault to yeeld to necessity for the good of the state, being a great thirst to loofe for gain. The original sets downe at large all the conditions of this treaty: vnto so please may read the ninth of Montfrellet, & in the history of S. Denis. The summe is, that the massacre committed in the person of John Duke of Bourgogne at Montreuil-saint-yonne, is fully repaired by confession and ceremonies. Great sommes of present money with goodly Seignories are given to the Duke of Bourgogne, so many assurances for him and his, and a great volume is full of these scrupulous conditions.

The

1435.
King Charles and the Bourguignon reconciled.

The Duke of Bourgongnes promise is more simple, that he should declare himselfe a friend to Charles the 7. King of France, & enemy to his enimies: that he should renounce all alliance and friendship with the king of England, and promise, both his person, and all his meanes to expell him out off France. The performance was according to promise: Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Arthur of Brittain, Earle of Richemont, Constable of France in the name of Charles the 7. aske pardon of the Duke of Bourgongne, for the death of his father, and the Duke pardoned him for the loue of God. The Cardinals (in the Popes name and the Counsels) absolve the Duke from the oath which he had made vnto the English: and eyther part sweares to maintaine the accord in that which did concerne him. So the peace was published with great solemnity, to the incredible content of all men.

The King, the Duke of Bourgongne and the whole Realme reioyced exceedingly, only John of Luxembourg Earle of S. Pol, wold not be therin cōprehended, he shall suffer for it and his house after him. This was the 24. of September, in the yeare 1435. a famous day for those things which happened in this raigne, whereof this accord gaue the first occasion. The marriage of Charles sonne to the Duke of Bourgongnes, with Katherine of France, daughter to our Charles, was concluded to seale this accord. From this peace sprong a more violent war against the English. The Duke of Bourgongne sends backe all his contracts to the Duke of Bedford, and hauing shewed him the iust reasons which had moued him to imbrace the Kings amity, beeing his kinsfeman and Lord, hee renounceth the alliance of England, with a watch-word, that euery one should looke to himselfe. Euery man sharpenes his sword, and scoures his armes, to recouer that by force which they could not obtaine by reason.

War very violent against the English.

The first frutes of this accord beganne to grow ripe euen in the heart of winter, for Corbeil yeelds presently to the King, with Brie-Conte-Robert and the Castle of Bois de Vincennes. The Bourguignon employes all his friends and intelligences at Paris, he vseth all his instruments, meaning to let them to worke the yeare following. All Normandy begins to reuolt, Diepe, Fecan, Monstier-Villiers, Harsen, Tancarville, Bec-Crespin, Gommesle, Loges, Villemont, Grasville, Longueville, Neufville, Jambreville, Charles-Mesnil, S. Camain, Fontaines, Preaux, & Blainville, obey the King willingly, chafing away the English: & receiuing the French for their safety: all which was acted in two dayes. What more? To finish this worke, God takes away one of the chiefe causes, and one of the principall instruments of the misery which had so long afflicted this estate. We haue seene what part Isabel of Bauierre played in this Tragedy, wee haue sought her after the death of her poore husband and could not finde her, for in truth she was ciuilly dead. Bedford fearing the spirit of this Medea, seekes not onely to stay her hands, but to keepe her eyes from the managing of affaires. And for that shee had deuoured the treasure of the Realme, he constraines her to keepe a diet. He doth therefore sequester her to the house of S. Pol, where she liued vntill the ende of this yeare in great pouerty, no more assisted by the Bourguignon then by the English. Beeing dead, they caused her body to be put into a small boate, and so transported by the riuier of Seine to S. Denis, where she was buried without any pompe, like to a common person. A light put out, whose fauour doth yet offende posterity.

Queene Isabel dies.

In this yeare also died John of England, that great Duke of Bedford, called Regent of France, who hath noted many blacke pages in this volume, and so much terrified our Ancestors. Hauing seene the former accord, and felt so sodaine effects in Normandy, fearing the rest would follow, he drowned himselfe in sorow, and knowing no meanes to auoid this storme, he dies at Rouen, the 15. of December, leauing to King Henry the 6. a bottom very hard to vntwist, and to his yong wife (beeing sister to the Earle of S. Pol) a cause of mourning, the which continued not long, for she married soone after with an English Aduenturer of small accompt, giuing cause to laugh at her, beeing but little pittied.

The Duke of Bedford dies.

Charles being thus discharged of a heauy burthen, by this accord, hath more liberty to follow his honest delights. He goes to Lions, visits Dauphiné, and stayes in Languedoc.

Arca a Province which he loues about all the rest, hauing found it most deuoted to his service. Montpellier was his aboad, a place very pleasantly seated: be taking this time of recreation, he had left good lieutenants in France, who shal soone send him newes of their exploits.

The Citty of Paris yeelds to the King, and expells the English.

He Bourguignon prepares to annoy the English, whilest that the Constable makes way for the reduction of Paris. His intent was (parting from Pontoise) to put himselfe into S. Denis, a Towne halfe dismantled: but Thomas of Beaumont Capitaine of the Bastille (hauing intelligence of this dessein) preuented the Constable, and entred into S. Denis with a notable troupe of soldiers. Richmont notwithstanding approacheth neere to S. Denis: the sentinell hauing giuen warning of his approach, Beaumont issues forth to the bridge, vpon the little riuier which is towards Pierre-fite, where he met with the fore-runners, who hauing drawne him forth, ingage him in the battaile, the which was led by the Constable, marching from the valley of Montmorency. This English troupe was easily vanquished, most of them were cut in peeces, and the rest taken, hardly any one of them escapes, to carry newes to Paris. Thomas of Beaumont is flaine among the rest vpon the place. The Constable makes vse of this good successe: he presently marcheth with his victorious forces to Paris, which stood amazed at this reuerent, wanting a Regent, who was lately deceased, and such as were left to command were more fit to handle an Oare, then to gouerne the helme. Now was the time for good Frenchmen to shew themselves, whereof there were many in the Citty. The Bourguignon faction being now become the Kings seruants, imbrace this occasion, and being consulted together, they resolute to shake off the English yoke, the which they had too long endured.

The English vanquished.

The Duke of Bourgongne was then at Fruges, but he had left the Lord of Lisle-Adam to defend with his partisans at Paris. It is the same whom he had formerly employed against Charles and his father John, in the murder of the Kings seruants. He had great credit in the Parisians, of whom Michael Laillier was the chiefe Tribune. Hee discouers by him the peoples affections, being resolute to submit themselves to the King: of whom they craue onely a generall absolution of what was past. This gentle demande beeing brought to Pontoise to the Constable, and easily granted, all prepare for the effects. That quarter nere the Halles gaue the first signe of the French libertie at Paris, by the meanes of the Curat of S. Eustace, and al S. Houores street ioynes in this hardy resolution. In the meane time the Vniuersity beyond the bridge doth the like. Lewis of Luxembourg, Bishop of Therouenne Chancellor for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux & Meaux, the Lord Wilshy, with others deuoted to the English, aduertised of the mutinie, withdraws parts of the Citty, fearing some sedition, retire towards S. Anthomes gate, hauing carried all their best furniture into the Bastille, and fortified the houses adioyning. All being thus prepared at Paris, the Constable of Richemont, guided by Lisle-Adam, parts from Pontoise, & comes to S. Denis, in the night, where hauing rested some houres, he marcheth early in the morning, accompanied with the Earle of Dunois (a bastard 1436. of the house of Orleans) the Lords of Suze and Bueil, with a great company of resolute souldiers, approaching nere the Citty. Lisle-Adam with a choise troupe goes before. James gate, the appointed place for the Rendez-vous, where he finds all in a readines, so as Lailier having planted ladders for him at the lowest part of the wall, he mounts with his troupe. Being entred the citty, the people of that quarter (who were assembled for his coming) begin to crye. A peace, a peace. God saue the King, and the Duke of Bourgogne. Lisle-Adam being ioyned to the chiefe of the citty, goes directly to the Gate, the which was set open by the capitaine of that quarter, and the Constable, who was before it with his troupes, entred in good order. Then the people redoubled their cries. They all stand at a gaze, being aduertised of this entry, and exceeding glad to see themselves ready to recouer their ancient liberty, they prepare to march where they should be commanded to expell the English. All run to the Bastille. The Tournelles are presently seized on, and approaches vnto the Bastille are soone won. Such as werewithin it at the first, made some shewe of defence, but as all things were prepared to force them, they demand a parle, and agree to depart with their liues and baggage. They are conducted about the Towne beneath the Louure, to imbarke vpon the riuer of Seine, and so to passe to Rouen. They could not well haue passed through the citty. The people aduertised hereof run to the walles, and cry out with great shoutes, bayting the English like dogges, whom a little before they had feared and honoured as their masters. This happened the 27. of February, in the year 1436. Thus Paris returns to the obedience of this Crowne, hauing passed seuentene yeares vnder the gouvernement of the English: which made the fatherly command of their King more pleasing vnto them, and them more willing to obey him, hauing tasted the imperious commande of a stranger.

The Burgundians attempt Calais in vaine.

Charles aduertised of this happy successe, parts from Montpellier, and returns slowly by Auvergne, to giue the Parisians time to prepare for his entry the which was performed with great pompe, six moneths after the reduction of the citty, but with so extraordinary an affection of the people, as drinking after a great thirst. All the townes within the Realme had followed this example, if Charles had imbraced this goodly occasion, all being drawne vnto their duty by a naturall instinct. He was of a milde spirit, pliable to all windes, flying toyle, but patient when he had undertaken it. We haue heard therto scene him content inough in his afflictions, although the waight of blowes so often doubled, had made him senselesse, so as he bare his crosses with lesse feeling, as a mortified member doth the rasor or corrosiue: but prosperity had so renewed his spirits, as he recovered himselfe & returned to his owne disposition. He wanted authority to command well, and iudgement to make choyse of his seruants, for he often imbraced and rewarded vnecessary men, and put back such as were profitable.

This proceeding discontented such (as seruing him faithfully) did see themselves contemned. These discontents giue them liberty to speake, and doe things, which offended the King, Experience teaching, that these tractable humors are as soon moved as pleased, and above all, are suspicious and cholericke: for impressions creeping into these wake spirits, makes them to fall into another extreame of vnmeasured passion. We haue scene the like in the life of Lewis the gentle, but we shal not find the like excess in our Charles: yet shall we see that by the like indiscreet facility he disordered his owne affaires, discontented his bloud, grieved many of his best seruants, filled his life with languishing in the prosperity of his affaires, to cast him headlong (in the midst of his greatest triumphs) into the gulph of a fearefull graue: what we are to represent in this discourse, shall be the comentary of this truth.

As soone as the spring appeares, the Duke of Bourgogne army goes to field to besiege Calais, it consisted for the most part of the commonalties of his estates. He easily engaged them in this warre, both by his authority and the shew of profit: to haue a Towne so conuenient for trafficke. This army had scarce continued in field ten dayes but they looke homeward to their houses, shoppes and fieldes: besides, the English wrought them vnder hand, and sent a great supply to defend Calais. This humour did

As to possesse this armed multitude, as the Bourguignon had no power to hold them. All passe away like to a violent ifream, and this his desseme came to nothing, although he chased in vaine, like vnto the Perseus that threatened the tempest & whipt the sea. So all enterprises succede not. The Duke of Bourgogne being thus retired, the English, had his reuenge of this affront, & spoiles the marches of Boulogne and Gravelins to the great losse of the Countrey. The Lord of Croy sought to make head against the English, being followed by a goodly troupe: but he was defeated and saues himselfe with distinction in Ardes. The Flemings stirre at this losse, and march vnder the Duke of Bourgogne commande, but they returne with shame, for Calais was referred for an other sea-son. We haue sayed that Charles had a sonne named Lewis borne in the midst of his greatest crosses, the first yeare of his raigne, in the year 1423. Being thirteene yeares old, he married him to Marguerite Stuard the only daughter of James King of Scotland, a Princess of excellent vertues, and a gage of the faithfull seruice which Scotland did to this Crowne in her greatest dangers, who furnished not much this felicity of France. Charles was desirous to returne to Montpellier: where hauing called an assemblée of that Province, he heard many complaints of the outrages, his soldiars had committed, running vp and downe the Countrey in great disorder. The best soldiars were guilty of these insolencies for want of pay. Rodrigo de Villandrado an Aragonais, (who had faithfully serued the King,) was in disgrace, and banished with his troupe, but being ioyned with Pothin in Gasconie, and hauing taken some places from the English, he made his peace with Charles. This confusion was not alone in one Countrey, but generally disperfed throughout the Realme. A troupe of 2000. horse led by Anthoine of Chabannes, Blanchfort, Gualter of Eron, Floquet and other renowned Capitaines, parting from Normandie, passe through the Countreys of Vimeu, and Ponthieu, by Dorleans, Orville, Bray, Cappy, Lihons in Sauters, and enter into Cambresy, from thence they lodge at Sallines towards Hainault with insatiable spoile, eating and ransoming all after a hostile manner. John of Croy the Bayliffe of Hainault sent troupes against them, but they were defeated. They were called the flauers, or fleasers.

The robberies of soldiers.

In the end through Charles his many commands, they come into Champagne, where hauing remained sometime, they were employed to take Chasteau-Landon, Charny, and Nemours, and from thence they were led to Monstereau-saut-yonne, where there was a menialous seege, being well assailed and well defended: but in the end the Towne was taken by force and the Castell by composition. Charles was at Bray, and the Dauphin commanded at this seege. He made faire warres with the English, who thanking him before the King his father, yeilded him these first fruits of his authoritie in the viewe of the whole army, who honored him afterwards as the Sun rising, whence grew the iealousies we shal hereafter speake of.

The Mignons of Court were then in quarter gaue a great occasiō. Christopher, of Harcourt Lord of Chaumont, and Martin Gouge Bishop of Clermont, men that had no good in them but to do ill. The Duke of Bourgogne had much trouble this year: the English had sowed great diuisions in his chiefest Citties. Bruges stirred vp strange mutinies against him, whereas he was in danger of his life: Lisle Adam chiefe Capitaine of his gard is slaine. A popular man whom wee haue scene to command the Parisians to life, once against the King, and an other time for the King, he presumed in like sort to gouerne them of Bruges, but they teare him in peeces, as the Gantois had in former times massacred Artenille, their Tribune. A multitude is a dangerous thorne, which cannot be handled without pricking. Gant followed the example of Bruges, but in the end all was pacified, with the losse of the most seditious, to the content of the same people, who denoure him they did adore. After these seditions, Philip returns to waite he beseegeth Crotoy (a place very important for the free trafficke of his Countries) but after great paines and charge, it proued all vaine. A man vnfortunate in war, but in Councell he commanded mens minds with an Imperious grauity. But (amidst the generall) shall I omit this particular obseruation, profitable for the example: That great Capitaine la Hire, passing neere vnto Clermont (a Towne then

He is vnfortunate in war.

1437. subiect to the English) was there honorably received by the Lord of Anfemont gouernor of the Towne, and (for that he trusted la Hire much) he suffered him to enter with his men into the raulin to eate a banquet. la Hire embracing this occasion, makes him his prisoner and takes the place, Anfemont had his reuenge in time, by meanes of the Lord of Mouy: he enters Beauuais, where la Hire was gouernor, goes vnto him to the Tenise Court, takes him and leads him away prisoner in vewe of all the inhabitants, and makes him to yeeld both his ransome and Clermont againe, notwithstanding Charles his letters to the Bourguignon: but in the ende they are good friends. Thus discourtesie is alwaies requited with the like, leauing a long repentance for him that is the author of the iniurie, how braue and cunning soeuer he bee, God punishing iniquitie in due season, when as men thinke least of it, and by meanes least apparent. The warres had wonderfully vnpeopled France, but this scourge was not sufficient. The whole Countre lying wast, (not able to be tilled by reason of the daylie incursions and ordinarie spoiles of both parties) there fell a great famine. That which was vually worth but five pence, was sold for five shillings and six pence, or more. The people being famished, sought bred where they might finde it, being forced from their houses by raging hungar, they disperse themselves in the fields and Townes: in the one to finde some fruite among the trees and in the bushes, ro some herbes or rootes in the other to get some morcell of bread, or some garbage, to fill the panch with any thing they could meete withall.

Famine and pestilence
followe war.

So their bodies filled with bad meates were likewise filled with bad humors, falling into diuers languishing diseases. In the ende all turned to a plague so horrible, as all these poore creatures famished & weakned, with diseases were like vnto dne wood in a great flame. Thus one plague bred another, and that miserable plant of warre, brought forth two branches of miserie to our wretched Countre, famine and pestilence. These afflictions dispersed throughout the Realme, rained chiefly at Paris, the sollempne Rendezvous of this languishing people. There was nothing to be seene but lamentable troupes of people pale and leane, of all sexes and ages, eyther running in the fields or vp and downe the streets, or layed vpon dunghills, or dead in the market places, a most horrible spectacle to behold.

Alamentable spectacle in Paris.

There died threecore thousand persons in Paris. All the principall men abandoned the Cittie, except Adam of Cambray the first President, Ambrose of Lore the Prouost of Paris, and the President of the Accounts, whome God preserued in this contagion, to eternize their commendable memories for euer, hauing succored the publicke in necessity: without whose couragious resolution the Cittie had easily fallen into the hands of the English, who watched for all occasions, and made daylie incursions from Monte euen vnto the gates. The Champian Countre being abandoned, wolues left the forests without feare, and hauing made their pray vpon the remainder of this miserable people, they came to the gates of Townes & euen into the streets. This horrible spectacle hath bene seene at Paris, in the Theater of the world, in the most populous Cittie of all others. So one miserie drewe on another, and these afflictions continued two whole yeares, vnto the yeare 1439. whilest the contention of Antipopes increased the fire of Schismes in Christendome, as we shall shewe in due place.

The Duke of Sauoie becomes a monke.

Amedee or Amé Duke of Sauoie carried himselfe as we haue sayed, during the calamities of France: in the ende of this yeare he shall shewe a strange alteration of humor, to the great amazement of all the world, for being in his Castell of Thonon, (a Towne seated vpon the Lake Leman) he retires with a small traine to Ripaille, where he had an Abbaie of Monkes of Saint Maurice, and hauing imparted his desire but to two of his most confident seruants, (hauing bound them to keepe him faithful company) he takes vpon him the habit of these monkes, that is, A graye frocke, a longe cloake, a gray hood, a short cornet, and a red bonet under his hode, but vpon his gray frocke he wares a great girdle of gold, & vpon his cloake a crosse of gold. Hauing thus changed his habit, his meaning was not to change his degree, nor to leaue the world, but vnder the colour of this habit, his intent was to aspire higher, as the course of his life will shew. Being now retired to Ripaille, he calles a parliament and shewes them his intention in this newe manner of life. That being weary of the world, where there was nothing but toyle and trouble; hee would sequester himselfe, to dedicate his life wholly to the seruice of God. But to the end he might prouide for the gouernment of his estate, he declares his eldest sonne Prince of Piedmont, and Claude his yongest, Earle of Geneue, and he himselfe remaines Duke of Sauoie, although he had vowed himselfe to the order of Saint Maurice, and without altering of any thing, he referues to himselfe the sole and soueraigne authority of al his estats. Hauing thus published his intent, he retires with his monkes to Ripaille, into one quarter of the lodging the which he had built apart, accompanied with twenty of his fauorits in Monkes attire: but not liuing like vnto that profession, for leauing them their water & rootes, he qualified this solitarie life with the best cheere he could get from Chamberie or Turin. This yeare is likewise memorable by the death of three great Princesses: of Catherine Queene of England sister to Charles the 7. the mournfull leuanie of our long miseries: of the old Queene daughter to the King of Nauarre Mother to the Princes of Brittaine, the Duke & Countesse of the old Countesse of Armaignac, daughter to the Duke of Berry and Mother to the Duke of Sauoie, the Earle of Armaignac and the Earle of March. All died almost in one day, hauing seene the strange tragedies of France, acted during their liues and vpon their children, and in their ends, seeing no end of our miseries. As the furie of fighting grew colde, so the war was turned into trafficke. There was no Towne but the gouernor kept it for him that would giue most: and Charles held it more expedient to haue a Towne or place for money, then to beseege it with great charge, to the oppression of his subiects, and with a doubtfull euent. Montargis had cost eyther partie much money to take it and to recouer it againe: Charles buies it of Francis of Surienne an Aragonais vnder the English pay, for ten thousand Crownes. He bought Dreux (the which he could neuer yet obtayne) for eighteene thousand Crownes of William Brouillart of Beaufe, a filthy trafficke, worthy of that confused time, but vnworthy of all good order and all royall authority. The which being layed open vnto Charles, he resolues to vse an honorable force, & to spend more money to get more honor. So he beseegeth Meaux and takes it victoriously, these were the first fruits of this newe yeare. In the moneth of May Charles the only son of Philip Duke of Bourgongne comes to Tours, where King Charles was resident, and takes Catherine of France his daughter to wife, according to the treatie of Arras.

Hauing conducted her through his fathets Countries to Saint Orem (where the duke attended him, hee solemnized the marriage with exceeding great pompe, the which did nothing increase the loue of these Princes allied, nor the happiness of the marriage, the which was of small continuance, and lesse loue betwixt the parties as the course of the historie will shew. In the meane time the Bourguignon hath still two strings to his bowe. Although he had renounced the alliance of England, yet he had not left all his intelligences, the necessity of their neighbour-hood giuing them still occasions to confer together. And as he was alwayes watchfull of his profit, so had he a good gage in England to settle his affaires, in rettyring Lewis Duke of Orleans out of prison, being taken at the bataille of Azincourt. He caused Charles to entertaine a treatie for a truce with the English: the first grounds were layed by the Duchesse his wife, a cunning Princess and careful of her husbands good. The Cardinal of Wincesire comes to Gravelin to that effect, yet this was but to lay the first foundation of the worke which shalbe finished in due season. We haue made mention of Jehn of Luxembourg, who would not bee comprehended in the treaty of Arras. Philip made great shewe to be displeased with him, and Luxembourg like-wise to be his enemy, causing his men to be laine in great disorder. Philip treats with him vpon complaint of them that were wronged, and all is pacified. The cleere sighted did easily finde that this was the Bourguignons policie, who seemed to bee in choller against him to gratifie Charles, being much displeased with Luxembourg, who played the pette King with his maister, but he shall not carrie it long, for he died soone after, & the Bourguignon lost the whip he held ready for all events, and the children of Luxembourg stood in need of the Kings favour. But now the Bourguignon flies to another practise. He desired infinitely to be maister of Calais, and seeing that force could not preuaile, he meanes to trie policy. Some of his subiects perswaded him that in breaking of a dike, they should let in the sea, and so drown the Towne & Countrey about, whereby they should force them to obedience. He beleuees this imagination, and employes much paine and cost to effect it. But this fancie of a flood, vanished away like vnto the Flemish army at the first seege, whereof we haue seene the fruitlesse issue. So this fantastickall flood proued ridiculous. But the Duke to shew that he had done something, caused the bridge of Milay to be beaten downe, and some small dikes, which onely watered the Countrey.

The beginning of this yeare layed the foundation of great matters for the restoring of our estate, the which doth drawe on dailey by meanes not foreseene, and without the wisdom or care of Charles, who was chiefly interess'd. After the reduction of Paris, all the Townes in generall were resolu'd to free themselves by force, if the King had bene so affected, but finding his minde inclining rather to peace, they be'eech him to finde some meanes to compounde with the English, and not to languish longer in the ordinarie losses of a lingering and preiudiciall warre. The Duchesse of Bourgogne for her husbands priuate interest, layes the first stone, treating for the deliuey of Lewis Duke of Orleans, as wee haue sayd. This first act was seconded by the request which the Prouinces of the realme made vnto the King, the which ministred occasion vnto Charles to call a generall Parliament at Orleans, whether not onely all the Citties sent their deputies, according to the custome, but all the Noblemen which came not in person sent their Agents: for the subiect was to treat of a generall peace, & if it might not be effected, to let some order for the men of warre, for the ease of the poore people, who could endure no more. The King was there in person accompanied with these Noblemen, the Earles of Marche, Bourbon, Yendosme, and Richemont Constable, and the Archbishop of Rheims beeing Chancellor of France. The Agents of the Duke of Orleans, of the Duke of Bourgogne, and of the Earle of Armaigne assisted with the deputies of Paris, Languedoc, Dauphiné, Guienne and other Prouinces subiect to the French. The Chancellor (a wise and an eloquent man) did set downe at large the miseries of war, and the inestimable good of peace: but what better commentarie then the feeling of forepast miseries, and the visible demonstration of our present calamities. It was decreed that in regard of a general peace they should make al necessarie poultur with speede. As for the ording of men of war, they should presently take some course to auoide confusion hereafter. The Lord Chancellor & the first President were chosen to negotiate this treaty with the English, through the meanes and fauour of the Duke of Bourgogne, as hauing layed the foundation: & presently a decree was made for the government of soldiars both of horse & foote, and to discharge the army of hangers on the which did but incommber, to the great oppressio of the poore people. This was the institution of the frank-archers. The first day of May was appointed by the common consent of both Kings to meete at Saint Omer, but the King of England was aduised by the Duke of York his vncl (who had succeeded the Duke of Bedford in his authority, although the name of Regent was not given him since the Kings coronation) that he should stand vpon termes, as hauing no neede of peace, but only moued with compassion of the poore people, and therefore he failed in the assignation. But there fel out an vnexpected occasion to Charles, which not only brake of the course of this businesse & all others, but had wel neere plounged France into greater miserie then before. The King was gone to Angers, where he had intelligence of the taking of Saint Sulpice, for his seruice, one of the most important places of the Countrey of Maine, and of his losse at the seege of Auranches, which was ill attempted & succeeded ill: when as stranger newes made him loose the pleasure of this gaine, & forget the bitterness of his losse. He was growne woderfull wayward & suspicious, inclining visibly into too extremities: being too familiar with some of his domestical seruants, & too seuer to his Princes & chiefe officers: either he shold not haue married his eldest son Lewis, Dauphin of Viennois so soone, or else he shold not haue vsed him like a child. But Charles lookt on him with

A lower countenance, as if he had bin vnder the rod. All this was done of purpose, practised by his secret counsellors, to keepe great men from attempting against him vnder the name of this yong Prince, to the preiudice of his royall authority: but what he feared chanced. The Earle of Marche a prince of the blood, had the charge of the yong Dauphin, a Prince whom Charles trusted, being both wise and temperate: Lewis of Bourbon Duke of Alençon Godfather to Lewis was not so familiar with Charles as hee was accustomed.

The Princes
of the blood discontented.

The Duke of Bourbon was not altogether in so bad tearmes, yet was he not so great in the Kings fauour as he desired, greewing that such base men should haue countenance. These two Princes must lead the dance: if their desseine had succeeded, many wold haue ioyned, but now they would be lookers on only. At this time the Princes had men fit to execute their desseine, the Lords of Chaumont, Bouciquant & Prye, with many aduenturers, theues, and such like. Tremouille hauing some notice of this plot, offers himselfe vnto them, and is intertained: a matter as wisely performed by them, as rashly done of him. The proiect of these discontented Princes was, to settle the Dauphin, that hereafter all things might be done by his authoritie, being ruled by the aduice of the Princes of the blood, and so in effect they would haue King Charles gouerned by his sonne.

Make a league

the Dauphin.

For the execution hereof they first seize vpon the Dauphin, who was an assistant himselfe, to be freed from the Earle of Marche his gouernour. He was lodged in the Castle of Loches in Touraine, gouerned with great respect, who seeing him of age, married, and of a liuely disposition, gaue him great liberty: hee might go abroad at his pleasure, where he found the bastard of Bourbon, Anthony of Chabanes, with other Captaines aduenturers, who conducted him honorably into Bourbonnois. The same day the Duke of Alençon seized vpon Niort, and by his commandement John de la Roche tooke S. Maxent. The Duke of Bourbon hauing the Dauphin in his power, (a Prince full of youthfull courage) he caused him to write to the nobility of Auuergne, and to the Duke of Bourgogne praying them to ayde him in his desseins, which was to haue more liberty to gouerne matters of state hereafter, for the better satisfiing of men of honour, whom he did see (to his great grieve) kept back by certain flatterers which possessed the King his father, to the great preiudice of the whole Realme. These newes being brought to Charles, he presently sends to the Duke of Bourbon to returne him his sonne, and to the Duke of Alençon to deliuer his townes of Niort & S. Maxent, & to the both to come & yeeld an accompt of these inouations: who finding by their answers that they excused themselves and fought delays, he resolues to come to the effects, and to suppress this mischief in the breeding. He was well serued at this time.

The Duke of Bourgogne lets the Dauphin vnderstand, that all his meanes are at his commandement, so as it be not against his father, but he aduised him to go vnto him, & not to aggravate one error with an other, being most certain that the shortest errors are the best. He aduised the Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon not to attempt a thing of ill fame, whereby they should get neither honour nor profit, & to free themselves speedily with the most honest excuses they could deuise. The nobility of Auuergne protest vnto the Dauphin by the Lord of Dampmartin, that in all things that were in their power they would do him seruice, except against the King his father. The inhabitants of S. Maxent (seeing the Castle seized on by la Roche) assemble and intrench themselves in the gates and Towers of the Towne, and aduertise the King thereof, offering to do as it shold please him to command. The king was at Poitiers. This aduertisement was brought him as he dined: wherevpon he presently dispatcheth the Admirall of Cottinny and the Lord of Varenne Seneschall of Poitou to these good subiects of S. Maxent, and the next day he follows himselfe. The Castle was presently besieged, battered and forced, and the heades of such as were taken, paid for la *Roche*s folly, who escaped in the night, vnder colour that he would seeke counsell & succour. Mont-richard being taken by the Princes at the same time obeyed the King. The Earle of Dunou a bastard of the house of Orleans, who was of their faction, leaues them presently, & follows the King. This was the ende of this yeare, and shall soone be the ende of this hurly burly, ill attempted and

The Princes had seduced many townes in Auuergne, notwithstanding A their first protestation, but for that it belonged to the Duke of Bourbon, it could not be, but many of his subiects and priuate seruants must make some shewe of obedience, especially in the Daulphins presence, and at his intreaty. Charles resolues to march thither with all speed. He had eight hundred men at armes, and two thousand archers, & had so provided for their lodgings as they marched without effecting any thing. And for that it was likely the English would make his profit of our domestical confusions (seeing the princes of the bloud presume to attempt against the head of their house, and to set the sonne against the Father) Charles prevented it with such dexterity, as all the frontiers against the English, were very well fortified. He had intelligence also that the men of warre being generally discontented for their pay, and grieved that the King B so exclaimed against their disorders, vpon his subiects complaints, would be easily drawne to the league: He therefore sent for the whom he might most suspect, & engaged them in his seruice, the Vicont of Loumeigne, the bastard of Foix and Halezard, valiant Captaines, and welbeloued of the aduenturing souldiers. This done, hee sendes Pothon, Floques, and Bresay with his troups; and followes himselfe without any stay, being accompanied with the Earle of Marche, the bastard of Orleans, the Constable of France, and many Noble men with a well ordered traine.

The Townes of Chambon and Euon being fortified by the Princes, were easily taken by Pothon. They were in danger of their liues through their resistance, but by the Constables means their peace was made for six hundred crowns of gold which then made C a hundred markes of siluer. These places being reduced to obedience, Charles came to Ebryuele, which yeelded, from thence he went to Aigueperse and Curset, the which likewise obeyed, notwithstanding the perswasion of the Princes. Charoux resisted & was taken at the first assault: the spoile was great, the troups remaine there 15. dayes, whilst that Charles takes Esfuroles, with 5. or 6. other forts fauouring the discontented princes. The Duke of Bourbon was at S. Porcain, where he had engaged the Daulphin to seize vpon the townes of Auuergne. Tremouille was there also, who had brought a hundred launces to the Princes with a thousand vaine hopes of his great meanes: but hearing that the King approached, (being armed with right and force, they aske counsell of their wounded consciences, which aduise them to flie into Bourgongne. So parting from S. Porcain D they come to Moulins, & from thence they take the way of S. Desire to passe into Bourgongne, but hauing intelligences that they could passe no further; and that the Duke of Bourgongne had prevented them, they returne amazed to Moulins, finding their affaires to succeed but ill. Clermont & Montferraut could neuer be drawne from the Kings seruice, notwithstanding all the perswasions of the Princes, Rions followed their faction and was soone reduced to the Kings obedience. Charles being arriued at Clermont calls an assembly of the Estates of Auuergne, shewing the importance of this action by the Bishop of Clermont. The whole country is presently at the Kings deuotion, offering freely to imploy their bodies and goods for his seruice.

But not reiecting mildnesse with his force, Charles thought it good that the Earle of E Eu should treat with the Princes, who in the end resolue to attend vpon the King at Clermont. The Daulphin remained at Moulins, & the Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon undertooke the voiage vnder his Maiesties safe conduct, they carried with them Tremouille, Chaumont & Pry, whereof Charles beeing aduertised, he sent to countermand them, not meaning these three should be comprehended in the passport. The Princes hauing spoken with the King, and drawne matters to some good accord, they promise to bring the Daulphin to Clermont, and to pacifie all by this enterview, but this young prince so diddained the refusall his father had made of his three seruants, as he protested hee would not go vnto him, but would rather hazard all. This humour made him to faile in the assignation, and Charles was resolued to vse force. He therefore sendes his vanguard, which besiegeth and takes Vichy, Curset, & Varennnes obey presently without contradiction, S. An must be forced, but in the end it obeies. So doth Rouenne, Chartier, Perriers & all the places of Rouannois. This successe did mollifie the hearts both of the Daulphin and

A & Princes, to draw them vnto reason: so as hauing (by the mediation of the Earle of Eu) 1440. perswaded the king to like of their coming, they went to Curset. Charles was very mildly bent to haue Tremouille, Chaumont and Prie (his good and faithfull seruants) receyued into fauour, and boldly to say vnto him, That hee must else returne, beeing engaged in his word & honor, he sayed roughly to him: Lewis, the gates are open, & if they be not big enough I wil cause sixteene or twenty sadomes of the wal to be beaten dawne, to passe where you please: you are my sonne, you cannot tie your selfe to any without my leaue. but if you will go, you may depart: for by the helpe of God, we shall finde some of our bloud, which shall helpe vs better to maintaine our honor, then you haue yet done. So the accord was made with- B out comprehending of these three. The Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon sweare to setue the King, and yeeld vpon Loches, Corbeil, Bois de Vincennes, Sancerre, Sanguins, Erie, Conte-roberr and other places which they held. The Daulphin remaines with his father, who changeth all his trayne, except his confessor and Cooke. But all this is but counterteite, you shal soone see other broyles. This phrensie of state bred in the Kings house against the King himselfe, was by our Ancestors called the Frangary. Nine moethes of this yeare being spent in these garboiles, Charles returnes to Tours, to provide for the raising of the siege at Harfieu, where the Earle of Stamerset had lien long: but it was in vaine, for the Towne was taken in the end, after a long and painfull constancie of the Inhabit- C ants, who could not be releued in time by reason of these home-bred troubles, and yet there was a second mischiefe. The Lord of Gaucourt gouernor of Daulphiné (a most profitable seruant of the King) returning from the siege, and causing some of his baggage (which was scattered from the troupe) to retire, he was surprisid by a companie of English, and led prisoner to Rouen, to the great griefe of Charles who loued him, hauing giuen good testymones of his loyalty in his greatest extremities.

But in exchange Charles takes Canches and Louuers, (Townes of importance in Normandie) from thence he came into Champaigne, to subdue a part of these aduenturing theues, who had surprized some places in this Prouince, Musse l'Euesque, Montagu, and others. The Kings army (led by the Constable) takes them, and razed them by the Kings commande, pardoning most of these theenish Captaines, the bastard of Vergy D and the Lord of Commercy, but he caused Alexander bastard of John Duke of Orleans to be drowned, a notable theefe, who (hauing followed the discontented Princes) had spoken vnworthilie of his maister. This execution of Iustice is memorable vpon one of so high a birth, being followed the same yeare with the exemplarie death of Gyles de Raiz Marshall of France, issued from a great and famous house, who beeing found guilty of Negromancie and Sorcerie, was condemned by the Court of Parliament of Brittaine, and burnt at Nantes with some of his seruants, culpable of the same crymes. He was honored for his valour, but neither his armes nor his bloud could stay the hand of diuine Iustice, meritoriously executed by this iust decree of the magistrat. Priuate actions worthie to be registred in the historie, to shew that the greatest cannot flie the E hand of God, after they haue long abused his patience. But the treaty of peace betwixt France and England, being discontinued aboue a yeare, was againe reuiued by the industrie of the Duchesse of Bourgongne a Portugall, but much affected to the quiet of the Realme, and a very sufficient woman, who had great credit with her husband. She followes it so wisely, as in the end two Kings sende their Ambassadors to Calais. On Charles his behalfe were the Archbishops of Rheims, & Narbon, and the Earle of Dunois A bastard of Orleans. For Henry King of England, the Cardinall of Yorke, and the Duke of Exeter, who brought with them Charles Duke of Orleans, so being longe kept prisoner in England.

This poore Prince (after the languishing of so long a prison,) was exceeding glad to F see some meanes to returne to his house, hauing felt the aire on this side the Sea, and embraced the Earle of Dunois, one of the branches of his house, hee who had so faithfully serued him in his afflictions: but hee greeted to see himselfe presently carried backe into England, for that they could not agree vpon the foundament- tall

And although the King were content they should freely inioy what they possessed, so as they held it as they had done in times past of the Crowne of France by homage: yet would they not yeeld in any sort, being loath to relinquish their pretended souerainty. But he refuseth which afterwards doth sue. At this time they were enforced to retire with this resolution, That without infringing any thing of the treaty begun, euery one should go home, and consider of his affaires, to assemble againe when neede should require: the which eyther part desired. And this is al could be done for the general. They proceeded farther for the duke of Orleans, but as in these trafficks such as hold the possession do comonly vse policy, the stronger giuing lawe to the weaker, so in so precious matter as life, the English must bee sued vnto, making no hast to deliuer him, for that they drewe great profit yearly for the pension of this great Prince. Moreover Charles had no great care of his deliuerie: for that some malicious spirits had seasoned him with some bad impression against this poore Prince, perswading him, that his long imprisonment was not without some mistery, and that it hatched some mischief against the King and his estate. The which being miserable in so great a person, gaue all men a iust cause of compassion. But notwithstanding all these difficulties yet must this Prince (one of the goodliest plants of this Crowne) be now deliuered, to leaue a successor for the realme of France: and God, who would honor his race with the Crowne, had prepared an admirable meanes for his deliury, by his helpe, from whom in reason he might least hope, euen when his owne friends had abandoned him.

The Duke of
Orleans deliuered.

The diuers afflictions of the Duke of Orleans.

A notable example for all men in many respects: a prison of five and twentie years, was a great affliction to a Prince borne to commande, and yet captiue to an other. The losse of all his goods gaue him a sufficient occasion to resolue to perpetual miserie, and to leaue it for an inheritance to his posterity. In the ende sclander (a most cruell sting to a generous minde, which hath honour for his assured Treason) had bene able to suppress him. But God, who governs the rodde wisely, giues him libertie, goods and honour in due season: in despite of this deuilish enuy, which seeking to afflict the afflicted, and controuling aduersitie as well as prosperity, is then corrected when it seeks to correct an other: but God doth neuer send helpes too late.

The Duke of Bourgogne
undertakes for the Duke of Orleans ransom.

Philip hauing resolved to do this good turne for the Duke of Orleans, and to withdraw him out of prison, compoinds for his ransom with the King of England, for three hundred thousand Crownes. He giues his word for it, and payes it, and so Charles Duke of Orleans being honorably conducted, comes first to Calais, where the mony being payed, hee comes free to Gravelin to the Duke of Bourgogne his deliuerer, who receyued him with all the good chere hee could desire. Hee was taken at Azincourt, in the yeare 1415. and was deliuered in 1440. the 25 of Nouember, by the meanes of his sonne that had slaine his father, and had done all hee could to ruine his house. Being come to Philip, (hauing thanked him for this good will, and protested to hold him for his father,) he swears a perpetuall league with him, the which is confirmed by the marriage of Marie of Cleues the niece of Philip with the Duke, and then he swears to the treaty of Arras, except the article of the murther committed on the person of John Duke of Bourgogne, wherof he was innocent: and for confirmation of this follemne league, he takes the order of the golden fleefe, from the hands of Philip, and is admitted into the number of his Knights. Behold two great enemies are become great friends by so memorable an occasion.

Two great enemies become great friends.

The reason that moued
the Duke of Bourgogne
to do this good turne.

The Duke of Bourgogne had his priuate considerations for the safety and quiet of his house, he sees himselfe raised to grearnesse. But as it is no lesse vertue to keepe then to get, and that his bloud, profit, dutie, and necessitie commanded him to hold firme for the French partie, as the greatest and most assured for the good of his affaires: so likewise hee considered that he should neede some trustie friend neere the King, on whome he might confidently relie. And what greater personage then the Duke of Orleans the first Prince of the bloud? and what greater bond then to free him from Captiui-ty: necessitie also forseeing him therunto: for it was verie apparent that this Prince being

A being freed from prison, had the like action against Philip, that Philip had against the King: for although Philip had not slaine his father, yet was he son to the murtherer, and the quarell must needs be hereditarie in these great houses, where discontented and wrongs go from father to sonne. being also likely that the King discontented to haue bene forced by his subiect to aske him forgiuenesse in the viewe of al Europe, would maintaine the right of his bloud, in a Prince that had neuer wronged him, against his reconciled enemy, whose friendship he had so deere bought: wherein he noted well the Kings humor, being suspicious, zealous, and impatient of any new authority, which (being able to oppose it selfe) hee would neuer faile to crosse in all occasions. Philip wisely foreseeing all these difficulties) prevented them, in assuring himselfe of the Duke of Orleans loue, vpon so good consideration, suppressing thereby all doubt of danger, which he might hereafter feare. Herein we see a notable example: that we must neuer despaire in the greatest crosses of this life, that quarrells must be mortall, & whereas they die, friendship must be immortal. That the best meanes to vanquish an enemy is to do him all the good we can.

The honour of this good worke was not attributed to the Duke of Bourgogne alone, but to the Duchesse his wife, who woone as great credit in drawing her husband to this reconciliation, as her Predecessor did dishonor, by the incensing of her husband against the house of Orleans, whence grewe that infamy which polluted these two houses, with two tragickall murders. The wiues honour is to pacifie quarrells betwixt the kinsmen and Allies of the house whereinto she is matched, and contrariwise it is an importune ialousie to sowe dissention among kinsmen. God also blest the mediation of this worthy Princeesse in the marriage of Marie of Cleues, Neece to her husband, with the Duke of Orleans, by whome he had Lewis. 12. which shalbe King of France. & two daughters, the one Eleanor which was married into the house of Nauarre, of whome is issued Joane Queene of Nauarre, mother to our good & valiant King Henry the 4. now reigning. This yeare shalbe full of warre, and successfull for Charles: yet in the ende it shall minister occasion to enter into the former treatie of peace, which hauing begunne the yeares before and little aduanced, shalbe ended in the following yeares, after another manner then the English expected. Charles seeing that the King of England by his cold delays, sought not onely to make his conditions better (being sought vnto) but also to drawe him into some inconuenience, he resolues to armes.

The English had taken Creil vpon Oyze and could not bee dispossessed of Pontoise, a Towne of importance for the neerenesse of Paris. The King resolues to take them both. The Admirall of Coytivy beseegeth Creil, and forceth it in the Kings presence. Thus the way is made to Pontoise, the seege was memorable, being well assayed and well defended, but in the ende it was taken by Charles for the good of France. He lodgeth at the Abbie of Maubuisson, accompanied with his sonne the Daulphin of Viennois, Charles of Anjou, the Earle of Clermont, the Constable of France, the Marshalls of Loheac and Seloigne, Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Paul and of Pigney, who brought vnto the King a goodly troupe of men from the Duke of Bourgogne, with them of the Citie of Tournay, who sent a gallant squadron of their Cittizens. Thus vnite brought both French and Bourguignons vnder the same enseignes, against the common enemy of France. There were also the Earles of Eu, Albret, and Vaudemont, the Vidame of Chartres, the Lords of Chastillon, Tancarville, Joigny, Morneil in Brie, Fueil, Mouy, la Tour, Angeli, Longueval, Moyencourt, Suze, Chabannes, Flauy, S. Symon, Mailly, Penefac, Blanchefort, and those braue Captaines, la Hire, Pothon, and Floquet, with an infinit number of the Nobility, who added their valour to the number of the soldiars, which they had brought vnto the King. The City of Paris sent a goodlie troupe, so as Charles had twelue thousand fighting men.

The memorable seege of Pontoise.

At the first approach the bastion vpon the bridge next to Maubuisson was taken by la Hire, on the other side against the Abbie of Saint Martin, they make a bridge with a great bastion, where they lodge three thousand archers, yet the Towne was not so straightly beseegeed, but Talbot sent in both men and victuals.

Whilest

1441.

The Duke of Torce goes with an army to releue
Pontoise.

Whilest that Charles stood discontented with this error, behold a greater brauado, for the Duke of Yorke (Lieutenant generall for Henry King of England) comes to Cerny and Hotonville, places very neere to Pontoise, with a goodly army of eight thousand men, and sends his heralds vnto Charles to offer him battaile, Charles (who by the aduice of his Councell would not commit this successfull beginning of his affaires to the hazard of a battaile) returnes them with no other answer, but that he should haue his bellie full sooner then he liked. The riuier of Oize was betwixt both armies. Charles resolues to keepe the passages from Pontoise to Beaumont, and the Duke of Yorke to passe the riuier in despite of the French, and to this ende he caused many small boats of Leather, wood & cords to be brought, with other stufie fit to make bridges. The bridge of Beaumont was garded by the French, but the English passe at an Abbie beneath the bridge, and with such danger in their artificiall boats, as ten resolute men might haue stayed a great army, but the silence of the night so fauoured their passage, as a great part of the English army was past, before our Sentinells had discovered them. Then was there no remedy but to aduertise the King, of the enemies passage.

Charles reuers from Pon-toise.

The Duke of Yorke (having thus happily passed the riuier and rested his soldiars that night,) marcheth in goodly order towards Charles, meaning to charge him: Charles takes Councell of his teare couered with this resolution, not to hazard a generall battaile: but hee was likely to haue fallen into an other inconuenience, for without attending of the enemy, he puts all the waighiest of his cariages into the fort of Saint Martin, vnder the gard of Charles of Anjou, and the Admirall of Coitivy with two thousand men, & with them la Hire, Roubault, Estouteuville with other resolute Captaines: and to leaving his lodging of Maubuisson he retyers to Poissy. The Duke of Yorke takes vp his lodging at Maubuisson, being abandoned, and makes a shewe to attempt the forte of Saint Martin, but hauing tried it in vaine, he takes his way to Poissy, and lodgeth before the Towne in viewe of the King and his army. There were some skirmishes without any great successe, Charles continuing his resolution to hazard nothing, and Yorke his proicect to vittaile and saue Pontoise. So the English retyers to Mante, to send refreshings from thence to the beleeged: but this great brauado came to nothing.

The beginning was dishonorable for the King, but the end was both happie and honorable. Being retyred to Saint Denis, and hauing sent the Constable vnto Paris, he resolues to send to Pontoise, and to wine it or to die. The reason was, that this his retrait or rather flight was so infamously spoken of by the greatest in Court, and so odious to the Parisiens, (who had defrayed a great part of the charge at this sege) as it was to be feared they would make some mutiny against him, if the successe were not good. His spies did likewise assure him that the Princes of his bloud (especially since the returne of the Duke of Orleans) were resolued to make some extraordinary assemblie, and to admonish him touching the gouernment. It chanced then that the Earles of Saint Pol and Flandremont (notable partisans of the Duke of Bourgongne) left the King, when he had most neede of succours, and they of Tournay were of the same party. He had the Dauphin with him, whom he caused to watch diligently both day and night. But howe could he doubt that these tricks came not out of the Bourguignons budget? Choller banished feare, so as being resolued to repayre this error, and to prevent his enemies practices, he runnes to Pontoise (for he was but ten dayes away) and giuing the Duke of Yorke no leasure to releue the beleeged, he resolues to take it by force. This indignation succeeded happily. He caused three assaults to bee giuen on three parts, and at the first he woone our Ladies Church which is without the Towne whereby he might greatly annoy the beleeged. He tooke this quarter for him selfe, accompanied with the Earles of Marehe, Albret, and Tancarville. The Dauphin was at the Port Franche ioyning to the riuier of Oize, with the Earle of Maine, the Admirall and the great maister of the Crosbowes. On the other side of the batterie was the Constable, the Marshall of Loheac, the Lords of Monty, Touars, Saze, Serran, Sanzay and the vidame of Chartres.

The Canon being planted of all sides, and a reasonable breach made, the French

A enter furiously, and the King with the first: (of such force is resolution in a great Prince,) to animate a whole army, as the head doth the whole bodie. The English were consumed like to strawe in the fire, five hundred were slaine at this entrie, and fower hundred taken prisoners. The Inhabitants were spared (by the careful command of Charles) who acknowledging the happinesse of this victorie to come from God, goes to giue him thanks, offering him the first fruits of this victorie: for without doubt if he had failed, his enemies were readie to conspire against him.

He calles together all the Princes, Noblemen and Captaines of the armie, hee thanks them for the good and faithfull seruice they had done him, in this notable occasion. He makes the Lord of Salonges Marshall of France, and many Knights. He called for him that first entred the breach, commends his valour, and rewards him with an honorable pension. But why hath the Historie concealed this honest mans name, his reward had beene immortal? Such was the issue of the sege of Pontoise remarkable for many circumstances, but then very considerable for the Kings affaires, who had an honorable reuenge of the English brauadoe. But as one good happe followes another when it pleaseth God, so Charles receiued many good aduertisements at the same instant.

The English drewe together many garrisons in the Country of Maine, from Mans, Fresnoy and Mahinne la Iubez, and had sackt Saint Denis in Anjou. The French which were in Sable, Laual and Saint Susanne, led by the Lord of Bueil, meete them laden with spoile, and very ioyfull; they charge them, defeat and kill them, leauing fower hundred vpon the place. Peter of Breze issues out of Conches and surpriseth the English at Beaumont le Roger, sleeping without feare, hee awaks them with the sword, kills them and takes the Towne.

John Floquet doth likewise about the same time take Eureux (a Towne of verie great importance in Normandie,) The meanes is memorable, a fisherman makes a hoale in the wall, whereby he enters in the night, and becomes maister of the Towne. But in exchange they receiue a check. The Captaines and soldiars which had taken many prisoners at Pontoise, had compounded with an English Captaine for their ranfome, who had taken the debt vpon him. The prisoners were kept at Cornil'e, a Castell neere vnto Chartres. While they expected money, this mediator hauing free liberty to go and come, obserues all the passages so well, as he soone finds meanes to pay all these ranfomes, for one morning he surpriseth the place, frees the prisoners, and takes all them that had them in gard.

The Parisiens honor Charles at his returne, whome they were readie to deuoure, if the successe of Pontoise had not beene good. The Duke of Bourgongne sends his wife vnto him for many respects, who returned with no great satisfaction: and Charles Duke of Orleans (who had not yet seene him since his returne from prison) comes vnto him with a goodly traine: the King receiues him verie graciously, and allowed well the excuses of his long delay, and to crosse the Duke of Bourgongne, hee giues his Cousin of Orleans towards the payement of his ranfome, a hundred and fiftie thousand frankes: a very great some in those dayes, the which was not giuen for nothing in so great a necessity of the Kings affaires. Lewis of Luxembourg and the widowe of John of Luxembourg, partisans to the Bourguignon, do homage to Charles, and yeeld the Towne of Marle vnto him: these be fruits, no doubt of the victorie at Pontoise. In the meane time the Princes assemblie at Neuers, the Dukes of Bourgongne, Bourbon and Alencon, with the Earle of Vendosme. The Duke of Brittain sent his Ambassador, not able to come him selfe, for that he was not yet in the Kings good fauour.

There were for the most part priuate discontents, tending to euery mans priuate interest. As not to be maintayned in their degrees, to be called to Councelles, respected in their aduises, honored in their charges, payed their pensions, and eased in their lands. But the zeale of the publike good shadowed all, with a shewe of Iustice, peace, order and releefe of the people. That it was fit the King should proceede more speedily in the treaty of peace with the English, the which had beene too coldly followed. That he should supply

admonitions to the King and their demands.

1441 supplie his Parliaments with good and sufficient men, and thereby provide for the offices and not for the persons, that by their faithfull diligence suites might be shortned, and speedie justice administered without delay, or respect of eyther of the parties. That he should provide for the ease of the subiect overcharged, rule the soldiers, prevent robberies, ransomings, and ex-tortions, the which were daylie committed vnder too apparent an excuse, that the soldiers were not payed. That he should giue honors without respect of forepassed diuisions, and declare all his subiects capable of Offices and dignities indifferently, not remembring what was past. That he should haue a competent number of graue men in his great Councell worthy of that charge, & not to commit the government of the affaires of the Realme to two or three, as had bene done in former times. These are the chiefe points of their demands, drawn word by word out of the Originall.

Charles was nothing pleased with these Assemblies, made both in his absence and without his priuie, whereby many inconueniences must ensue, all being done without his authority. But being taught by his owne experience, he digested this kinde of affront quietly, being loath to alter any thing at such a season, when as he had no neede of newe enemies: and hauing eyther excused what had bene done, or contented eery priuate person, he proceeded to the principall, which was the establishment of the affaires of the Realme. The disorders of men of warre were insupportable, the which must be reformed, but that which troubled the King was the sege of Tartas, remarkable by this circumstance.

Tartas is a Towne in Gascogne belonging to the house of Albret. This Towne was besieged by Captall de Buch, a great Nobleman of that Countie, and of the English faction. It was concluded for the extreame necessitie of the Countie that there should be a surceasse of armes, and libertie of free trafficke in that Province, vntill midsummer following, vpon condition that if the King did not succour the Towne by that day, it should yeeld to the English, or else the French should remayne in free possession without any controuersie. And for assurance of this treaty, the eldest sonne of the Lord of Albret should remayne in hostage. The matter was of great waight, being not onely a question of the losse of a place of great importance, but of the Kings reputation, who leauing his subiects, was in danger to be abandoned by them, & so to loose all Gascogne, where the English had gotten many partisans. Charles prouiding carefully for his safaires, giues two blowes with one stone, wherewith he strooke both the theues and the English. He armed with exceeding speede, hauing drawn together foure thousand horse, eight thousand archers, and eight thousand other foote. An infinit number of great personages and voluntarie Noblemen posted to this iourney, as to a solemne assignation whereon depended the quiet and honour of France. The Daulphin did accompany him in this voiage, Charles of Anjou Earle of Maine, the Constable of France, the Earles of Marche, Eu, Castres, Foix, & Lomaigne the eldest son of the Lord of Armagnac, the Lords of Albert, Gaure, Cominge, Estrac, Tartas, Tancarville, and Montguyon the eldest son to the Earle of Boulougne & Anuergne, & Philip of Culant Admiral of France with an infinit number of gallant Nobility. Thus Charles parting from Paris comes first to Saumur, whither John Duke of Brittaine sent his Ambassadors, to offer him homage and men. Shame, to haue so often left him in all his extremities, would not suffer him to see the King, although the Constable were a good mediator for him. He restored to the King the forts of Essers & Palluau which annoyed al the Countie of Poitou, and Charles gaue them in gard to the Constable: from thence he passed into Poitou, and prouids that Marueil, and Saint Herme, should no more trouble the people: he then comes into Xaintonge, which had bene much troubled by the Lord of Tons, who humbled himselfe vnto the King, promising to liue in peace. Taillebourg was taken by force, and the theues punished. Bretueil was taken and razed. Thus Charles spent this year against theues who had surprised some Townes. The next year was happily employd against the English our open enemies, making a great breach in Gascogne and thereabouts, where the English had gotten deepest footings, by the ancient and lawfull possession of his Ancestors. In the end by this breach the whole Province remained remained his: but the prouidence of God imparts his blessings by degrees. Hauing thus pacified Poitou and Xaintonge, he comes to Limoges, and so to Tholouse, which was the Rendez-nous of all his troupes. Being arrived, hee giues notice to them of Tartas, that they should continue firme, and that they should be releued by the prefixed day, but as he labors on the one side to settle his affaires, so the English on the other side seeke to overthrowe them.

Behold Talbot comes out of England into Normandie with two thousand men, and the Duke of Yorke leuied men in the Countie it selfe and places of their obedience, goes to field with foure thousand men. With these forces hee thinks to take all that Charles held in that Province, where he had left the Earle of Dunois and the Vidame of Chartres for the gard of those places: but this enterprise had small successe. Talbot beseegeth Couches, and at the same instant the Earle of Dunois Galardon, (a place holding for the English) to cause a diuersion. Talbot hauing taken Couches, the Earle leaues Galardon, hauing no reason to hazard his small troupe against so great forces, and puts them into garrison, making a defensue warre; attending the successe of Tartas. Talbot fearing least Galardon should be surprised by the French, doth raze it, and this was all.

Let vs now returne to Tholouse, to conduct Charles from thence to Tartas, for there lies the waight of his affaires. Assignation is giuen, it must be held. To conclude, the King comes at the appointed time, with a goodly and mighty army: the condition is performed, he demands his hostages, and the effect of accord. So young Albret is deliuered, Tartas continues vnder his obedience, the day honorably kept, and all the Province in quiet. Tartas thus victoriously assured, Charles resolues both to hut band the occasion with his forces, and to proceed farther. Saint Seuer was held by Thomas Ramelton with a hundred men at armes, and foueteene hundred Cros bowes, and fortified what might be in those dayes. Charles takes it by force, slewe the greatest part of the English, and takes the Commander prisoner. Acqs hauing endured a sege of fixe weekes is yeilded by composition. The Earle of Foix was with the King, and employed both his person, men, and meanes to do him seruice, but the impatience of the French thrust them vpon his Countie, where they committed many insolencies. The Bearnois discontented with the French, assembles his forces and chargeth them as enemies; but they had their reuenge, for they fell vpon this ill armed multitude, and slue seven hundred, to the great griefe of Charles, fearing that this escape might alter his affaires: but the Earles discretion couered this excess and Charles continued his course. Agou held for him, from thence he summons Tonens, Marmande & Port Saint Marie, which yeeld him obedience, Reole being obstinate, was besieged, and assailed with difficulty, but in the end it was taken.

The sharpe winter (hindring the course of Garonne, for the vitteling of the army) made the sege both long and difficult, and gaue the English meanes to recouer Saint Seuer and Acqs, not very well garded: but the Earle of Foix winnes Saint Seuer againe, and the Earle of Lomaigne Acqs. A great number of the Nobility of the Countie (forced to make a good shew during the English force,) submit themselves to the King, as the Lords of Fuils, Ranson, Roquetaillade and Pelagru. Thus Charles hauing made the Lord of Cotiny Seneschall of Guienne, gouernor of that conquered Countie, he makes his returne into France. Being at Montauban he lost those two great Captaines so famous in his raigne, Pothon and la Hire, more rich in vertue & honor then in substance: yet Pothon was master of the Kings horse, and his sonne was Marshall. La Hire left for his chiefe welth the immortall memorie of his loyaltie and valour, the which hee happily employed in the greatest necessitie of this Crowne. Names in truth most worthy to be consecrated to the perpetuall memorie of posterity, for a president to such as manage armes, and make so great profession of honour, with what title were these most honored, for their vertues or for their Castles. A happie exchange, to change perishing gold, which oftentimes makes him hatefull that loues it, with the pleasing smell of immortall praise. An vnreprouable ambition amidst the reproches of this golden age, which ouerth gold more then honour. So Montauban was a tombe for their bodies, 1442. and the whole world the Epitaph of their praises. At that instant and in the same place, Charles ended the controuersie for the Earldome of Cominge. Ioane daughter to the Earle of Cominge and Boulogne, (married at the first to John Duke of Berry, Ioane to King John), was after his deceale married to Mathew Earle of Castel-bon, of the house of Foix. She had one daughter by this Mathew, but for that there was no good agreement betwixt them, she makes a will to bridle her husband, that by vertue of the authority of a father, he should not enjoy her luying, instituting King Charles the 7. her heire, in case her daughter died without lawfull heires. In disdain of this testament, Mathew much younger then she, and who had not taken her but for her Crowne, kept her prisoner, an aged woman of foure score years.

The Daughter of Ioane of Cominge being dead, the Earldome belonged vnto the King as lawfull heire, by the donation of Ioane the lawful heire. So Charles was bound by a double bonde to defend the gray haire of this old woman, against the insolence of her cruel husband, who finding himselfe supported by the fauour of the Earle of Foix and Armagnac his Cousin (hauing already seized vpon some Townes of Cominge, and playing the pettie King, during the confusion of times and the neighbourhood of the English) thought all things to be lawfull. The King adiournes them both to appeere at Tolouse, (wheras then he established a Parliament for all the Countreies of Languedoc, Foix, Cominge, Gauze, Quercy, Armagnac, Elzac, Lemoigne, Mcgnac, Rigorre and Rouergue.) Mathew deliuerd Ioane his wife into the Kings hands, and it was decreed by the Court of Parliament (the which they noate to be the first of this solemn assembly,) that Ioane should liue in free libertie out of Mathew's power, and should enjoy the moiety of the reuenues of Cominge, and the rest should goe to the Kings cofers. The Earle of Foix and Armagnac yeelded vp the Townes of Cominges which he had vsurped, and was adiourned vnto Paris, to yeeld an account of many rebellions whereto he was accused, especially for that he set in his titles, Fernand by the grace of God Earle &c. A marke fit for soueraintie, the which appertaines not to Seigneuries subiect to this Crowne.

Thus Charles remembers Lawes in the heat of warre, but it requires an other Commissioner to execute this decree by force of armes, after the death of Ioane, who being conducted to Poitiers, liued not long in this libertie. Charles being returned to Poitiers about the moneth of March, resolues to imploy his sonne Lewis, both to fashion him to affaires, and to drawe him from such as would seduce him. He giues him the gouernment of those Countreies which lyes betwixt the riues of Suze and Seine. For the well imploying of this newe authority, there were two goodly occasions presented one vpon an other. Depe was reduced to the Kings obedience, this was a great annoyance to Rouen: for the freeing wherof the Duke of York doth beseege it, raising forts to keepe them from all releefe. This seege had continued nine monethes, verry tedious to the beseege, when as behold the Daulphin accompanied with the Earles of Dunois and Saint Pol and the Lord of Gaucourt, assailes these forts and forceth them, kills three hundred English and many Normans, either by the sword or water, and so frees Depe.

This occasion, was followed by an other, which chanced in a manner at the same instant. Ioane Countesse of Cominge dies at Poitiers, soone after she had tasted the aire of libertie, and the good cheere which Charles made her. Vpon the report of her death Bernard Earle of Armagnac seizeth vpon the Townes of Cominges, Duret, Lile in Deuon, Samathan and Lombres, and preparing to warre, he leues troupes in Arragon by Salazar a Captaine of that Countreie, causing John of Lescun a bastard of Armagnac to invade the Kings territories. This excesse might haue proued verie preiudiciall, when as Charles sends Lewis his sonne into Languedoc, with a thousand horse, to quench this mischiefe in the breeding. Being arrived at Rouergue, all yeelds vnto him. Euerie thing is opposite to the Earle of Armagnac. The Earles of Perdriac and la Marche, the chiefe supporters of his insolence leaue him in the plaine field. Salazar doth likewise abandon him: of such force is a royall maister against a bad cause.

The

A The Earle of Amagnac (seeing himselfe thus abandoned) shuts himselfe into Lisle Jordan, to dispute his pretensions with more aduantage, but he thrust himselfe into the toyle, for he was taken by Lewis, and led prisoner to Carcaffone. These happy exploiters did greatly recommend the Daulphins iudgement and valour, whom all men held worthy of a great commande. Charles hauing commended him for so well doing, would haue sent him backe against the Earle of Somerset, who had raised a great armie on the frontiers of Normandy & Brittain, the which was like vnto a fire of straw, for hauing taken la Guertche by force, he left it as soone for money, & so retired with his army without any other exploit. The heate of the English grewe more temperate touching the chiefe points of their affaires. They stood vpon teames in the two first fruitlesse assemblies made for peace: but now they seeke the King. The Earle of Suffolke writes vnto him that he hath commandement from the King his Master, not onely to renew the treaty of peace discontinued, but also to finde means to marry him in France: he receiues a fauourable answer from Charles, and vnder his safe conduct comes to him to Tours. Charles continued still in an humor to loue peace, and to seeke it, but the Earle of Suffolke, & the Lord Rosse had no charge but to treat of a generall truce, the which they concluded for a yeere & a halfe: but this shall be a goodly occasion to send home the English. After a shower comes a sun-shine, and euen experience teacheth, that after a great raine comes a long drought. Now we shall see nothing but truces, one after another, marriages and alliances during fower yeares, which is a preparatiue to a ciuill peace for about a hundred yeares.

This truce being made, they must now seeke warres else where: so fruitfull is our vanity of change, so as we cannot liue without suffering or doing harme to others: when as they treated of this truce, it was demanded by the Ambassadors of both Kings what their men of warre should do? This truce (say they) will be more chargeable vnto vs then warre, for they must liue: They haue not bene accustomed to work, and yet they will make good cheere, neither can the poore people endure any more. Moreover if they haue no worke, they will fight with themselves: we must therefore calme this storme, and send them to such as loue vs not. This was the cause of the war in Switzerland, whereof Lewis was General, leading both French and English vnder the same Ensignes. Matago was Collonell of the English forces, for the King of England vnder the Daulphins command. He entred with his armie into the territory of Basill & the country of Elzas, betwixt Basill and Strasbourg, one of the goodliest and most fertill prouinces of Germany, they terrified Metz, tooke Montbeliard, & filled all those countries with feare and combustion. The motives of this extraordinary enterprise, may well be obserued by that which I haue said: but these causes were farre fetcht, and not to be embraced by two Kings, who but euen now tormented one another, especially by Charles who hauing suffred so many crosses, should haue horror to cause others to feele the like without constraint, yet he found a pin for all these holes. Charles would haue his sonne take Montbeliard, to be reuenged of the Gouverneur, for the wrong hee had done him, spoiling his country as farre as Langres in his greatest necessity. He assayed the Suisses (and namely them of Basill) being fauourers of Eugenius against Felix his competitor, that is to say against that Amedee Duke of Sauoy, who had so crossed him in his affaires, whom he could neuer loue what shewe soeuer he made in pollicy. And for that Germany, & that quarter nere vnto Switzerland supported Felix against Eugenius, he therfore hated the. And to gratifie René King of Sicile, who had a priuate quarrell against the city of Metz, he turned his forces against it. But what meaning soeuer Charles had herein, he embraced this voluntary warre with an incredible affection, as if it had bin to defend the hart of his Realme. He himselfe came to Espinall, & hauing sent his army before to Metz, he continued the siege fower moneths, vntill the Cittizens had paid two hundred thousand crownes for the charges of the warre, and acquitted King René of a hundred thousand florins of gold, which they had lent him in his necessity. Lewis the Daulphin parting from Montbeliard ruines Portentru, in disdain of the Bishop a great solicitor against Eugenius, & from thence he enters into the territories of Basill with 1443. The Earle of Armagnac taken by the Daulphin.

1444. with this goodly and flourishing army, tyed together with so many strings, hee encountered fourethousand Swisses, being resolute to defend their COUNTRY. The greatest part of them were cut in peeces, but they sold their liues deere, for the German histories report, that we lost aboue fise thousand men, although we had the victorie. The Emperour Frederic the 3. (a Prince which otherwise loued peace) vpon the complaints of the Citties lying alongest the Rhin, caused them to arme as Lewis returned into Lorraine fearing to be too faringaged in an enemies COUNTRY, whome he had incensed against reason: yet Frederic sent his Ambassadors to Charles, to renew their ancient alliance. So this cloude of people-eaters passed, falling vpon diuers quarters like a shower of haile in a field of ripe come, leauing nothing memorabile but a notable example of rashnesse, making a warre which was neither necessarie nor iust, afflicting quiet & peaceable people without any occasion. Whilest that France & England made Switzerland to weep, Henry the 6. King of England, married with Marguerite of Aniow, daughter to René Duke of Aniow, and of Lorraine, and King of Sicilie and Naples. The Earle of Suffolk fetched her fro Nancy, where Charles was resident, whilest that his army afflicted these poore people. He feasted & conducted this Princess as his own daughter, even with tears of ioy: but this ioy was sodenly couerted into heauines, by the death of the Dauphins wife his daughter in Lawe, whom he loued deere for her vertues, which made her amiable to all France. She was one of the chiefest in this great solemnity, from the which she went to the bed of death: her death was the sepulchre of her Mother, the widowe of James King of Scotts, who was come to see her: and whilest her funeralles were making, her Sisters ariue from Scotland to attend on her, nay rather to descend with her into the graue, if the humanity of Charles had not requiued them, giuing them honest meanes to maintaine their estats in France. Thus passeth the Ocean of this miserable life, in the which there is more cause of mourning then of ioy, both in great and small. The marriage likewise of England, wherein were so great shewes of ioy, shall end with a lamentable Tragedie, as we shall see hereafter. The truce was so pleasing to both Realmes, that before it was expired, the Kings of France and England renewe it for five years more, in hope of a perfect peace, promising by their seuerall writings published generally, to meete together within six monethes in some convenient place, to confirme this peace so generally desired of all their subiects. And to confirme the assurance of their promises, the English deliuer Mans to Charles with all that he held in the Countie of Maine: but all is put into the hands of King René his father in lawe. Francis Duke of Brittain doth homage to the King for the Duchie of Brittain and the Earldome of Montfort. This was at Chinon, but some monethes after there chanced a tragicall defaite in that house. Francis suspecting that Gyles his brother would deal treacherously with him, by the too familiar correspondency he had with the English, caused him to be put in prison, by the Councell and care of Charles, who had sent him foure hundred lances, vnder the comand of the Admirall Coitivy. But they dealt worse with him, causing him to die in prison for hungar. The history of Brittain describes this accident very plausibly, but it is true that Gyles died beeing prisoner with his brother Peter, who liued him not long after, hauing a great remorse for this tragicke accident. In the rest of this yeare, and the three following, there is nothing memorabile, but the pursuits which Charles made for the reunion of the Church. But not to breake off the course of our history, which is properly to treat of that which concerns our Estate, we reserve it for a more convenient place. A worke in truth not onely worthy of a great Monarke, but of a peaceable time, that in the peace of the State, we may see the peace of the Church. The soldiars insolencie was nothing abated by this voiage of Germany. They returne more fiesht then before against the poore laborer. Charles made new orders to restrain them, causing them to be duly obserued: but the ouerweening violence of the English increased daylie, not onely by the negligence, but by the command of such as had the charge.

The Duke of Yorke being called home into England, the duke of Somerfet succeeded him, a proud man, who thinking to do better then the rest, did absolutely ruine the English affaires in France. Hee dispenced with his soldiars in all their villaines, and kept them ready to breake the truce, vpon any profitable occasion. In the meane time the Souldiers ordinarie practise was to stand in Sentinell, to surprise some good house in the countie, being ill garded: to robbe it, spoile it, and carry away the prisoners by vnkowne wayes. To this end they had their spies, their guides, and their retreats. The fields were full of robberies, by men disguised in strange and fearfull habits, being masked when they espied their pray: and therefore they called them counterfeit faces. But to draw men into danger, they marched like passengers, expecting the commodity to surprize them. There is heard nothing but complaints and repulses. All the pursuits which were made to reparaire the breaches of truce, did but increase the paine and charges of the interested. But of these small disorders committed by the Souldiers, there grew so great an inconuenience, as in the end it filled vp the measure against the English, being hated and detested of all the French, for their pride and insolencie.

Fougeres a Towne of Brittain vpon the confines of Normandie, then very riche and populous, being without garde vnder the assurance of the truce, was easily surprized by Francis of Surienne, called the Arragonois, a Knight of the order of the Garter, and a great Captaine vpon the marches of France, obeying the English. The Towne being surprized by him, (being accompanied with six or seuen hundred souldiers) suffered all the miseries that might be. They kill, spoile and sack, rauish women, robbe Churches, take prisoners, and from thence they runne into Brittain, and fill all full of feare and combustion. The Britton appeals to the King, and both complaine to Henry King of England, and to the Duke of Somerfet his Lieutenant in France: they presse them to reparaire so notable a breach, else they would seeke a meanes of reuenge. But they receiue nothing but words, disauowed by mouth, and aduowed in effect: for Somerfet causeth S. James of Beueron to be fortified, contrary to the treatie. Charles receiuing these bare answers from England, sees which way the chance would fall, and that the game would not passe without blowes, yet he restrained his men with great modestie, holding it for a maxime, that he must vse no force: But when as moderate remedies can take no place with men not capable of reason; then to oppose force against the iniurious passion of his enemy. I read with ioy in the Originall, that Charles contemned himselfe, and was forced to this last warre. To haue God on his side and the wrong on his enemy. To conclude, this moderate proceeding did so iustifie the good cause of Charles, as it was continued with a happy euent: not onely to abate the pride of the English, but to expell them out of the whole realme: as the iust iudgement of God pursued their arrogancie in this attempt, by the breach of publike faith, the vndoubted ruine of humane societie, which hath no certaine foundation but in perfect faith. Here endeth the yeare, but the controuersie shall begin more hotly by iust armes, accompanied with a victorious sentence, the which the Iudge of the world shall pronounce against the pretender of this estate.

Normandie reduced to the Kings obedience.

He Duke of Brittain first interested by the English, begins first to resist him: But Charles is drawne to force by constraint. The Ambassadors of France and England, were assembled at Louuiers, to redresse the breach at Fougeres, when as behold Pont de l'Arche (a Towne vpon the riuer of Seine, foure leagues from Rouen) is surprized by the Lord of Breze, for the Duke of Brittain. This troubled Somerfet, who presently sends to make complaint vnto the assemblee. Charles makes him answer, that it is a requittall: but if he will render vp Fougeres, and the goods that were stolne, valued at sixteene hundred thousand Crownes, he should haue Pont de l'Arche againe. The which being disdaine fully refused by Somerfet, Charles protests by his Ambassadors in open assemblie, That if warre followed (which God forbid) the fault should not be his, causing an autentike acte to be taken by certain Apostolike & Imperiall Notaries, for his discharge, and iustification. Seeing therefore that this inde courte was scorned by his stout enemy, hee resolues to haue his reuenge by force of armes. To this end he combines with Francis Duke of Brittain, to make warre against the English their common enemy, vpon condition the Britton should not treat with him without his leaue. A very needefull restraint, hauing often failed, as we haue scene. All prepare to warre, in euery place where the English had any footing, in Gascogne, in Normandie, and in all other parts where there was any remainder of their ancient Conquests.

The exploits
of the King in Gascogne &
Normandie.

Guierne shall begin the game: but it shall ende in Normandie, to make perfect the French obedience, whereof it offers these first fruits to Charles in the beginning of this yeare, as to their lawfull King. Cognac, was surprised for him by Verdun & Gascogne, but the manner was notable. Mondot an English Captaine was gouernor of the place, he was absent when the Towne was taken. Verdun keeps the gates carefully, that no intelligence might be giuen vnto him, so as he comes to the gates without knowledge of anything, but he found somewhich added him vnto their prise, being taken prisoner, whereas before he was a gouernor. The same day Saint Maigrin was taken by Alliac likewise a Gascogne. The newes of Cognac and S. Maigrin were scarce brought to Charles, when as the Lord of Mouy giues him intelligence, that he had taken Gerberond, and the Bailiffe of Eureux Conches, with great slaughter of the English. Complaints are presently made by the English, Talbot is the messenger: Charles lettes them know, that they are in the fault, seeing they began first: Yet he offers to yeeld all that had bin taken by his commandement, according to the lawe of reprisalles, so as they would deliuer what they had taken, and suffer his friends and Allies to liue in peace. Talbot answering, that he had no such charge: Charles lettes him vnderstand, that he would redresse it by lawfull force: that he did vnwillingly enter into warre, yet would he soone shewe the English, that his myldnesse had a sting, and so he goes to field with a goodly army. There were three chiefe dens for the cues, the Rendez-vous of all the English robberies in those parts, Verneuil, Mante and Loigny. Verneuil an infamous place for our defeat was first taken: a Miller gaue them entry by a hoale in the Towne wall, by the which the water did run to his mill ioyning to the wal. The Towne began, and the Castel followed: a strong Tower deuided from the Castel held our some daies, but it yeelded when as Charles arriued. Mante yeelded in viewe of the army. Loigny was surprised by escalado, but the English intrenched in the bafe Court, fought it out resolutely, & lost both liues and goods. Vernon a Towne vpon Seine yeelded of it selfe, by the voluntary obedience of the Inhabitants. Pontenoumer was forced by the Earles of Eu and S. Pol, whereas many English men were lost. But Lizieux by the graue aduice of their Bishop yeelds voluntary obedience, and auoids the miseries of the vanquished. Louuiers did the like, & Gournay was sold by an English Captaine that held it. Effy was taken by a gentle stratagem of the Duke of Alencons. The Captaine accompanied with the soldiars of his garrison, was gon forth to fish a poole, while he seeks for fish he is taken himselfe, and his Lieutenant deliuers vp the Castel to the Kings seruice. Fescampe is taken by the Abbot, hauing intelligence with the Monks: & at the same instant a ship arriues out off England, being ignorant of this losse: the French suffer them to land and take them all prisoners. Harcourt makes shewe to resist, but yeelds by composition after the siege of eight daies. The army marcheth against Neschatell of Nicourt, & takes the Towne by force, the Castel yeelds by composition. The Earle of Clermont was desirous to recouer his chiefe house wherof he carried the name: his subiects gaue him entry into the Towne, and so by the Towne he wins the Castel. S. Loo, at the sight of the army demands and obtaines a good composition, with all the neighbour Castells. Carenten yeelds after three daies, and Pont d'On is taken by assault. Constances and Gauray by composition. Alenfon freed it selfe from the English & yeelds to the mild command of their good Prince the Duke of Alenfon, who shewed his mercie euen to the English being vanquished, to whom he gaue both life and goods.

Townes in Normandie
yeeld vnto
the King.

La Rochequien was yeelded vp by the Captaine of the Castell, who of an English man becomes French, by the perswasions of his wife, who was a French woman. Chesneau gaillard a Fort of importance vpon the Riuer of Seine, endured a siege of six weekes, but the pience and good fortune of Charles, made him master of the place. Gisors, so famous for the English quarrels, was yeelded to the King by the Captaine, who likewise came to the Kings seruice, and in the end Valonges, a place of importance, the which hereafter shall come in question by a famous accident.

As the Kings armie made this progresse in Normandie, to it increased daily by these new conquests. René King of Sicile, and the Duke of Brittanie, arriue with goodly voluntarie couples, and some townes newly reduced to the Kings obedience, with an infinite number of warlike people: but aboue all, the Court was goodly, by the multitude of Noblemen, who went not onely to honour the Kings good fortune, but carried by an inward instinct of his right well gouerned, (as it were by a celestiall guide) did runne to an assured victorie, and to the possession of an heires lawfull right. The Dukes of Bourbon, Alenfon, and Brittanie were there, with the Earles of Richemont, Constable of France, of Maine, Eu, Saint Pol, Dunois, Castres, Tancarville, and Dampmartin. The Duke of Lorraine and John his brother, augmented the traine of King René. John Inuencall of Esjins Baron of Treignel, and Chancellor of France was there, hauing succeeded Renard of Chartres Arche-bishop of Rheims, being lately deceased. The Lords of Culant, Eueil, Montgascou, Blainville, Preigny, Briou, Prally, la Bouffiere, Montet, Aigreuille, Malicornes, and Han, with an infinite number of the Nobilitie.

Charles resolu'd to imbrace these goodly occasions, finding (by the obedience of so many countie Townes) the way laied open to Rouen, the capitall Cittie of that Prouince: he determines to besiege it, and all with one consent, aime at this goodly make, as the chiefe of the Kings affaires. But it chanced through the prouidence of God, that where as there seemed greatest difficultie, there it proued most easie, by the loyaltie of the French, who cannot denie their Prince. The combate was ciuill, managed more by counsell then by force. The Cittie was much at the Kings deuotion, yet were they kept in awe by the English forces, being maisters of the strongest Fortes within the Cittie. The Duke of Somerset was there present with authoritie. Talbot must imploy all his valour: but neither force, fortes, authoritie, nor valour were of any force, for that God hauing determined to restore this estate, by the meanes of Charles the 7. inclined both hands and hearts to his decree, the which no mortall man can preuent.

The King being at Pont l'Arche, had certaine intelligence from the best Cittizens of Rouen, that the whole Cittie was resolu'd to obey him: desiring only to be supported by his pience and forces: vpon this aduise he causeth the Earle of Dunois to march, and to shew himselfe vnto the Cittizens: who sends a Herauld to summon them to yeeld their obedience vnto the King, whom the English were like to haue totine in peeces. No Cittizen dares shew himselfe vpon the walles: all is filled with eninies. The English had seized vpon the walles, so as no man within the Towne durst approach. Hauing thus marched about the Towne in good order, fearing no lesse the lightnesse of the peoples humour, then the Winter which approached (being then October) he resolues to retire. Charles and his counsell distrust these popular humors, as not able to draw the Cittie to yeeld: he therefore thinkes it best to lodge his armie about it, and to seize vpon the passages of the Cittizens chiefe houses, being the best meanes to draw them to reason. The which was speedily put in practise. The troupes were scarce lodged in their quarters, when as Charles lying at Pont l'Arche, had intelligence that his seruants had seized vpon two Towers, by meanes wherof they had a quarter of the Cittie. Wherevpon the Earle of Dunois shewes himselfe presently with the Armie before the Cittie, and vnder his troupes according to their quarters. The brute of those forces is great vpon their approach: they haue aduice to march, the which they do resolutely, being set in order, full of generous resolution, as in the Kings presence. The Ladders are set to the wall, as they begin to mount, all prepare to follow, fortie of our men gette vp the wall, when as Lord Talbot arriues with three hundred desperate English, who hauing

The King holding the Cittie wonne, comes to Darnetall, when as the Earle of Dunois returns to aduertise him of the hard successe of this popular brag, so as all held it for winde and smoake.

In the meane time the Cittizens slept not, the litle bloud of some that were slaine set all the rest of the Cittizens on fire, who resolued to vnmake themselves, and to speake plainly to the English. The whole Cittie is incensed by meanes of the magistrates, every man prepares his armes against these strangers. The Archebishop of Rouen (a name which the historie owes to the truth and honor of the French loyalty) was a good seruant to the King, & had great credit with the Cittizens: so as the whole Cittie assembles with him, and by a common consent all resolue to returne to the Crowne of France as to their first beginning: Somerfet and Talbot runne thether with fiftie men, but what is that against a multitude? The Archebishop acquaints them with the Cittizens resolution, who in their presence depute the Officiall to go vnto the King.

The Cittizens resolue to reuel and send their deputies to the King.

The Summe of his Ambassage was, that his Maistie should graunt vnto the Cittizens of Rouen a generall abolition of all that was past, and leaue for the English and allothers of their humor to retire without danger, offering him their obedience as to their lawfull King: that he should come when he pleased, where he should finde the gates as open as their hearts. This resolution deliuered boldlie in the presence of Somerfet and Talbot, amazed them much, their courages were daunted. And what could their weake authority do against the whole body of a Cittie, fortified with the Kings approach, his army, and his right? Thus the Cittie of Rouen, sends deputies vnto the King, and obtaine all they demande, who being returned with this good answer, all are satisfied, but the English, who keepe the walles, Towers, bridge, Castell and Pallace: all this must be fought for. They prepare for force, the people do the like, all the streetes are filled with armed men to force the walles.

The Cittizens send againe vnto the King, beseeching him to approach with his army with all speede, to take absolute possession of his Cittie of Rouen. Attending the Kings answer, the Cittizens do happily winne the walles, the Towers and the gates: all that belongs to the Cittie obeyes the King, the English with great difficultie recouer the bridge, Castell and Pallace. But they inioye not these forts long, for the Cittizens beseege the bridge and wanne it, and now the army comes downe the hill. The Cittizens at the sight thereof ie God saue the King, all breake out into ioy and triumph. The armie enters the Cittie, to the peoples exceding ioy, attending the King. In the meane time Saint Katherins fort is beseegeed and yeilded to the Earle of Dunois: Charles lodgeth there whilest the Cittie is freed from strangers: The Castell yeields, the Pallace onely remains: Somerfet and Talbot are there, they are men of action, who had where with all to fight for their liues. but how can they hold out, all being disposed to an accord?

Rouen yeilded vnto the King, and the English beseege'd in their forts.

The Earle of Somerfet and Talbot yeeld and come to King Charles.

The Conditions granted to the English at Rouen.

Charles enters Rouen.

Charles being wholie inclined to Clementie, doth willingly see Somerfet and Talbot at Saint Katherins fort, who receiue a lawe from his victorious hands, yet would he not admit them with conditions like vnto the Cittizens: but he giues them leaue to retire with their liues and goods vpon these conditions: That they should leaue their prisoners and artillerie, deliuer vp Arques Caudebecq, Tancarville, Lislebonne, Honnefleu, and Monsteuille, they should pay fiftie thousand Crownes presently, and discharge their priuate debts in the Cittie before they departed: for assurance whereof they should leaue Talbot (the flower of all their men) with fivie other hostages such as the King should demande. So Talbot remaines for a pledge. After ten dayes/all articles agreed vpon being performed, except Honnefleu all the hostages haue leaue to depart, except Talbot, who stayes vntill Honnefleu is deliuered. But Talbot must haue more time to taste the bountie & clemencie of our King, and the fruits of French courtesy. Thus Charles enters Rouen with great pompe, but the peoples ioye excedded the stardelincse of his traine,

traine. Their shewes drowne the Trumpets and Clarons, all crie God saue the King. This poore people (greedie to see their Prince, after so long and cruell a seruitude,) weepe for ioy, men and women, young and olde, all runne, many bonfires are made, but the fire of publike deuotion burnt more cleare. This was the tenth of Nouember in the yeate 1449. a notable date for so singular a deliuerance. There yet remained some Townes in Normandie to conquer. Charles loth to lose any opportunitie, or to giue the enemy any leisure to bethinke himselfe, would scarce allow of any time for the publike ioy and content of his good subiects, but goes presently to field with his armie.

Honnefleu would not obey the Duke of Somerfet, the which he must deliuer vp according to the treatie: there were fiftene hundred English, resolue to defend the place, but after fiftene dayes siege they yeilded, vpon honourable termes, their goods and liues being saued. Charles for an increase of the good cheere he had made vnto Talbot during his imprisonment, giues him his libertie without ransome, with meanes to retire himselfe into England with great gifts: but he shall make him no due requitall of this good and honourable entertainment. Fougeris the subiect of this last warre, and the chiefe cause of this good successe, returnes to the obedience of the Crowne, through the valour of the Duke of Brittanie: and Belesme with the Castell of Fresnay, by that of the Duke of Alencon. As all things succeeded happily for our Charles, so all went crosse in England. The Earle of Suffolke gouerned King Henry the 6. quietly, being a young man, and of a weake spirit. As all the affaires of England depended vpon this Earle, so did the King Charles deales honourable with Talbot.

The estate of England.

C reproches. The Duke of Somerfet (a Prince of the English bloud) very ialous of his credit and reputation, and ashamed to be blemished with these losses in France, layes the chiefe fault vpon Suffolke, and others that had the gouernment, and so incensed the people of London, against them, as the Londoners transported with choller for so great a losse, meaning to punish the offenders, fall vpon the Bishop of Chichester, Lord Keeper of the priue Seale, and kill him in a mutinie: they intend the like to Suffolke, (by the fauour of some of his friends) he had not bene put into the Tower of London, to yeeld an account of his actions. Henry (who loued him deere) takes him forth, and sent him into France, for his better safetie. But it chanced that Suffolke seeking to auoide one danger fell into another, where he made his last shipwack: for being met by *Somerfet*s people, being his capital enemy, he was taken and beheaded, his head & body were sent to London, & those cruell spoiles set vp to publike view, in places most frequented.

The Londoners mutinie, and kill the Lord Keeper.

The English Chronicle reports quite contrary.

In the meane time, all England troubled for the losse of Rouen, and the greatest part of the Prouince, resolues to hazard all, to saue the rest of their conquests in France. They had yet in Normandie the Townes of Caen, Vire, Auranches, S. Sauueur le Vicont, Falaise, Damfront, Cherebourg, with the strong places of Tombelaine & Briquebec, and a great part of Guienne. With this remainder the English imagin to recouer the possession of what they had lost. So Henry sends speedily 4000. men, vnder the command of Thomas Tires, one of his most renowned Captaines. Being landed at Cherebourg, without any losse of time, he besiegeth Valonges, a strong place, and of importance. At the brute of these forces, all the English garrisons assemble, to augment his armie, and to fortifie the siege, so as being together, they make about 8000. men. Our armie was lodged in diuers places, to refresh themselves since the siege of Honnefleu, the season being wonderfull moist in the thawe of the spring, when as newes came to Charles of the landing of the English, and the imminent danger of the besieged, the losse whereof were a foule blemish to his victorie. To preuent this, he presently sends the Earle of Clermont with sixteene hundred Lances, whereof the Earle of Castres, the Admirall of Raiz, the Senehall of Poitou, and the Lords of Montgison, Couuran, and Rouhault were the commanders. The English armie was lodged at Fourmigny, a village betwixt Carentan and Bayeux, in a place of advantage, to keepe themselves free from such forces as they might doubt should be sent from the King, being then in the country. Matago an old English Captaine, came vnto him with a thousand Archers. The English being thus fortified, set their backs to a Riuer, being flanked with diuers Orchards and Gardines, before them they make trenches to stoppe their approche, and in this fort they attend the enemy.

The

New forces sent out of England into France.

1450.

The neereneffe of Charles made them to imagine our French to be more in number then they were; for this troupe did not exceed fixe hundred fighting men, whereof a hundred onely, commanded by Geoffray of Couran, and Joachim of Rouault, charged the Englysh vangard, & hauing slaine three or foure hundred, put the rest of their armie in disorder: yet the Earle of Clermont seeing the danger he was in with his troupe, if the enemie had discovered his aduantage, hauing so great an army against his small troupe, sends presently to Charles for speedy succours. By good hap as the messenger came vnto the King, the Constable of Richmont arriues from Brittaine, who marcheth presently, not giuing his souldiers any leasure to breath, exhorting them to go courageously to an assured victorie. His coming strack the stroake, and I wayed the victory. He had 240. Lances, and 800. Archers, and with him James of Luxembourg, the Cont of Laaill, and the Lord of Loheac Marshall of France, with the good fortune of Charles. He arriues euen when as the Earle of Clermont was farre engaged in the fight, the Englysh had taken two Culuerins from him, and in despight had passed S. Clements-forde, preparing to discharge these Culuerins: when as behold the Constable comes with his troupe with a victorious countenance, who at his first approche winnes the bridge vpon the riuier. The Englysh are amazed, especially when they see Matago (who was somewhat retired from the body of their armie to succour at all euents) take the way to Bayeux. The Constable makes his profit of this flight, who without pursuing them, chargeth their dismayed Armie.

Thomas Tirrell puts himselfe in defence with the fauour of the riuier, the Orchards & Gardens: but the Constable commands some of his horsemen to leaue their heiffes. The Earle of Clermont inuiours the enemie on the other side, the Englysh being charged of all sides, feeling the waight of their blowes, giue way, leaue their armes, and suffer themselues to be slaine, and taken to mercy. The courtesie of the French spared many in this ouerthrow: there were more taken prisoners then were slaine. They buried in three pits 3774. carcases, by the report of the Herald, priests, and good men that were there. This losse did likewise bury all the conquests which the Englysh had made in Normandy. The commanders of the armie were prisoners, Tirrell, Norbery, Drient, Kirgich, Warberton, Apel, Alergour, Vaquier, Calenille, and a great number of Englysh Nobilitie, armed with coates of armes: all are lead to Charles with their Ensignes. An honorable spoile to his triumph, but a perpetuall ignominie both to the runners away that saved themselves, and to the cowards that were taken prisoners. This absolute victorie cost France but eight men, to the end they might doe homage to the great God of armes and victories, who by this memorable ouerthrow made the way for the restauration. I read with ioy the warrant of the Originall. And therefore wise men do say, that the grace of God was the cause of the Frenchmens victorie and so by his diuine power the Englysh were ouercome. This victory was giuen vs from heauen, the 19. of Aprill in the yeare 1450. and thankes were giuen vnto God throughout the realme. A solemne procession was made at Paris of foureteene thousand young children, from the age of seuen to ten yeares, carefully chosen out, to the great content of the people, going from S. Innocents to our Ladies Church. This notable victorie of Fourmigny, did soone after cause the rest of Normandie to yeeld: Vire yeelds by composition, the which was granted to 400. Lances, who might well haue contended for their liues.

All Normandie yeelds to Charles.

Auranches stood the longer vpon termes, through the resolution of fixe hundred voluntaries, but in the end they departed with their liues onely, and a white wand in their hands. The strong Castell of Tombelaine garded by a hundred Englysh, yeelded two daies after. Bayeux resolues to fight it out, all prepare to armes. After the ordinance had made a great breach, and the mine ready to play, Charles fearing the sacke of his subjects, as well as of his enemies, would not suffer his men to attempt so dangerous a matter, and the souldiers on the other side crye out to be led vnto the breach. But in the end they march without command, and are twice repulsed, yet Matago (being amazed at the furie of these desperate men,) demands a parle, the which is granted by Charles, but he obtained life onely, and a white wand for euery Souldier: to some Gentle-pointing spectacle, to see foure hundred women carrying their children cyther in their armes or in their cradels, leauing all their goods and mouables behind them, and hardly carrying a poore clout for their greatest neede. So Misery comes to him that spoiles, for hee shall be spoiled, that makes an other weeper, for hee shall haue time to weepe. Yet Charles could this troupe of 900. men being disarmed to be safely conducted with the rest to Cherbourg, a place which they had demanded for their retreat. Bayeux being thus yeelded, the Kings army marcheth to Saint Sauueur le Viconte, the which yeelds without batterie. They had a good composition for the number of men of waite that were not being fixe or six hundred: they grant them their liues and goods, retyring to Cherbourg. Charles was loath to loose his men vnconstrayned, for that there remained yet some places of strength.

Caen (a goodly and populous Citty) was besieged with great preparation, but to what ende should I consume time in the priuate report of assaults, seeing we hast to the victory? A great peece of the wall being beaten downe, and our men burning with desire to rume to this honorable breach, Robert de Vere being gouernor, demands a parle, he held the Castell (being one of the goodlyest peeces in France) with foure thousand souldiers. So by the commandement of Charles, the Earle of Dunois yeelded them an honorable composition, to depart with bag and baggage and their armes, except the armour the prisoners were set at libertie, and all that the Citizens might owe vnto the Englysh was discharged, to the benefit of the debtor. All depart the first of Iuly and are conducted in safety according to the accord, and the King makes his entre two dayes after.

The composition at Caen.

Falaise is besieged in the meane time and yeelds the one and twentieth of the same moneth. Fiftene hundred Englysh of their best souldiers, obtaigned a good composition to depart with bag and baggage. Domsfront garded by foureteene hundred franke archers yeelds vpon the like composition, the second of August following. Cherbourg
(one of the strongest places of Europe in those dayes) was the conclusion of that account and the crowning of this happie worke. It was garded by 2000. desperat adventurers, who (wonderfully greued with so many misfortunes) would be buried in the ashes of this last losse: but Thomas Gamel gouernor of the place preuailed more in their obstinate resolution, shewing that they had discharged their duties to their Countrie in being the last to fight. But nature swayd most with Gamel, for hauing his concept soner with the King, he would not loose himselfe with his sonne. The accord was made absolute for his souldiers and his sonne, and vpon this accord he leaues the Towne, and retires last into England, to admonish Henry to prouide for Guienne, where the whole burthen of the warre would fall.

So the 12 of August in the yeare. 1450. Normandie (one of the goodlyest and richest provinces belonging to this Crowne) was reduced to the Kings obedience, in aueue and six dayes, hauing remayned in the possession of the Englysh thirty yeares, and lost by them, as it is a miraculous worke of God they were so easily disposed of.
Restoring Normandie, let vs come to Guienne, to finish the restoring of this Estate.

Guienne returns to the Crowne of France.

Guienne had begon her last seats of armes by the taking of Cognac and Saint Margrin, as we haue sayed, whereas the wane continued coldly during that of Normandie. But Charles after the happie conquest of this Province, bends all his forces to drue the Englysh out of England had Guienne, the which hee had inioyed by a lawfull title aboue a hundred yeares. Charles assembles his great Councell with the chiefe meanes how to maintayne his army. This done, he giues the gouernment of Norman- die to his Constable, and setled Peter of Brezay at Rouen, for the well preseruing of that which he had happily gotten. And to bee the neerer to his affaires, he resolues to re-maine at Tailbourg for all occurrents. He had then a small army in Guienne, vnder the commande of the Earle of Foix, who had not onely kept the enemy in breath during the warres of Normandie, but also had wonne part of the Country, by the taking of Mauleon in Sole, and Guifans.

Charles giues the commande of the army to the Earle of Dunois and Longueville a bastard of Orleans, but the Earle of Ponthieure and Perigort, haue an other part, to molest the English in diuers quartres, yet these three armies shall make but one bodie vnder this lieutenant general to his Maister, when the necessity of his seruice shall winne them all in one. The Earle of Ponthieure did happily begin the conquest of Guienne, in taking of Bergerac, the which was well defended, and then Genfac, Saint Poy and Mon- ferrand, with their dependances, by the terror of his victorious armes. Our braue Cas- cons did no lesse on their side. About the same time Amalon d'Albret Lord of Oruill was in garrison at Tartas a Towne of good presage, being the beginning of many blessings which God gaue vnto France. Hee had scarce six hundred men at armes, and some good footemen of the Countie: but he was well accompanied with Tolereffe, Robin and Epinaffe, wife and valiant Captaines, and with his generous resolution, the hereditary ornament of his noble house. He shewed by the effects, that we must not num- C ber the men, but weigh their valour, for with this small troupe he presumes to braue Bourdeaux euen at their gates, and giues a Lawe vnto the Country of Medoc, making not onely the whole Country to contribute, but also to bring their commodities to Tartas.

The Bourdellois (to free themselves, not onely from these brauadoes, but from their ordinarie toyle and charge, thrust on by the authority and commande of the Engl (who were then their superiors) leaue eight thousand men vnder their Maiors com-mande. The Cittizens promise themselves an assured victorie, but this troupe encounters them, defeats them, kills and takes them prisoners. The neere retreat reserued many, but there remayned two thousand vpon the place, and the victor led D two thousand two hundred prisoners to Tartas, the which were taken like slaves in a net, from whom he drew great ransomes, with the honor to haue vanquished a great multitude with few men. This onely was memorable during that yea.

1452.

The next shall bring vs in an absolute victorie of all that held in Guienne for the Eng- lish. Charles hauing giuen some respite to his Nobility and men of warre, appoints the first day of May to go to field. The army was verie faire: the Earle of Dunois had the chiefe commande, (as we haue sayd) the which did not hinder John Earle of Angoul- me, (brother to the Duke of Orleans) from ioyning with the army, with a goodly troupe of the Nobility: as the Lords of Taillebourg, Pons, Rocheaucault, Rochechouard and St- terre. Duke Charles was then in Italie for his priuate affaires, whence he shall returne E with an other traine when he shall be King. Philip Duke of Bourgonie was much troubled, in pacifying a mutinie of Gantois, who molested him, when he had most neede to succour France, in the conquest of the two Prouinces, whereof we nowe speake. To-wardes ted counsell in the priuate relating of all these sieges, the Kings army did first attempt Montguyn and takes it: then the Earle of Ponthieure arrives with his troupe, and ioynes with the Earle of Dunois the generall, and to the army (being increased both in men and courage) beseegeth Blais, one of the goodliest fortresses of Guienne, a Towne seated at the mouth of Dordonne, and enriched with a goodly haue of the sea, the which was well assayed and well defended, but in the ende the Towne is taken by force, and the Castell by composition, although the Cittizens of Bourdeaux labored to releue it with a flect of five armed shippes.

A force was prepared against Fronsac and in the meane time the Earle of Ponthieure beseegeth Castillon, a Towne in Perigort, seated vpon Dordone, (the which shall be famous in the warres of our time) and takes it by composition. Saint Million by their example yields obedience. In the meane time all march to Fronsac (a place renowned since Charlemagne, and one of the strongest forts of Europe) being beleaguered of all sides: as all prepare for some great force they within demanded a parle. Their request was to haue a truce vntill Midsummer, if they were not succored by that day they would yeld the place and submit themselves to the Kings seruice and imploy all their meanes to draw Burdeaux to obedience. These offers pleased the Princes and the Earle of Dunois being generall. The daie being come, no succors appeere, and so Fronsac is B yielded vnto the King, to the incredible content of the whole armie, which expected great resistance from this inuincible fort.

It yields,

If the Earle of Dunois preuailed wel on this side the riuer of Garonne, on the other side the Earles of Foix and of Armagnac failed in no point of their duties: hauing taken Rion, they ioyntly beseege Acqs a towne of importance in that Countie. Their happy exploits performed in lesse then two monethes, did as much incourage the French as it did daunt the English, who could not keepe the Townes (which yet held for them) from affecting of the French, and much more in the champion Countie hauing more libertie. So as the Nobilitie, together with the Townes, resolute to expell the rest of the English, that the King might bee wholly obeyed. Onely Bourdeaux and Bayonne C remained: the most important Townes of that Prouince, whether the whole force of this royall army doth march, but the Cittizens of Burdeaux (loth to bee forced) resolute to obey. Beeing thus affected, they treat and make a profitable accord, as it is set downe at large in the Originall Their fredomes and priuileges were confirmed vnto them by John Luenall of Vrjins, Chancellor of France; they brought their keyes to the Earle of Dunois, (as Lieutenant generall to the King in his armie) and re-ceyued the French into their Cittie with exceeding ioy the first day of August, to the great greece of the English, who see themselves expelled out of the whole realme, but they shall yet make a new attempt.

Burdeaux makes a composition and yields.

The oathe of fealtie was autentically made to Charles the, 7. both by the Cittizens
D of Burdeaux and by all the Estates of Burdellois to their naturall King and lawfull Prince, renouncing the English. The Nobilitie held vp their hands first in this oath, & namely the Lords of Esparre, Montferrand, Duras, Rosan, Pugeols, Lansac, List, & Anglade amongst the which how many proued treachers? The Archebithop also did take the same oath of homage and fealtie to the King, with Gaston de Foix: only Captall de Buch would not take the oath for his person, but he submitted all his Lands to the obedience of the Crowne, an error which shall be preiudiciall to the whole Prouince. Thus all Guienne was made subiect to the Kings obedience, except Bayonne: for the reduction of which Towne, (being needlesse to keepe together so great an armie,) euery Nobleman, was commanded to returne to his howse, and that the Earle of Dunois should E continue there to imploye the forces of the Country at this siege. So the Princes of the bloud depart, accompanied with twenty thousand men, whom they dismiss euery one into his Countie.

Bayonne yields vpon hard condicions.

The Earle of Foix ioynd with the earle of Dunois, & they beseege Bayonne: the siege was long, painefull and dangerous: the which might haue bene more easie and spedie by means of the armie which was redie. But in truth the nigard spends more then the bountifull man in euery degree: yet in the end Bayonne submits to the obedience of the Crowne vpon these conditions, That the tounesmen of Bayonne should deliuer John of Beaumont their Captaine into the Kings hands, with their own persons and their goods to be at the Kings wil & discretion: and to reparaire their disobedience & to purchase F the Kings fauour they should pay fortie thousand Crownes, whereto they are referred by the earle of Foix, generall of the army. This accord was confirmed by the entrie of the said Earle into the Towne, who tooke a sollemne othe in the Kings name. Charles tor-gues the inhabitants halfe their fine, and confirms halfe their priuiledges. The three Estates of the Country of Burdellois send their deputies vnto the King, who was then at Taillebourg, to confirme their othes, and homages already taken by his Chancellor: and the King likewise doth ratifie their priuileges, and receyues them into fauour, so as Guienne seemed to be reduced to the Kings obedience, to the incredible content of the whole realme, and so this yeare ended with an vniuersall ioy.

But seven or eight moneths were scarce spent in this publike ioy, such as the French might haue in euery corner of their country, enioying peace, the which they had not tasted these hundred yeares, and which in outward appearance there was no hope to recouer, the English and Bouguignons hauing taken such firme footing in all parts, when as behold, a great surge which seemed to expose France to the mercie of a more horrible and dangerous storme. For Talbot comes to the gates of Bordeaux, with goodly troupes of English, where he was receiued, and tooke the Seneschall of Guienne prisoner, being gouernour of the Towne, and Jehan de Foux depuie Maior of Bordeaux, and in a mane, the same day, the Nobilitie which had giuen their faith vnto the King, (noted before by their speciall names,) deliuered all the chiefe places of the countie to the English. Fronsac, Colonnues, Castillon, Chasteauneuf in Damedee, Cadillac, Langon, S. Matie, Liborne and Saint Millon. And after Talbot (who came but to discouer) there arrived the next day in safetie, foure thousand fighting men from England, with foure score ships laden with Meale and Salt meates, to victuall the Towne. The amazement of this losse was as great, as the ioy had bene of gaine. Charles was then at Tours: the Earle of Clermont (sonne to Charles Duke of Bourbon) was gouernour of Guienne. He commands him to haue a care to the preseruacion of the rest of Guienne, and presently he sends six hundred men at armes, vnder the command of three Marshalls of France, and the Lords of Orual and Rouhaul, who were then neere the King, and sends for the rest of his forces with all speed. But whilest that all prepare to repaire this losse, may we not examine the motive of this great and sodaine change? Some new writers accuse the ill usage of the French to this people newly conquered, which made them to wish for the English, being more milde and temperate Lords: others blamed the negligence of our French, yf to keepe that which they had so valiantly gotten. But who is he that can finde this first cause truly noted, hearing the whole History speake, and representing the discontent of the French nation, against the gouernment of the English. And why did the King dismisle his armie, but to ease his people, euen with the preiudice of his owne affaires?

As for our negligence in keeping of that which we haue gotten with much paine, it is too well knownne by memorable examples: but seeing the affection of the people of Bordeaux, had bin confirmed by many prootes, in this voluntary obedience, to what end had it serued to put them in fetters, as a people vanquished by armes, and force them to obedience? But to find out the causes, we must examine the effects. L'Esparre, Montferrand, Duras, Anglade, Rofans, and others specified in the register of the oath, will bee found straight waies revolted in these places. Capitall de Buche protested openly that he was not the Kings seruant, so as he might without reproch carrie armes against him for the King of England his maister. He might remaine peaceable within the country, inioying his houses, being vnder the Kings protection, and to make his traffick for the English at his pleasure. Jehan King of Navarre an Arragonois both by birth and humour, was an enemy to Charles for two respects, as hauing married the heire of Navarre, and with that marriage the quarrells & hatred of that Charles which was Grandfather to his wife, who had so much troubled the reignes of Jehan and Charles the 1. and as an Arragonois by reason of the quarrells of Naples, against the house of Aniou. These were two instruments to moue many mens mindes. It could not otherwise be, but the authoritie and command of two hundred yeares, had purchased England many seruants, and such as had alwayes held the English party against France, and were not reclaimed to the Kings obediences, but by force, could not beleue that they had any such part in the Kings fauour, hauing brought nothing to his seruice but necessitie and constraint. These men being wonne, doe animate, or rather force the people, making themselves the strongest, in places where there was no gards, whereof they were not onely wearied, but were plunged in the trust and assurance of a profound peace. Who seeth not then, but this made the way more easie for these disloyall treachers, to surprize those Townes which

A they had deliuered to the English: but from whence soeuer the mischief came, this was the remedie.

Talbot was the Kings prisoner, as we haue said at the taking of Rouen; Charles had shewed him all the fauour a man might hope for of so great a Monarche: he gaue him his libertie without ransom, and had honoured him with goodly presents: yet he is become head of the English armie, which were esteemed eight thousand fighting men, and marcheth directly against the Kings armie, which made hast to recouer what had bene lost, and to preferue what remained. Castillon was become English. The Earle of Ponthieure, with the Admirall and Marshalls of France, besiege it, attending the King, who came posting to quench this fire. Talbot makes hast from Bordeaux with the choicest of his men, bearing an assured victory, in his conceit, and being ignorant that he went to seeke death. At the first charge our men begin to wauer, vpon the braue arriual of Talbot, but they gather themselves together againe, with great resolution, to stay the course of this streame. Talbot on the other side, encourageth his men as going to a banquet, and not to a battaile, he beates out the heads of pipes of Wine, to make his men drinke, himselfe being drunke with presumption, and making his Souldiers drunke with the vaine hope of victorie; being mounted vpon a little Nagge, but followed by six or seven thousand men, they come to fight.

The combat was fierce, but the English are repulsed, scattered and ouerthrowne. Therewere two thousand slaine vpon the place, and amongst the rest, Talbot was ouerthrowne from his horse and slaine, with his Sonne. The Earle of Candal (sonne to Capitall de Buche), Montferrand and Anglade are taken prisoners: Esparre escapes for an other time. In the end Castillon yeelds at discretion. Saint Millon and Liborne returne to the Kings obedience, to the great content of the inhabitants, being surprized to their griefe. Charles did also warrant them from all losse in this reprise. Cadillac, Langon, Villandras, and S. Maquaire, shake off the English yoke at one instant, and open their gates with their hearts. The Kings armie goes from thence to Bordeaux, being full of Englishmen, but fuller of feare, seeing the English lothe to buy it so deare as Talbot had done: so as they suffer the French to wander at their pleasure vp and downe the country of Medoc. This victory was due to the presence of Charles, who being arriued at Fronsac, (the which was held a place inuincible by force) it yeelds as vanquished. The English haue their liues granted them, with a white wand, through the bounty of Charles. He doth not so intreate the revolted French, for the Captaine of Cadillac being taken, is beheaded for an exemplarie punishment.

From thence he comes to Bordeaux, (the which was the chiefe place of his affaires) but the multitude that came vnto his seruice was admirable, they came from all parts, (knowing that the King was present,) so willingly do the French obey their Prince. Therewere foure thousand English remaining in the Towne, and as many of their factious, being drawne together from diuers parts of the country: the siege continued two moneths. Charles had built vp Bulwarkes to stop the entrie, and to incounter the English defences, but there were no memorable assaults. The sicknesse which increased in the Kings armie, hastened the composition for the City, the which he might haue forced, but that he desired to spare the blood of his subiects. The composition was thus made. That all the English should passe into England with their goods: that the Citizens of Bordeaux should be all in the Kings protection, taking a new oath, neuer to rebell against him their Soueraigne Lord. And for that some of the country, and of the City of Bordeaux, had drawne in the King of England, contrary to their oath, the King (pardoning the greatest number) he should chofe twenty at his pleasure, to banish them out of the Realme, their goods remaining forfeited to the Crowne: of this number were Capitall de Buche, and Candal his sonne, Duras, Anglade, Rofan and Esparre, who in the end lost his head, being found guiltie of a new treason, a yeare after this pardon. The Citizens of Bordeaux renew their oath of fidelitie with teares, and receiue a great garnison to preuent all surprises: they build two strong Castels to that end: one towards the Sea, called Castell Trompette, an other towards the maine, named Castell du Ha. 1454. Earle of Clermont, gouernour of Guienne, remains in the Citty, to settle the Kings authority. Charles carried this true commendation in the recouery of his losse, to haue doubled his army by the good order which he caused to be carefully obserued, and by his victorie, in vanquishing his enemies, not onely by force, but by clemencie, & his subiects by loue and mildnesse. So as both the treachery of these disloyals, and the rashnesse of his enemies with their new attempts, were parts due to his victory, so much the more admirable, for that he doth vanquish, when as he seemed vanquished: he winnes, when as in shew he was lost: and forced as it were to warre for the desire he had of peace, he reaped the fruites both of warre and peace, in fighting valiantly, and vsing the victorie modestlie, to the eternall memorie of posteritie.

Troubles in England.

Charles returns from Bordeaux to Tours, hauing happily finished so doubtfull an action. But oh the inconstancie of this world: England which had so much troubled vs, takes occasion to trouble it selfe, for the losses which they supposed to haue made of that which they had taken from vs: and as affection is wayward and often blind, so it sowes dissention vpon strange subiects. The Dukes of Yorke, Somerſet, and Gloucester, accuse one another, and make factions within the realme. Richard Duke of Yorke (being of a branche of the blood royall) pretended the Crowne to belong more iustly vnto him, then vnto Henry the 6. then reigning; but contemned, by reason of his great losses, and of his naturall defects, Somerſet being fauoured by the King (as the ringleader of his faction) was pursued by Yorke, and so cunningly, as the Londoners (hating him as the cause of all the losses in France) put him in prison; but in the end he was freed by the Kings authoritie.

This diuision burst into open warre, vnder the names of two factions, Lancaster from whence King Henry was descended, and they wore the redde Rose for a mark: and Clarence from whence the Duke of Yorke tooke his beginning, bearing the white Rose for a distinction. This rancor of parties hath bathed all England with the blood of her subiects: two yeares shall not passe, after this losse, but Somerſet shall dye in a battaile, and King Henry the 6. (who had carryed himselfe as King of France) shall be prisoner: and whereas he sought to ioyne the Crowne of France to that of England, he shall loose that of England, both for him and his: teaching vs that we must neuer thinke to doe harme to another, but we shall receiue our share againe, and not to dispaire in our greatest afflictions. The beginning of this raigne did represent vnto vs a ruined realme, and this end restores it to her first beautie. Thus was this realme restored; from the which the English were quite expelled, except from Calais, and the heyre recouered the possession of his right, the which his successors enioye vnto this day.

The meanes of this singular deliuerance, is worthy to be obserued, vnder the conduct of the first mouer, the which the wise acknowledge to be in the prouidence of God, the Soueraigne of Soueraignes, and the preseruer of States, whereby he maintaines the societie of mankind. Truelie in the course of these ordinarie meanes, which we seeke after: Charles holds the first place, being both capable of Councell, and full of resolution to put in execution. He was assisted by great personages in the gouernment of his affaires, and for the warres. He was furnished with two Constables, which serued him faithfully, the Earle of Bouquain in his aduersitie, and the Earle of Richemont in his prosperitie: of two Chancellors, worthy men, and fitte for the time: Of Renald of Chartres Archb. shop of Rheims, and John Iuuenall of Vrjins, Baron of Trignel, the one for the beginning, the other for the end of his affaires? And for watrours, he had as resolute and happy commanders, as might be found in any raigns, of whom he had great need. But from all this we must ascend vnto the foueraigne cause, who hath shewed vs the rodde, and cast it into the fire, when as it pleased him, that by the example of our Ancestors, we may more perfectly obserue the causes and remedies of our difficulties.

Now we drawe neere vnto the end of this raigne: but before we conclude, we must obserue the estate of the Church, & finish the discourse of the Schisme, whereof we haue

shewed the beginning and proceeding. We haue made relation of this inexcusable confusion vntil the councell of Pisa, which (supposing to reforme the scandalous disorders of two Popes being enemies, Gregorie and Benedict) aduanced a third, which was John the 23, so as at one time there were three Popes. John, at Boulogne, Gregorie at Rimini (not able to be resident at Rome, and Benedict at Auignon).

This multiplicitie of Popes bred disorder, to the great scandale and preiudice of all Christians. So as Sigismund (not able to cure this infirmity of the mind, by force) he resolved to haue recourse vnto the authoritie of the church: & to that end he passed through France, England, Spain and Italie, perswading all Kings, Princes and Potentates to hold a Councell at Constance, (whether the Emperours of constantinople & Trepisonde, with the churches of Greece sent their Ambassadors, and all Christian nations assisted, to the end this councell might be oeconomically and vniuersall. In this Councell, John the 23, (being accused and found guilty of greuous crimes) was first deposed and then imprisoned. Gregory the 12. and Benedict the 13. were likewise deprived, & Otho Colonne a Romaine gentleman, was chosen Pope by the Councell, & is called Martin the 15.

This decree of the councell, was accompanied with great and generall complaints, by reason of the corrupted estate of the Church, the which had exceeded farre in some places. Saint Bernard had begun in France, as doth appeere by diuers places of his writings, and by books written vpon this subiect. But many of his disciples had followed him in great numbers, Gabriel de Roquetaillade, Tomas Coeuet, and Nicholas Clemangis had filled all France with these complaints. But in England John Wiclef, and in Bohemia John Hus had perswaded men with greater vehemencie: for Bohemia was ready to disclaime the Popes authoritie. John Hus teaching them not only to leaue the abuse of manners, but the doctrine it selfe: as is conteyned at large in acts of the councell of Constance. It shalbe sufficient to coat them, my stile not permitting me to set them downe at large. The reader that is carefull to see the grounds of this controuersie, may go vnto the Originall, and I will obserue the effect according vnto the dutie of the historie.

Wiclef doctrine was condemned. John Hus and Ierome of Prague came to Constance, (hauing a passport from the Emperour Sigismund and the Councell,) but they were condemned and burnt as heretiks. Hus in the Bohemian tong signifies a goose. John Hus when as the Iudges had pronounced this sentence that he should be burnt, he said vnto them. I appeale from you vnto the soueraigne Iudge and preseruer of all truth, who a hundred yeares hence, shall raise out of my ashes a Goose which shall not suffer him selfe to be roasted. So as John Hus was burnt in the yeare. 1417. and Martin Luther began to shew him selfe in the yeare, 1517.

There were great complaints against the abuses of the Church, made by Peter d'Alliae a Cardinal & John Gerson Chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Paris & deputie of the French Church. The Colledge of Sorbon had giuen him great instructions vpon this subiect, but nothing was effected. They only make the Pragmaticall Sanction, to suppress the Popes authoritie. Gerson returning from Basil died for greefe at Lions. But this Councell did not end those two difficulties for the which it had bene called. for Peter de la Lune, called Benedict 13, being deposed by the councell and retired into Arragon, had so incensed Alphonſus King of Arragon, as he supported him with all violence, against Martin the new Pope. And the Bohemians were so moued with the death of these two personages (whom they reuerenced) as they tooke armes vnder the comand of Xifca a very famous Captaine, and did much annoy the Emperour Sigismund. Peter de la Lune, called Benedict 13, held his court apart, doing at Laniscoule a Towne in Arragon, as Martin did at Rome: but this humour brought him to his graue.

After his death the colledge made choise of Giles Munion, who was called Clement the 8. Martin dies in the other feare, and his Colledge doth choose a Venetian of the familie of Condolme, and calls him Eugene, 4. who finds the means to cause the Antipope Clement 8. to relinquish. But the Bohemian action was of more difficulty, for they spake boldly being in armes: and Sigismund the Emperour prest to haue audience for them, hauing receiued great reproches, for that (to please the Pope) he had violated the publicke faith, and suffered the breach of his passport. These causes made Martin the 5. to call a Councell at Basill, whether the Bohemians had free libertie to come: but the Emperour gave them hostages for their suerty; trusting his word no more, the which he had broken in the death of their Countmen. There were likewise many other besides the Bohemians, which desired some redresse for these visible confusions: so as it was there freely disputed of the necessity to reforme the Church, being fit to begin first with the Pope, and not suffer the forepassed disorders, to the great scandall of all Christians: and that (to auoide a future inconuenience, by the generall discontent of all men,) it was reasonable he should submit himselfe to the censure of the Councell, whereunto hee was subiect. As the fathers of the Councell, with a generall consent, had thus concluded, and had drawn articles, That the authoritie of the Councell was above the Pope: Eugenius (foreseeing the preiudiciall consequence of this decree) reuokes the Councell assembled at Basill, for certaine great considerations which he sayed proceeded from the holy ghost, & transported it to Bologne, to the exceeding discontent both of the fathers & the Emperour. They resolute to oppose themselves against this brauado of Eugenius, and to withstand him by the like authority of the Church, wherby he sought to ruine them. By the authority of the general Councell lawfully assembled, they giue him an assignation to appeere before them, and in case he disobeyes, they declare him degraded and excommunicate. Eugenius (to calme this storme) makes shew to yeeld vnto this decree, & promitteth to obey, yet seeking meanes vnder hand to crosse them, relying vpon our Charles the 7. who followed his party. It chanced also (as Eugenius desired) that the Emperour Sigismund (who was the chiefe opposer to his desires) died during these disorders: Yet the Councell of Basill was not dissolved, but were resolved to continue firme. Albert of Austria is chosen Emperour after Sigismund, and succedes him both in his desire to continue the Councell at Basill, and in the Imperiall dignity.

Matters grewe then more violent, our Charles the 7. (being loath to yeeld in any thing to the Emperour, hauing made a generall truce with the King of England, as we haue sayed, the English likewise holding with Eugenius) sends his son Lewis neere vnto Basill, with an army compounded of French & English vnto, to nourish this notable dissension, the issue whereof was as we haue said. The Councell of Basill incensed by these bitter and violent courses practised by Eugenius, in the end they resolute to degrade him, and in his place they choose this Amedee Duke of Sauoy, (of whom we haue spoken in diuers places) hauing made himselfe a monke of purpose, to be chosen Pope amongst so many which aspired to this dignity, and was called Felix.

But this cured not the disease: for at this new election of a Duke of Sauoy to the Pontificall dignity, all Kings, Princes, & Potentats were moued (France, England, Italy and Spain) at so strange a proceeding, and disauowe Felix. In the meane time the college of Cardinals at Rome, choose Thomas Sarzan Pope, & name him Nicholas the 5. a man commended in histories, fit to suppress this Schisme & to reduce the Church to vniou, being wise, modest, learned and quiet: all Kings and Christian Princes allowed of him by a generall consent. Felix was supported by the Germains, (for Albert fauored him) but hee dies soone. Frederic the 3. succeeding in the Empire, a wise and a modest Prince, who (not to contradict the Germains at the first) followed their humour in fauoring of Amedee: but in the end ouerruled by a generall consent of all Christendome, he vtieth his authority with Amedee, to make him renounce his Popedom. Our Charles doth likewise interpose his authority, and sends John Inuencall of Vrsins his Chancellor vnto him, being well accompanied: who finds him at Lozanne, where he had made his Pontificall feat with a stately college of Cardinals. He feared the King more then any man lyuing, whom in his conscience he had moued to a iust dislike of him, when as he made a good shew and yet betrayed him in his greatest afflictions, (crosses which wounde euen the verie heart of a generous minde). Moreover Charles was both strong and neere at hand, to comproule him, if hee should continue obstinate. Felix stands vpon tearmes, but in the ende (whereas the Kings Ambassadors spake vnto him of force,) he grew more milde, and treated thus busines

A by the Kings authority, protesting that for his loue hee did willingly resigne his right. Thus all obey Nicholas: and Amedee had a Cardinals hat, with the title of Saint Sabine, and was Legat ouer his countries, and of some part of Germanie. This was the end of that feuer which so much tormented all Christendome: the raine of Charles being honored with this blessing of God; to haue bene a sollemne theater both of the restoring of the realme, and the reunion of the Church.

But alas, during these cruell confusions of the westerne Church, the Christians of the East (who had endured much) were now vtterly ruined. We left them in very poore estate vnder the raigne of Charles the 6. in the yeare 1396. In fifty yeares (during the scandall of this miserable Schisme and the willfull warres of France and England) there happened a greater alteration. Our Kings and Princes had labored long in vaine to recouer the holy land, consuming an infinite number of men and money, and preuailed nothing. But Constantinople the head of the Easterne Empire remayned stil in state, with Greece, Macedonie, Thessalie and the neighbour countries, Sclauonia, Valachia, Russia, Serua, Bulgaria, and a part of Natolia, whereof Trepisonde was the chiefe of that Empire. In this weaknes which drew nere to a totall ruine, the Christians vanitie was so great as to make two Empires, the one in Europe and the other in Asia, and then euery Empire being diuided into diuers parcels, held by sundrie Despotes or soueraine Lords, that among so many maisters there should be none at all. These confusions did bring in, fortifie, & wholly settle the Turkes, who were the horrible instruments of Mahomet and enemies to all Christendome. I enter not into the particular discours of this Easterne historie: it belongs not to my subiect. I onlie obserue the continuance of time, to shew the estate of the Church, and the Empire, with our Monarchie.

After our French had abandoned (as we haue said) this imagined Empire of the East, the Paleologues seised thereon, and gouerned it diuersly, according to their passions: Michael, Andronic, John & Manuel, hauing brought vpon the stage, both in diuers occurrents & with diuers successe, the most horrible tragedies which impiety could deuise: to the great dishonor of the Christian name. In the end Constantine Paleologus giues the last acquitance of the annient possession of the Empire, to make a new bond in fauour of the Turkes, that his name might be answerable to his miserie. Wee haue shewed what a breach Baiazet had made in Hongary, making so great a slaughter of the french when as he tooke John Duke of Bourgonne prisoner. This beginning of a victorie had in shew proceeded farther and ruined Constantinople, the which he besieged, but that God (who would suffer the Christians to breath for their amendment) suppressed this tyrant by an other tyrant: for Baiazet being taken by Tamberlane, did then suffer for his cruelty, but he left the conquest of the great Cittie to his posteritie, at such time as the wise & iust prouidence of God had decreed it: the which was 50. yeares after for the battaile wherein Baiazet was vanquished, after he had ouerthrowen our Christians, was giuen in the yeare 1395. and Constantinople was taken the yeare, 1453. the 29. of May, by Mahomet the 2. grand-child to Baiazet, a fit instrument to punish the impietie, cruelty, and all other kindes of execrable dissolution which then reigned among the Christians, & euen among those which had the cheefe command.

This Mahomet was the sonne of Amurath, borne of a Christian, the Daughter of the Despot of Serua, and instructed by his mother in the Christian religion: to be the more fit to chastise the Christians, who (confessing God in their mouthes and denying him their deeds), could not be ruined by a fitter instrument and more answerable to the crime whereof they were guilty, then a tyrant Atheist, who hauing tasted the true religion, had spued it out, hauing no religion, and mocking at all that carried the name of religion. This Mahomet (seeking to settle his Empire as the eldest of his house, being loth to haue any companion) caused his two brethren to be slaine. Turjin and Calepin: the one he drowned in a basen, the other he caused to be strangled. Hauing murdered his two brethren by two of his Basnaes, Moyse and Huly; he puts these murderers to death for his bretherens blood, shedding their blood who had bene the instruments of their murders,

Having thus fetled his Empire by these solemnities, he applies all his wit to ruine A the Christians, being diuided of themselves by strange partialities, and as it were inviting him to their ruine. He seizeth vpon the Empire by degrees, being called in by the Christians to decide their quarrells, and fortifying the weaker of purpose against the strongest. A politick man, painfull, active and imperious, getting authority by his fearefull tyranny.

Constantinople beleeged.

Being seized vpon the Country, hauing incombred the Christians affaires, and diuided their mindes by sundrie intelligences, it was easie for him to beseege Constantinople for who should succor it? The greatest enemies the Christians had within the Country, were the Christians themselves. The Paleologues (with the Churches of the East) had had recourse to the Pope, Emperour and King of France, & by their fauour to the Councells of Pisa, Constance & Basil, one after another: but they returned with nothing but winde, dispaire & mockery. Thus Mahomet (well assured of his enemies estate) beseegeth Constantinople, the which was now but the shadow of the Empire, a great masse of building, testifying, that the beauty of the Empire was decayed. The Emperour Constantin Paleologus (who resigned his authority vnto Mahomet) had only a few succors from Genoa and Venice. Mahomet had two hundred and fiftie shippes of war, and two hundred thousand fighting men: amongst the which the most warlike were leui- C ed in those Countries which made profession of the Christian religion. The beleeged seeing their estate desperate, fought to sel their liues deere. But what could they do? their walles being battered downe by the horrible thunder of the Turkish artillery, their port forced by their armed shippes, and they themselves oppressed by so infinit a multitude. So as a generall assault being giuen, Constantinople is taken by force. The Citie thus forced on the one side: as Constantine and many of his troupe fought to saue themselves by a gate that was free, they were furiously pursued by the victorious Turkes, & the port being stoppt by the multitude, many were smothered, among the which Constantine was found dead.

Constantinople taken by the Turkes.

Constantine the Emperour smothered.

The Turke incensed for the losse of so many his men, glutted himselfe with the slaughter of the poore Inhabitants of Constantinople, killing all indifferently, without respect of age or sexe, yong and old, women & maidens, with such exceeding cruelty, as no man can write it without terror, nor reade it without teares. When we shall be D fore our eyes this goodly Country of the East, this capitall Citie of the Empire, where the voice of the gospell had founded in the sacred mouthes of so many holy personages, & famous doctors of the Church which haue serued happily in their times, to become now the dongeon of Impiety, the fortresse of error, the Rendezvous of al barbarisme and iniquity: where Mahomet raiseth himselfe aboue the Kings of the earth & threatens Christendome proudly, hauing an Empire not onely fashioned, but also fortified with the force & power of so many kingdoms. But alas what speake we of Constantinople the last of our losses in the East? When we begin by Ierusalem, the chiefe Rendezvous of the Elders of the house of God, from whence the Gospell flowed, where the holy mouth of the son of God and of his Apostles haue founded out: when we continue by E Iury a land which hath so long nourished the true church, & bin the gard of the doctrine of helth: when we crosse ouer this great country of Asia, & fro thence passe into those goodly Prouinces of Europe, Greece, Macedonie & the neighbour Nations: when we cast our eyes beyond the sea and behold from our windowes the heauen vnder which Africke lies, heretofore replenished with so many goodly churches, and enriched with so many excellent Doctors, & yet all these great & large Countries are at this day the receptacles of Mahomet, where he vomits forth his blasphemies, & spoiles the miserable remaynders of the poore Christian Church: where he takes the tithe of sons and daughters to giue them to Molue, forcing the to leaue the truth: where he hath ouerthrowen al libertie, to plant his absolute Tyranny, banished all learning & euery thing that may F put man in minde that he is a man, what may wee say in comparing our selues with them? are wee better then so many that haue lyued in those desolate places, making profession of the same Christian religion, and the same hope of eternall life? Are our Prouinces

A Prouinces more stronger, fertill and richer then theirs, & our Townes stronger and better peopled? O Christians, if he be wise that takes warning by an other, how well should these examples serue vs? The same way which the capitall enemy of the Church hath made to Mahomet to inuest him in the Empire of the East, is it not open by our common dissensions? A miserable date: the end of the warres betwixt France and England was the confirmation of the Ottomans at Constantinople, and the beginning of many miseries to many nations, as wee shall see in the following raignes.

1454. An excellent aduertisement to all Christians.

But as misery is good for something, may rather as the prouidence of God is admirable, who can drawe light from darknesse: by the ruines of the Easterne Churches, those of the West haue bene enriched. The ignorance of all learning was very great throughout all the Westerne Prouinces, since the rule of the Gothes. The knowledge of learning and sciences being banished out of the East by the Turke, came into the West, so as by a singular miracle, the West is now become East, this goodly Lampe hauing lightned the Prouinces to be a herbinge to the gospell. But this planting of the Muses is due to the raigne of Francis the 1. as well King of the Muses as of the Frenche. The shipwarke of Constantinople did cast these great personages into Italie, the which haue giuen a beginning of solide and perfect knowledge to our nations, Emanuel Chrysoloras an Athenien, George Trapezondæ or of Trebizonde: Theodorus Gaza a Macedonien, Ierosme Spartiate, Gregorie Tiphernas, Iohn Argypole C of Constantinople, Laonicus Charcondil an Athenien, Marcus Musurus a Candiot, and Iohn Lascaris. These haue begun, but our men haue so followed, as they haue surmounted them in the knowledge of those goodly professions.

Learned men came into Europe.

Almost about the same time the arte of Printing had his beginning. Some attribute it to the yeare 1440. to Iohn Guttemberg borne at Strausbourg, others to Iohn Fausse at Mayence, in the yeare 1452. Doubtlesse it is an excellent inuention D to increase knowledge, although the vanity and malice of men makes it often times their baude, to the preiudice of the truth and all good manners. But hauing wandered ouer so many strange Countries; Let vs returne to France, from whence hauing expelled the English and restored this Monarchie to her auncient beautie, by the meanes of our Charles, wee must now see the last act of his raigne and life.

From the yeare 1454.

E His last act of the life of Charles, conteyns a notable president of the vanity of this world. Charles had passed a languishing youth, borne in the weakenesse of his father, and bred vp in the cruelties of his mother: he began his life with pouerty, the which was continued in the despaire of his affaires, and yet he purchased peace to his realme; but now he cannot inioy it, banding against his owne bloud, & luying in so wilfull a waywardnesse, as in the end he brought himselfe vnto the graue after a terrible and tragick manner. The whole Realme being in quiet after a long and tedious warre, behold a newe storme ariseth in the Kings house. Lewis the eldest sonne of Charles and Dauphin of Piennois, was not well satisfied with his father, and his father lesse with him. The occasions are rather probable then true, as they are obserued by writers. Forto what ende should Lewis bee so discontented with his father, for that hee was giuen to the loue of Ladies? It is more likely that the solemnities to iustifie the condemnation. To conclude, according to the forme let downe in this processe; John Duke of Alanson was found guiltie of high treason, prac tising to bring the English into the realme, the ancient enemy of this Crowne: witnes ses are produced, Letters auerred, and the confession of the accused: what more? Sen tence was iudicially giuen, that he should loose his head, and forfeit all his goods, ali be ing at the Kings goods pleasure: the which neither President nor Councillor durst con tradict: yet Charles giues him his life, condemning him to perpetuall prison, and his goods to his wife and children, where he continued but two yeares, for Lewis being King, he freed him from prison, and restored him to his dignitie.

Passion makes Princes pri soners.

It is a hard law, when force is ioyned to a Kings command. How soeuer it were, the cleere sighted did iudge, that the Kings ieaousie was the true cause of the condemna tion of this poore Prince, who had alwayes serued the King faithfully, and the King had loued him aboute all the Princes of his blood, honouring him so much as to make him his gossip, carrying his eldest Sonne Lewis to the Font. This his familiaritie with his Godson, and the credit the Daulphin gaue vnto his counsels, was held to be a dangerous testimonie against him. Were it then iustly or vniustly that this Prince was thus intrea ted; who seeth not heere a great prooffe of the inconstancie of this world, of great friends they become capitall enemies: neither blood, nor the gages of loue in so holy a thing as the badge of our Christianitie, can subdue the violence of passion, the which C hath no restraint: yea euen that which should be of most force to vnite loue, hath most power to breed and increase ieaousies. A notable president in two so great persona ges, Passion makes these two great Princes prisoners, borne of one blood; the one a King, the other capable of a kingdome. The one is prisoner at Loches with his gard, the other at Vendosme or at Tours, in the greatnesse of his Court. This is the difference, the one endures paine forceably, the other voluntarily. But he that commits a sinne, is hee not a slaue to sinne?

Charles his waywardnes.

After this condemnation Charles seemed alwaies grieued both in minde and coun tenance, the ieaousie which he thought to quench, in suppressing him whom he suspect ed, so increased, as in the end it was the cause of his death. He turniued little about two yeares after this Tragedie, the which happened the 10. of October, in the yeare 1458. and the King dyed the 22. of Iuly, in the yeare 61. which time was vnto him a languishing prison, or rather a pining death. Doublelesse he that serues God doth rage, and he that serues vice is but a slaue: the Crownes and Scepters of Kings haue no ex ception in this. The quiet of a good conscience is true libertie. And who can haue a good conscience, but in doing well? How farre better and more honourable had it beene for Charles, to haue beene beloued and respected by his sonne Lewis, who being growne great, and hauing giuen many testimonies of his iudgement and valour, might well haue eased him in his greatest affaires, as Robert did Hugh Capet, being associate in the same raigne: to be honoured and serued by the Princes of his blood, especially of this his trustie friend, who had giuen him so many prooffes of his loyalty in his greatest affaires, and receiued likewise from him such firme gages of his loue, and to scape the fruits of this so much desired peace with his subiects, the which he had not had for all his subiects. But if he afflicts others, he hath a good share himselfe. He makes his Sonne to flie, and to beg his bread in a strange countrey: he causeth a poore Prince of his blood to languish in prison: and he himselfe feelles in his soule a continuall torment of griefe, a fier of choller, and a torture of ieaousie, trusting no man, but liuing in con tinuall feare, and was this man at rest? A strange torment, he hath brought peace to all men, and cannot inioy it himselfe, he hath bread and cannot eate it.

His loues.

But what read I in the Originall of the manners of our Charles? This King Charles (saith Monstrelet) after his reconilement with Philip Duke of Bourgoingne, was of a good life and deuoute, but when he had recovered his realme, he changed his manners, and polluted his life, in maintaining dishonest women in his Court, leauing the companie of a good and lawfull wife,

A wife, suffering more honour and reuerence to be done to those women, by the greatest of his Court, then to the Queene: they being more richly attired then the Queene herselfe, the which was an ill president in such a person: yet he gouerned his realme very nobly and wisely, & was indued with goodly vertues, maintaining iustice throughout his whole realme. Monstrelet and the historie of S. Denis, excuse the loue of faire Agnes, and here they accuse Charles.
My dutie is to coate euey part faithfully in this my Inuentorie, in the which there is nothing of mine owne but the bare report, whereby it appeares, that vertues are mixt with vices: and that it is more easie to beare aduersitie then prosperitie. Let the exam ple of David be confronted with this: Wine causeth drunkennesse, and water tem pers. Sometimes age is more weake and imperfect then youth, to the end the whole ho nour of any good that is in man, may be ascribed to God, who is the Author thereof.
B Joy and griefe, ieaousie and loue, be they not contrary affections? and yet behold they are both in one subiect, distracting him diuersly. Inconstant nature of man, who is a slaue to sinne, by the meanes of sinne, which receives the motions of diuers windes, from North, South, East and West, both soure and sweete.

It will be now time after all this, to shew the end of our Charles: but we may not o mit some notable things which chanced in this season, during the ebbing and flowing of these feuen variable yeares. Lewis the Daulphin was resident at Geneppe in Brabant, and married with the daughter of Sauoy, by whom he had a sonne. The Duke of Sauoy with his wife (who was daughter to the King of Cypres) came to visit Charles, and to C pacifie him, with hope that he should soone see his sonne, with this new gage of loue, but all this did but ease and not cure Charles his infirmite. We haue said before, that Henry the sixt King of England, was put in prison by the Duke of Yorke, who pretended the Crowne to appertaine vnto him by a iuster title then vnto Henry. He makes an ac cord with the Duke of Yorke, to free himselfe from this captiuitie, That Henry should inioy the Crowne during his life, but after his decease it should come to the Duke of Yorke, and to his heires after him: and so the Prince of Wales, sonne to King Henry, should be excluded from the succession of England. By this accord Henry was released, but Toland his wife (daughter to King Rent of Sicile) shewes her selfe more resolute then her husband, who (hauing provided for her affaires) disauowes this accord, as D prejudiciall to her sonne, and against the lawes, which allow of no forced contract made by a prisoner: and so she armes to maintaine her sonne the lawfull heire of the Crowne. The Duke of Yorke likewise leuies an army to frustrate the Queenes deffines.
At that time the Queene did winne both the victorie, and the heads of the Duke of Yorke, of his second sonne, and of the Earle of Salisbury his chiefe partisan, whom she tooke prisoners in the battaile, and caused to be beheaded, but she shall haue her turne.

Troubles in England.

In the meane time these troubles ministred an occasion vnto Charles to attempt against the English: although (transported with these home-bred discontents) he had a troublesome enemy within himselfe, without seeking one beyond the seas. This was done by the counsell and aduice of the Constable of Richmont, who fearing the Kings humour, and loth to deale in these discontents, laboured to diuert him: giuing him a better subiect to exercise his spirit. It was also happy for the Constable, that he was to re off, being likely that ieaousie would haue brought him first in question, whom Charles loued nor much, for the crosses he had receiued by him in the beginning. The cause which had drawne Richmont from Court, was honourable for him: for by the death of Peter Duke of Brittanie his Nephew, he was called to the Duchie. Being Duke he would not leaue the office of Constable, notwithstanding all the intreaties of his subiects, being desirous to honour that charge in his age, the which had honoured him in his youth: although he inioyed the Dukedome but three yeares, dying with the good opinion of all France, hauing assisted it much both with his counsell and valour.

I This aduise to attempt against England, giuen by the Constable, was executed by the Normans, vnder the command of Peter of Brezeay, Seneschall of Normandie, accompa nied with a good number of the Nobilitie of Normandie, and foure thousand fighting men: these might do some great exploit in a countrey diuided and troubled: but God bath appointed the limits of Kingdomes; and that great ditch of the sea is sufficient to distinguish these two Monarchies, who haue inough to content them without attempting against their neighbour. To conclude, this armie lands in England, and takes Antwerp, the which they presently spoile & leaue, and so returne to Honnesteu, from whence they imbarked, carrying away store of prisoners and spoile. Their speedie returne was chieftie to saue their liues and goods, which had beene in great danger, if they had engaged themselves farther, for any rich spoile.

A strange death in the midst of roy.

Charles was intreated by Ladislaus King of Hongarie, (sonne to that great Iohn Huniades, one of the strongest Champions against the Turke) to graunt him Magdick in his daughter to wife, the which he did. As he prepared for this voyage, and a stately traine for his daughter, which might equall or surmount the Ambassage sent from Ladislaus, newes comes of the death of Ladislaus, (a young man of twenty yeares of age, and of a generous hope) who was poisoned at Prague: Whose death was the cause of many miseries, as we shall hereafter shew. Their ioy in France was changed to mourning, and the wedding to a funerall, to the great griefe of Charles. But to put him in minde of necessary causes, amidst these voluntarie afflictions, It chanced that the mother of Isabe the Virgin (to purge the blot of infamie in the death of her daughter, being condemned as a Sorceresse by the Bishop of Beauuais, to please the English) obtaines a reuocation of this sentence from the Pope, and Charles confirms it, causing it to be solemnlie published to the content of all Frenchmen, to whom the remembrance of this genetous spirit shall be for euer pleasing.

The tragick death of Charles.

In the meane time, this ielousie which was grauen in the heart of Charles, is fed by the dayly whisperings of his household flatterers. And now behold a strange accident: A Captaine (in whom he had great confidence) aspires him that they ment to poison him: he beleues it, and plants this apprehension so firmly in his heart, as he resolues neither to eate nor drinke, not knowing whom to trust. He continued obstinately for seauen dayes in this strange resolution, the which in the end brought him to his graue: for being obdurate in this humour (not to eate, notwithstanding all the perswasions of his Physicians and seruants,) the passages were so shrunk, as when he would haue eaten, it was then too late: and feeling his forces to decay, he provided for his last will, and dyed the 22. of Iuly at Meun vpon Yeure in Berry, in the yeare 1461. hauing liued 59. yeares, and reigned 39. leauing two sonnes, Lewis and Charles: the first shall raigee after his father, and the second shall be the cause of new troubles in France, but not such as haue raigned vnder our Charles the 7.

His disposition.

A Prince who hath as much aduanced the French Monarchie, as any King that euer commanded: for finding the realme ruined, he hath restored it: his Predecessors had planted the English in the bowels of the Estate, he expelled them, bringing in a gentle peace after an intestine warre of a hundred yeares. A friend to Iustice, good order and the people, resolute in great affaires, capable of counsell, wise, couragious, happy in the execution of good counsels, and happy in seruants that haue faithfully serued him to the end of the worke of restauration, wherevnto God had appointed him. But these great and heroike vertues were blemished by some vices, which were more visible in his prosperitie, then in his aduersitie: for affliction restrained him, but his happy successe pufft him vp, and gaue scope to his humours, making him suspicious and amorous, to the preiudice of his affaires, and dishonour of his person. On the one side, vngoverned liue to stragewomen, making him to forget the lawfull loue of his wife, and to loose both time and iudgment, whereby he blemished his reputation, both with subjects and strangers. On the other side, presumption of his good successe, made him vnpleasing to his best seruants, yea euen to his owne blood: and this sroward humour causing him to discontent such as hee should haue trusted, fetled so with ill and pecuish a ielousie in his heart, as hauing troubled all his house, in the end it brought him to his graue, after a most fearefull and tragicke manner, leauing in his vertues, an example to bee followed, and in his vices to bee auoided, with a visible prooffe in his happy successe, That God vseth the weake instruments, to the end

And that he might be knowne the Author of the good worke they haue in hand, that his grace seeming strong in their weaknesse, the homage and honour of all good might be giuen to him: for whosoeuer glories, let him glory in the Lord.

Charles had no sooner closed his eyes, but Poasts fle to Geneppe in Brabant vnto Lewis, to aduertise him of his death. The originall notes it for exceeding speed, that through the diligence of Charles of Aniou, father in law to Charles, Lewis was aduertised of the death of his father, the very same day he dyed. This Poast was speedy, yet slowe in regarde of the desire Lewis had to returne into France, and to take possession of this goodly Crowne, which attended him.

Lewis the eleuenth, the 55. King of France.

As it not then likely, that this so happy a Catastrophe of the latter raigee of Charles, should haue purchased Lewis as happy and peacefull a Crowne, as his fathers had beene painfull and full of crosses? But the heires of worldly possessions (which we call the goods of Fortune, and of the body) doe not alwayes inherit the same humors and complexions of their Predecessors. Charles was of a courteous disposition, affable, a friend to Iustice, and capable of counsel: he leaues Lewis his eldest sonne, a Prince in truth humble in words and shew, wise in aduersitie, painfull, a free entertainer of men of merit, curious to know all men, of a good capacity, perfect in iudgement, and very continent. But these vertues were blemished with many vices: ill tongue, revengefull, cruell, full of fraud, dissembling, distrustfull, variable, a friend to base people, and an enemy to great persons, yet willing to repaire the wrongs he had done to many. But Lewis impute this alteration to the multitude of his forraigne & homebred foes, who had greatly altered the good seeds which nature had planted in him. That which plunged him in a labyrinth of troubles & afflictions during all the course of his life, was that A at his first comming to the Crowne, he discountenanced most of the Princes & Noblemen, whom Charles had fauoured, preferring meane men to their places, changed (in a manner) all the ancient officers of the crowne, & cashiered & discharged the old companies of men at armes, whereby such as hated him, did take him as an enemy to al valour & vertue. Lewis the Dauphin at the age of eleuen yeares, was rashly engaged by some His wisest Noblemen & others of the realme, in the war called the Praguery, against Charles his father, who speedily suppressed it by his resolution, as we haue seene. Being come to the age of man, he married with Marguerit daughter to the King of Scots: and as hee fell rashly in loue, so he reaped nothing but repentance. After her death (not able to beare the vnpleasing waywardnes of his father) he retires into Dauphiné, and takes to his second wife Charlotte, daughter to the Duke of Sauoy, by who he had Joachim, who dyed young, Anne married to Peter of Bourbon, Joane the wife of Lewis Duke of Orleans, & after King of France, the 12. of that name, Charles his successor, and Francis who died like wife in his infancy. In the end Charles going to suppress the practises of his sonne in Dauphiné, and the neighbour Prouinces, Lewis abandons the country, and retires to Philip Duke of Bourgogne, at whose charge he was entertained six yeares.

Charles being deceased, Philip of Bourgogne (to perfect this good office of hospitality to Lewis) accompanied with Charles Earle of Charolois his sonne, James of Bourgon-gne Earle of Estampes, Adolfe Duke of Cleues, the Lord of Raueslin his brother, nephewes to the said Philip, the Earles of Nassau and S. Pol, and with many other Noblemen of the C lowe countries, conducted him into France, with foure thousand horse well appointed, chosen among a hundred thousand fighting men, the which Philip had leauied vpon a brute that some Noblemen of the country would aduance Charles the younger brother of Lewis to the Crowne. John Duke of Bourbon (the Duke of Orleans as well for his old age, as for that he mourned for King Charles deceased, came not from Paris) Peter and James of Bourbon brethren, the Earles of Armaignac, Eufendosme, Dunois, Grâpé, Philip of Sauoy, with the greatest part of the Princes, Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, go to meete him, and conduct him to Rheims, where he is solemnly annointed & crowned by John Tuennall of Visis Archibishop of that place, assisted by the Cardinal of Sanctae, the Patriarke of Antioch, the Popes Legat, 4. Archbishops, 17. Bishops & D 6. Abots, the 15. of August 1461. being about 38. yeares of age. Two daies after Philip did him homage for his Duchy of Bourgogne, as Peere, and Deane of the Peeres of France: for the Earledom of Flanders as a peere of France: and for the county of Artois
& all other lands he held of the crowne. The made he a sumptuous & stately entry into Paris, with very ioyfull acclamations of the people, as you may see at large in the Originals. After many sports, tourneies & publike feasts, Philip taking leaue of the King, exhorts him to lay aside all hatred and spleene conceiued against some of his fathers ancient seruants, from whom he should draw as many good seruices, as they had giue testimonies of their loialties to their lawfull Master: to liue in loue and vnity with his brother Charles, and to aduance him according to the degree he held within the realme. L E
Lewis was no sooner installed, but the Inhabitants of Rheims minister an occasiō to imploy the first fruits of his forces. About S. Remy the collectors of imposts were slaine & their contracts burnt in open street. The King sends thither many souldiers disguised like marchants & laboreis, who entering secretly, & at diuers gates, become the strōger and are presently followed by some troupes led by the Lord of Mouy, who seize vpon the towne, takes 80. or a 100. of the most culpable, puts the to death & suppresseth the mutinie. About the end of the yeare Lewis made a progresse into Touraine, where the Earle of Charolois coming to the pilgrimage of S. Claude, did visit him, & the King (in regard of the kindnes he had receiued frō Philip) giues him the gouernment of Normandy, with 36000. franks yearly pensiō: for the nonpaiment wherof there wil soone grow great dissentiōs & ciuill wars. In sooth the words of a prince shold be held for Oracles, neither shold he be lesse iudicious, then constant in his promises. The Duke of Alençon was set at liberty, who Charles the 7. had restrained. But oh the vanity of man, we shall

A him hereafter a prisoner, & condemned vnder his authoritie, who now giues him both 1462 life and libertie. Then the King gaue to his brother the Dukedome of Berry for his portion, and assigned the Queene his Mothers dowrie (who shall not long enioy it, but dies in the year 1463.) in the Countie of Xaintonge, with the towne and gouernment of Rochell, Chinon, Pezenas, and other places. Then he went in pilgrimage to S. Sauuour of Re-don in Brittanie, where the Duke did homage for this said Duchie, the Countie of Mon-fort, and other places, he held of the Crowne. But deuotion did not so much draw Lewis into Brittanie, as a desire to discover the Dukes affection, his country, and his forces, whom he held in ieaousie, the which shall easily draw the Duke into the vnion of malcontents, as we shall soone see; which will fall out happily for him, to disappoint the King of the prey he haunted after in Brittanie.

Lewis in the meane time, carelesse of Philips aduise, not able well to endure the sight of his fathers spies (whom he accused as the motives of his disgrace) changeth the gouernours of Prouinces, and most of the Officers both for Iustice and warre: he placeth new being chosen out of those that had beene companions of his fortune, the which (to agrauate) they called a banishment, imputing it to them that were displaced. More-ouer, he prohibited all Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen, the sport of Hawking and Hunting, vnder great and odious punishments, no further then he should permit: a second fire-brand of the following combustions. Now the King of Arragon (seeking to reduce his rebellious subiects to their duties by force) ingageth the Coun-tie of Roussillon to Lewis, for three hundred thousand Crownes, whereof he receiued fiftie thousand presently, being followed with a goodly and mighty armie, to succour the said King, vnder the command of James of Armaignac Duke of Nemours. Henry King of Castill, complains by his Ambassadors of these succours giuen to his aduer-sarie, which was a breach of the League betwixt France and Castill. The King (as well to end this quarrell, as that which Blande, the onely daughter and heire of the King of Na-uarre, wife to the said King of Arragon, had with the King of Castill, by reason of some places in Navarre) he goes to Bordeaux, and there concludes the mariage of Magdaleine of France his sister, with Gaston the eldest sonne to the Earle of Foix, and presumptiue heire of Navarre, who lay hurt at Libourne with a Lance at a Tourney, whereof he D dyed, leauing a sonne and a daughter: Francis Phabus his succellour, who reigned but one yeare; and Katherine who succeeded him, and was married to John of Albret: then he goes to Bayonne, where the King of Castill comes vnto him, and ends all controuer-sies. A dangerous and fatall enteruiue: for these two great Princes, the most strictly allied of all Christendom, of ancient from King to King, from realme to realme, and man to man, bound by great curses to maintaine this necessarie league, the which neuer yet had any breach, and they now conceiued a contempt & disdain one of another. The Trench of the Castillians sumptuousnesse and pride, in their words, countenance & apparell: the Castillians of the plainnesse of the French attire, for Lewis had short garments, & of bad stoffe, the which the Spanish nation did impute to miserableness, wherewith he E was neuer blemished. So as from that day, these Kings did neuer loue; but both nations conceiued such a mutuall hatred one against another, as they haue left it hereditarie to their posteritie: and we haue felt the bitterness of this old leuaine in our late and more then vnciuill tumult. So perillous shall the enteruiue be of our Lewis, with Charles of Bourgogne (who shall hereafter come often in place) at Peronne, as we shall see.

Lewis being returned to Paris, as by the purchase of Roussillon he had fortified his realme towards Spaine: so desired he to assure it on the other side, redeeming the townes lying vpon Somme, the which had beene engaged by the treatie of Arras, to Philip Duke of Bourgogne, for foure hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, with this condition, that the King should maintaine all the officers aduanced by the Duke in the said T Townes: a promise without performance: for after the oath taken to serue him against all persons, at the first he tooke away the Captainship of Amiens, of Arras, & of Dourlens from Sauaise: that of Mortaigne from Haut-bourdin a bastard of Bourgogne: and the Baillwike of Amiens from the Lord of Creuaceur (whose lands he did confiscate soone after,

1463. after) aduancing to these offices Launoy the Nephew of Croy, whereby he did greatly A discontent the Duke, and the Earle of Charolois his sonne more, who in despite of the said redemption, did afterwards chase away the Lord of Croy, with his whole family, and confiscate their goods, they beeing the meanes thereof. Beeing retyred in to France, Lewis gaue him the county of Gwynes, with the office of Lord Steward of his house. A discontent which shall hasten the Charolois to arme against our France. Moreouer Lewis, to tye the Pope vnto him, (by the meanes of Iohn Balue Bishop of Arras, (who since was made Cardinall, in recompence of so good a seruice done to the court of Rome) sends Godfrie Bishop of Albi Cardinall of Abbeville vnto him, to renounce all rights of the pragmaticall sanction. So doing, the Pope promised to send a Legat into France, that should giue all benefices: to the ende that all the money which should be raised thereby might remaine within the Realme, and be no more transported to Rome. But the Pope beeing seized vpon the charter of the said Sanction, made no accompt to performe his promise: and to please the Romans, he caused it to be dragged through the streetes. So as Lewis being thus deceiued, did forbid to carry any more money to Rome, nor to bring any Bulls from thence. He made Sforce Duke of Milan his vassall, giuing him Sauonne which the French held, (a heauy motiue of lamentable warres, which followed) and receiued his homage. But whilest he labours to purchase friends abroad, he procures himselfe insensiblie mighty enemies at home. The princes and Noblemen to whom the first places in court, and offices of the crowne did appertaine, seeing themselves with great indignity supplanted by these mustromes growne vp in one night, & put from the Kings fauour: they found one another, both by mouth, writings, and by diuers messengers: being assured of their mutuall loues, they open their mindes, discover their conceptions and conclude, To defend and maintaine their dignities. For (say they) to what end do we suffer the indignities and braueries of these new vpstarts? we should shew want of couragenot to apprehend the wrong the King doth vs. Wee haue armes, men, friends & money to force him to reason, seeing we are debarrd his prefere by these base people that possesse him. The cheefe were Charles Duke of Berry the kings brother, Iohn Duke of Bourbon who had married Charlotte the kings sister, Francis duke of Brittaine, Iohn Earle of Dunois, bastard brother to Lewis Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Nemours, the Earle of Armaignat, and the Lord of Albret. The Duke of Berry was easily D drawne into this league, discontented to haue no better portion then Berry. The Duke of Bourbon had not yet receiued his marriage money. The Britton could not digest foure hard conditiōs, the which Lewis, (hauing an army ready in case he refused) required of him: That he should no more intitle himselfe, By the grace of God Duke of Brittaine, That he should coyne no more money without his permission, That from thenceforth the King should leaue taxes and subsidies in Brittaine, and not the Duke. And that all that were beneficed within the Dukedome, should acknowledge him immediately for Patron & foueraigne. Priuileges which till then had bin alwayes expressly referued to all the Dukes his predecessors, in the homages they did to the crowne. The Earle of Dunois had alwaies bin of the chiefe of the army & Lieutenant generall to Charles the 7. and now is deprived of all his offices and dignities by Lewis his sonne. So euery one pretended diuers causes of complaint.

The League of the common weale.

The chiefe of the league.

Charles of Berry must carry the bable, a young Prince & credulous, an age which doth easily make men bold & rash: for they would vse him as the reuenging instrument of their passions. But it is the means to draw him from Court without ialousie: Behold an occasion is offered. After that Lewis had visited the Townes of Picardy lately redeemed, hauing crossed Normandie and Touraine, he passeth to Poitiers, leading Charles his brother with him. Lewis is going one day to his deuotion, Iohn of Rommillé & Tannequy of Chastel (Nephew to that Tannequy that was charged for the death of the Duke of Bourgongne) agents for the Britton in this action, vnder colour to carry Charles Duke of Berry to the hunting, they lead him into Brittaine. Tannequy was discontented, for that hauing disbursed fifty thousand franckes at the funeralls of Charles the 7. in the absence of Lewis, he had neither recompence, nor any thankes of the king, and was not satisfied for the space of ten yeares.

There

There remayned nothing but to be assured of Philip Duke of Bourgongne, who euen 1464. then had great cause of discontent: for during the partialities of England; betwixt the houses of Lancaster and York, Lewis supported Henry against Edward, (he being of Lancaster and this of York) for that Henry had married the daughter of René King of Sicile, and by consequence was neere kinsman to Lewis. In fauour therfore of this Queene, he makes a proclamation in the territories of the Duke of Bourgongne, forbidding them to aide or assist Edward, terming himselfe King of England. And for a greater disgrace, King Lewis would impose a custome vpon the Salt in the Duchie of Bourgongne.

The Bourguignon opposeth: he protests that Edward King of England is his allie, and B that he could not deny him succors being required. As for the custome he shewes forth the ancient priuileges of Bourgongne, and intreats the King to forbear in the execution of this charge. Behold a sharpe touch, which might easily open the Dukes eares, to harken to these malcontents: yet would he not enter; but suffers the Earle his sonne to vse all his meanes for this effect, beeing discontented for the gouernment of Normandie taken from him, and his pension not payed, for the redeeming the Townes vpon Somme, and the aduancement of Croy in France. And although the passing and re-passing of the Agents and factors of these Princes were very secretly performed by men disguised like religious men, pilgrims & beggars, yet could they not worke so secretly, but the King had intelligence, that the Britton had sent to practise the loue and association of the King of England, & that by Iohn of Rommillé, vice-chancellor of Brittanie, he had made a strict allyance with the Earle of Charolois, a violent & valiant Prince. Thus the King sends the bastard of Rubempré, a sea Captaine, to surprise such as he should finde passing out of Brittanie into England, or from the Bourguignon to the Britton. This bastard lands at la Haye in Holland, hee enters the Towne (with three in his company) where then the Earle was resident. Being examined of his quality, and of the cause of his landing, he makes some difficultie to discouer himselfe. He is put in prison, as a pirate, sent (saied they) by Lewis to surprise the Earle treacherously, and so to preuaile more easily with the Duke his father. This brute was disperfed through the Countrie, and made the King odious. At the first report of these newes, Philip being at Hedin, D dislodgeth, without taking his leaue, although he had promised not to depart without speaking againe to the King.

Lewis (aduertised of the bastards detention), sends the Earle of Eu, the Chancellor Morulliers, and the Archbishop of Narbonne, to Philip beeing at Lisle: they accuse his son of treachery and infidelitie, for that he had made a League with the Duke of Brittanie, a friend and confederate with the Englishe. he complains of the restraint of Rubempré his seruant: and demands amends for words blowen & giuen out against the Kings honour: that the prisoner should be enlarged, and for expiation of the crime, that the authors of this slander should be deliuered into the Kings hands (especiallie Oliuer de la Marche, one of the chiefe in the Dukes Court) to bee exemplarily punished. The E Chancellor who deliuered the speech, being but a blunt man, made it as bitter as he could, and omitted nothing that might make the fact odious and criminall (for the which he shall in time and place, bee disauowed by the King and loose his office) adding moreouer that he could not conceyue the cause of the Earles discontent, if it were not for the pension and gouernment which the King had giuen him, and since taken away.

Philip answers, that Rubempré being charged with many crimes, was iustly taken, and in a Countrie where Lewis had no right. If the informations did acquit him, he would send him to the King. That la Marche was of the Countie, & therfore the King not to be his copetent Iudge: yet if he had done or sayed any thing against the honor of his maiestie, he would punish him to his liking. Morullier insists, vrging that Philip should not deny the King, and that he should command his sonne, not to entertaine any bad conceite of his Maiestie, nor beleue the scanders imposed vpon Rubempré.

The Duke replies: That till then hee had neuer denyed the King anie thing: and Ambassadors from Lewis to Philip.

Philip answers to the Ambassadors.

1465. contrariwise the King had failed of his promise, in that contrary to their transaction he had fortified the Townes redeemed, with great garrisons, the which he should haue inioyed during his life; taking an oathe of the Nobility, to carrie armes indifferently against all he should command. That if his sonne were ielous and distrustfull, heeooke it of his mother, who had often suspected him to go to other Ladies: & not from him, who suspected no man.

The Earle of Charolois toucht with the Chancellers speech, would haue taken the defence of his honor and the Duke of Brittaines. but Philip fearing least choller should transport him beyond reason, commands him to prepare for the next day. The night brings Counsel. The Earle hauing considered well of his plea, answers very respectfully: yet he maintaynes, that the proces of Rubempre would shew, that his imprisonment was both iust and duly made. That hee had made an allyance and strict league with the Duke of Brittain, being brothers in armes, but their association did nothing preiudice the Kings seruice, nor the good of his realme: but rather their common forces should be alwayes ready for the preservation of his crowne and the publicke good. As for the losse of his gouernment and pension, (whereof he had neuer receyued but one quarter) hee was nothing displeased: that as for any welth and honours, the fauour of the Duke his Lord and father did suffice him.

Thus the Ambassadors returne nothing to Lewis, but threats from the Earle: who charged the Archebishop of Narbonne particularly with this speech. That within one yeare he would make the King repent the iniurious words he had caused his Chancel-ler to giue him, in the presence of the Duke his father. And hauing speedily assembled a great armie out of Artois, Hennault, Boullen, Flanders, Holland and Brabant, consisting of foure thousand men at armes, and eight or ninthousand archers, vnder the en- seignes of Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Paul, and afterwards Constable of France, the Lord of Raueslin brother to the Duke of Cleues, Anthony bastard of Bour-gongne, Haut-bourdin bastard brother to the Earle of Saint Pol, Contai and Lalun va- liant and wise knights, with many other Noblemen and gentlemen, and great store of artillery and carriages: hee enters into Picardie as Lieutenant generall to the Duke of Perry, taking armes to releue (sayes he) the people furcharged with taxes and sub- sidies, and to recouer their ancient freedoms and liberties; to restore the Nobilitie D to their honors and ancient dignities, and to giue vnto the Clergie their rights and pre- heminences. In truth these were goodly shewes, able to perswade the credulous, and to supplant the affections of the simple.

For the first fruits of his forces, he takes Nesle, a little Castell neere vnto Noyon, in the which there was a garrison of Roie, Montdidier, Beaulieu and Pont Saint Maxence; then ha- uing passed the riuers of Somme & Oise, he comes with little spoile of the Country, to S. Denis, where all the confederats should meete, but they failed of their appointment. Hauing presented himselfe before Paris, and skirmished at the gates with some losse to the Inhabitants, supported onely by the companies of men at armes of Charles of Me- lun Baylife of Sens, of the Marshall Joachim Rouault, and the Lord of Nantouillet, after- wards great Master: he seized vpon Saint Cloud, where his army passed the Saine, to drawe towards Esiampes, and to ioyne with his confederats, whome the Kings army stayed in their march. In the meane time the Duke of Bourbon seizeth vpon the Kings reuenues and treasure, & of the chiefe officers, from whom he might draw any money. Then did Anthony of Chabannes Earle of Dampmartin escape out of the Bastille at Pa- ris, whom Lewis held prisoner, for that he had made warre against him in Dauphine, by the command of Charles the 7. vntill he had provided such caution as he demanded for the performance of the condition for the which he had giuen him his life: That hee should passe the remainder of his life an Exile at Rhodes. Who going through Gajinois, rooke & spoiled the Castells of S. Forgeau & S. Maurice, and carried away the captaine F prisoner, Jeffroy the son of James Cœur: he seized vpon S. Pourcain, & being aduertised that the King sent to beseege him by the Faylifs of Sens, & Melun, he retyred himselfe to the Duke of Bourbon. This flight did sodenly drawe the King vpon Duke Lewis. The places

Bourbonais were in a maner all taken & assured: hauing intelligence that the Duke of 1465.
Nemours with the Earles of Albret & Armagnac did march, & that succors came to the Duke of Bourbon out of Bourgonne, leuied by the Earle of Beaune and the Cardinall of Bourbon brethren to the said Duke (the which were of more shew the profit) he willingly harkens to an accord with these Princes, wrought by his sister being wife to the Duke of Bourbon, that they should beare armes for the King, & labor to win their confederats vnto him. A couention ill obserued, by means whereof Lewis had caused the siege of Ri- onin Auvergne to be raised, the which was at their deuotiō: this done, he goes towards Angers, to trie if by mildenes & good meanes he might reclaine his brother being in Brittain. Not able to effect it, & hearing the Earle of Charolois approached with great ex- pedition to Paris, he leaues René King of Sicile and Duke of Anion, & Charles Earle of Maine his Vncles by the mother side vpon the frontiers of Brittain, to hinder these great forces from ioyning with the Bourguignons. And lest the Parisians (abused with this goodly shew of the comon weale) should receiue them, he being so far from them, he makes his Vncles to go forward, who dislodging alwayes before the Britton, did greatly annoy him for want of victualles, and hindred his march, and he himselfe posts to Or- leans with speed, and from thence to Chartres vnder Montlebery, with no intent to fight vntill he had visited Paris, and gathered a greater power. but necessitie forceth him vnto it. The Earle of Charolois hearing of the Kings approach, marcheth towards him, & goes forward with the Bastard of Bourbon: commanding the rereward, to ioyne with the Earle of Saint Pol, who led the foreward: and takes his place of battaile in the plaine of Montlebery, where they appeere at the breake of day the 27 of Iuly. Hauing discouered the Kings army led by the Lord of Breze great Seneschall of Normandie, hee com- mands all his archers and the greatest part of his men at armes to leaue their horses, and every man to plant a stake before him in the formost ranks, to withstand the furie of the horse: behind he compasseth himselfe in with his carriages, and on the flank he fortifies himselfe with a forest adioyning, hauing resolved to fight on foote in a place of aduantage for the foote, before that all Lewis his troupes were ioyned. Lewis had about two thousand two hundred well appointed Lances, besides the Nobility of Dauphine and some gentlemen of Sauoie and Bresse, a great number of Archers, and o- ther men of warre; but not equall to the Bourguignons. God, who disposeth of battailes, would now chastise our King, but not to his ruine.

The battaile
of Montlebery.

The Earle Charolois like a great commander in warre used a good stratagem, seeing the French army could not descend into the valley of Tourfau, but by small troupes: for while as the foreward appeered, they were not aboue 400. Lances, yet hee gaue respite to the re- ward, whilest the two armies spend the time in light skirmishes and Canonshots. Hauing past some foure houres, the Earle aduertised that the Parisians being sent for by the King might come and compass him in behind, he aduerteth first: our foreward doth likewise march, but he beats them backe vnto the village, and to (dislodge them from thence) hee fiers certaine houses, so as the winde carries the flame and smoake into our archers faces, who did likewise fight on foot: hee cometh then to abandon the place and to recouer their horses. The Bourguignons do dismount & gallop after our runn-awayes, but they had recouered a long & large ditch: which they found by chance in the field with a strong quickset hedge, behind the which they breathed whilest the enemy labored in the pursute: but issuing at cyther end a troop vpon the Bourgonngons, they charge them so resolutely, as they turne their backs, ouerthrowing their owne archers in the flight: some recouer their carriages, and some the foremost amongst others the Earle of S. Paul & his bretheren, the Lords of Raueslin, Haplaincourt, & Armities, & Inchi, Rabodenges, & many others. The nobility of Dau- phine, Sauoie & Bresse had the chiefe honor of this defeate. The archers thus broken, re- mained at the mercy of the French. But being pestred with the baggage, some Bourguig- nons rallied together, turne their carts, compass them in, & beat them downe with great battles of lead. And to increase the losse, Charolois fighting on the right hand towards the Castell, had an easie victory ouer our men, chasing the backe aboue a thousand paces. But hauing intelligence that they were ioyned againe, & that if he passed but two arrow shoots

1465. shoots farther he should be taken, he returned soderly, & scincounters an amazed troupe A of footemen flying in the village. He chargeth them, but no man turnes head, saving one lie one soldier who strooke him on the brest with a borespeare, but the foote man lost his life with some fewe others who could not in time recouer the gradens & orchards. As he passed against the Castell, he met by chance with a troupe of men at armes, which saved them selves from the route at the cariages: one of them in the charge gives him a dangerous wound in the throat with his sword, by reason of his beaver that was fallen. Jefferie of Saint Belain, called la Hire, Baylife of Chaumont, and Gilbert of Grassy knewe him, they presse him to yeeld and not to be slaine: but behold the sonne of a Physician of Paris, called John Cadet, the historie in truth owes his name for so worthy an act, being big and mighty of body, mounted on a horse of the same proportion, B rushes through them, & diuides them that held him. Then happilie arriues the bastard of Bourgongne, and the Earles garde, by means whereof the French retire themselves to their ditch, where they had beene in the morning. During the which, a false brute of the Kings death had almost ouerthrowne all, for euery one began to faint. The Earle of Maine, the Admirall of Montauban, and the Lord of Borde embracing this common beleefe, fle with al the reward. Lewis aduertised of this amazement, takes off his helmet, shewes him selfe to his soldiars, and so assures them that he is aliue. On the other side, the Bourguignon rallies his men disperfed and wearied, readie to fle if they had bin charged. At the same instant the Count Saint Paul, goes to the field and gathers together vnder his enseigne about eight hundred men at armes, and but fewe foote. C

Charles of Bourgongne taken and released.

A famous bataille for running away.

Charles Earle of Charolais muste of the place of Battaille.

The number the dead.

Success come to the Earle of Charolais.

Behold the two armies ranked one against an other, not like vnto tired men, but hauing vewed one another, and mutuallie discharged their Canon. The night approached, which ended the bataille: an incounter, where the notable flying on either side did wonderfully moderate the furie of the fight. The which being thus ended, the King was conducted by the Scottes to the Castell of Montlehery, hauing neither catenar nor dronke all that day, and then he retyres to Corbeil. The Earle keeps the field, poile the dead, and therefore holds himselfe a Conqueror. Amongest the Kings men were, knowne Jefferie of Saint Belain, the great Steward of Normandy, Captaine Flee, and Baylife of Eureux, with many gentlemen, to the number of foure hundred horse and but fewe of foote men. Our Bourguignons, the Lords of Lalain, Hames, Gagnie, Varenne, and almost all the Earles Archers: Haplainonurt, Aimeries, Inchy and many others, were taken flying, and brought prisoners to Paris: of footemen there were more slaine, then of the Kings part. A'l which were esteemed by some, at two thousand of both sides, others be'd the three thousand six hundred, but al assure constantly, that there were more Bourguignons then French, although Lewis lost more horsemen.

In truth, the firme resolution, the constant labour, the dangerous hazards manfully passed by the King, were sufficient motives to encourage his men to honor; and if he had beene well and courageously followed, notwithstanding his small number, and want of artillery, the Earle of Charolais soldiars had digged their graues at Montlehery. Three daies after the bataille, the Earle of Charolais being aduertised that his confederates approached, went to receiue them at Eslampes, The Dukes of Berry & Brittaine, the Earle of Dunois, and Dammartin, the Lords of Loheac Marshall of France, of Buel Chaumont and Charles of Amboise his sonne, all disgraced by Lewis, and put from their offices, although they had well serued the King his father. They brought with them (saith the historie) eight hundred good men at armes, most Brittains, who had newly left the companies, euery one pretending some discontent. Of Archers and other men of war resolute & wel appointed, six thousand on horsebacke, all of the Brittains charge, who (assured by some me at armes that fled vp o the Kings death, promifeth to himselfe much good in conceit, in case the Duke of Berry come to the Crowne. And if at that instant they would haue guen him credit, they should haue suppressed the Bourguignons, or at the least dismissed them, verifing, That there is small loyaltie, and lesse pity in men of warre.

On the other side, the Duke of Berry began to loath these broyles, for in open Council, (hauing hauing vewed seven or eight hundred hurte men wandering vp and downe the Towne, he said: how much more glad would I haue beene, if this warre had neuer begon, then to purchase my selfe riches and honor which the price of so much blood. A speech worthy of a milde Prince and not bloudie: but ill digested by the Bourguignon, supposing that Charles would easely make his peace vpon the least motion made by Lewis. And to assure him selfe as wel without as within the realme, he sends William of Cluni (afterwards Bishop of Poitiers, to Edward King of England, although he had alwayes supported the house of Lancaster, from whence he was issued by his mother, against that of Torke.

Hauing refreshed their troups they all dislodge from Eslampes, and take the way to Saint Mathurin of Laroham, and Moret in Castinois, and hauing an intents to passe the riuer of Scine, the Earle employes many coopers to make pipes, hauing brought great store of stufte for that purpose, whereon a bidge was made (for want of convenient boats) through the fauour of the Canon, which the Earle had planted in an Island in the midst of the riuer.

There ioynes with them John Duke of Calabria the onelic sonne of René King of Sicile, the Prince of Orange, Thibault of Neuf-chastel Marshall of Bourgongne, and Montagu his brother, the Marquis of Rotelin, the Lords of Argueil and Thoulongeon, with many others, leading nine hundred men at armes of the Duchie and Countie of Bourgongne, six score men at armes barded Italians commanded by Galeot and Campo-bisso, foure hundred German crosse-bowes sent by the Cont Palatin: and five hundred Suisses (the which were the first that came to our warres. A farall and lameurable alliance for the Bourguignon, as we shall see in his place) of other footemen very fewe.

All this great torrent of a hundred thousand men, inuiron Paris: they seize vpon S. Maur on the ditches Pont Charenton, Conslans, S. Denis, and other Places thereabouts, they tyre the inhabytants with contynuall skirmishes, euen at their gates: and shakes their affections by practises and deuises. The Duke of Berry writes to the Clergie, to the Court of Parlement, to the vniuersitie (which then was in great credit in Paris) and to the Bourgeses to euery one a part, shewing them that all these forces tend not but to the peoples ease and profit: and requires them to depute men of iudgement and learning to vnderstand more at large the causes of this their great assemblie.

Ten Deputies heare their complaints, being led by William Chartier Bishop of Paris, they report it to the Counsell of the Cittie, who answers: That the Cittie shalbe free for the Princes to enter into at their pleasure, they and theirs abstaining from violence and paying their expences. Surely this would haue beene a Conquest of the cittie of Paris. But the great Maister of Nantouillet, the Marshal Joachim, and other Capitaines take a vew of their forces, and by this meanes retayne the Parisiers who changing their minds, are fully confirmed by the arriual of John of Rohan Lord of Montauban Admirall of France, with great troups of men. O light and inconstant people, how easly is it to moue thy affections, and to make thee in an instant to applaud that partie which euen now thou diddest abhorre. But let vs leaue them in this good humour, and see what remedy the King had for these garboyles attending, the succors the Duke of Milan sent him.

Lewis being (after the battayle) retyred from Corbeil to Paris, flatters the peoples humours, treats popularly with them, erects a priuie Counsell, of six Counsellors of the Court, sixe Doctors of the Vniuersitie, and sixe Burgesies, to gouerne his affaires according to their aduice and direction: he leaues sixe hundred Lances in Paris, vnder the command of the bastard of Armaignac, Earle of Cominge, of Maister Gilles of Saint Simon Bayliffe of Senlis, la Barde, Craon, Charles of Mares, and Charles of Melan his Lieutenant in the said towne. Then he goes into Normandy, to assemblie al the Nobility and men of warre he could: from whence he sent the Earle of Eu to haue the Meane to pacifie a people that wauer.

Lewis his proceeding at Paris. Newe succors to both parties.

A Politick aduice.

A bridge of boats at Charenton.

The King hauing intelligence of the confederats trafficke with the Parisians, knowing that this people dorth easily change their affections with the successe: and foreseeing that this baite of the commonweale, would soone bewitch them, displeased also that the Bishop had without his knowledge treated of an accord, he hastens his returne, accompanied with the Earles of Maine and Ponthieure, and the forces of Normandie. And for the first fruits of loue to his subiects hee confirmed all the priuileges they enjoyed in his fathers life: he abolished all new impositions, and retayned none but the ancient and ordinary farmes of marchandise that is sold by great: then did hee punish, eyther with banishment or death, such as had yielded to the reception of the heads of the League into the Cittie. Hedoth sharply blame the Bishop, (and at the instigation of the Cardinall of Albi, who haue bene a dealer in his absence for his enemies with an inconstant and ill-advised people: and hauing provided for the surety of the Cittie, hee prepares to offend and defend. The Bourguignons likewise vse all force, great and daylie skirmishes with the Parisians, sometimes chasing and sometimes chased. And therevpon comes newe supplies to the Leaguers, the Dukes of Bourbon and Nemours, the Earle of Armaignac, and the Lord of Albret (notwithstanding the former treaty) with about six thousand men.

On the other side, the King receiued from Francis Sforze Duke of Milan, six hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, commanded by Caleas his eldest son, with this Counsell of State: That to diuide this company, hee should yeeld to all conditions, and only preferue his men. An aduice which Lewis shall cunningly put in practise speedily. These Milanois were employed in Bourbonois, vntill newes of the peace shall come. The Earle thus fortified, offers battaile, but the King would not hazard any thing, desiring to disperse this misse cloud without effusion of blood. And to annoyne them of Conflans & Charenton, he sends foure thousand frank-archers, & about foure hundred pioneers, supported by the Nobility of Normandie, and some at armes, who plant themselves vpon riuers side right against Conflans, at the English port, where they make a large and a long trench vnto the Cittie, with a bulwark of wood and earth, whereon they plant many peeces of artillery, the which at the first driues the Duke of Calabria out of Charenton, with great losse of his men, and an extreame terror to the Earle of Charolois, who lodged at Conflans in a house belonging to his Father. Two Cannon shor passed through his Camber being at dinner, and slewe his trompetor, carrying a dish to his table. This amazement makes him go downe with speed: he fortifies his lodging, pierceth the walles, and plants a Cannon for a counterbatterie.

But they must dislodge these frank-archers, & preuent the losse they receyued from the other side of the water. For the effecting of this, he obtaines a truce for two dayes, in which time he made a bridge of boats. The bridge almost finished, the frank-archers leaue their trenches, carrie away their artillery, and retire to the suburbs into the Carthusians cloister. A part of the Bourguignons army passeth the water: they enter the suburbs of Saint Marceau, and skirmish, but with little losse on cyther side. Herevpon our Captaines resolute to assaile the enemy in diuers parts. A page sent by night, giues them intelligence. At the breake of day some horsemen charge home to the artillery and kil a Canoniere. This was in shewe the effect of the pages aduertisement. All arme: they make barricadoes and stand firme. The artillery thunders: the Kings answers them. They send forth two hundred horse to discover: who see a troupe issuing forth the Cittie to learne the cause of this tumult, and moreouer a great number of Lances in conceit: and so they report that all are come forth in battaile, but the daye breaking they proue but thistells. So this alarme turnes to laughter. In the meane time they treat of peace, but the demands of the Confederats were excessive. The Duke of Berry demands Normandie for his portion.

The

The Earle of Charolois, the Townes of Somme lately redeemed. For the better effecting hereof, the two commanders conclude of an enteruiew. The King mounts vp the water right against the Bourguignons armie, accompanied with the Lords of Montauban, Admirall, Namouillet, Du Lau, and few others. The Earles of Charolois and S. Paul, come to receiue him. He then offers to giue his Brother the Prouinces of Frie and Champaigne, excepting Meaux, Melun and Montereau: the which he would not accept. He graunts the Charolois his desire, disauowes Moruilliers in certaine speeches, wherein he saith he had exceeded his charge: and for the Earles sake he promifeth to giue the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Paul.

These entercourses of either side proue lamentable for the King: for besides that the Princes doe daily suborne more of his men then he can draw from them, behold Pontoise is deliuered to the Britton by Sorbier, commanding there vnder the Marshall Lorraine; and to finish so notable a treacherie, he marcheth towards Meulan to the same intent, but the inhabitants being aduertised, he returnes without effect. There growes an other vprore in Paris: the Souldiers vaunt insolently, that the Cittizens goods are at their free disposition: that they will take the Keyes of their houses from them, and for a need will pull the cheines out of their streetes. Herevpon the Prouost of Marchants calles the Captaines of the quarters, and chiefe of the Cittie to counsell: he commands them in the night to make fires at all the corners of the streets, and to watch in armes, euery man in his quarter. The people stands vpon their garde, ready to attempt some great action. The King himselfe goes the round, he findes the gate of the Rajule towards the fields open, and the artillerie cloyed. But oh the prouidence of God, misfortune is good for some thing. These v unexpected fires disappoint the conspirators practises, they hinder the approach and entry of the enemy, and saue the Cittie. Moreover Gisors is beleagard, & the garrison abandons it. But that which imports more, the widow of the great Senehall of Brezeai, (gouerned by the Bishop of Bayeux,) then resident at Rouan, with some other Partisans, giues Iohn Duke of Bourbon entrie into the Caste, and so into the Cittie. The Cittie desiring long to haue a Duke remaining in the country, consents to this change, and sweares to the said Duke, for the Duke of Berry. In a manner, all the Townes and places of the Prouince follow the example of their capitall Cittie.

The Bourguignons armie was now reduced to extreame necessitie of victuals and money, so as all the Noblemen dreamed onely of a retreat. And yet (an admirable thing) the price of victuals was not risen in the Cittie. So many stormes caused Lewis to demand a second enteruiew, before that the yeelding vp of Rouan should be knowne to the Earle. He grants the Duchie of Normandie to his Brother: restores the Townes vpon Somme to the Earle: to the Britton his Countie of Montfort, with promise to discharge his charges: he giues the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Paul: he promifeth vnto Iohn Duke of Calabria, men and money to recouer his realme of Naples. to pay what had bene promised for the marriage of his Sister to the Duke of Bourbon, with the execution of other clauses contained in the contract: to restore vnto all others the goods, offices and dignities, which they had enjoyed vnder his father Charles. He stands vnto the Princes, that not any one should be bound to come in person at his summons, but should discharge their homage and duties, in sending such forces as they were bound to furnish at need. To conclude, all the publick good is turned to priuate interest. The Earle of Charolois accepts these conditions so willingly, as discoursing with the King the vehement desire he had to see the execution of this treatie, carries him into the trench of the Bulwarke of frank-archers, by the which they entred the Cittie. The Bourguignons hauing lost him, crie out that he was stayed. The chiefe assemblie together, they tremble, they condemne their Earle of rashnesse, alleaging the inconuenience happened to his grandfather at Montereau, in the presence of Charles the 7. and they begin to talke of their safetie: but as they walked into the field on horse-back, behold they discover about fiftie of the Kings horse, conducting the Earle to his quarter. So euery one renewed his spirits, and iointly commend the Kings loyalty.

Two

1465. Two dayes alter the treatie of peace was read, and tworne on either side, at Vincennes, Charles the Kings brother did homage for the Duchie of Normandie, the Earle of Charolois for the Townes and land in Picardie, and likewise the rest that had homages to doe. The Earle of S. Paul tooke his oath for the office of Constable: the rest for the most part receiue their goods and honours. So the Duke of Normandie was conducted vnto Rouen, by the Duke of Brittainie. The Earle of Charolois took his way to Amiens, and receiued homage of the inhabitants, as also of other places that were restored vnto him, by the peace. Then he entred into the countrie of Liege, that rebelled of late dayes against his father, vpon the first brute of the ouerthrow of the Earle his sonne at Montlehery, without attending the trueth. He pacified the Countrie, and returned into Brabant. This was called the peace of Conflans, which was but a counterfeite, the 28. of October 1465. the which the Burguignon had not so easily yeelded vnto, if he had receiued sooner that refreshing of men and money, which Philip sent him by the Lord of Sauenze.

It was an act of great import, for Lewis to disperse these Princes so cunningly: he did well foresee, that the Charolois being faire from them, and busied in his owne Countries, would hardly turne head in the Winter season. Moreouer he knew well the meanes (as he was an excellent plotter of partialities) how to diuide the Dukes of Normandie and of Brittainie. And in trueth they were scarce arrived in their new Duchie, but all the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Capitaines, expected some preterment from Charles Duke of Normandie, so greatly aduanced by this peace; and moreouer the Duke of Brittainie, who had bene farthest ingaged in the charge, was little amended by the treatie: they all by a generall discontent shew a notable subiect of distrust of the new Duke: so as there is spread abroad a still rumour, That the Brittons would carry Charles into Brittainie. Vpon this brute, the Dukes seruants and the Inhabitants troupe together: they runne by heapes to Saint Katherins Mount (where Charles remained yet, attending the preparatiues of his entrie) they lead him into the Citie, without any other assistance, but the Clergie in their ornaments. The Duke of Brittainie, fearing the mutinie of this people, retires vnto his Countrie: and in his way hee takes some Townes in Normandie, wherein he leaueth diuerse garrisons.

Lewis imbraceth this occasion; and vpon this diuision marcheth against his brother, treaties with the Duke of Brittainie at Argenton, to win him from the alliance of the Duke of Normandie: he takes from him (by the Duke of Bourbon newly reconciled) Epernay, Fernon, Louuiers, Pont de Larche, and other places: and by Charles of Melun, Gisors, Courmay, Chailly: and consequently all bate Normandie. Caen held some other places, being in the hands of Lesclapart, a trustie seruant to both the Dukes. Charles abandoned by all men, and set vpon by so mighty an armie, resolues to retire into Flanders, and seekes to the Earle of Charolois, whom this diuision did much grieue: for he desired about all things to see a Duke in Normandie, the which the old gentle weaken the King. But the time was vnseasonable, being busied against the Liegeois. Yet for a proofe of his good hap, he labours to put some troupes (gathered vp in Picardie) into Diepe: but Lewis preuent him, and compounds with the Gouverneur. Herevpon the two Dukes reconcile themselves, considering (but too late) that as their dissention had already ruined the one, so might it easily ouerthrow the other: according to the saying, That by concord small things increase, but by discord great are ouerthrowne. In trueth it is a hard matter for great men to entertaine friendship long: and for the State it is necessarie to haue one soueraine head ouer all, who by his iudgement, wisdom, and credit, may retaine the subiects in obedience.

So the Duke of Normandie begs helpe of the Britton, being poore, overcome, and abandoned now in his aduersity, of all them that during his prosperity had grounded the anchor of their hope vpon his fortunes, and had newly made their peace with the King.

The Duke of Brittainie receiues him, & in his fauour sends an Ambassage to the King, giuing

A giuing him to vnderstand, that for the honour of his blood, and respect of his Maiestie, he had receiued him; seeing him a fugitiue, and vnprovided of necessarie meanes to entertaine his estate. Therevpon Lewis makes answer, that he could not dismember Normandie, the goodliest flower of his Diadem, from the Crowne of France, whose demaines are inalienable. The Duke replies: That to giue a portion to his brother, grounded in part of the successe right, was an alienation of long time receiued in France, seeing that many held it euen then by the same title. But they commonly say, it is in vaine to preach to them that care not to doe well. Lewis could not yeeld to the preterment of his brother: and the Brittons Ambassadors returned with no other answer, but a bare confession, that it was reasonable to giue him some portion, and that he would consider of the quantitie thereof.

B Thus Rouen (wanting their Duke some fewe dayes,) yeeldes the King obedience with small adoe: who sodenly causeth many to bee executed of his brother Charles faction. The Lord of Esternay, taken by Charles of Melun great Maister, in a Friars weed, accompanied with an Augustine, was beheaded: yet some write that both were drowned in the riuer of Vre. The King offended with the entertainment the Duke of Brittainie had giuen to his Brother, and aduertised that John Duke of Calabria was dead beyond the Mountaines: he calls home the troupes he had giuen him, to haue the greater forces to assaile the Britton, for receiuing of his enemies, and practising intelligences within his realme. And euen then the Duke of Alençon promised to giue the Duke passage through his country, if he would enter into Normandie. Moreouer so many Ambassages from the King to the Duke and Earle of Charolois, and from them to the King: from the Earle to the Dukes, and from them to the Earle, were but to discover their humours, and vnder colour of faith, to with-draw mens affections. So the Duke of Brittainie, not able to perswade the King to reason, enters into Normandie, takes Caen, Bayeux, and Auranthes: he burnes Meruile and some other places, whilest that the King assembles the forces of Anjou, Poictou, and Normandie; and the Earle of Charolois resolues to succour his confederates, hauing suppressed them of Liege and Gant. And for that our Lewis hath bene so confusedly incombred amidst the combustions of those people: let vs leaue France, to learne briefly the cause, the proceeding and the end of these warres.

D The Liegeois hereditarie and capitall enemies to the house of Bourgogne, (seeing all tend to open war betwixt the King and the Earle of Charolois, seekes the Kings friendship and alliance, and they obtaine it, vpon condition to enter presently into the countie of Hainault and Namur, belonging to the Duke of Bourgogne, with all acts of hostility: the King promising vnder his seale, to succour them with two hundred men at armes, (euery one hauing three horses at the least,) and not to treat any accord or peace with the Duke without their consent, and to comprehend them in it, putt vp with this fauour and imagined succours, they send a Herald to Philip being at Brussels, with letters, desying the Earle his sonne with fire and sword, and thereon demand an answer.

E The Duke hauing read these Letters, deliuered them vnto the Herauld, willing him to carry them to his sonne. So he returnes to Liege, but he is presently sent backe with other Letters, desying the Duke himselfe and all his allies. And sodenly they breake into the Dukes countrie, they spoile, raiuish, burne, and omitte no outrage that one enemy may doe to another. Philip assembles the forces of his Countries, and sends for the Dukes of Cleues and Gueldres: the Earles of Nassau and Horne, the Marquesse of Raubellin, and others that were neighbours to Liege.

But this multitude finding the King to faile them of his promise, and that they were not able to resist so great forces, they shutte themselves vp within the walles of Liege.

F Then at the first and false newes of the ouerthrow of the Earle of Charolois at Montlehery, (as the passions of a disordered minde doe easlie make men to beleue what they wishesth,) they take a subiect of new follie. Those of Dinan especially, a people of Liege, proud and arrogant to haue at sundrie times endured seuentene sieges of 1467. Emperours and Kings, yet neuer conquered, make an image very like to the Earle of Charolois, and attired with his armes: they carry it in troupe neere to Bouuines in the Countie of Namur: they set vp a high gibbet in the sight of the Cittizens, and there they hang this Image, crying with open throate. See there the Sonne of your Duke, that false traytor the Earle of Charolois, whome the King of France hath, or will cause to be hanged, as you see heere. Hee termed himselfe the Sonne of your Duke, he lyed: he was a villaine bastard, changed in his infancie with the Sonne of the Lord of Hainfeberghe, our Bishop. Did he thinke to ruine the Noble house of France? From these and such like insolent speeches, they come to deedes, armed against the subiects of Philip, with fire and sword, the instruments of their horrible outrages. This was not all, the father must receiue the like disgrace by his picture, the which they carryed to the Dung-hill before Bouuines, and setting it vpon a peece of wood. See heere (say they) the Seate of the great Toade your Duke. Those of Bouuines exhort these madde men to performe the duties of good subiects to the Duke, before that matters grew more bitter. But the bearer of this good and hollesome counsell, returned without his head: they send an innocent child with the like Letters, hoping his tender age would moue some respect, and mollifie these cruell and vnaturall minds, but in delphight of the Duke and of their neighbours, they killed him most barbarouslie, and tare him in peeces.

O insolent people, which haue not yet learned, That there is no vice whereon God doth more often shew his iudgements, then vpon pride. The great wealth thou hast gathered together during thy long felicitie, hath it so furiously transported thee beyond the bounds of obedience? and to what end is thy great wealth, but to draw thee headlong to thy ruine? Philip takes his reuenge by the defeat of foure thousand Liegeois, fortified within Montenac, a village five leagues from Liege. The Earle of Nassau did this exploit, but the Duke would be present in person with the Earle his sonne, at the taking and vtter defolation of Dinan. He besiegeth it with aboue twenty thousand horse, beside foote, which were in great numbers, takes it, spoiles it, and destroyes it, and drags eight hundred prisoners chained together, to be drowned in the Meuse, before Bouuines: an expiation for the tyrannicall extorsions they had endured by the Dinardais. Those of Liege did for this time escape the like fortune, but it was but deferred, and behold an other cause of indignation, which they procure to themselves. Lewis of Bourbon Bishop of Liege by resignation, and admitted to the dignitie by the intercession and fauour of Duke Philip to the Pope, begins to preferre the most confident and trustie seruants of the said Philip, to all offices and dignities within the Towne. The people are grieved thereat, they mutine and expell the Bishop. This reuolt against their spirituall and temporall Lord, procures the Popes excommunication against them. Philip after the destruction of Dinand turnes head against them: but terrified with so sharpe a punishment, they fle to the Earle of Charolois, who is a meane for their peace and pardon, paying six hundred thousand Florins of the Rhin in sixe yeares, and three hundred hostages for a securitie of their deeds and promises, specified by the Bishop. Thus this people restored to fauour with their Prince, and reconciled to their Bishop, were absolved of the excommunication, by Onofrie a Romaine Cittizen and Bishop of Troye.

Whilest that Philip subdues the Liegeois, Lewis employes his whole studie to ruine the house of Brittanie, and to confirme a truce with the English, who threatned France with a new descent during our diuisions, and hee praesenteth the Bourguignon by all meanes. And to presse him to renounce his Brother Charles and the Duke of Brittanie, he takes the Liegeois into his protection against their Duke, in case hee shall hereafter wot on them: the which he doth signifie vnto him by the Constable of S. Paul, and the Cardinal Bilue, offering notwithstanding to renounce their alliance, if he will likewise abandon his brother and the Britton. This Brauado proceeds to effects. He sendes them foure hundred Launces of his ordinarie, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Dammartin, the Lords of Salezart, Conyhem and Vignolles, with sixe thousand Archers. The Earle of S. Paul, (but without the Kings authoritie) lead them somerowes speedily

A speedily leuied vpon the frontiers of Picardie. The first act of his Tragedie, which in the 1467. end shall make him leaue his head at the Greue in Paris. But it was now time for Philip of Burgundy to leaue the troubles of this world, to enioy an assured and euertlasting rest in heauen.

This inconstant and mutinous people, supposing by the decease of their Lord, to be at libertie, they breake out: go to field, recouer all the Townes, chase away the garrisons placed by the deceased Duke: spoile and sack the places they take by force, without any care of their ingaged hostages, who were all readie to be sacrificed by Charles the new Duke of Bourgenne, to requite the madde insolencies of their countymen, yet he referres the reuenge for a more famous memorie. Hee partes from Louuain in armes, and well accompanied, and goes to besiege Saintron. The Liegeois (to raise the siege,) issue forth with thirtie thousand men, some five hundred horse, and great store of Artillerie.

The Duke turnes head againe, chargeth them and ouer-comes them, he kills about nine thousand: the approaching night saues the rest. Presently after this charge, the Duke (pust vp with this good successe) speakes bigge, he writes vnto the Constable like a Rodomont, answerable to the speeches he had with him at Louuain: That he beseeched the King for his sake to attempt nothing vpon the State of Brittanie, aduertising him of the memorable battaile which he had wonne. After the which Saintron yeelds vpon conditions, and the tenth man is chosen out at the Dukes pleasure, and then beheaded. Tongres was no better intreated: and these miserable wretches thus tithed, were for the most part of those hostages, which hee had freely sent home, vpon condition to imploy themselves to pacifie the seditious humours of their fellowe Cittizens.

In the end, as he turned all his forces against Liege, premeditating with himselfe of a lamentable and bloudie reuenge, behold three hundred of their best Cittizens come forth in their shirts, bare headed and bare legged, bringing the Keyes to the Duke. He enters the Citie by a great breach of twentie sadome beaten downe in the wall, disarms the inhabitants, takes from them their artillerie which remained, razeth all the Towers and Towne walles, and chargeth them with heauier imposts then euer his father had done. A worke of heauen, which quencht the fire of sedition, which began to flame at Gand: a stirring people, and second to the Liegeois in inconstancie: of whome it is commonly sayd, That they loue the sonne of their Prince, but not the Prince himselfe. So the Gantois bring vnto him on foote as farre as Bruxelles, the seuentie and two banners of the occupations, which he had graunted them at his entrie, with all the priuileges and letters they had tumultuously wrested from him.

Charles sent the sayd Banners to Bologne la grasse, to accompany those which his father had in like sort taken from them: he disanulled their priuilege of the law, whereby the people had right of 26. Sheriffes of the Towne, to choose euery yeare two and twenty, and the Prince but foure: he condemned them in thirtie thousand Florines to himselfe, and sixe thousand to his officers and followers: All other Townes compounded for money, and then he made his entrie armed into Gand. Thether came Ambassadors to him from Lewis, labouring to drawe him to consent to the warres which he pretended to make in Brittanie: the which not able to obtaine, the Winter was spent in sending one to another: and Summer being come, Lewis enters the said Duchie, with an armie of fiftie thousand men: and at his first arriuall he takes Chantoué, and Ancenis, and after some other militarie exploits, he forceth both his brother and the Duke of Brittanie, to accept such conditions as he would prescribe vnto them: That they should renounce all alliances, and especially that of the Duke of Bourgenne: That his Brother Charles, lately Duke of Normandie, should haue twelue thousand Franckes a yeare rent, for his portion, issuing out of some lands which should carrie the title of a Dukedome or Countie, and three score thousand Franckes for his pension.

1467. In the meane time Charles of Bourgongne, at the instance of his allies, was already advanced to Peronne. Then had Pope Pius the 2. sent a Legate into France, for the renunciation of the Pragmatick Sanction, made by Lewis at his coming to the Crowne. The Patents are read in the Chafselet without contradiction. Balance comes to the Palace the first of October, to haue them in like sort published. But Maister John of S. Romain, the Kings Proctor generall, opposeth himselfe directly against the execution thereof, notwithstanding the iniurious threats of the said Cardinall: Replying (saith the Originall) that he had rather loose both his office, and all his wealth, then to do anything against his conscience, to the hurt of the Realme, and preiudice of the Kings dignitie. In the end, the Rector of the Vniuersitie, (for then they maintained by faithfull obedience, their ancient authoritie) and the Deputies thereof, go to the Legat: they appeale from him, and the effect of the said Letters, to the holy Councell, the like they doe in all other places where need required. They protest the like at the Chafselet, and depart not before their opposition be registred.

The Kings Proctor generall opposeth himselfe stoutly against the Pcs proceedings.

Lewis solicits the Liegeois to a new rebellion.

Hereupon the King sends the said Legat and Cardinall with John Ladriesche Treasurer of France, to the Duke of Bourgongne, to signifie vnto him the accord made with his Brother and the Duke of Brittanie, and to treat of a peace with the said Duke of Bourgongne, but alwaies tending to diuide him from them: and (for a baite) he promisseth to giue him fixe score thousand Crownes of gold, the one halfe to be paid before he dislodgeth, for the charges of his leuie: and hoping to winne him wholly to his will, he concludes of an enterview at Peronne, by the meanes of the sayd Balance, and to this effect, the Duke writes him a Letter with his owne hand, as a warrant to go and come. And in the meane time, that Charles busied at home, should nowayes hinder Lewis in the warre he pretended to make in Brittanie, (for he still gaped after the conquest of that Prouince) he had sent againe vnder-hand, to sollicite the Liegeois to a new sedition, wherevnto they were too prompt for their owne good: they arme, and by stealth surpriue Tongres, and carrie their Bishoppewith many Chanoines (whome they hated to the death) prisoners to Liege. Yet somewhat respecting the Legates presence, they were content to pull out the hearts of fire or fixe of them, in sight of the Bishop, with an outrageous violence, hewing one of them into many peeces, the which with a brutish derision they cast one at another like vnto Tennis D Balles.

These two Princes liued in continuall distrust, and feared one another: for the falsitie of their persons at this meeting, they fortifie themselves with great forces. Lewis to free the Duke of all ieaousie, comes ill accompanied, but he is followed by John Duke of Bourbon his brother in lawe, the Cardinall brother to the sayd Duke, the Constable of Saint Paul, the Cardinall Balance, (a man which dealt much in matters of armies and State) by Tarnegui of Chafel, newly receiued into fauour, and many other commanders of troupes. Charles had sent for the Armie of Bourgongne, where there were many Noblemen, in former times ill intreated by the King: as Antoine Ch. sieuueuf, Lord of Lau, (who had escaped from Villon, a strong place in Auuergne, where Lewis kept him prisoner, vnder the garde of Charles of Melan, who (sauing his owne head) inbued three scaffolds with bloud, with that of Charles at Loches: of Remonet, sonne to the wife of Charles at Tours: and of the Kings Proctor at Villon, in Meaux: Poncet de Riuiere, d'urfe, (who was after Maister of the Kings Horle): three Princes of the house of Sauoy, that is to say, the Lord of Bresse, the Bishop of Geneue, and the Earle of Rhosmond, Bretheren, followed by many Gentlemen, Sauoyards and Bourguignons. The King seeing all these within the Towne, and the armie lodged thereabout, findes that hee wrought politicklie: but cunning is preuented by cunning. So the providence of God blindes man in his owne malice, and shadowes his eyes, to confound him in his fraudulent desseignes. And to increase his folly, he requires the Castell of Charles to lodge in: for that the greatest parte of those that were last come, were ill affected vnto him: What then? an enemy that had a desire to crosse the policies of his aduersarie, would hee refuse him this Cage that

A sought to intangle himselfe in his owne snare: yet he perswades him to feare nothing. 1468. Let Princes leame not to commit themselves rashlie to such assemblies, the very baits of deceits, collussions and periuries.

The newes of this second mutiny at Liege, being reported vnto the Duke, he sodenly causeth the gates both of Towne and Castell to be shut, but vnder a colde pretext, That one had lost a male full of iewells and money. Lewis seeing himselfe coopt vp, and many archers at the gate, being lodged moreover right against a great Tower, whereas that Earle of Farnadois had once caused Charles the simple his predecessor to die, blame him not if hee feared. So (as an antient sayd) malice driues the greatest part of her owne poison. They could not treat of a more important matter then the life of a King of France and of his Estate.

Charles doth first impart this businesse to some of his Chamberlaines and groomes of his Chamber (amongest others to the Lord of Argenton, to whome the King since gave this commendation, to haue bene a great helpe in this pacification of Peronne) who then tempered this spleene all they could: He holds a counsell the most part of the second day, and almost the whole night, hauing all the desire in the world to do the King a throwd turne, who in the meane time practiseth with all vehemencie such as he thought might serue him: he vntunisheth his most trusty seruants, being farre from his treasure, commands to make distribution of fiftene thousand crownes: (but the comissarie retayned a part as the King was since aduertised) he giues to some, and promisseth C to others. In the ende their resolution in counsell was, That Lewis his excuse should be admitted, who did sweare that hauing sent his Ambassadors to Liege, euen when as the Duke did arme against France, the great affection he had to a finall and vniuersall peace had so transported him, as he had forgot to countermand them. Thus promise beeing made to Charles of Bourgongne, to accompany him at his request in the voiage of Liege, and to giue vnto Charles his brother the Earldomes of Brie and Champaigne, (the which the Bourguignons did, that at neede they might haue more meanes to succor one another) the treatie of Arras and peace of Charenton were reconfirmed and sworne, vpon the crosse which Charles of Bourgongne was wont to carrie, called the crosse of victorie. D graue and trusty seruants, then by enteruewes, from the which such as had neuer anie matter to determine together, do seldome part without mutuall dislikes and grudgings, the seeds of diuisions and warre, the which may bee long smothered, but at length it breakes forth. From henceforth you shall see vpon the theater a wretched people, paining yet with the bastonados lately receyued: but not yet vanquished, and so much the more lamentable, for that their owne calamities cannot make them wise: who hauing obstinately rebelled against their naturall Prince, and indiscreetly imbraced our Kings quarrell, run headlong to their totall ruine. Lewis was engaged by promise, and summoned to performe it. Besids the Scotts of his gard, he sends for three hundred men at armes, hauing with him John Duke of Bourbon, Charles Cardinall of Bourbon and E Archebishop of Lions, and the Earle of Beauieu brothers to the Bishop of Liege. A Citie then of the bigines of Rohan, exceeding wel peopled, seated in a mooraine coutry, fertill, watered with the riuer of Meuse, which runs through it, but by the last years check almost all dismantled, & greatly weakened of men, so as the Marshall of Bourgongne & the Lord of Himbertout leading the auantgard, and gaping after spoile, thought to haue entered at their first approach, before the King or Duke were arriued. John of Pilette chiefe Tribune of these Liegeois, and other Captaines seeing them lodge confusedlie in their suburbs, they issue resolutely by the old breaches, and kill about eight hundred men, amongest the which were a hundred men at armes: they hurt many, & amongest them the Prince of Orange. All the people were ready to make a generall fally, but some F Canonados shot into the great steete kills very many, and keeps in the rest. The Tribune was hurt and died within two dayes after, with some other Captaines, whilest the two Commanders arriue, & take their lodgings, Lewis in a great fannie, a quarter of a league from Liege, Charles in the midst of the suburbs, where the King went to lodge 1468. lodge next day right against the Bourguignons lodging. This approach breeds a great distrust: for Charles doubted that Lewis would cast himself into the Towne, or practice something against him, or at the least save himself before the taking of the Towne. To be the better satisfied, the Duke doth lodge three hundred of his best men at armes in a barne betwixt his lodging and the Kings, the better to observe the Kings actions. In the meane time, they make a good shew, and keepe good guard vntill the xij. and twentieth of October, the day of the siege, when as Charles and all his men disarmeth themselves, to be the more ready the next day for the assault. During these eight dayes, the besieged gave libertie to their Bishop to go to the Duke and to offer him their Towne and goods, desiring nothing but their liues. But he had resolved a sharpe reuenge, and retaynes the Bishop, not accepting of any offer. The Apostolike Legat had no more ac-

uy credit with Charles, neyther was he so happy as he expected.

The Ligeois abandoned by the French, dispayring of all foraine succors, and of all grace with their Prince: beheld a troupe of six hundred choise men of the Countrey of Franchemont issue forth, hauing for their guides the masters of those two lodgings where the Generalls did lie. The partie was well made, but the enterprise was great, and ill managed; yet did they hardly faile in it. The guides should lead them secretly through the hollow rocks neere vnto these Princes lodgings, to surprize them, kill the, or at the least to carry them away before their guards were in armes. Moreouer all the people should issue forth by the gate and breaches right against the great steepe of the suburbs, and with their cries and fighting discomfort the whole army, or at the least sell their liues deere, in dying gloriously. They issue forth, kill the sentinells: and stayed at a paulion in the which the Duke of Alençon, and the Lord of Craon were lodged, where they slue some seruants with their halberds and partisans; they charge euen vnto the grange, whereas the three hundred men at armes were in their first sleepe, the whole multitude runs thether, and troubles both Nations, some crying, God save the King, others God save the Duke of Bourgogne, and some also crye God save the King, and kill, to lowe diuision betwixt the French and Bourguignons. They awake, they arme & defend the entrie.

In the meane time succors come from all parts to the duke, being charged by a squadron led by the master of the lodging. He is slaine first, and then all his company. The King is no lesse amazed, his host compasseth his house with an other band. The Scots are about him, they first kill the hoste and then his followers: and so the multitude recouers the Towne in disorder. The two Princes talke together, and thanke God for their deliuerie, and with a iust cause: for if these desperate men had neyther lingered at the Paulion nor at the grange, without doubt they had had these two Princes at their discretio: but God would rescue ours, for the restoring of his estate, and increase of his reuenues with the Bourguignons losse: and the Bourguignon for a more tragicke ende. Our Lewis grew likewise pale with distrust, foreseeing that if Charles did not take this Towne by assault, the burthen might light on him, that he was in danger to be stayed and taken, being the weaker in the army. There was no hope of retyring, he was too well guarded: and his honour likewise engaged. Thus he stood vpon thornes, yet resolute in shewe, and alwayes a perfect dissembler. A miserable estate of these two Princes, who of late had so solemnelie sworne a peace, and yet one could not assure himselfe of an others faith.

This desperate fallie had amazed the Dukes men, who (euen by the Kings advice) would willingly haue delayed the assault for some dayes, but Charles constant in his desseine, lettes Lewis vnderstand, that if he pleased hee might retyre to Namur vntill the Towne were taken: as for himselfe hee would not part without seeing the issue the next morning: but Lewis was engaged in honor, who would neuer giue the least suspicion of cowardise: he therefore answers, that he would take his part of the sport. The day being come, every one repayres to his colours: the signe is giuen by a field peece and two shot of a serpentine, to the ende the vanguard lodged on the other side should charge at the same instant. The trompetts and drums sound, the ensignes approach, & all march resolutely. But when they thought to ioyne, they found no resistance. Their chief commanders were dead, the most apparent being slipped out of the Towne, some one way some an other, the comon people were gone to dinner, thinking that Sondaie would be a day of rest. So the whole army consisting of about fortie thousand men, entered at both ends, & finde the cloth layed: they kill at the first encounter two hundred, men, women, children, and religious indifferently; they rauish women, maids, and nunnies, spoile the Cittie, and holy places: the Duke saues the great church of S. Lambert with great difficulty, the people fly ouer the Meuse, and so saue themselves in the forest of Ardenne, and other places thereabouts, where (to increase their misery) some gentlemen who till then had held their party) strip them, kill a number, and take the best prisoners, and by this treachery & piteous stratagem make their peace with the Duke. Many died of hunger, cold and sleepe: the historie makes mention of a gentleman that had the palfie in one legge, and a page that had two fingers on one hand false off. The wine was frozen in the pipes, and for three dayes was cut out with hatchets. And for the last of this tragedie, the Duke doth place foure thousand men about the quarters of the Citie, to beate downe the bridge vpon the Meuse; to defend the houses of the Clergie about the great Church, & to preserve the other Churches from ruine, whilst that others set fire on the Towne, ouerthrowe the walles and fill vp the ditches. Vnraith and victory do neuer forget any kinde of reuenge. And if we shall beleue some writers, there perished about fifty thousand soules in this warre, most cruell beyond all bounds of humanity. Learne O yee nations to containe your selues in the obedience of your Soueraignes; and not to imbarke your selues rashlie in Princes quarrells: who retire themselves easily out of the mire where they leaue you engaged. Liege is a president vnto you wherein you may observe the iust iudgement of God, vpon a cruel rebellious people, enemy to all soueraignie, both spiritual and temporall, of long time subiect to daylie rebellions, vntill their generall ruine. As wee haue brought our Lewis to Liege, so let vs returne him into France. Charles exceeding proud with the happie successe of his desseins, suffers himselfe to be sought vnto by mediators from the King for his departure: and afterwards hee himselfe moues him, as desiring to go & cause their accord to be proclaimed & inregistred in his Court of Parliament at Paris, (which else were of no moment) and the next yeare to meete in Bourgogne, and to feast one an other mutually for a monethes space. Charles (hauing drawen a promise from the King, to confirme all he had sworne at Peronne) yeelds, but not without grudging, and hauing accompanied him halfe a league, he causeth him to be conducted to the frontiers, by the Lord of Cordes, and Murs great Baylis of Hainault. A piteous spectacle to see a Soueraigne reduced to that extremity, as to humble himselfe before his vassall: but wee must haue patience for seauen yeares, and then shall wee see a strange alteration of fortune: and yet seauen yeares after, an other Catastrophe no lesse tragicall in this house of Bourgogne: and the vniing of the sayd Duchie to the Crowne of France.

After the Kings departure, Charles enters the Countrey of Franchemont: hee killeth, spoiles, burnes and makes all desolate: then (glutted with reuenge) hee retires into Brabant. Lewis taking his leaue of the Duke, demanded of him captiously, In case his brother (who was in Brittaine) would not accept the portion hee had giuen him, howe hee would aduise him to gouerne himselfe: and the Duke answered, that if hee were content, it should please him whatsoever they did. This speech was cunningly construed by the King: for hauing inrouled the sayd vnion in the Court of Parliament, and proclaimed it throughout all the streets of Paris: hee offers Charles Guienne, for Brie and Champaigne, his brothers neighbour-hood with the Bourguignon being suspected vnto him. Charles refuseth it, fearing to displease the Duke of Bourgogne, who by Ambassages and admonition exhorts him not to change: for if happilie the King should annoyne him, he might daylie haue succors out of Bourgogne.

Charles was in all things gouerned by an other, namely by Odet de Rye Lord of Lesclapart, and 1469. and afterwards Earle of Cominges. Lewis subornes him, and by his means wins Charles A to accept of Guienne, as more plentifull and rich, with mutuall assurances, so like bretheren and good friends. For confirmation whereof they meet at Chartou and feast together. then they depart, Lewis into Touraine, and Charles into Guienne.

The Duke of Bourgogne greeued with this exchange, imploies the Cardinal Bal- ue, a turbulent and pernicious member in a State: a dissembler, and taking pleasure, as they say comonly to put his finger betwixt the barke and the tree. An vnkinde man. The trust which Lewis reposed in this man, caused to procure him a Cardinals hat: & to that end the King had sent an Ambassage to Paul the 2. and sends Fumee also, one of his most trustie seruants, to perswade the Pope to desiste from the refusal he had made thereof, being aduertised of many things that did disswade him: at whose vrgent perswasion a Cardinals hat was granted him: yet behold he writes to the Duke of Guienne: in fauour of the Bourguignon: That this change tended but to deceiue, diuiding him by this means from his friends and confederats, and by other messengers he aduertileth the Bourguignon: That the peace concluded betwixt the two bretheren, was a baite to surprise him: the which the King deferred only until his brother had visited his newe Duchie, and set an order in his house. Let him therefore arme & begin first. These letters are surprised, with other instructions, so as the Cardinal is arrested, and carried prisoner to Montfason, where he shal contynue eleuen years.

Cardinal Bal. ue comitted to prison.

Lewis hauing thus plaistered this peace with the Bourguignon, comprehended the Erit- ton therein & gaue the Duchie of Guienne to his brother Charles for his portion. He had C now no more so mighty enemies, against whom he should employ his forces: yet would he not dismishe his troupes, for there came a new taske in hand. To kepe them in practise, he sends part of them vnder the command of the Admiral bastard of Bourbon (for Montauban was dead) and the Earle of Dammartin, into Armagnac. He had bene one of the common-welth, and this enterprise did alwaies sticke in Lewis his stomach. At the first without any effusion of blood, they make him peaceable possessor of the countrie whereof they inuest his brother. and so the yeare ended.

But let vs se the first frutes of the following yeare. To be revenged of Charles of Fou- gongne, he must haue some apparent colour. Lewis doth vnderhand practise the Townes lying vpon the riuier of Somme: animates the Nobility of the Countie to D complaine in the Parlement at Paris, of the difficulty they had to receyue iustice, and thereupon to require the Kings assistance & fauour. Moreover they charged the Bourguignon, that he extended his limits farther then he ought by the treatie, & vsurped the Kings rights and prerogatiues, forcing some Lords, whose lands did hold directie of the King, to doe him homage and seruice against all men. Vpon colour of these complaints, Lewis assembles the Estats at Tours, in the moneth of March, and Aprill, (the which was all he euer held:) but he calls none, but his most confident seruants, who would not contradict him in any thing. For a conclusion of the assemblie, the Duke is summoned to appeere at the Parlement of Paris. He retains the officer many daies at Gand, and in the end sends him back.

As all things were prepared to ruine the Duke of Bourgogne; behold there falls out another matter of some moment in this action. The Earle of Warwick (hauing a- boue all others supported the house of Yorke against that of Lancaster) had besides his patrimonie enriched himselfe aboue 4000. Crownes a yeere reuenue in rewardes and offices by Edward King of England, Competitor to Henry the 6, whom he kept prisoner at London: which Henry had so long ruled our France. This his great credit draws iealousie after it, too ordinary in soueraine Princes, especially to the whom they haue raised vp: whereby the Earle falls into some disgrace with Edward. The Duke of Bourgogne, to whome the Earles great authoritie, and the secret intel'igences he had with our Lewis was wonderfull odious and suspect (for the Duke had married the sister of Edward, to fortifie himselfe against Lewis, not for any affection he bare to the howse of Yorke, being by his mother issued out of the house of Lancaster) feeds this hatred of Edward against Warwicke, who finding himselfe forced to yeeld to the stronger, resolues to reue-

Edward King of England & the Earle of Warwick diuided.

A retyre into France: hee leads with him Marguerite the wife of Henry, daughter to René 1470. King of Sicily, the Prince of Wales son of the sayd Henry and Marguerite. the Duke of Clarence son in lawe to Warwicke, and brother to Edward, the Earle of Oxford, with their wives and children, and many followers. In his passage he takes many ships from the Bourguignons subiects, and sells the bootie in Normandie. And for a requital Charles causeth all the French Marchants to be taken that were come to the faire at Antwerp: hee complains to the Court of Parliament at Paris, of the reception the King had made of The Duke of the Earle of Warwick, threatening to fetch him wherefoeuer. But the arrogance of his Bourguignons arrogance, words, was but the leuaine of his spleene.

Lewis giues such entertainment to the Earle of Warwick, as he might hope for: he B armes all the ships he can finde in his fauour: by meanes whereof he returnes happily into England, and gathers together an infinite number of men, which ioyned with him from all parts: he marcheth against Edward, and forceth him to fly to his brother in lawe into Holland, being accompanied only with leauen or eight hundred men for his gurd, without money, and without apparell other then for war. Hee drawes Henry out of prison, where he himselfe had formerly lodged him, and installes him againe in his royall state. Edward (notwithstanding the presence of the Dukes of Glocester and Somerset, sent by Henry) jobtaynes of the Duke of Bourgogne (but vnderhand and secretly, for that hee The Earle of would by no meanes incense Henry, whom all England now obeyed) succors of men, ships & money: he returnes into the realme, is receiued into London: he meets with the Earle C of Warwicke, fights with him and kills him, with his brother the Marquis of Montagu, & cuts all his army in peeces. The Duke of Clarence (before the battaile) goes to his brother Edward, and with his owne hand slue (as some write) Henry, whom Edward had taken in London and led to this battaile: this was in the yeare 1471. on Easter day. This happy victorie is seconded by an other no lesse famous. The Prince of Wales sonne to the Prince of Henry, followes after, with whome the Dukes of Glocester and Somerset had already ioyned, leading fortie thousand men of his faction. Edward putte vp with the prosperous successe of his first victory, marcheth towards him, fights with him, kills him, takes the Earle of Somerst prisoner, and the next day cuts off his head. To conclude, Warwicke had conquered the realme of England in eleuen days: and Edward recouered it in twentie, and remained in peaceable possession vnto his death. If the Earle had patiently attended the great forces which Prince Edward brought vnto him, who will not thinke but he had remayned a conquerour? But he feared Somerst, whose father and brother he had put to death, and hee must feele the effects of the diuine Oracle: Hee that hath shed mans blood, his blood shall be shed, for God hath made man after his owne image, and: All those that haue taken the sword shall perish by the sword. In the meane time whilest these Dukes are in England, Charles the 8. of that name, afterwards King of France, was borne vnto Lewis at the Castell of Amboise, a happie proppe of an old decayed father. This birth causeth the Princes hereafter to be lesse respected, and the King more feared and honored, who hauing now an heire to whome he might leaue the Crowne, bandies all E his wits, to weak his enemies, as wel for his own priuate regard, as to leaue therealme wholie & peaceable to his successor. Charles of Guienne lyued, for shew, in good amity with the King. Francis of Brittain (although he had preferred the order of the golden fleece before that of Saint Michell, the which Lewis had offred vnto him) being loath to loose assured friends, to accept the friendship of a Prince in whom he could repose no confidence, yet he contayned himselfe. Charles of Bourgogne woare the garter openly, & molested the Kings subiects and friends. Moreover Lewis had iust cause to be greeued for the brauado done him at Peronne. The nobility thrust him on therto, namely the Constable of S. Paul, foreseeing that the continuance of peace would be a hinderance to his great offices and pensions. He had a pay without checke for foure hundred lances, of forty thousand franks yearly, besides the fee for his office, and allowance for many places where he commanded. Men fish most easily in a troubled water. Hee offers the King to take S. Quentin by meanes of the credit hee had in the Countie: most of his lying lying thereabouts: and vants to haue great intelligence in the lowe Countie. The

Charles the 8. borne.

The Constable labors to deuide Lewis and the Duke of Bourgogne.

1471. The Duke of Guienne offers both his person and his meanes, with five hundred men at armes for this warre, but it was the least of his desires, for he was corrupted with the infections of that age, in the which all great men fought to maintaine themselves with the ruine one of another. The Duke of Bourgonne takes the alarme, puts the greatest forces he can to field, entertayned with halfe their pay. Lewis suffers him to runne on foure or five monethes, entertayning him with sundrie Ambassages, to free him from all feare, so as troubled with that great charge, in a season when as money was scant, he dissolues this army, and leauing his frontier Townes vnfurnished, retires into Holland. In the meane time Arthur of Longueuall takes Saint Quentin, the Constable enters it with two hundred Lances, and takes an oath for the King. They practise Amiens, the Kings army comes before it, one part holds for the King, another for the Duke, who might haue assured it, if hee had sufficient forces ready to enter, but foure or five hundred horse, with the which he came posting, would not suffer him to hazard his person.

S. Quintin taken from the Duke of Bourgonne. Amiens yeelds to the King.

The Kings friends discouering this brag, double their courages & let in the kings army. Abbeville meanes to follow, whereas the Lord of Cordes enters for the Duke & assures the place. The Duke vnprovidid of men, and doubting the intelligences which the Constable bragged of, retires with feare and speede to Arras, to hasten a leuie both of men and money. Thetier (notwithstanding the promise which Charles of Guienne had made to the King) comes a secret messenger vnto him, with this aduise written and signed by the sayd Charles: Labour to content your subjects, and then take no care, for you shall finde friends, but these were but iests. This letter makes the Duke breathe: he sends to the Constable, to let him vnderstand, that this warre was without desie or summons, intreating him, not to deale against him according to the rigour of his present forces. The proiect of the Dukes of Guienne and Brittain with the Constable, was to imbarke these two great Princes in mutuall warre, in a season of aduantage for Lewis: that the Bourguignons necessity (being abandoned of his allies,) might force him to giue his only daughter to the sayd Duke of Guienne: the which he had often promised, but without performance: whom as Oenomaus did his Hippodamia hee promised to many, & gaue her not to any.

So this Constable who tooke a delight to nourish these Princes in feare and mutual distrust, answers the Bourguignon: That the King had a strong and flourishing army, and great intelligences in his Countries, that hee knewe no better expedient to auoide this storme, then to accomplish that to the Duke of Guienne, which he had so often reiterated: which done the Dukes of Guienne and Brittain would declare themselves for him, and would succor him with their forces. But what shall the Constable get to entertaine these Princes in distrust and ialousie one of another, eyther of them being too cunning to discouer his policies? Within short time both of them (hauing ioyntly conspired against him) shall see his head to sale, and in the ende plant it vpon a scaffold for a spectacle. The Britton writes to him in the like and more rigorous termes: suffering the Lord of Lesclat to lead a hundred men at armes Brittons to the King. This proceeding caused Charles of Bourgonne to conceiue a great hatred in his heart against them all: but misfortune is good for something. It made them the more affected to the Kings seruice during this warre, so as at this time the Bourguignons estate was in great danger, whereas by the sayd marriage he had wonderfully weakened the King: but man purposeth and God disposeth.

It is commonly sayed, that halfe the world knowes not how the other liues: & the ordinary custom of man is to be cleere sighted in other mens affaires, but blind in his own. Behold two Princes incensed one against another, & yet who so should examine their consciences, they could allege but friuolous pretexts. Lewis hauing put fourteene hundred men at armes and foure thousand franke-archers into Amiens, commanded by the Constable, & other chiefe Officers of the crowne, he assembles the body of his army at Beauuais, hauing with him the Duke of Guienne his brother, Nicholas Duke of Calabria, the eldest son of John duke of Calabria and Lorraine, & the onely heire of the house

Charles of Bourgonne abandoned of his friends.

Lewis his army in Pr. ardy.

A house of Anjou & a great number of Nobilitie, whereby he recouers Roye, Montdidier, Abbeville & all the Countie of Ponthieu. Charles passeth the river of Somme, takes Piquigny, plants himselfe betwix Bapaumes & Amiens, & keeps the field about six weeks, with a firme resolution in shewe, to fight with the King if he presented himselfe.

But blockt vp within his Campe, and seeing himselfe ready through want to be forced to yeeld at the Kings wil and discretion, his Maiesties army in Bourgonne (commanded by the Cont Dauphin of Auvergne, sonne to the Earle of Montpensier, in the which were the Earle of Cominges, the Lords of Combronde, and Charente, Maister William Cousinot & others, hauing likewise vanquished all the enemies forces, taken many prisoners and some places, Charles, by a letter of his owne hand, humbles him selfe to the King: he is greeued that he had so wronged him for an others pleasure, not being duly informed of all things.

Virtue finds some respect euen in an enemy. Lewis, who vnder a simple bait to recouer the Townes vpon Somme, had not so hotly kindled this quarell, without the great intelligences wherewith the Constable had abused him, especially in the Townes of Antwerp, Bruges and Brussels: he graunts a truce for one yeare. This was the 4. of May. An vnseasonable truce for the Constable (who then serued his maister, without dissembling) and other horseleches, whom neither troubles, oppression of the people, nor the tediousnes of affaires did any thing touch, but as pleasing to the Duke as the peace of Conflans. So the King returns into Touraine: Charles out of France into Guene, the Duke of Bourgonne into Hainault, where he assembles his Estates, and shewes the losse he had receiued, for that his men at armes were not so soone ready as the Kings, and giues order to be no more surprised vnawares. Thus the Estate is pacified, but the Duke of Guienne was no sooner returned home, but there springs vp new seeds of dissension. He receiues the Earle of Armaignac into fauour, and restores him to full possession of the Lands which the King had confiscate. Lewis moued with this reconciliation, sends forces and takes the lands into his owne hand, disappoints the Earle, whom he knew to be a stirring and a factious man: and euen then he resolved to dispossesse his brother of the Duchie of Guienne, as he had doone of that of Normandie.

And obtaynes a truce.

New troubles by the Duke of Guienne.

The Duke of Guenne took to many with the heire of Bourgonne.

The Duke foreseeing this storme, sends often to the Bourguignon, and vnder colour to seeke his daughter, labours to bind him more finely vnto him by that alliance. The Bourguignon hauing his heart puffed vp with as great conceits, as his person was susceptible of trauell, but exceeding the capacite of his sence, he fed him with hope: yet had he no such meaning, but preserved her, as a most pretious iewel to be courted by many, and to serue him at need, according to diuers occurrents, both of their persons and meanes. Neither would he haue so great a Sonne in Lawe, as the only Brother of a King of France, whom he might not rule at his pleasure, neither could he digest the words & proceedings of the Duke of Brittain & the Constable. The Constable would haue the Duke of Guienne beholding vnto him for this marriage: the Britton repined he should haue the honor. The King comes to crosse it, and with reason: for this alliance had wonderfully fortified his brother, who (being ioyned with the Duke of Brittain) had greatly crossed the Kings estate and his childrens. Moreover the King of England did much disuade the effecting thereof: (said he to the Duke of Bourgonne) if the King of France comes to die without children, his brother succeeds to the Crowne, and this marriage vniing vnto it so many prouinces and Seigneuries, the estate of England were nere her ruine.

But to what ende serue these affectionate and contrarie pursuits. Alasse some one thinks himselfe found, that carries death in his bosome. But he that reigneth in heauen, Psal. 2. laughs them to scorn: within fewe monethes our Charles of Guienne, leauing the world, shall leaue his loues. So it is, that their vehement solliciting, extorted some verball promise, confirmed by a letter, but he had great Corriualls, who all pretended to haue the best part in the pie: Nicholas Marquis of Pont, sonne to John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, Philop Duke of Sauoie, Maximilian Duke of Austria, Son to the Emperour Fredrick. All these, marched in equall ranke: but in the end Maximilian shall be conquerour, yet 1471. not during the life of Charles of Bourgonne. This marriage gaue a goodly colour to these mediators, but vnder the shadowe thereof they treated of other matters. They must auoide this forme, ready to oppresse the Duke of Guienne. Behold therefore the publike Ambassadors, and priuate messengers of these three Dukes, are sent respectiually one to another. The Lord of Vrfe and Poncer de la Ruicre, Agents for Charles of Guienne. The Abbot of Begard, since Archbishop of Lion, is an instrument for the Britton to the Bourguignon, they take the King to haue practised and suborned, what by friendship, and what by force, the Duke of Guennes seruants: to haue already defaced a place belonging to the Lord of Estissac, with many other things: testifying that the King would soone dispossesse his brother of Guienne, if he were not speedily prevented: that to this effect he was armed, and ready to enter into Xaintonge. The Duke of Bourgonne lends often to the king touching these affaires. The King excuseth himselfe and accuseth his brother, as hauing treated with the Earles of Armaignac and Fois, to his prejudice, seeking to enlarge his limits without his priuie, & to enter into factions with his enemies: yet he promisseth to suffer him to inioy his portion peaceably.

A new league betwixt the Duke of Bourgonne, Guienne and Brittain against Lewis.

This promise carries no credit, and works lesse effect: the Dukes of Guienne & Brittain mislike they presse the Bourguignon: yet that it may be done without the assistance of the English, the ancient and generall enemy of this Realme: seeing that all their common deuils, tended but to the good and ease of the publike: that his assistance with the great intelligence he had with many gouernours & Captaines of places, did fortifiethem sufficiently: pleasant people, to seeke with a bloody wound once againe to abuse the common people with this baite of publike good, & to couer their priuate passions with so pleasing a shew. Charles of Bourgonne casts the stone and hides his arme, and the better to disguise his proceeding, he solicites the English secretly, to invade France, on the one side, whilst that he seemed blind, & not to see it. But it was in vaine, the English had more willingly assisted the King, if this marriage had allyed the two houses of France & Bourgonne. In the end, behold a number of Princes in great perplexitie, the which is more lamentable, for that they shall trouble their heads with so many preiudiciall & extravagant conceptions: this confusi on shall in fewe yeares oppresse them in a manner all, & Lewis (particularly fauoured of heauen) shall surmount them and carry away their spoiles. They preiudice thus much, the Duke of Bourgonne (possessed with an earnest desire to recouer Amiens, S. Quintin, and other townes vpon Somme) he armes twelue hundred lances, three archers to a lance, well armed, well mounted, and good leaders. What doth our Lewis? In trueth he had too good a iudgement to want foresight, & he that thought to surprisethalbe surprisid. To diuert the Bourguignons leauy, he had often sent the Lord of Craon, and the Chancellour of Orle who (being very trusty seruants) in the end conclude an absolute peace. The King yeelds to the Duke the foresaid townes, he abandons vnto him the Earles of Neuers & S. Paul Constable: the one hauing serued the King loyally at Peronne, had purchased the dukes indignation, the other hauing nourished hatred and distrust betwixt these two princes for his owne profit, had so vnreconciledie estranged them from him, as they bandie roynly to his destruction, & giues him at their lands, to incorporate them to his owne, if he could. The Duke in exchange, forsakes the Dukes of Guienne and Brittain, and their territories to dispose at his pleasure, promising not to deale at all in the warres which Lewis pretended against them. A foule and dishonest trafficke, made to the prejudice of so great personages.

The Duke signes and swears this fraudulent and counterfeit peace. A blowe able to amaze the Dukes of Guienne and Brittain at the first hearing, to see themselves thus abandoned of their chiefe support. But he repayres it with an after blow, & by letters of credit writt with his own hand, giues the aduice to continue their course: that his intent was only to recouer his townes vpon Somme: which done, he will beseech the King by especial Ambassadors to desist fro making war against the, & vpon his refusal he will succour the with body & goods: that as the King at his pleasure had broke the treaties of Cofflans & Peronne, so might he infringe his promise, & oath. As for the Earles

Notable deceit and treacheries.

Earles of Neuers, and S. Paul Constable, although he had a iust occasion to hate them, yet would he remit their iniuries, and suffer them to inioy their owne, and beseech the King to doe the like by the Dukes of Guienne and Brittain, suffering euery one to liue in peace and safetie, vnder the Articles respectiually accorded: if not, he would succour his allies.

Craon and Orle had likewise sworne for the King, leading Simon of Quinchi (a gentleman bred vp in the Dukes house) to receiue the othe of his Maiestie. But from a new subiect springs a new proiect. Behold newes are brought, that the Duke of Guienne is sick, and without hope of recouerie. Vpon this aduice, the King delaies the oath, findes euasions, attending the course of his disease, and in the meane time doth speedily seize vpon many places of Xaintonge: he doth presse Rochell, the which (vpon these accidents of reconciliation and sicknesse) inclines to a composition: he withdrawes many of his brothers chiefe seruants, and resolues to signe this peace, as the sundrie euents of his affaires should lead him: and in the meane space he protracts time with the Bourguignon, during the which, Charles Duke of Guienne dyes at Bordeaux, the 12. of May, by the which Lewis recouers the Duchie without blowes, and moreouer retaines Amiens, and Saint Quintins.

The Duke of Guienne dyes.

O subull wits, both deceiuers, but not of like industrie: so our Lewis shall more easily auoide the snare. But oh death in generall, which by the dissolution of the body and soule, doest dissolue great desseings! The Brittons were ready to enter, building vpon great intelligences and practises within the Realme: the which without doubt had much troubled the State. But oh vnseasonable death in particular, how fitly shalt thou serue to shadow the filthy and hatefull, (yet well coloured) reproches of enemies, and the murmurings of the most respectiue. A death too much neglected, but by some affectionate seruants to the deceased Duke, who discouer, that Tourdain Fauré, borne at Dauphiné, great Almoner to the Duke, and Abbot of S. Iohn d' Angely, assisted Henry de la Roche, one of the said Dukes Kitchin, had hastened his death by so violent a reason, that with a strange and lamentable contraction of his sinews, his hayre fell out, and teeth fell out before his death. The Lord of Lefer retired himselfe into Brittain, leading prisoners with him these cursed murderers, where the Abbot was found one morning starke dead in his Chamber with a Thunder-clap, Hauing his face swollen, his body and visage black as a coale, and his tongue hanging half a foote out of his mouth. God doing that iustice in the twinkling of an eye, which men delayed. Let vs confesse the trueth, and without passion: the vertue of the Historie doth presse vs vnto it: that Charles had beene an ill brother, and ought more honour and obedience to him, to whom that great Author of Nature had giuen the right of eldership about him, yet should he haue beene regarded as a sonne of France, and from his infancie receiue a portion fit for the entertainment of his estate and house. Kings haue alwaies power to compromise the infolencies of their neere allied, when they forget their duties. But howsoeuer, let vs obserue the order of diuine iustice, who easily raifeth vp home-bred scourges: but in the end he doth cast the rod into the fire. Lewis must be measured with the same proportion he had measured his father, and Charles must suffer for the rashnesse of his rebellions. This death being little lamented, makes such to speake, as had but too diligently obserued Lewis his speech, hearing one day of the death of the King of Castile brother: He is but too happy (saith he) to haue lost his brother: but hatred and ill will, grounds their passions euen vpon a Needles point.

By poison.

Note the murderers of Princes.

Note.

At the same instant, Nicholas Marquis of Pont, heire of the house of Aniou (one of the abouenamed riuallles) made sure to Anne, the eldest daughter of Lewis, abused with the great (yet vaine) promises of the Duke of Bourgonne, renounced this so worthy alliance of his Soueraigne Lord, for a frustratorie hope, which the vasaile gaue him to marry his daughter: but he was ignorant that death the yeare following would punish this rashnesse, and preuent him from the inioying, either of Anne or Murie. 1472. of Bourgogne, Earle of Newers and Rethel, and grand-child to Philip the hardie, a sonne of France, and Duke of Burgogne, and by consequence neere kinsman to Charles, yet in all these combuſtions, he had faithfully ſerued the King, and preferred the Flower-de-Luce before the Red Croſſe. Let vs likewise obſerue the death of William Chartier Biſhop of Paris, who (after his conference with the League before Paris, in the Kings abſence) was alwaies in ſuch diſgrace with him, as after his death, Lewis cauſed his Epitaph to be changed, making mention of the bad ſeruices he had done him, during the warre of the common-weale, ſuborning the inhabitants in fauour of the Burguignons. The death of the Duke of Guienne had wonderfully afflicted Charles of Bourgogne, & to increaſe it, he had intelligence, that the Brittons would not arme, conſidering that he was dead for whom they ſhould riſe. In the meane time the chance was caſt: he had bene at great charge, and to turne head without reſtitution, were a ſhame: but that which made him mad, Amiens and S. Quentin were loſt: he muſt hazard all. And fiſt he writes to many townes: he chargeth the King to haue conſented to his brothers death, and labours to draw them into armes, declaring himſelfe their protector, but no man ſtirres: ſo the ſmall effect of his letters, ſets him on fire, and in this choller he marcheth to Nogel in Vermendois: he ſpoiles, burnes, & makes all deſolate, beſiegeth the Towne, batters it, and takes it: he kills the greateſt part of five hundred Archers, commanded by one called Little Picard, takes ſome, and amongſt others the Captaine, and cuts off ſome of their hands. Many ſouldiers and Townſmen flying into the Church, are barbarouſly ſlaine by the altars, imbracing the images: the Duke enters himſelfe into the Church on horſeback, and ſeeing theſe carcaſes. Behold (ſayes he) this is goodly, & haue good butchers: then he burnes and rafeh the place.

The Burguignons practiſe againſt Lewis.

His crueltie.

Fifteene hundred franke-Archers being in Roye, vnder the command of Peter Aubert, baiſſile of Melan and Nugnon, are amazed, and at the Dukes fiſt approach, abandon the Towne, and yeeld vnto him, Loiſet of Balagni, Mouy, Rubempré, and others of the artierban, with about 200. lances: they compound, leauing horſe and armes, euery man at armes only hath a horſe. The Duke puts a garrifon therein, & likewiſe into Montdidier. Thus he hotly purſues his conqueſts: but Beauuais cooled this heat. He did beleagere it (being vnprouided of men of warre): the inhabitants were commanded then by the foreſaid Balagni, and ſome few men at armes, ſo as they were not able to ſaue the Towne, without the preſent aſſiſtance of him, who doth looſe and reſtraine the raiues of his iuſtice at his pleaſure. At their fiſt approach, the Lord of Cords, leading the vanguard, plants two Canons againſt the gate, makes a great hole, but for want of munition the battery ceaſeth, they come to blowes, the one to enter, the other to defend the entrie, and they preſſe the duke to ſet forward: the defendants ready to be forced, ſet fire on the poſtall, which makes the aſſailants to retire. The Duke arriues, and ſuffers the fire to take his courſe, hoping in the end the towne would be his. And indeed if he had lodged a part of his army towards Paris, there had bin ſmall hope of ſafetie. But God had otherwiſe decreed, for in ſight of the enemies troups, he giues courage to the Earle of D. Martin, to the Marſhalls of Joachim & Loheac, to William of Valleu, the Senefhals Lieutenant of Normandy, to the Lords of Cruſſell & Rubempré to Beine & Tory brethren, to Buill, Sale, 2nd, i heuenot of Vignoles, & Mert of Croy (all braue & worthy of memory in this ſiege) to thruſt themſelues into the towne, with a good number of foot, & about 200. lances: who at their fiſt entrie, giue their horſes to the women (who take them, ſet them vp, & looke vnto them) and preſent themſelues vpon the walles, incouraging the Beauuiſſins, & diſcouraging the Burguignons. The Duke being enraged, makes all his canons to approach, and thunder 15. daies together: he makes a breach, and giues a ſharpe aſſault, but well defended. Six ſcore men are ſlaine, & 1000. being wounded leaue the place, ſo as the Duke retires his companies appointed for the aſſault, and being fruſtrate of his conceiued hope, preſſed by extreme famine, he raiſeth the ſiege, & retires in good order, fearing a charge. But theſe valiant Captaines knew that the beſt courſe was to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. This was on S. Magdelins day, the 26. of the ſiege. A ſmall ayde doth ſometime great good. Beauuais wauered, and was readie to compound

Beauuais beſieged and relieved.

The Duke of Burgogne retires from before Beauuais.

A compound. But what curteſie might they expect of a paſſionate enemy, who breathed nothing but bloud and fire? For the auoiding whereof, louing and kinde dealings were of great moment, which this Towne receiued of thoſe two mighty neighbour Cities, Laris & Orleans, aſſiſting them with pioners, victuals, canon, powder, bowes, arrows, ſpears, tooles, apparell, and other neceſſary reſreſhings, but eſpecially from Orleans, with a hundred pipes of wine, a meanes whereby the eternall prouidence preferred them from ſack, ſpoile, and a generall detolation by fire, wherewith the Burguignons threatened them, if force had preuailed. Beauuais freed, the Duke marcheth into Normandie, and preſently takes Euſ. Valery by Crotoy, Rembures, and (being the ſcourge of this detolator calmed) leaues in all places behinde him the pittifull and cruell markes of his paſſage: he ſpoiles & burnes all the country of Caux, Neuſchattel, of Nicourt, (a good and a great Towne of warre, but vnturniſhed of men) Longueville, le Fachy, euen vnto the gates of Rouen, being little annoyed or hindred by the Conſtable, who lead 400. Lances: whoſe winking ſerued as a Wheelſton to ſharpen the Kings diſpleaſure & hatred againſt him, and the iealouſie of both theſe commanders, hauing of purpoſe entertained this warre betwixt them, who cunningly ſmother a ſecret dillike, which coſt the ſaid Conſtable his life. Then winter approaching, he returns into Picardy, & had no ſooner turned his back, but theſe braue Captaines in Beauuais, recouer Euſ. Valery, Rembures, & ſo caſting themſelues into Noyon, they fruſtrate the Dukes purpoſe, who ment to beſiege it. The Burguignons fire flames yet farther. A ſwarme of his partizans, led by the Earle of Rouſſy, the Conſtables ſonne, falls vpon the Countie of Tonnerre, ſpoiles the country, iunnes as farre as Joigny, and vnto Troyes burnes both farmes & villages without reſiſtance. For reuenge whereof, the Dauphin of Auvergne flies to Bourgogne, drawing after him, where he paſſeth, a burning belome. Pittifull exploits of warre, the witneſſes of reuenging ſpirits, & alwaies the people ſinarts for the error of great men. But behold other troubles, Peter of Bourbon, Lord of Beaueu, being at Leflore, as Lieutenant general for the King in Guienne, was ſurpriſed by the Earle of Armagnac, who was lately diſpoſſeſſed of his lands: who by this meanes recouers the ſaid Towne. Lewis moued with this affront, cauſeth his armie to march, and followeth himſelfe in perſon: but the Cardinal of Arras commanding the troups, receiues the towne by compoſition, makes the Earles appointment: & the better to confirme it, he breakes the ſacrament in two, takes the one halfe, & giues the Earle the other, either of them ſweauiſg this accord. Truſting therein, he abandons the Towne to the Cardinal, who brings in the armie, & by ſome ſouldiers ſuborned, he cauſed the Earle to be murdered ſaying of his praies, not in the Caſtell, but in a private houſe neere to S. Geruais church, and then ſacked the Towne.

The Conſtable diſcombing.

Leflore ſurpriſed, the cauſe of new troubles.

The Earle of Armagnac much reſented by the Cardinal, treacherie.

The priſon of Beaueu, taken by treaſon to the King of France.

Gods iuſtice is ſlow, but in the end it payes home. This Earle had (vnder a falſe Bull of diſpenſation, purchaſed for monney of Ambroſe of Cambray, Referendary to Pope Celeſtus) married his owne Siſter: and after by ſundry rebellions, purchaſed the Kings diſpleaſure, and made himſelfe guilty of diuine and humane treaſon. But abhorring the Earles life, let vs likewise abhor the Cardinals proceeding, ſelling (vnder the holy communion) his bloud to them that truſted in his oath. The King put many Gentlemen in priſon at Loches, who had followed the ſaid Lord of Beaueu, whom the Earle had ſent home: but the chance fel vpon John Deymer, being quartered at Tours, who dying, charged the Lord of S. Baſill, a yonger brother of Albret, with this treaſon, being nourished and bred vp in the houſe of Bourbon, for which crime he loſt his head at Poliers, the 7. of April 1473. And to increaſe Lewis his croſſes, Parpignan (a towne in the Countie of Foſſillon, by treaſon deliuered vp to the King of Arragon, the ancient Lord, where he liued by treaſon to the King of France) which he ſends thither, and beſiegeth it hotly: the French were yet maſters of the Caſtell, by the faithfull valour of maſter James of Fou (iſſued out of the houſe of Britanie) he recouers it, & giues the gouernment to Tanneguy of Chafel. Thus the troubles raiſed by the Earle of Armagnac, and the King of Arragon, were like to a fire of ſtraw.

Let vs obſerue in the ſame courſe, the apprehending of the Duke of Alençon, ſo ſhall we ſee the carriage of our Lewis. He is accuſed to haue offered the ſale of his Duchie and 1473. other lands in Perche and Normandie, to the Bourguignon: and then to follow his fortune, A (a crime which shall put him in minde of his condemnation pronounced at Vermeigne, he was seized on by Tristan the Hermite, Prouost of the Kings house, (a speedy executioner of his Masters will) and lead before the King, who sends him to the Leure at Paris, where by a sentence given by the Chancellor of Oriele, the 17. of July 1474, he was condemned to loose his head, referring notwithstanding the Kings good pleasure, who in the end of the year 75, shall binde him vnto him the second time for his life.

Lewis having recovered Guienne, reduced Lesfore, punished some, and pacified Perpignan he assembles all his forces vpon the Marches of Brittanie, to the number of 30000. men, ready to employ them in that country. But the duke, by reason of the death of the Duke of Guienne, being frustrate of the intelligences he had in France, & too weake to avoid this storme that threatned him, sent vnto the King, lodging at Pont de Sec, Philip of Essars, a gentleman of his house, & Willia of Souplemille, a follower of the Lord of Lesat. His maiestie giues care to an accord. The duke of Brittany being possessed of so wise & valiant a mā as Lesat, might much annoy him: For in Brittany there was neither iniquity nor virtue, but what proceeded from him, (so saies the History.) Moreover he had alwaies during these partialities, shewed himselfe a Frenchman, and would neuer yeeld that any places of Normandie should be given to the Englisb: he must therefore be dealt with. To this end the King commands Souplemille to giue him the demands in writing, which his maister made, as well for the Duke as for himselfe. He doth it, and obtaines them all: fortie thousand Frankes pension for the Duke, the which was paid two yeares. For C his maister, six thousand Frankes pension, the moitie of Guienne, the two Seneschallships of Vannes and Bourdelois, the Captainship of one of the Castles of Bordeaux, that of Flaie, the 2. Castles of Bayonne, of Dax & of S. Seuer: foure & twenty thousand crownes in gilt, payable in foure yeares: the Kings order, and the Countie of Comminges for Souplemille six thousand Crownes, payable at like termes: twelue thousand Frankes pension, the Mairaltie of Bayonne, the Bailiweke of Montargis, and other small preferments in Guienne: for Philip of Essars, foure thousand Crownes in reward, and twelue hundred Frankes pension, the Bailiweke of Meaux, and to be maister of the waters and Forrests of France: which things they should enjoy during the life of Lewis, who was D alwayes well and faithfully serued by Lesat.

Now the Britton is satisfied, and sequestred from the alliance of Fourgonne, against whom Charles now turns head, but the season in the which the Duke of Bourgonne retired into Picardie, caused a truce for one yeare: ending the first of April 1475. A truce which, while the Fourguignen shall giue our French leave to breath, shall imbarke him in so many quarrels, as in the end, the most important shall swallow him vp. A truce likewise concluded to the Constables great prejudice: for both the King and the Duke hated him deadly, as the moitie of these diuisions. He had lately seized on Saint Quintin, expelling the Lord of Curton, and a hundred men at armes, which he had in entertainment from the King. Charles had likewise many causes of his dislike: he was E the instrument to take Amiens and S. Quentin for the King, he sought to reduce him to that estate, as to force him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guienne: but the chiefest ground was, that during the siege of Amiens by the Duke of Bourgonne, the Constable had made a roade into Hainault, spoiled the Country, and burnt (among other exploit) the Castle of Seure belonging to Master Baldwin of Launai, of whom the Duke made good account: for reuenge whereof, he passed into Picardie and Normandie, as we haue scene. Moreover he had mighty enemies both with the King and Duke, who all jointly conspired his destruction, and animated their maisters with all their credit. So all this yeare of truce is spent chiefly in making marchandise of the Constables life. Himbert court S. Hugonnet Chancellor of Bourgonne, had some private F spleene, for in a conference held of late at Roye, where the Constable was employed for the King, they grew so bitter in words, as the Constable had giuen them the lie: to who the Bourguignons modestly answered, That they did not impute this iniurie done vnto them, but to the King, vpon whose word, they were assembled: and to their maister, whose person they did represent, to whome they would make report.

The truce of the King, and Bourgonne was hated against the Constable.

The Duke of Alanson apprehended & condemned to dye, but pardoned by the King.

Warre in Brittanie pacified.

The conditions of the peace.

In the end, at the instance of either part, a day is held at Bouuines: for the King there came the Lord of Curton Gouverneur of Linein, and Maister John Heberge afterwards Bishop of Enreux, and for the Duke, the two aboue named. They pronounced the Constable an enemy, and guilty to both Princes, they promise and sweare one to another, that the first that may apprehend him, shall put him to death within eight daies, or deliver him to his companion to doe his pleasure. That he should be proclaimed by Trumpet, an enemy to both parties, with all those that should serue & assist him, and confiscate all his goods, mouables and immouables. The King promiseth to giue S. Quintin, Han and Bohain to the Duke, with all the money that might be found within the Realme, appertaining to the Constable, and all his lands holding of the Duke, and at a certaine day the King and the Duke should meet before Han, and therewith these armed forces besiege the Constable. But some wil say; to what end serue all these voyages, and so many assemblies? whereto so many complots to intrap the Constable? must the King to be reuenged of his seruant? make an agreement with his capitall enemy, who euen of late had sought to take away his life by poyson, promising a marchant named Ithier fifty thousand crownes to effect it: who hauing imparted it to John Harb his seruant, sometimes in household with the Duke of Guienne, he suffered the said Harb to loose his life, and to be quartered publicly at the Greue of Paris. Lewis iudged of the future by the present, and with one stone gaue many blowes. He disarmed his enemy, or at the least gaue him means to transport his armes farther C on, whether the great desfeins of his ambition did draw him, as we shal see hereafter: and moreover the King could hardly seize vpon the Constables person, without the Dukes intelligence, for he was seated directly betweene both. He held S. Quintin, & had Han and Bohain, his owne places, very strong and neere, he might put in men from whence and when he pleased. Hee had intertainment for foure hundred men at armes well paid, whereby he got much, in not keeping his companies full. He exacted a crowne for every pipe of Wine, passing through his country, into the lowe countries. He had five and forty thousand frankes of ordinary entertainment from the King, very rich seignuries, and great intelligences both within the Realme and in the Dukes countries. He was a man of action, and could both helpe and hurt much. D To conclude, he knew well that flying from the one, he should be well accepted of the other. Moreover, the personage and the places he held, deserued a good peace, & either of the two Princes would gladly haue enjoyed him absolutely, if he had beene constant, and not dissembling to either.

Yet for all this hee auoydes all danger. He is advertised that his head is set to sale, whereupon he sends to both princes, speakes big, and faith, That he vnderstands all their practises, but especially to the King, That the Duke by this conuention sought only to draw him to his party, and to put him in disgrace with his Maiesty, and this did Lewis apprehend most. In truth these two Princes laboured exceedingly, who should deceiue his companion most. According to man, it is better to deceiue, then be E deceiued. Lewis presently countermands his Ambassadors, giues them charge not to conclude any thing against the Constable, but to prolong the truce, so as the foure Ambassadors (who had already mutually giuen their seales, conteyning their resolution taken against the Constable) deliver them vp, and returne without any conclusion.

The King fearing least this affront might force the Constable to make his peace with the Duke, and so deliver vp vnto him S. Quintin and other forts, that were in his power, presents him, giuing him to vnderstand, that an enteruew shall make his peace. They appoint a day and place, three leagues from Noyon towards la Ferre, vpon a little river. The Constable came first, but, as a conscience prickt with the feeling of his misdeeds, wants no distrust and feare, he demaunds hostages. The King seemes to like F well thereof. On the riuers side, they make a strong bar with grates, cry high towards the Constable: there he presents himselfe, accompanied with three hundred Maisters, having armes vnder a loose cassocke. The King approacheth, accompanied with aboue six hundred men at armes, and amongst others Chabannes Earle of Dammartin, Lord of Beauregard, and a mortall enemy to the Constable.

Charles of Beau, is secke to persuade the King.

Lewis and Charles of Bourgonne seeke to circumvent one another.

Lewis reconciled to the Constable.

A presumptuous comming of a subiect to his Seigneigne.

1474. But oh Lord Stuard, but for thy presence, with what colour could the Constable haue shadowed his excuses? At the first entrance he kneeles downe, and beseecheth his maiesty, not to hold it strange, if hee appeere in armes, and thus followed, considering the quarrel he had with Damartin. Then they treat together, the King grants him a generall abolition of all that was passed, he leaues him the gard of S. Quentin, and continues him the pay of his men at armes, being before refrayned of some quarters pay. The Constable promieth to serue his maiesty against all men, without exception, and so he opens the barre and passeth to the Kings side, who reconciles him with the Lord Stuard, and the next day suffers him to returne to Saint Quentin. A presumption of too hard digestion for so iudicious a Prince as Lewis was: to see his officer present himselfe like a Prince that were hisemie, yea his equall in power. But all comes to one end, if we will haue patience. The Court could not endure this manner of proceeding, and the murmuring which Lewis heares, makes him remember, that it is too great a presumption in a seruant to plant a barre before his master, and to present himselfe vnto him accompanied with men at armes, all being his subiects and vnder his pay, and to bate in him, to go and receiue the submission of his Constable. A folly approaching neere to that of Peronne.

Wherewith
Lewis inwardly discontented.

Good obser-uations for subiects.

And it which shall much incense the Kings hatred against him, and breede a worme in the Constables conscience, the which shall gnaw him with continual disquiet, doubtfull howe to maintaine himselfe betwixt two such mightie enemies: but in the end he must fall, to teach vs, That neyther our merits, nor any seruices wee can do to our Princes, should cause so great presumption, as to thinke they could not liue without vs: or that we haue meanes to prescribe them a lawe. For naturally they hate such as thinke they are beholding vnto them: and dispatch them at length that haue braued them. Good deeds are pleasing, whilst that he which receiues them hath meanes to recompence them: but when they are so great, or we wil esteeme them so, as they are beyond all compasse of requitall: in steed of thanks, we receiue nothing but hatred and illwill. It is therefore better to be loued, then feared.

Lewis marrieth his two daughters.

Let vs now see what passed during the truce. Lewis hauing his minde free, and his bodie discharged of armes, hee resolues to provide for his heires. Doubtlesse the choice which he made of two Princes of his bloud, did testifie, how much he did cherish his house, giuing them two precious perles out of his Iewell house. Anne his eldest daughter of Bourbon, a goodly Princeesse, and Jeane the yongest to Lewis Duke of Orleans, being yet very yong, and afterwards the 57. King of France: whereunto he did not yeeld but to please the King, for she was foule and crooked. This season is likewise famous for a notable Ambassage from Arragon, touching the affaires of Roussillon. The King making the Ambassadors to iudge of the whole peace by a patterne, caneth the 20. of Aprill a hundred and foure thousand men armed in battaile, all in onefloure, with red cassocks crossed with white, all officers, Bourgeses and inhabitants of Paris.

Adolfe an vn-kind sonne.

We haue sayd, this truce should proue an incoimber to the Duke of Bourgogne, let vs examine the effects by the causes. At what time the King tooke Amiens from the Bourguignons, Adolfe the pernicious and vnkinde sonne of Arnold Duke of Guelldres, repynning at his fathers long life, tooke him prisoner one night going to bed: and making him to march on foote without hose, in a most cold season, five germaine leagues, he shuts him in the bottome of a Tower, whereas the sunne did neuer shine, but by a small grate, and there he held him six monethes. The Duke of Cleues, whose sister the prisoner had married, undertakes his quarrell, and seeks by force to free his brother in law. But Adolfe hauing married the Duke of Bourbons sister, in the Bourguignons house finds great fauour. So the Duke of Bourgogne labors to reconcile them. The Emperour deales in it, but all without effect, vntill the Pope had interposed his authority, who commanded Charles of Bourgogne, vnder great penalties, to drawe the old man by force out of prison, seeing his sonne would not enlarge him by intreaty. Adolfe on the one side, seeing so many Potentates busied in this action, and on the other side fearing the Dukes

A Dukes forces, hee releaseth Arnold, who in the sayd Dukes chamber, (notwithstanding the inequality betwixt the father & the son, offers his son the combate. Charles seeks to reconcile them, to the sonnes aduantage: to whom hee offers the title of Gouverneur of Bourgogne, the Country of Guelldres, with all the reuenues, only Grake, a small Towne should remaine to the father, with three thousand Florins of rent, and so much pension, & the title of Duke. But oh impious and horrible answer. I had rather (saies Adolfe, to those that deliuered this speche vnto him) to haue cast my father headlong into a ditch, and cast my selfe after him, then accept of this accord: he hath bin Duke these 44. years, it is now time that I were. I wil willingly leaue him three thousand Florins a yeare, upon condition that he neuer enter into the Dukedome: with many other words vnworthy of a Sonne. Charles grieved at the obstinacy of Adolfe, leaues both father and sonne at Dourlans, & retires to Hedin. Adolfe to recouer the Country, disguiseth himselfe, like a Frenchman, & passing a ferrie, neere vnto Namur, hee is discovered by a Priest, who giues intelligence, wherevpon this yong Duke is taken and carried prisoner to Namur, where he remained vntill the death of the Duke of Bourgogne, that the Gantois deliuered him, hoping by force to make him marrie with Mary the heire of Bourgogne, afterwards Duchesse of Austria, after the folly they had made him commit before Tournay, a fatall place, for the reuenge of the wrongs he had done to his father.

The father
challengeth the sonne to the combats.

Adolfe taken prisoner.

Arnold died during *Adolfe*s imprisonment, whose ingratitude had iustly mooued him to leaue the succession to the Duke of Bourgogne. So Charles building vpon this donation, goes with force to take possession of the Duchie. This new conquest bred new proiects, and euen then he conceived such an imagined authority, as in the end he sinke vnder the burthen. He neuer had so goodly an army, especially in horse. The Earle of Campobasso, and Galeot a Neapolitain gentleman, (the first a Greeke in disposition and most wicked, the second a very honest man,) commanded a thousand men at armes, Italiens: hee had three thousand good English, and good numbers of his owne subiects, well mounted, well armed, and of long time trayned vp in warre, with great store of artillery. He was at truce with our King, and to keepe him occupied, the English by his practice were readie to land in France. What then should he suffer his men to lue idle without employment? Guelldres had encouraged him. The Emperour was no man of resolution, willing rather to endure some disgraces, then to be at charge, & without the aide of some Princes of Germany his power was small. These baits thrust him forwards, but the expiration of the truce might haue stayed him. Yet he obtaines a prolongation of the King for six monethes, wherunto Lewis yeelds willingly. Foreseeing (as he had a more sound iudgement then those which did dissuade him) that this Prince sought his owne mine: that hauing finished one enterprise, another would spring vp, & so quarrell grow vpon quarrell, which the Princes of Germanie would well preuent, being alwayes united in matters which concerne the Emperour. So it chanced. And as in so great a proiect, he must needs wonderfully discōtent the nobility & cōmunalties of Germany: so was it expedient for him, to tie some vnto him. He procures an interview with the emperour at Treues, & there treats of the mariage of Mary of Bourgogne his daughter with Maximilian Archduke of Austria, the Emperours son: which done, the Emperour should erect his lands & seigneuries in Gaulle Belgique, to a royalty: he should incorporate foure Bishopricks to this new kingdō, wherof the royalty should appertaine vnto him & not to the Emperour, & should creat him vicar general of the Empire. Fredric findes these demands so vnreasonable, as he leaues the Duke Bourgogne at Treues, & parts without bidding him farewell. And now an other occasiō thrusts him on. He that hath once missed the bounds of modesty, must needs grow exceeding impudēt. Two contended for the Archbishopske of Colongne, the one was brother to the Lantgrane of Hessen, the other a kinsman to the Conte Palatine of Rhin, whom the aduerse faction had expelled. Charles was banded for the latter, & undertakes to restore him by force, hoping to plant his ensignes in Germany, or at the least to haue some part for his charges. He first comes to Naz vpon the Rhin: some leagues from Colongne, supposing (that if he tooke it) to fortify it well, & the to plant an other forte about Colongne, by the surpris of some towne of importance, thereby to force the towne to yeeld, and so to mount vp the Rhin vnto the County 1474. Countie of Ferrete (the which he held in pawne, of Sigismond Duke of Austria, brother A to the Emperour) and so to command all that great and rich passage of the Rhin, euen vnto Holland, where it ends. thereby to deuour Lorraine, and so without the Emperours ayde, to vsurpe the title of King of Sicile and Ierusalem. But Nuz was not vnturnished. The Landgrau of Hessen had cast himselfe into it, with many of his kinsmen, and friends, to the number of eightene hundred horse, with a sufficient number of foote, to keepe the place. The Citizens of Colongne with their neighbours, armed sixteene thousand foote, and incampe vpon the Rhin, right against the Duke, to cut off his victuals that came out of Guelldres, and to stay the boats with their Cannon.

The English
prepare for France.

The Emperour, and Princes, both spirituall and temporall do arme, & as the King had often solicted them; they send vnto him to make a triall of his intent, Lewis saies B not to graunt what they demanded, promising twenty thousand men, when as the Imperiall army should be at Colongne. But he had worke at home. Edward King of England discontented, that Lewis had supported Henry, and the Earle of Warwicke, against him, prepares (in the Bourguignons fauour) fiftene hundred maisters, all Gentlemen well mounted, and the most part barded, which made a great number of horse, & 14000. Archers all on horse-backe, with a great number of foote. The Duke of Brittaine hauing already consented to rebellion, should receiue three thousand English, and ioyned his army with them, as appeared by letters, written by the hand of Vise, sometimes master of the Kings horse, and then seruant to the Britton (the one letter to the king of England, the other to Hastings great Chamberlaine of the said realme) the which the King did buy of a Secretary of England, for three score markes of siluer.

Lewis seeks for a peace of the Duke of Bourgonne.
& is refused.

In the meane time, the King treats of a peace with the Duke of Bourgonne, to preuent this storme, or at the least to prolong the truce. The Duke excuseth himselfe vpon his word given to the English, who labours to drawe the Duke from Nuz, exhorting him to accomplish the conuenitions, considering his great charge, and that the season fit for warre, was almost spent. To this end, the Lord Scales, Nephew to the Constable, makes two iournies to Charles, who pretends (by frivolous reasons) that his honour is much ingaged in this siege, and that hee could not rise without great blame.

Lewis procures to Charles many enemies.

Lewis to crosse him, being alwayes his crafts master in any action, eyther of warre, D or peace, procures him many and new enemies. It was no matter of difficulty to draw in René the sonne of the daughter of René King of Sicile, the heire of Lorraine, by reason of his grandmother, after the death of John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, his uncle, and of the Marquis Nicholas sonne to the said John. For the Duke being dead, Charles of Bourgonne desirous to vniute this Duchy to his country, had caused him to be taken prisoner: but he was deliuered in exchange for a young Germaine Prince, who was taken studying at Paris: and marching presently with his army, hee had easily deuoured that preie, if the King following him, had not forced him to passe on.

René Duke of Lorraine.

René therefore sends to desie him before Nuz, and fortified by some French troupes, E commanded by the Lord of Craon, he enters the Duchy of Luxembourg, spoyle the country, and razeth Pierre-forte, a place of the said Duchy, and neere to Namie. Sigismond of Austria, had in the yeare 1469. ingaged his countie of Ferrete, to the Duke of Bourgonne, with all the lands he enioyed on eyther side the Rhin, for three score and ten thousand Crownes. Charles had placed Peter of Hagenbach there for Gouernour, a wicked man, a violent extortioner, and insupportable, both to the nobility & people, who complained to Sigismond, beseeching him to succour them against the outrage, & concussions of Hagenbach. Sigismond had bene long in dislike with the Suisses, his neighbours, but by the Kings meanes, they were all easily reconciled.

Sigismond
Archduke of Austria.

So they conclude a league, in the which the imperiall Cities ioyned, Strasbourg, Basill, Colmar, and Slestad, and contribute to furnish the summe due by Sigismond to Charles, the which they configne into the hands of a banker at Basill: then the inhabitants of these ingaged lands, signifie vnto the Duke of Bourgonne, that they they hold themselves freed of the oath they had made vnto him. And holding them- 1474. selves freed from the Bourguignons obedience, they reiect his Lieutenant generals commands. To suppress the same, he assembles a great troupe of Picardes, Flemings, Hennuers and Lombards, and on Chistmas day at night (a good woike on a good day) hee seekes to bring them secretly into Enshem. The Citizens beate them back, kill and take many, the rest flee to Brizac with Hagenbac. The Brizanzons arme, and are the stronger, they seize on the gouernor, expell the soldiars, and then do they speedily informe of his misdemeanors, giuing intelligence to all their allies, and demand Iudges to iudge of the proceffe. They depute, some from Alsatia, Strasbourg, Basill, Sorgoye of the blacke forest, Fribourg, Berne, Soleure, and other places, who condemne Hagenbach to be hanged at Ihan, without any forme of Lawe: to haue made and displaced officers at his pleasure contrarie to his oath, to haue brought in foraine nations into places with all liberty, and for that he had rauished women, forced virgins, and committed incest with Nunnes. The Duke of Bourgonne aduertised of the death of Hagenbach, reuelues to be reuenged of such as had bene actors. And hereupon Henry Earle of Vittemberg and Montbeliard, is taken by the Dukes men. Those of Basill aduertised hercof, send a number of men with artillery to Montbeliard, to stop the Bourguignons passage, who summons the Castell: the which refusing to yeeld, he sends six thousand horse, vnder the commande of Stephen Hagenbach, to reuenge his brothers death, and to make war vpon C the Bishop of Basill, who (whilest that Sigismond assembles his confederats) spoiles about thirty villages, kille, takes, carries away, and ransomes, men, women, children and catde. Behold a strong party made against Charles of Bourgonne, by the Kings policy, whereby the Suisses entering into Bourgonne, take Elasmont, beleage Hericourt, defeat the Bourguignons that come to succor it, and kill two thousand: which done they retyre.

Open warre betwixt the Duke of Bourgonne
and the Suisses.

The truce nowe expired, as the King had vnderhand stirred vp the Duke of Lorraine, the Germains and the Suisses against the Duke of Bourgonne, sufficiently busied before Nuz, he now by open force takes from him, spoiles, and burnes Trougnoy, Montdidier, Roye, Montreuil, and Corbye: and then sends the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France D General of this army, before Arras, and thereabouts, who spoiles and consumes with fire most of the places lying betwixt Abbeville and Arras. The Inhabitants of Arras force their men of warre to go to field, vnder the commande of the Earle of Rhemont the Queenes brother. But the Admirall hauing layed a strong ambuth, sends forth about forty Lances to draw forth the Townsmen, who falling out as an assured victorie, are compassed in like partridges in a net: defeated, chased and flaine to the number of foureene or fiftene hundred, many are taken prisoners, and of the better sort, James of S. Paul the Constables brother, the Lords of Contay, Carenty and others. At that time the King did let the Prince of Orange at liberty, (being of the house and bearing the armes of Chalon), taken in warre being set at thirty thousand Crownes ran- E some, the which the King did moderate to ten thousand: and caused it to be presently payed to the gentleman that held him, by meanes whereof he became the Kings Liege man, and did him homage for the said Principality. So as the King gaue him power to iurisdiction, by the grace of God Prince of Orange, and to coyne money of gold and siluer of as high a standayd as that of Daulphiné: to grant all graces, remissions, and pardons, but for heresie and treason.

Privileges granted to the Prince of Orange by Louis.

This transaction, with the former prizes, did wonderfully discontent the Constable, iealous of the Kings good successe: and fearing likewise some checke by to mightie an army, which the Admirall and the Earle of Dammartin had at his gate. For the aduancing whereof, he giues the King a false intelligence, that the English were at sea, ready to land at Calais: he perswades the King to prouide for the places of Normandie: he prometh faithfully to defend the marches of Picardie; and in his Masters absence to reduce Abbeville and Peronne to his obedience.

The Constables malice.

But let vs heare another notable part of trechery: hee seekes by all meanes to weaken

1475. weaken the King, and yet would he not fortifie the Bourguignon: but that the Englsh should crosse both their Estates, that his owne might stand firme in the muck of their confusions. With this dessein, he procures the Duke of Bourgonne, to send Philip Bouton and Philip Pot Knights, to the Duke of Bourbon, and he for his part sends Hector of Escluse, to signifie vnto him, that the Englsh would soone land: that the Duke of Bourgonne, and he the Constable, ioyning all their powers together, would easily conquer the Realme: exhorting him (for the auoiding of his owne ruine and his Countie) to ioyne with them: the which if he refuse, and that it fall out ill for him, he was not to be pittied.

The Constable seeks to suborne the Duke of Bourbon.

Mournful prelates to the Constable.

The Duke of Bourbon sends the King two letters of this tenor, brought to him at diuers times by Escluse: who makes answer to the Duke and Constable; that neyther promises nor threats should drawe him from the obedience and faithfull seruice hee did owe vnto his maiesty. Lewis will produce these letters to the Constables confusion; in the end of the next yeare. For the present, hee must assure his frontiers. There is no newes yet of the Englsh. Lewis markes well this chafe, and will cause the Constable (who supposed himselfe to haue the aduantage of the game) to loose the partie. Poore Nobleman, howe many misfortunes foretell they approaching ruine. Thy Brother prisoner. Thy wife dead at the same instant, one of the chiefest pillars of thy house: who as sister to the Queene, might at neede haue preferred thy head: Thy Nephewe Scalpe prisoner, with the instructions he brought from England to the Bourguignon. And to fill vp the measure, thy sonne the Earle of Roussy defeated at Grey in Bourgonne, and prisoner with the Duke of Bourbon, who shall not leaue him vntill the end of the yeare, (for fortie thousand Crownes ransom) with the losse of two hundred men at armes, Lombards, the Baron of Couches and many others. The Marshall of Bourgonne, sonne to the Earle of Saint Martin, two sonnes of the house of Viteaux, whereof the one was Earle of Isigny, the Lords of Longey, Lisle, Digoine, Montmartin, Ragny, Chaligny, the Bayliffe of Auxerre, the Enseigne bearer to the Lord of Beauchamp, and many others, cleaped death but not imprisonment.

Sufficient warnings to amaze a resolute minde. Hereafter the Constable is afflicted with strange distemperatures fed with the neighbourhood of the Earle of Dammartin, being lodged neere S. Quentin whome he knewe to be none of his friends. And fearing least the King should assault him, he sends to take assurance of the Duke of Bourgonne, intreating him to send him his brother James of Saint Paul, the Lord of Fiennes, and some other his kinsmen and friends, to put them into Saint Quentin, and to keepe the Towne at the Dukes deuoroi (without bearing the Saint Andrewes crosse) the which he promised to restore vnto him within a prefixed time.

The Constable seeks to the Duke of Bourgonne & deceiues him.

They come: they present themselves within viewe of Saint Quentin, once, twice and thrice: but the Constable suspects them, and sends them backe. They came still, eether too soone or too late: so as at the brui of these forces, the Admirall casts himselfe in to Arras, whereof followed the taking of James of Saint Paul: who being brought before the King, hauing liberty to speake, he confessed, that at the two first iourneyes, hee came onely with an intent to comfort his brother: but at the third time, seeing the Constable had deceyued both his Master and him, if he had bene the stronger, hee would haue kept the place for his Master, without offering any violence to his brother: whereupon his maiesty set him at libertie, very well appointed, seruing him vnto his death.

Lewis dissembles with the Constable.

And although the Constable had lately done a notable disgrace vnto the King, yet his maiesty dissembled it wisely: and to take from him all cause of ieaousie, he willed him to go and make warre in Hainault, and to beseege Auennes, whilest that the Admirall was busied in Artois. He goes, but very loath, and with exceeding feare, and staies but little: he retires betimes, being aduertised (as he informed the King) of two men in his army (whome he described by apparent signes) suborned to kill him. This newe feare accompanied with distrust, bred a terrible distemperature in the Constables head, who hauing lost his credit both with the King and Duke, will yet entertayne himselfe

He accuseth Lewis, that he sought to kill him.

1475. himselfe by both, and perswade them that he is seruant but to one. He sent often to the Bourguignons campe to drawe him from the seige of Nuz, that he might ioyne fitly with the Englsh at coming on land; & then vpon the returne of his messengers, he gaue the King some plausible intelligence, to cause him to like of his conference with the Duke, sometimes disgracing his affaires, to winne the credit of an affectionate seruant with Lewis, sometimes extolling the Duke, to terrifie the King. But oh policie simply shadowed.

On the other side, hee knewe well that he had greatly offended the King by his last action. He sees himselfe forsaken by his most confident seruants, Ienlis and Mouy, whome the King had receiued. These might haue assisted him in his peace making, the which hee shadowed with some recompence that the King had promised him for the County of Guise. Lewis heares them, giues them good words, and commands the Constable to come vnto him. But it is a grieuous testimony, the conscience of our misdeeds. The variety of his troubled thoughts, will not admit any easie beleefe. Hee offers to come, so as his Maiesty wil sweare vpon the Crosse of S. Law, that he will neyther do, cause, nor suffer any treachery nor outrage to bee done to his person. This crosse hath bene kept at Angiers time out of minde, with an old beleefe, That whosoever swearing thereon, doth forswear himselfe, he dies within the yeare, of a miserable & violent death. Lewis refuseth this oath, but submitts himself to any other. The more he executeth himselfe, the more the Constable presseth him. Thus posts hee hourly froe eether of them vpon this assurance. Behold two great personages, of sundry humours, wonderfully troubled in minde, and it seemed they feared alike, to perish orto separate themselves absolutely. Yet Lewis was the more cunning, & did his busines more covertly. But if these two afflicted themselves in this sort, Edward of England and Charles of Bourgonne were in no lesse doubt one of an other. The King had sent John Tierclip the Lord of Brosse, to make his excuse vnto the Emperour, for that he had not sent the army promised by the treaty, assuring him to do it, when he had ended his enterprises begun, & for the most part well forward both in Bourgonne and Picardie, intreating him in the meane time not to make any agreement with the duke: & that the one should not treat of peace without the other. That he should confiscate all the Dukes seigneuries that he held of the Empire: and that he would seize vpon such as depended on the Crowne of France as, Flanders, Arthois, Bourgonne, and many others.

Lewis sends an Ambassadeur to the Emperour.

Charles in great perplexitie.

The Emperour, a man of more wit then vertue, answers by a gentle Apology. That they must not diuide the beares skin, before the beast be dead. As if he should say. Come according to your promise, let vs take this man, and then weare his spoiles. Let vs now see what he doth before Nuz where we haue left him much perplexed how to free himselfe with his honor from that enterprife. Two mighty armies attended him, and cutts off his visualls both aboue and beneath the Rhin: all the Princes of Germany both spirituall and temporall, had ioynd their forces in infinit numbers; all the Townes and commonalties did willingly contribute to this charge. Two other considerations did trouble him. The king made great warre against him, and had burnt many places in Bourgonne, Picardie, Arthois and Ponthieu. Moreouer, hee had labored all his life to drawe in the Englsh, but without any effect, till now: and would he abandon so good an army, passing now betwixt Douer and Calais, complayning of his breach, threatening (if the delay it any longer) to take an other course? Yet must the Bourguignon finde some honorable pretext for his rising.

There was with the Emperour an Apostolike Legat, going from army to army, to mediate a peace. The King of Denmarke was there in person, for the same effect. In the end the place is deliuered into the Legats hands, to dispose as the sea of Rome should decree. Thus Nuz after a yeares seige, sees the Bourguignon dislodge, with the losse of four thousand of his choise men. A hard departure, that notwithstanding the necessity of his army, and this mighty Imperiall power, yet not daring to disgrace him, he did see the beleeged and Cittizens ouercome with hungar and toyle, who had bin forced within ten dayes to yeeld to his mercy. Charles would willingly haue bin reuenged

He leaues the seige of Nuz.

1475 of René for his desie: yet he forbears vntil the next yeaer, but with an other issue then he expected he shalbe well beate[n] and then slaine. At this time vrgent necessity draves him else where: and his troups hauing need to be refreshed, he sends them to liue vpon the spoiles of Lorraine and Barr, and himselfe with a small traine goes to meet Edward at Calais. Edward being yet at Douer, sends Garter his King at armes, a Normand by nation, to Lewis, with a letter of defiance, the tenor wherof finelt more of the French then the English. He summons him, To yeeld vnto him the realme of France, as his right, that he might restore the Church, Nobility and people to their ancient liberties, and free them from their great burthens and afflictions: and vpon his refusal, he protests of all the miseries that should follow: after the accustomed manner and forme in suchlike cases. A bare desie grounded vpon occasion long before debated, and often decided. The King reads the letter: comands the herald to be brought into a Chamber vnto him, being alone, and saies vnto him.

Edward desies the King.

The policie of Lewis.

That he knew well the King of England was thrust into this enterprife by the people of England: by the Duke of Bourgogne, and by the Constable of Saint Paul. That the Duke came from Nuz like a vanquished man and needy, that winter grew on, vsfit for the effects of warre. That the Constable would deceiue King Edward, & liue only in his dissimulations, entertraying euery man, and trusting no man. In the end, he sollicitis Garter, to perswade his Maister, to make an agreement with him, giuing him 3 hundred Crownes with his owne hand, and promise of a thousand, if it might be accomplished: and in publicke, he caused a goodly peece of crimson veluet to be giuen him, containing thirty elles.

The Herald promisseth to do his best endeaueur, aduising him to send a Herald, to obtaine a safe conduct, for the sending of Ambassadors, at what time as Edward should haue passed the sea: who at his first entrie findes himselfe much deceiued of his expectation, for the Duke had promised to ioine with him, with two thousand five hundred men at armes, with a great number of other house and fore: and for his assurance to put some strong places into his hands, namely Saint Quintin, relying vpon the Constable. That finding the King overcharged, and redy to receiue a mate, he should begin the warres in France, three moneths before the leading of the English army: but his army was so weake and poore, as he durst not shew it.

The first cause of Edwards discontent against Charles.

Let vs here acknowledge an other notable fauour of God to this Crowne, who had so blinded the iudgment of this Duke, as he continued obstinate and wilfull, before this strong place resolutely defended, where as he should haue attended the English. We confesse that both together would haue dangerously shaken the estate of this realme. So the English and Bourgiugnon part from Calais, passe by Boullen, and drave towards Peronne: where thinking to lodge: they were disapointed: which gaue some dislike vnto the English.

An other error of the Bourgiugnon in at discontentis the English.

Being at Peronne, the constable sends Lewis of Crenille to the Duke of Bourgogne, excusing himselfe, for not deliuering vp of Saint Quintin, whereby (said he) he should haue lost all his credit, and intelligence in France, and hereafter be altogether vnprofitable for him. But he was now wholly at his deuotion, seeing the King of England within the realme. Moreover he promisseth the saide Duke, To serue and succour him, and all his friends and allies, as well the King of England, as others, and against all men, without any exception: and intreats him, that that writing of his owne hand may serue as a gage of credit with the sayd King. The Duke giues his letter vnto Edward, assuring him moreover, that the Constable should not only giue him entrance into Saint Quintin, but into all his other places.

The Constables timorous excuse.

He deceases both King, Edward and Duke Charles.

Both the King and Duke beleueed it. The King, for that he had married the Constables Neece: the Duke, for that the Constable was in so great feare and distrust of our Lewis, as it seemed he should not dare to faile of his promises. They part from Peronne, and approaching neere Saint Quintin, they send some English troups before, to enter the Towne, as to the taking of a certain possession. But the Negro (saith the proverbe) changeth not his hewe. The signall they giue them of their approach neere vnto them, are skirmishes and Canon shot. Two or three English are slaine, and some taken, and so they recover their armie, greatly discontented with this dishonour. The Bourgiugnon, to colour this foule and treacherous part, pretends the Constables meaning to be verie good: that he could not couer the yeelding thereof, with any apparent pretext, if at the simple sight of so small troups he should be amazed: that he would be forced therevnto, and if all the whole armie marched, he would make no refusal. But these were selfs: he desired but to winne time, and not to shew himselfe enemy for any man. The next day Charles of Pourgongne takes his leaue of Edward, promising to returne speedily with all his forces.

The Constable supported by Charles.

Edward and his men had small practise in the estate of our realme, they are not those braue warriors which had so long gouerned our France: they needed conduct & direction to fashion them to our armes, without the which they know themselves at their first annall to be vnprofitable: but in a short time they are fashioned and become good fouldiers. In the meane time they are abandoned, and the season of doing any thing almost past: they must therefore resolute. And thus the King discouers, that Edward would agree. The English had taken the seruant of James Graffe, a Gentleman of the Kings house, but for that he was their first prisoner, Edward giues him liberty. At his departure, Howard and Stanley, (both in credit with Edward) said vnto him: Recommend us to the King your maister, if you may speake vnto him. (Garter the Herald had named these two, to obtaine a passport for the Ambassadors that Lewis should send to create.) This message bred some iealousie in the Kings head, who then was at Compienne: for Gilbert the brother of James Graffe, followed the Duke of Brittanie, and was in great credit: but being carefully examined, they finde, he deserued credit. Lewis remembers the direction the Herald had giuen him: and sodenly takes this resolution with himselfe, To send a seruant, the sonne of Meridol of Rochel, belonging to the Lord of Halles (or Scalles) in qualitie of a Herald. This seruant had his countenance and personage very vnpleasing, yet a good wit, and a sweet speech. But why did Lewis make choise of a seruant, whom he had neuer seene but once, amongst so many thousands more capable of that charge? he might disauow him if need required, as intruding himselfe, or at the least aduenturing without his priuitie: and at all hazards, the loss of a seruant was not great.

An other error in the Duke of Bourgogne.

A notable circumstance.

A counterfeit Herald.

But well chosen, and why.

This Herald fashioned after the Kings minde, hath his charge deliuered him, and is attired with a coate of Armes, made likewise in hast, of a Trumpets Banner, enameled like a pettie Herald, that belonged to the Admirall. and then he goes to horseback, without any mans priuitie, except Villiers, Maister of the horse, and the Lord of Argenton. Being arrived at the English armie, he is brought before the King, to whom he deliueis his charge: That the King his maister had long desired to haue good amitie with him, to the end that both their realmes might hereafter liue in peace: That since his coming to the crowne he had neuer made warre, nor attempted any thing against the Crowne of England. If he had receiued the Earle of Warwicke, it was onely to crosse the Duke of Bourgogne: That the Duke of Bourgogne should not haue procured his passage into France, but to make his peace with more aduantage with the King. If any others were actors (meaning the Constable) it was but to serue their owne turnes in crossing him, and to worke their priuate profits, not regarding the affaires of England. When now Winter grew on: that his Armie was not railed without exceeding charge, (it was secretly to offer a recompence of all or part, which was a great perswader to peace.) That such as nourished this warre betwixt them, were some Noblemen and Marchants, who made their profit of the peoples losse: That if the King of England would giue care to a treatie, the King his Maister would imbrace it with so great affection, as both himselfe and his realme should remaine well satisfied. And for proofe, if it pleased him to graunt a safe conduct for a hundred horse, the King would send Ambassadors vnto him well informed of his pleasure. vnlesse he desired a mutual interview in some place, mid-way betwixt both Armies, then the King should graunt a safe conduct for his part.

The policie of Lewis.

Ambassadors sent frō both
the Kings.

These speeches please, and this counterfeit Herald returnes with a safe conduct, as he desired, accompanied with an other Herald, to carrie one from the King with the same tenor. The next day, the Ambassadors of either side meete, in a village neere to Amiens: For the King, came the Bastard of Bourbon Admirall, the Lord of S. Pierre, and Heberge Bishop of Eureux. For Edward, came Howard, Sellenger, and Doctor Morton, afterwards Chancellor of England, and Archbishop of Canterburie. In truth it was much to to humble himselfe, but the waighie burthen of affaires which oppressed our King, forced him therevnto, who with one stone gaue two stroakes: for Lewis sent back his enemy, to the great confusion of the Duke of Bourgogne. Let vs generally confesse, that it is not now alone, that God doth shew his singular grace and fauour to this Monarchie; The Britten was watchfull, and ioyntly with the Bourguignon, they practised crosses of dangerous consequence.

The Englsh from a generall demand of the Crowne of France, restraints himselfe to the Duchie of Normandie, or Guienne. But a franke demander, requires a bold denier. Lewis protests, that hee would doo any thing to send the King of England out of this realme: but to yeeld him the possession of any lands, hee will rather put all to hazard. Hee had a goodly and mighty army, which they esteemed (saith the Originall) a hundred thousand fighting men, and in thew might doo much, the Englsh being in bad termes with the Bourguignon. But the quietest courte is the best, and both being willing to agree, an accord is soone made. In the end, the King graunts the Englsh three-score and twelue thousand Crownes present payment: (Paris lent the money, C upon promises of restitution by the feast of All Saints next following,) the marriage of Charles with the eldest daughter of King Edward, (both being yet very young, neither shall it take effect,) and for the estate of her house, the Duchie of Guienne, or fiftie thousand Crownes yearly, payable in the Tower of London, for nine yeares following; at the end whereof, hee and his wife quietly to enjoy the reuenues of the sayd Duchie, and the King should remaine discharged of the payment of 50000. Crownes to King Edward.

Moreover, the King promised sixteene thousand Crownes pension, to some of Edward's favorites, who had much assisted in this reconciliation: to Hastings two thousand, to Howard, to John Chene Maister of the Horse, to Sellenger, Montgomeri, and D some others, the remainder: and besides, there was great store of Silver and Plate distributed among King Edward's seruants: to euery Saint had his candle. These conditions performed, Edward should repasse the Sea, and leaue Howard and the Maister of his Horse in hostage, untill he had recovered England: yet not without an interview of both Kings. This peace should continue nine yeares, comprehending the the Dukes of Bourgogne and Frittanie, if they pleased. The Bourguignon hearing these newes, hastes his returne to the Englsh, followed onely with sixteene hundred Horse; At his first arriual hee discouers his inward passions, by his outward countenance. But hee came too late to prevent it. Edward tells him, that hee had made a truce for nine yeares, and exhorts him to enter, according to the reservation E he had made.

Charles replies by fits, and after a reprochfull manner; That Edward's Predecessors Kings of England, had performed many high exploits in France, and with much sweate and toyle had wonne great reputation. Hee checketh him that hee did not procure the Englsh to passe, for any neede he had, but onely to giue them occasion to recover their ancient inheritance. And to make it manifest, that hee had no neede of their comming; hee would not accept of any truce with the King, untill that Edward had beene three monethes in his owne Country. And hauing thus sayd, hee returnes towards Luxembourg, from whence hee came. A brauadoe of ill digestion to the Englsh and his Counsell, but plausible to all the friendes of confusion.

But what is become of our Constable? is there no speech of him during this treatie. Nowe is hee more incombred with feare then euer. Hee knowes well, that

The Constable perplexed

A that he hath displeased the King, the Englsh and the Bourguignon, all alike, and still hee apprehends the conclusion at Bouuines. In the meane time hee seekes to please all, and setteth a good face on it. Edward had freely made offer to the French Ambassadors, to name some Noblemen, that were Traitors (sayd hee) to the King and his Crowne, and to proue it by their hand-writings.

The King holds a Counsell vpon this matter: some maintayne, that this accusation is fraudulent, and that the Englsh would make his demandes the greater with the wracke of an others honour, as hauing good intelligence in France. But Lewis his iudgement was more sharpe, hee knewe the Bourguignons courtes, he considered the season: that the Englsh had not any one place in their hands, and that the Bourguignon had deceyued them. Moreover hee knewe well, that the Constable would not giue them any entry: and least he should be farther imbarcked in the league, the King entertayned him with many letters, and kept him in good humour: and the Constable likewise sent often to the King: yet alwayes swimmyng betwixt two streames, vnderstanding that the treaty betwixt the two Kings, grew to some perfection, he seemed well satisfied, and sends Lewis of Crenille a gentleman of his house, and John Richer his Secretary: advising the King, that to auoide this threatening foraine tempest hee should procure a truce: & to satisfie the Englsh, it were good to graunt them one or two final Townes to winter in. Hee supposed in doing this, the Englsh should be beholding to him, and to rest fully satisfied for the affront at Saint Quentin.

C Note alwaies, that Lewis was a wonderfull instrument of diuision, when he pleased. Contay a prisoner at the defeat of Arras, went and came vpon his faith to the Duke of Bourgogne, to treat a peace. Hee was by chance in Court at the comming of these two perions. The King hides him in his Chamber behinde the hangings, to heare and report to his master the speeches the Constable and his people held of him. Crenille by the Kings commandement; with a loud voice, sayd, that the Constable had sent the to the Duke of Bourgogne, with many instructions, to diuide him from the Englsh; and that they had found the sayd Duke so farre incensed, as by their perswasions he was not onely readie to abandon them, but to charge them in their retreat. Crenille in speaking this, did counterfer the gesture of a passionate Prince, stamping and D swearing, S. George (the oath of Charles of Bourgogne), saying that he called the King of England, Blanchborne, and the sonne of an Archer, whose name he carried: words accompanied with all the indignities that might bee spoken. This mooued laughter in the King, who taking pleasure at the repetition thereof, and seeming somewhat deaffe, made him to straine his voice in the report. Contay no lesse amazed then the King was pleased, would neuer haue beleued it, if he had not heard it.

And although it grieved the King much to dissemble the Constables counsell, to giue some places to the Englsh; yet would hee not discouer his discontent to these deputies, but answered them graciously: I wil send to my Brother (the Queene & the Constables wife were Sisters) and let him vnderstand my minde, hauing cunningly drawn a E promise from his Secretary to reueale what did concerne him. And at the same instant hee dispatcheth Contay to the Duke his master with letters of credit, of the Kings owne hand: and somewhat to satisfie the Constable, hee giues the Englsh Eu and S. Valerey to lodge in during the treaty of peace.

In the meane time, (oh notable trechery) behold one of the Constables ordinarie trickes; hee sends his confessor to the King of England with letters of credit, and intreats him earnestly, not to trust to the Kings promises, but rather to seize vpon Eu and Saint Valerey, and there to passe some part of the winter: That within two monethes hee would lodge him better. Yet hee giues him no other security, but much hope, and an offer to lend him fiftie thousand crownes, with many other goodly shewes, to drawe him F from so profitable an accord. Edward answers, that the truce is concluded, and that hee will not alter any thing. That if he had kept his word, hee would haue accepted it. Thus our Constable dispaire on all sides.

The King (foreseeing that the Constable would thrust Edward into iecalousie) resolved by 1465. Lewis his policie to prevent the Con- tables pra-ctises by his bounty to take away all cause of suspect: for the effecting whereof, he lends Edward three hundred carts laden with the best wine he could get: and within halfe a League, within Amiens (Edward lod ging within halfe a league, for confirmation of the truce) he causeth two long tables to be set vp at the entry of the Towne, covered with exquisite meats, and all kindes of prouocations to drink, with men to attend all comers and goers at the table. At euery table were five or six men of reputation, fat and big, the better to incourage the Drinkers: amongst others were the Lords of Craon, Briquetot, Bresme and Villiers, gentlemen of a pleasant humour: and wheresoeuer the English tooke any lodging, they might not spend any thing. This bounty continued three or foure daies: during the which, if Lewis had ment treacherously, he had good means, they enting into Amiens confusedly, to the number of nine thousand, for this great multitude, some did sing, some slept, ouercome with wine and drouines. But contrarywise, he comitted the gard of the gate to English Archers, whome Edward (at Lewis his request) had sent, to take in, and put out whome they pleased.

An entervewe of the Kings.

It was then concluded, to appoint a place for an entervewe of these two Kings. It is done with lesse confusion and hazard in a final place. Picquigny vpon Somme was held conuenient: an ancient prophesie which the English obserued, described this very place. To this effect they build vpon the bridgetwo pentises of wood, the one for Lewis, the other for Edward, either of them capable of ten or twelue men. Betwix both was a partition, with grates to put through ones armes, going ouerthwart the bridge, that no man might go from the one to the other. Lewis made his profit of fore-passed euents: he knew that if the barre at Montreueau had had no more passage then this, John Duke of Bourgogne had not ended his dayes so lamentable, in the narrow bounds thereof.

The 28. of August, Lewis comes first to the barre, accompanied with John Duke of Bourbon, the Cardinall his brother, and followed only with about eight hundred men at armes. Edward comes after, hauing with him the Duke of Clarence his brother, the Earle of Northumberland, his Chamberlain Hastings, His Chancellor, & others: and behind him all his army in battaile. Either King had twelue men about him, foure of the which went from one part to another, to search if there were nothing prauided to the preiudice of their maisters. They imbrace each other through the grate, and sweare vpon the holy Bible, to obserue the articles agreed vpon.

The othe taken, Lewis mingling his serious discours with some mirth, inuities Edward to come to Paris, that he would feast him with the Ladies, and giue him the Cardinall of Bourbon for his Confessor (a pleasant man and of free life,) who willingly would giue him absolution, if happily he should sinne in that case. Then they conferre together a while, without any witnesses. And vpon the Kings demand, whether the Duke of Bourgogne would not accept of the truce, (men take an oxe by the horn, and a man by his word: and with the like policie the Duke of Bourgogne might haue bin surprised at his departure from Liege.) Edward answered that he might doe as he pleased, I will summon him againe (he saith) if he will not harken to it, I will referre my selfe to you two.

The politike proceeding of Lewis.

This accord being made, Lewis begins to play vpon an other string, & makes the like demande touching the Duke of Brittain, for whome he chiefly made the motion. But he findes the English resolute in his protection, as hauing found no friend so kinde in his affliction. Lewis surceaseth, and with a wonderfull curtesie takes leaue of the King of England, contents all his folowers with some kinde words, and giues presents to some private Noblemen, the Heralds & trompets, who to shew their thankfull mindes began to cry A largeesse for the most noble and mighty King of France: a largeesse, a largeesse.

He hath alwayes made it manifest, that he was exceeding suspitious, and that from an antecedent he could cunningly draw a good consequence. He is no sooner on his way to Amiens, but he studies of Edwards facility to harken to the going to Paris: that he was a very goodly Prince, and of an amorous complexion: and that some nice

Parisien

A Parisien might stay him longer then his estate required, or at the the least drawe him to passe the sea an other time: that his Predecessors had loued Paris and Normandie but too well: He therefore desires to see their backs, and must by some meanes bring him from this desire: wishing rather to haue him his good brother, & friend beyond the seas, then here. The necessitie which forced the King against the Burguignon, serued for an excuse.

Moreouer, the King was grieved, to see the English so resolute to defend the Brittons quarrell: he would gladly haue obtained that freedome, to make warre in Brittain, the which hee wonderfully affected: and made a second motion vnto him by Bouche & S. Pierre, who returned with this answer, That whosoeuer doth attempt, (saith he) against the Duke of Brittain, I will passe the seas in person, and succour him. So hee was no more importuned. Edward had an especial cause to entertain the loue of the Duke of Brittain, for at the defeat of Henry King of England, as wee haue heard, Henry Earle of Richmond and neere kinsman to the said Henry, after the death of his sonne the Prince of Wales, saued himselfe with his vnclie the Earle of Pembroke, and hauing entred a barke in hast, they were with tempest driuen vpon the coast of Brittain, and there forced to take land, where they were seized on, and led with sure guards to Vannes. A verie happie chance for the Duke, for while hee holds this goodly gage, hee was assured to commaund the forces of England: but very vnhappy for the Earle, for if hee might haue landed in France, Lewis without doubt (to crosse Edward) would haue laboured to restore him. This truce did wonderfully displease some of Edwards houseould seruants: Lewis of Brettailles among the rest, a gentleman of Gascony, was greatly discontented, giuing out, that the King his maister hauing in person wonne nine battails, had gotten more dishonour by the voluntary losse of this tenth, (which was in a manner gotten,) then he had purchased honour in the former nine. That the French might with reason laugh at Edwards credulous facilitie. Lewis aduertised by the Lord of Argenton, of this Gascons free discourse, resolues to stoppe his mouth, to the end he should nother after spend his tongue to the preiudice of this Estate: He sends for him, and makes him dine with him, offers him great aduancements, so as hee will serue him. Vpon his refusall, hee giues him a thousand crownes presently, and promiserh to doe good for his brethren that remayned in France: binding him to maintaine (as much as in him did lie) the friendship growing betwixt these two Crownes.

Edwards ser- uants discon- tented with the truce.

Lewis a free buier of mē's seruices.

Brettailles did not iudge amisse. Our Lewis had sometimes a more liberal tongue then was conuenient, and feared much, least some words had passed him, whereby the English might discouer that he mocked him: and so it chaunced, yet behold how hee couered it. The day after this enteruewe, being in his Cabinet, he fell to iest of the wines & other presents he had sent to the English. But hee discouered not a Gascoyne marchant dwelling in England, who by chance was crept in, to obtaine a lycensie of the King for the transporting of certaine pipes of wine, freed frō impost. This marchant might talke: he must therefore be wooed, and staid in France, vnder some apparent pretext. The King sent the Lord of Argenton to talke with him, aduanceth him to a good office in the towne where he was borne. hee giues him a thousand frankes presently to transport his familie: the transport of wines he required, and a man to conduct him to Bourdeaux: but all vpon condition that not he, but his brother, should make the voyage into England. Thus the King made amends for his rashe speech.

Edward is now vnder saile: he was a newe Conqueror, his presence was therefore more needfull in England: he did neuer much affect the voyage. Two principal reasons drew him in to the action. The one was, all his subiects gaped after the possession of this Crowne, did sollicit him, and the Burguignon prest him. An other was, he might referre a good part of the money that should bee rayfed for this voyage (for the Kings of England leue no thing about their reuenues, but for the warres of France.) But see the policie of Edward: he had of purpose brought with him ten or twelue of the chiefe bourgeois of the Citie, whose credit was great with the Commons, and who had with all care procured this tax. These men were soone weary with this military toile, Causes that moued Edward to passe and to returne home into England.

presuming

1475. Presuming that at the first arriuall, a profitable battaile should decide the quarrell. And to make them taste more feelinglie the sweetnesse of peace, from the sharpenesse of warre, Edward doth sometimes trouble their heads with doubts, sometimes with feares, to keepe them from murmuring at his returne into England. On the other side, he loued his pleasures, & was of a complexion not able to endure the trauells requisite for the conquest of this Realme: and although the King was ouercharged with enemies, yet had he provided well for his defence. But see the most vrgent reason of Edward's retreat.

Edward I. sent the Constables letters vnto Lewis.

The performance he desired of the marriage betwixt the Daulphin, and his daughter. A marriage which made him dissemble many things, whereof Lewis will make his profit. To conclude; as they which haue bene deceived in their friendship, hate without dissembling, Edward before hee parted from Calais, sent the King those two letters of credit, which the Constable had written vnto him, with all other verbal assurances which he had giuen him. Sufficient testimonies to accuse and conuince him of those crimes, wherewith he shalbe hereafter charged. Let vs nowe reconcile the Duke of Bourgogne, and Brittain with the King.

Discontent betwixt the English and Bourgignons.

Contay was now returned from the Duke of Bourgogne, the day of the enterviewe, and had found his maister in a good humour, when as the English were returned. Hugonnet Chancellor of Bourgogne, & other Ambassadors for the duke, meete at a bridge midde way betwixt Auennes, and Veruins in Hainault, so well accompanied with Archers and other men of warre, that one of the English hostages, whome the King had led with him, tooke occasion to say, that if the Duke of Bourgogne had bene followed with many such men when he came to salute King Edward, peraduenture they had not made a peace. The Viconte of Narbonne answered: That the Duke wanted no such men, and that hee had sent them to refresh themselves, but six hundred pipes of of wine, and a pension which the King gaue them, made them hast home to their Country.

A truce betwixt Lewis and the Bourgignons.

The English mooued herewith. It is as euery man said (replies he) that you would deceiue vs. Do you call the money the King giues vs a pension? It is a tribute: and by Saint George you may talke so much, as we will returne againe. This quarrell stayed their proceeding: neyther did they preuaile any more, the second time, when as the King appointed Tannegey of Chassel, and the Chancellor Orisle to heare the sayd Ambassadors at Veruins: but the third assembly which was in the Kings Chamber, made a full conclusion (and in truth Brezey had reason to say one day to the King, that his horse was well laden when he was on him, for that hee carried all his Counsell with him: for in deed he did effect more in his presence, then all his Ambassadors together,) where there was a truce accorded for nine yeares, according to the other, but by reason of the oath which Charles of Bourgogne had sworne to Edward in his choller, it might not be published vntill the 17. of October following.

Edward offers to ayde Lewis against the Bourgignons.

Edward (discontented that the Duke of Bourgogne would treat a part) sends Montgomery (a Knight very inward with him) to the King to Veruins, hee requires two things, the one, that hee would take no other truce with the Duke then that which hee had made: the other that hee would not suffer Saint Quentin to bee yeelded vnto him: and if hee would continue the warre against the sayd Duke, hee would returne the next spring and ioyne his forces with the Kings, so as hee would recompence him for the losse hee should sustaine by the customes of wooll at Calais, which would be of no value, (being estimated at fifty thousand Crownes) and pay halfe his army.

The King to satisfie Edward, answers, that it is the same truce they had made together, and for the same terme: but the Duke would haue letters apart; hee thanks him for his good offers, and returns him home his Ambassador and hostages. Lewis had lately learned, that the French & the English do easily quarrell, when they are together, and a small matter would reconcile them with the Bourgignons. As for the Britton, the King could not well digest the answer which Edward had made

A to Fouchage and Saint Pierre, whereby he easily discovered the strict alliance betwixt them, but seeing he could not diuide them, being in the Abbie of Vicorie neere to Senlis, where he had a priuate deuotion, the peace was absolutely confirmed, whereby the King renounced all rights pretended by him to the Duchie of Brittain, reseruing the feuerancy and homage according to the ancient Custome. Hee promised to keepe the Dukes person in safety, and to maintaine his privileges, and prerogatiues, without forcing him to follow him out of his Duchie, but with his owne good liking: Moreover he should cause to be giuen vnto the Duke of Brittain the hands & seales of all the Princes of his bloud, and of the Noblemen of the Realme, both spirituall and temporall, with reuocation of all alliances, or former promises, and restitution to be made of all things taken during the warre. The patent hath the same date with that of the Duke of Bourgogne.

A peace confirmed with the Duke of Brittain.

Let vs nowe bring the Constable into open viewe, to play the last acte of his Tragedy: finding that all these shifts and deuises, could not breake the reconciliation of the two Kings, the next day after their enterviewe, he writes very humbly to the King, by a knight of his named Rapine. That he was well informed howe his enemies labored to bring him in disgrace, charging him with many things wherof he had shewed contrary effects: for that during all the forepassed confessions, hee had faithfully kept all those places which his maistry had committed vnto him, and beate backe the enemies whosoever hee presented himselfe. And to purchase some credit, hee offers to C deale with the Duke of Bourgogne who (if the King please,) shall helpe to defeat Edward and all his army. Lewis dissembles, and writes to the Constable, what was concluded the day before, that at this time hee was busied with many affaires, and had neede of such a head as his. A captious word but well vnderstood by Rapine, who takes it for a beginning of fauour for his maister.

The last acte of the Constables Tragedy.

Lewis dissembles with him.

But alas, howe easily doth man deceiue himselfe in his vaine imaginations? and what can a perplexed soule produce, but trouble and confusion? The truce is no sooner confirmed with the Bourgignons, but the conclusion of Bouuines is renued, wherof wee haue made mention. Nowe this poore Constable knows not to whom to flie.

D And as euery man runnes as farre as hee can from an imminent shipwracke, his best friends, his most affectionate seruants, and his most confident soldars abandon him. What shall hee then do? Whome shall hee implore? What Sanctuary? What succors? Hee knowes well hee hath equally displeased, Lewis, Edward and Charles; his Lands are on all sides inuironed by his enemies. He is too farre from any succour. He holds strong places, yea almost impregnable: but who shall defend them? Hee inuoyes great treasure, but they violently hunt after it. What refuge shall hee choos? Shall he go to the King? but by what meanes shall hee purchase peace? hee is too farre incensed, and is seized of the letters which the Constable hath written to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon and Bourgogne. May hee re-
E leauepon Lewis his word? but he would not sweare vpon the croile of Saint Lau. Shall hee alle the seas? he gaue Edward too vnkind a welcome neere S. Quintin. Shall he cast himselfe into Charles of Bourgognes armes? but he hath spoiled his Country of Hainault, he would haue forced him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guienne deceased, and hath often treacherously deceiued him; being aduanced by his meanes to that dignitie of Constable.

The Constables piteous estate.

The Frenchmen beleue that whosoever breaketh that oath die vilenly without any yearre.

To conclude, hee alone hath more then all others maintayned these Princes in hatred: for as what partie soeuer he takes, hee is vndoone. Yet must hee needes vniat ke himselfe and flie to one, for what meanes hath he to warrant himselfe alone against so mighty enemies? which shall he choos? Poore soule, beaten with distrust, feare and doubtes; for yeelding to the one he incensed the other. Moreover there is lesse danger for him to be beleegged by two, then by one alone, being impossible for two armies to accord long together; and contrariwise, being charged but by one, there is some hope to make his peace.

The Constable in a desperate estate.

Some

1475.

Sometimes he resolues to flee into Germany, and to buy a place there, vntill he be reconciled to the one: sometimes to keepe his strong Castell of Han, the which hee had well fortified to serue him at neede. But he is so amazed as he dares not discouer himselfe to those fewe seruants that are left him. Moreouer they are all subiects to some one of these Princes. Yet he must resolue: and better is it to fall once, then stagger alwayes.

But they haue both ioyntly conspired his death, he is well informed thereof, and hath seene a coppie of their mutuall seales. Yet when once he hath passed his word, he will make a conscience to breake it. But there is no faith in the Court of France: he hath offended the King too much, and hath too great aduersaries, and no man might safely loue him whome Lewis hated. The Duke of Bourgogne is more moderate, more easie to pacifie, and if he giue his faith, he will be ashamed to deliuer him who had thrust himselfe vnder his protection. He gaped after Saint Quentin, he must yeeld it vp vnto him, & redeeme his head with the price of this good place. He stands firme in this resolution, and beseecheth Charles to send him a safe conduct, to go and treat with him of matters concerning his estate and person. At the first Charles makes some difficulty, but in the end he thinks he may well dispense with his conscience for Saint Quentin.

The Constable yeelds to the Bourguignon.

Saint Quentin yeelded to the King.

The Constable prisoner.

So the Constable accompaigned onely with fiteene or twentie horse, goes towards Mons, in Hainault, to Esmeriez, great Bayliffe of Hainault, the dearest of his friends, attending newes from the Duke of Bourgogne, who made warre in Lorraine vpon the desie we haue spoken of. The Foxe is now out of his earth. Yet must be foreseene, that this yeelding reconcile not the Constable to the Duke. The King well informed what troupes were in Saint Quentin, & of the inhabitants affected to, halseth thether with fourteen or eight hundred horse. They meete him with their keyes: the quarters are ordered, all his forces enter and he followes. And to take from the Bourguignon all hope to recouer Saint Quentin by the Constables meanes, he giues him aduice of the taking thereof: for although in the diuision made at Bonnines of the Constables places, this fell to the Duke, yet would not the King that he should make his peace with the Bourguignon by the deliery thereof.

Charles aduertised hereof, sends to the great Bayliffe, that he should gard Mons well, & that the Constable go not forth, and that hee should appoint him his lodging for a prison. Here the Bayliffe preferres obedience to his maister before the Constables loue. Lewis aduertised of the Constables detention, requires the Duke of Bourgogne by Bouchages, and Saint Pierre, eyther to deliuer him, or to performe the convention. Hee promisseth to do it, and causeth him to bee carried with a sure gard to Peronne. He had now taken diuers places in Lorraine and Barrois, and did batter Nancy, whereof hee desired to see the issue for the deliery, or retayning of the Constable, so as with this desseigne, in steed of eight dayes concluded on at Bonnines, hee lets passe a moneth and more. But the Kings great instance, and his army which laie hovering in Champagne, as ready to succor the Lorraine, and to crosse the Bourguignon: that enterprize, the conquest whereof he greedily pursued, to vnite his territories, and to passe freely from Luxembourg into Bourgogne, (for inioying this Duchie, hee came from Holland vnto the Confines of the Diocese of Lion, vpon his owne land) made Charles to send Himbertcourt, and the Chancellor Hugonnet, (both great enemies to the Constable,) to deliuer him at an appointed day, to such as the King should send. Charles supposed to haue wonne Nancy by that day, but hee was deceived in the same. And in truth they had no sooner left him, but a countermand comes from the Duke, after the taking of Nancy, but too late.

The Constable deliuered to the King.

The prefixed day being come, they deliuer the Constable at the gates of Peronne, into the hands of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France. Bouchages, S. Pierre, Crispy and others: Vho led him prisoner to the Bastille at Paris, the said Admirall charging the Chancellor, his President, and other Counsellors of the Parliament beeing there present, in the Kings name, to make a speedy trial of him, vpon his letters written to

A to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon and Bourguigne. So by iudgement of the Court, giuen by the President Popincourt, he was beheaded at the Greue, the 19 of December, and by an especial grace was buried at the white Friars in Paris. A pittifull spectacle, to see so great a personage layed vpon a scaffold, allied to the houses of France, England, Bourguigne, Sanoye, & many other great personages, the chiefe Officer of this Crowne, mighty in Lands, in treasure and in friends, abandoned of his friends, his goods confiscate, degraded of his offices, and finally to serue as a spectacle to the whole world. He was witty, valiant, and of great experience: but in his latter yeares bereaued of the grace of God. Let vs apprehend this Oracle: It is a horrible thing to fall into the hands of the lying God. The pit hee had digged for an other, must swallowe him vp. He had with all his force labored to maintayne these two Princes in hatred and mutual diffension, to subsist in the midst of their partialities. He had often & impudently lied vnto them, and being both very reuengefull, it was impossible to auoide their inuaires. But who can warrant the Duke of Bourgogne tro the lawe Cornelius? must his cruel couetousnesse force him to giue security to this poore Lord, to thrust him into an vnbought ruine. Four score thousand crownes in mouables, and three score thousand crownes in ready money which hee got by his spoiles, were they valuable to the falsifying of his conscience: god leaues nothing vnpunished, & we shal learne hereafter, that this disloyall act in him was the iust ruine of his house: a house for a hundred yeares flourishing in all perfections of felicity, the which hereafter shall runne headlong to a strange Catastrophe: and by the meanes of a young and vnxperienced enemy, weak in regard of the Bourguignons great and redoubted power, God resists the high minded, and doeth contemptible things, to ruine and confound the proude. Let vs with one breath, see the declining and ouerthrowe of this house of Bourguigne.

The Constable beheaded.

Charles of Bourguigne beakes his oath with the Constable.

Charles affecting the title of a King.

The meanes whereby he sought it.

Charles makes an vnjust pretension vnto Lorraine.

Campobasso a traitor to Charles of Bourguigne.

The violent ambition of Charles, had (as we haue heard before) armed him with a boyling desire to be a King: but Frederic the 3. scorned it. From that time he still plotted to get this qualitie. René (before Earle of Vaudemont, sonne to Ferry of Lorraine, and of Yoland, daughter to René King of Sicile and Duke of Aniou, & of the only daughter of the Duke of Lorraine, eldest brother to John Earle of Vaudemont, Father to the sayd Ferry, and now Duke of Lorraine) had defied him before Nuz, grieued with the Bourguignons outrages. This is a good expedient to shake this pretended royalty. Lorraine made him a free passage, to vnite his Countreies, and moreover by the Conquest of this Duchie, hee should qualifie himselfe King of Sicile, and Ierusalem, the hereditary title of this house. This vent of vaine glory transports Charles into Lorraine: and for pretext of a quarrell, he pretends a great sum of money to be due vnto him by Renés Predecessor: for non-paiement whereof (after the taking of many places) hee camps before Nancy, beseegeth it, batters it, but takes it not so soone as he presumed, being valiantly defended beyond his expectation. The King also vnderhand fauored this yong Duke, procuring him secretly the alliance of the Suisses, & the Imperial Townes of Alsatia. Charles since the sege of Nuz had in pay about a thousand men at armes, Neapolitans for the most part. The Earle of Campobasso commanded foure hundred, a partisa of the house of Aniou, against that of Arragon: & for this cause being banished his Country, had alwaies followed the Duke René of Sicile, or Nicholas sonne to John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine: after whose death Charles of Bourguigne entertayned many of his seruants: especially this Earle, a wicked man and of a corrupt conscience, who in the beginning of the warre of Lorraine, entred into practise with Duke René (heire apparant to the house of Aniou, after the death of King René his grandfather by the mother) promising to prolong the sege of Nancy, & cause defects in necessary things touching the sege. He might wel do it, hauing more authority in this army then any other capitaine. But behold an other act of notable villany.

The duke of Bourguigne had giuen him forty thousand ducats before hand, to raise his company. Passing at Lion, to go into Italie, he grewe familiar with a Physician, named Simon of Paue, giuing by him the King to vnderstand, that for an hundred thousand crownes in ready money, his company entertained, and a good Earldome,

I 476. at his returne, he would deliuer him the Duke of Burgogne, and confirms the same to S. Prye, who then was Ambassadour for the King in Pimont. Being returned, and his troupe lodged in the Countie of Marle, he reiterates his offer to the King, to kill the Duke when he should come to the Campe, if he desired not to haue him brought prisoner vnto him, assuring himselfe to execute it easily: for (saith he) he is accustomed to visit his armie, mounted vpon a Nag, and ill accompanied: Or if the King and the Duke should at any time fight a battaile, hee would turne to the King with his companie.

Lewis abhorres the treacherie of this wicked wretch, and to shew the Duke his franke and royall disposition, he giues him intelligence thereof by Contay. In the meane time, Campobasso diuers the Bourguignon all he can from the warre of Lorraine: and makes the taking of Nancy, prooue more difficult. The Duke is so much incensed therewith, as from iniurious words, he proceeds to blowes, and strikes him. A blowe which the Earle will reuenge, in time and place. Hee dissembles for the present, and Charles either thinking the Neapolitane had forgotten this outrage, or supposing that his hired souldier had been bound not to reuenge it: or happily fearing if he lost him, his affaires would receiue some dangerous check, he entertaines him still in his seruice: yea (euen contrary to the Kings aduice,) he loued, or made shew to loue him better, supposing that Lewis his intention, was to set diuision betwixt him and his most trustie seruants. But let vs rather say, that he which sounds, euen to the deepest thoughts of man, had by a iust iudgement, altered the sence of this Prince, not to taste the holesome counsels that were giuen him, with most apparent reasons. Thus proud presumption, like vnto Nembroth, made him conceiue a world of Chimeres, and bring forth a shamefull confusion, as we shall read hereafter.

Hee is now putt vp with the new purchase of Lorraine, by the taking of Nancy, with the possession of S. Quentin, Han, and Bohain, and with the Constables moueables, but he would not make this the limits of his conquests. The Suisses had incensed him, redeeming of the Countie of Ferrete for Sigismond Archduke of Austria. Moreover, they had spoiled James of Sauoy Earle of Rhomont, brother to the Duke of Sauoy, of the Countie of Vaux, and the Lord of Chastangouion, brother to the Prince of Orange, of many places, lying within their marches. These Noblemen were allied, and partakers to the Duke, and trust him on to reuenge. On the other side, the King desired to parle with him, after the manner of Picquigny, wishing him to lodge and refresh his troupes, tired both with the siege of Nuz, and the reuenues of Lorraine, and to graunt a peace to this mountaine nation, being poore but yet froward. But Charles prefers the violent passion of his ambition, before the honest and holesome counsell of Lewis, and enters into Suisse land. The Cantons hearing of his approach, intreat for peace: they offer to yeeld vp the place in question: and by a second Ambassage, to renounce all alliances that should dislike him, especially the Kings: to serue him against all men, yea against the King, with six thousand men, for what pay he would giue them, and as often as he would call them. If he did triumph ouer them by an absolute victory, there were no profit to be found, seeing the spurres of his horsemen, and the bites of his hories, were of more value then all their countrie.

But he refuseth all accord, no preuention can stop this streame. He marcheth, and after this imaginarie conquest of the Cantons, he passeth the Alpes, and layes holde of Italy, for that Frederick Prince of Tarentum, sonne to Ferdinand King of Naples, was lately come to him, with hope to marry his daughter. Moreouer old René King of Sicile and Duke of Aniou, and Vncle to the King, seeing his sonne John, and his Grandchild Nicholas were deceased, promised to resigne vnto him his pretensions of Sicile, to adopt him for his sonne and heire, and soone after, to put into his hands the Earldome of Prouence. But wee shall soone learne the causes that mooued him to this attempt: hee gaped, aboue all other things, after the goodly estate of Milan, where hee presumed to haue great intelligences. The Ambassadors being returned, the Suisses protest of their submission, and of their desire to pacifie all things, calling God and

A the world to witnesse: & then they prepare for their defence. Charles for the first fruits of his army, fortified with fiftene thousand men from the Duke of Milan, & fise thousand from the Duchesse of Sauoy (for now he loues strangers better then his subiects, and the troubles of his mind, makes him conceiue a hatred and ieaousie against them) takes Lozanna, a mountaine Towne, seated vpon the Lake Leman, with other places in the Countie of Vaux: causing the garrisons for the most part to be hanged. Then he brings the whole body of his armie, (being about fittie thousand men, and fise hundred peeces of Artillerie of all sorts) before Granson, lying nere to the Lake of Yuer, which belonged to Rhomont, being defended by feuen or eght hundred Suisses of the Canton of Berne. He batters, makes a breach, and giues an assaull, with the losse of a hundred men. But the batterie continuing, the defendants (not able to hold the Towne) fire it, and recouer the Castell, where hauing many Towers beaten downe, they compound to haue their liues saued. An accord treacherously broken, for hee caused foure score to be hanged (some write fise hundred and twelue) hee drowned two hundred, and puts the rest in prison. A detestable crueltie, and so odious vnto all the Citties vpon the Rhin, as they send men to the Duke of Lorraine and the Suisses to their aide.

He is nothing amazed therewith; but for the statelie entertainment of Ambassadors that came vnto him from diuers countries, namely from Germanie and Italie, he shewes himselfe in his campe with incredible pompe and state: Pavilions and riche Cents, giltting armes, goodly standards, vessell of gold and siluer, of inestimable value, rich apparell, exquisite Tapistrie, Jewels, precious stones, and other costly ornaments: to conclude, the goodliest furniture that might beautifie a campe. The Suisses not yet aduertised of the losse of Granson, send foure or fise thousand me to releue it, but too late. The Duke (contrary to the opinion of the best aduised) goes to meete them. They campe at the entrie of the mountaines, hold the straites of hard access, and of great aduantage for the foote, and dangerous for the horse, where one man might stay fittie. But he was (as the Prouerbe sayes) mounted to the Pies neast, and God blinding his vnderstanding, prepared an exemplarie abatement of his pride. He sends a hundred Archers before, to seize on a passage of the mountaines; who discover not an ambush of shotte that kept it, the which suffer a part of the forward to enter, whereas the battaile could not succour them, whom they charge with such resolution and furie, that with this terror the Bourguignons fle, and fall vpon the other party, which was yet in the plaine, which likewise turnes head toward the Campe. The battaile and reereward seeing the forward in route, shrinke presently, and (notwithstanding all the Dukes labour to stay them) they saue their liues by flight, ill informed of the small numbers of their enemies, who pursue them with all furie. Charles himselfe was forced to ioyne with them that fled, abandoning both Campe & Artillerie, to saue their persons, staying in no place vntill he came to Ioigne, fiftene or sixtene leagues from Granson. A haltier flight then the pursute, for want of horse, so as the Duke in the middest of so great a terror, lost but feuen men at armes, but very many foote. This happened the second day of March.

A day not so famous for the losse of men, as of spoile, esteemed at three millions, where with the Suisses (not so cunning in those dayes as now) made themselves rich, although they were ignorant of the value of things. For a prooffe of their grosse and ride ignorance, the Originall obserues: that they did teare in peeces the goodliest & most sumptuous pavilions in the world, to apparell themselves. That a Souldier did tell a siluer dish like vnto pewter, for two pence halfe penie. An other taking vp the case of the Dukes great Diamond, wherat did hang a great Pearle, the which he viewing, put vp againe, and to cast it into a Cart, comming afterwards to fetch it, he bid it to a Priest for a Florin worth twelue pence: the Priest sent it vnto their Lords, who gaue him six shillings. They held it to be the goodliest in Christendome. Besides manie others, they got three Pearles of inestimable value, the which they called the three bretheren, with two other the most rare stones that could be found. To conclude,

1476. whatsoeuer the Duke had of rich or sumptuous, hee caused to be carried after him in ostentation, to shew his superfluous and fearfull greatnesse vnto strangers. So the eternall God did signifie vnto Ezechias by Esay. That all the cofers of his drags, silver and gold, his sweete perfumes and pretious ointment, with all his artillery, yea all that was found in his treasures, all that was in his house, all that his fathers had gathered together vnto that day, should be carried into Babilon: for that he had made a shew to the Ambassadors of Bersadac-Baladan the sonne of Baladan King of Babilon. Presently after this battaile, the Suisses recover their lost places, take downe their companions and burie them, & hang vp as many Bourguignons with the same halters. The King remained at Lion, attending the successe of the Bourguignons forces, fearing exceedingly, leaſt he should subdue the Cantons. He disposed of the house of Sauoy as his owne: the Duke of Milan was his allye: he held Lorraine, and hoped for Prouence, which succeeding, his power extended from the westerne sea, vnto the East: & France had had no issue out, but by the Dukes fauour, or by sea: for the preuenting whereof, Lewis sent often to the Duchesse of Sauoy his sister in law (being wholly at the Dukes deuotion) to René his Vncle, being much incensed against him, so as he would scarce heare his messengers, to the Princes & commonalties of Germany, who returne him an answer; Say vnto the King, that if he warre not against him, we will make our peace, and warre our selues against him. This was it he feared, yet would he not breake the truce, neither haue Charles discouer the messages hee sent. But now the Bourguignons shipwracke cheered him, grieved only at the small number that were slaine.

The Duke on his part was toucht with feare, & to preuent it, he sends Contay to the King, charged with humble and gracious speeches, contrary to his custome. He beseecheth his Maiestie to obserue the truce loyally, excuseth himselfe that he did not assist at their interview neere vnto Auxerre, and promisseth to be there shortly, or whereoeuer it should please the King. The King allures him of his demands, neither was it yet time to do otherwise, but to keep himselfe in the shade, whilst that Charles chafed himselfe. Lewis was well acquainted with the loialtie of the Dukes subiects, who would easily crosse him, seeing him oppressed with aduersitie. One mischiefe comes neuer alone: the losse, shame, & deſpight, to see himselfe vanquished, laies him sick in his bed. But behold a rougher charge: in prosperitie friends come by hundreds, in aduersitie they flie by thousands. Galeas Duke of Milan lead the dance; he was allied to Charles by reason of his practises in Italy: which being dissolued by this check, he sends a Citizen of Milan to the King: he dissuades him from making a peace with the Bourguignon, and to preuent it, he offers him a hundred thousand Ducats presently. The King detesting the inconstancie of this man, who three weekes before was estranged from him, hunting after the Bourguignons good hap, with a great and sollemne Ambassage: considering also that their wiuers were sisters, and his couetous proceeding: heretofore his money, reprocheth the little loue he bare to his brother in law, but in the end he accepts of his alliance. René King of Sicile seconds him. Charles had already (vpon the hope this good old man gaue him) sent the Lord of Chastaignon into Piedmont, with twenty thousand Crownes, to make a leaue of men, to take possession of that Earledome. But vpon this defeat, he was happy to saue his person, & to loose but his silver, seized on for the King by Philip of Sauoy Earle of Bresse. Vpon this amazement Lewis sends to his Vncle, desires him to come, and to assure himselfe of good entertainment, else he would provide by force. John Cosse Seneshall of Prouence, an honest man, and of a good houte in the realme of Naples, perswaded his maister to this voyage, giuing the King to vnderstand, that the treatie of René with the Bourguignon (the which he himselfe had procured) tended to no other end, but to let the King know the wrong he had done his Vncle, hauing taken from him the Castels of Barre & Angers, and intreating him ill in all his other affaires, and that he neuer had any will to performe the accord.

A liberty of speech very pleasing vnto Lewis, who from that time respected his Vncle, and they liued like good friends. The René made a transaction with the King, that after his death the Earledome of Prouence should returne to the king, and be incorporate in the Crowne.

The Duke of Milan.

The King of Sicile.

Lewis reconciled to the King of Sicile.

1476. In doing whereof, the Queene of England, daughter to the said René, and widow to Henry the 6. King of England, whom Edward held prisoner, was redeemed by the King for fiftie thousand crownes. For this cause she yielded vnto the King all the right she might pretend to the said Countie, and for a certaine pension which the King assigned her during her life. The Duchesse of Sauoy sent Montaigni secretly, to reconcile her to the King, yet will shee tie the issue of the Dukes fortune. The Princes of Germany, and the imperiall Townes, who before were enforced to temporise, now they themselves enemies, and turne from him.

Frederick Prince of Tarentum, grieved with the strange dissemblings, touching the pretended marriage, leaues him: and soone after, returning into France, he marries a daughter of Sauoy, the Queenes sister: what then? shall hee flie to his Hollanders and Flemings? But he knowes their inconstancie, and that they fauoured not his flight: yet hee sends his Chancellor Hugonnet, with twelue commissioners, to require ayde of men and money of his subiects, who returne with this resolution: That if the Duke their Lord were prisoner, they would mortgage and sell their liuing, to redeeme him: that to dissuade him from the warre, and draw him home into his counties, they would assist him with all their power. But to continue it, they are not resolved to doo any thing. To conclude, euery bird had his peck at this Owle. Euen as when a tempest ouerthrowes some great tree, euery oneteares off a branch. Hee yeelds not yet, but would be ashamed to confesse himselfe beaten by such a wretched people: and although all these crosses had wonderfully increased his sicknesse, & that heauinesse, melancholie, choller, and other passions, had altered his bloud, with great preiudice to his health: yet he gathers together the peeces of his wracke, and within few moneths goes to field with his armie. Hauing staied some space at Lauzanne, he went the 9. of June to campe before Morat, a small towne two leagues from Berne, belonging to the Earle of Rhomont, who lead the foreward. Anthony bastard of Bourgogne camped vpon the Lake, with thirty thousand men of foote and horſe. The Duke lodged in the mountaine, and Rhomont vpon the descent towards the Lake, with 12. thousand men. The Cantons were sooner in armes at this shock, then at the other: and if before they gaue him a light defeat, they shall now giue him a generall ouerthrow. In their league are numbred twenty Townes, prelates and commonalties: Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Fribourg, Sunderuel, Zug, Glavie, Fribourg, Soleurre, Basill, Chafhouze, Appenzel, Sangall, the Grifons, the Earle of Tocquembourg, the Abbot of Sangall, Valais, la Cassé, Dye: & the ten iurisdiccions of Malny. All these did furnish eleuen thousand pikes, ten thousand Halberds, 10000. shot, and 4000. horſe: and the King, who made warre against the Bourguignon at an other mans cost, had vnder-hand giuen the Duke of Lorraine means to ioyne with 6000. men at armes. Moreouer the Townes of the Rhin, Songoy and Ferrelle had sent a supply of three thousand men.

All these forces being ioyned, the 22. of June, behold at the first incounter, the foreward is so violently charged, as the Earle of Rhomont is forced to saue himselfe with ten or twelue horſe. The garrison of Morat fallies out, and ioynes with the Duke of Lorraine troups: they charge the Bourguignons campe, force it, and ouerthrow him with a horrible slaughter of his men. He recouers Besançon by the swiftnesse of his horſe; and from thence, Riuere in the County of Bourgogne. In this battaile died about eightene thousand men, (others say two and twenty thousand seuen hundred) and of Suisses fiftie men onely. At this day are seene the spoiles of this battaile, in a Chappell built, where the battaile was fought, and filled with the bones of such as were slaine. The Suisses pursuing their victory, take all the places of the County of Rhomont, and along the Lake Léman, euen vnto Geneua, which are at this day vnder the iurisdiction of Berne, and the Bishop of Basill, and razed many places and Castels vpon the marches of the French Countie. The Duke of Lorraine, hauing a good share in this notable victory, with his French troups, and some supplies from the confederates, recouers Vindemont, Epinal, Nancy, and some other places by composition. Now is Charles of Bourgogne exceeding heaue, and for that the houle of Sauoy had bin the chiefe kindler of this

1476. this warre: (wherof the first fire-brand had bin for some Cartes laden with skins, taken by Rhomont from a Suisse) and doubting least she would speedily be reconciled to the King, he sends to take her by force, & brings her to Rouure neere Dijon, with her youngest sonne, since Duke of Sauoy. Philibert the eldest then Duke, was (with the help of some seruants of his house) retired to Chamberi. The King, who neuer lets slip any aduantage, and who politickly builds vpon anothers shipwrack, treats with the Bishop of Genes, a sonne of Sauoy, a man of a free disposition, and gouerned by a commander of Rhodes, both tractable: who deliuer into his hands the Castles of Chamberi, Montmelian, and another place, in the which were all the Duchesse Jewels. She seeing herselfe deprived of liberty, dissembles no longer, but sends Rimera a Gentleman of Flemmont, to the King, to mediate her peace; but with all the surety that might be knowne, being well, that it was dangerous to displease him: beseeching his Maiestie to free her, Lewis sets her at libertie. Lewis a better brother then she had bin a sister, sends to deliuer her, by Charles of Amboise Lord of Chaumont, gouernour of Champagne, who brought her to Plessis by Tours, whether the King was returned: who hauing renounced the alliance of Bourgogne, recovered her children of the King, with the places, Jewels, and all things that belonged to her, & then conducted her home at his own charge. But Charles, is he tired? So many disgraces: so many losses of men of warre, places, friends, & treasures, haue all these daunted him, as he hath lost all courage? He is now solitary at Riuere, sad, mournfull, grieved, displeased in himselfe, wayward to his seruants, despised of his subiects, abandoned of his friends, and hatefull to all the world. he seekes neither comfort or counsel of any man, and his great austerity is the cause that no man dare giue it him. And doubtlesse these incounters were sufficient to make him lay aside armes, & humbly to acknowledge, that the scourge of God doth aduertise vs, that we are straitened from our duties, and to lift vp our eyes, hands & hearts to heauen, there to seeke for consolation, and not among men: rather restoring that which we haue pulled from another vniuallly, then continuing obstinate in our reuenges.

But Nancy must be the place of his funerall, it was wonderfull commodious for his passage to his other Signeuries; but his armie being vterly ouerthrowne, it was not possible to leuie new troupes so speedily, to succour the Lord of Beures, of the house of Croy, who defended it against the Lorraine. Campobasso did diuert him, shewing that the City was but slackly besieged: that it was needfull to breath, & to refresh his spirits, tired with the forepassed toiles: & in the meane time, continues his practises with Duke René. Beures passed him still for succours, yet could he not arriue vntill the day it was yeilded, with such forces as he could get out of Flanders, Luxembourg, & Bourgogne. He besiegeth it before it could be fortified & viſtalled, and within few daies, brings it to exceeding famine. The Lorraine not yet strong inough, attending such troupes as came to him out of Germanie & Suisserland, aduentures a company of souldiers, carrying some victuals. They crosse through the campe, maynteyning the skirmish, whilst that such as carried meale entered the towne. Cifron a gentleman of Prouence, & steward to the Duke of Lorraine, was taken priener amongst others. Charles commands he should be hanged. This gentleman had bin the actor betwixt Campobasso and the Duke René. Seeing that he must of necessity die, he desires Charles to heare him, and that he would discover a matter which concerned his person. Charles answers in choller, that they were but fluffs: and Campobasso fearing his tongue, doth hasten both the Duke & Prouost to this execution, for (said he) by the law of armes, euery one that seekes to recleue a place after the Canon hath plaied & is take, deserues death. Cifron makes a new request, and the Duke sends to know what he would say. He refuseth to reueale it, but to the Duke himselfe, and as they returned with this answer to the Duke, Campobasso remaining at the chamber dore, where the Duke was writing with a Secretary, makes them beleue that the Dukes pleasure was they should dispatch him: & so Cifron was hanged. He still continues his siege, and neither shame, losses, the season of the yeare, nor his weake armie, neither the great succours which he sees coming to the Lorraine, nor the secret aide the King gaue vnto his enemy, neither Alphonſus King of Portugall, his his cousin germaine, who then attended some succours from the King at Paris, against the Castilian, and went exprefly to him to mediate a peace, to bee the sooner dispatched (for the King excused himselfe, vpon the issue he feared of this warre of Lorraine) could moue him.

Nancy taken by René, and besieged by Charles.

A notable viſtall of Campobasso.

Nancy pressed with famine was ready to compound, if Campobasso had not by secret intelligence reuied their spirits: when as behold the Duke of Lorraine comes with an armie of fourteene or fifteene thousand men, French, Suiſſes, Germanes and Lorraines, & lodgeth at S. Nicholas of Varengueille. Campobasso not able to doe the Bourguignons a greater dispite, leaues him, with nine score men at armes with him, and the Lords of Ange & Montfort with six score, & they go to René. A great maine for the duke, whose troupes were but bare and weake. Notwithstanding vpon the Suiſſes protestation, that they would not fight in the company of a traytor, the Duke sends him to Condé a Castle vpon the riuier of Moselle, a passage for victuals which came to Charles from the vallie of Luxembourg & Metz. He takes this passage and stops it with trees and carts, to stay the flight of such as should thinke to saue themselves, foreseeing already the Bourguignons ouerthrow, hoping by this means to haue a share of the booty & prisoners, as it happened indeed. But the fowleſt and most trecherous act of his tragedy is, that he left men suborned to begin the flight at the first charge, & others to obſcure the Duke, and if he fled to kill him. Charles vnderstanding these newes, harkeneth thereto (contrary to his custome) yet he followes not the aduice of his counsell. The most expedient counsell him to retyre to Pont a Mouſon, which he held yet, & to fortifie himselfe there, suffering the to victuall Nancy. They told him that the Germanes loued the ayre of their hothouses too well: that René would want money, so all would disband, without meanes to ioyne together againe in long time: that their victualling could not be so plentifull, but it would be spent before the middelt of winter, & in the meane time he should refresh his army, increase his troupes, & furnish himselfe with all things necessary, seeing that he had money which was the sinew of warre. A wise counsell, but Charles halted to his ruine. He had in his army, but foure thousand men, wherof not above 12 hundred were in caſe to fight, yet by the aduice of some foolish people he will hazard a third battell, exposing a handfull of men ill armed, & ill mounted, panting yet with the first and second encounters, against an army fresh, luty, and glorious with two notable victories. The 5. of January, vpon twelue Eue, René puts his army into battell, neere vnto a lake at Neufuille. The Germanes & Suiſſes diuide themselves into two bataillons: the Earle of Abeslein & the Gouernours of Zurich and Fribourg lead the one, the Adouyers of Berne and Lucerne the other: the rest both French & Lorraines, march vnder their ensignes: one bataillon goes towards the riuier, the other takes the high way from Neufuille to Nancy.

The Duke of Bourgogne attends them firmly, in a place of strength and aduantage, hauing before him a litle riuier, betwixt two strong hedgrowes nere vnto the hospital of Magonne, and at the entry of this great hie way (where one of the bataillons marched) Charles had planted the greatest part of his arillery, which thunders vpon the Suiſſes at their first approach: but with smal hurt, being far off. This bataillon leaues the hie way, & mounts vp towards the wood, coasting along the dukes army. The Duke makes his archers to turne head, appointing two wings of men at armes, the one led by James Galio of a Neapolitaine, an honest man & a valiant Captaine. The other by the Lord of Lalain lieutenant of Flanders. This bataillon hauing gotten the aduantage on the higher ground, stands firme: then like vnto a violent streame it fals vpon the Bourguignons armie, and with a thundring volle of shot defeats the foote. At the same instant the other bataillon chargeth Galio's Squadron, who behaued himselfe like a wife and valiant Captaine: but the horse seeing the footemen amazed, leaue all and flie after. The other wing commanded by Lalain mainteines the fight, but vnable to withstand the violent shock of the Suiſſes, in the end they giue way, & turne towards the bridge of Bridores, where was the greatest shew of their men that fled. This bridge is halfe a league fro Nancy towards Thionuille & Luxembourg. Campobasso had stoppt the passage, so as all such as tooke that 1476. course, were either slaine, drowned, or taken: (if any recovered the woods, the peasants beate them downe with leuers. A chafe which continued from noone, vntill two houres within night. Charles thinking to saue himselfe, was ouerthrowne by a troupe of men that followed him; discovered by them, which the traitor Campobasso had left to obserue him. The next day he was found among the dead, lying frozen in a ditch, well knowne by many of his household seruants. He had three woundes, one with a halbard about the eare, which cut him to the teeth, the second with a pike through both the thighs: the third by the fondement. René caused him to bee honorably buried in S. Georges Church at Nancy. In this battaile there died threethousand Bourguignons; and there were taken, the Earle of Nassau, the Marquis of Rothelin, an English Earle, Anthonie and Bildouin brethren bastards to the Duke (whose ransomes the King did pay) B and many gentlemen. The bootie was small: but the victory of Gransson was yet fresh, and as they then did sing: he lost his goods at Gransson, his men at Moral, and his life at Nancy. Behold this great Nembroth, who made himselfe equall with Emperors, and yeelded not to the greatest Kings: before time the terror of Christendome, feared by his subiects, sought to by his neighbours: who had purchased to himselfe the surname of terrible, & warriour, dronke with ambition, transported with the desire of an others estate, now confounded with his owne greatnesse, who with his fall ruines his house. Doubtlesse, the dayes of mortall man are like to grasse, he fades like the flower of the field: for the wind passing ouer it, it is no more seene, nor the place thereof knowne. Shame and destruction follow pride at the heeles. And who doth not iudge by the effects, that the chiefe causes of his ruine were couetousnesse, pride, and crueltie: couetousnesse, in that contrary to his honour and faith, hee had deliuered the Constable, for the greedie desire he had to enioy Saint Quintin, Han and Bohain, and some mouables: Pride, in that God hauing raised him to greater dignitie then any of his predecessors, accompanied with many goodly and singular graces, yet hee thought that the habitable earth could not prescribe limits to his conquests: attributing all to his owne force, and not to the power of the Eternall: & the happie successe of his affaires to his owne iudgement. Crueltie, for that in the warre of Legee, he had bathed himselfe in the blood of his poore subiects, glutting his wrath with that sexe & age, whom the rigour of warre doth vsually pardon.

And what shall we say of the right hands, hee caused to be cut off, of those poore soldiars at Nesle: Of the fires wherewith he hath wasted so much countrie: Of the Swissers haged at Gransson, after they had yeilded vpon his faith: giuen to the contrarie: & of late had hanged a gentlemā being taken in the war. He had good parts, valiant, painful, vigilant, desirous to entertaine men of merit, liberall, but with discretion, to the end that many might taste of his bountie. He gaue aduice priuately, honoured strangers, and receiued Ambassadors, with state. But since the battaile of Montcherie, presuming by his onely valour to haue forced a mightie King, to leaue him the field, hee conceiued so ouerweening a presumption of himselfe, as neuer after would he beleeeve any other Counsell but his owne: attributing the issue of his enterprises to his owne iudgement & industrie, with so obdurate a constancie in his vnréasured desires, as in the end it was his confusion. So The voice of the Eternall breaks downe the Cedars: as the Eternall beates downe the Cedars of Libanus. But let vs note the iudgement of God: That before Nancy he deliuered the Constable, & before Nancy he was betrayed by Cipobasso. And let vs obserue the like in our dayes, as we shall see hereafter. Eleuen dayes before this battaile, Galeus Duke of Milan was murdered in a Church by Andrew of Lampagnago, a Milanais: who leauing a son very yong, left withall many discordes for the gouernment of the Duchie: amongst many Noble men, one among them called Robert of S. Seuerin, neere kinsman to the Duke, banished from his house by the stronger faction, retired himselfe into France, hoping to perswade the King to arrept something against the state of Milan. Lewis taught by former experience, that the French haue alwaies lost easily, & with shame, that they had gotten with much paine & sweate in Italy, would not harken vnto it, no nor suffer any succors passe for the reliefe of the Florantines, being ancient friends & allies to the French, against whom Pope Sixtus & Ferdinand

A and King of Naples made warre. But for that he would not seeme vtterly to abandon them, he sent the Lord of Argenton vnto them, with some troupes leuiued in the State of Milan, as wee shall shortly see.

But what doth Francis Duke of Brittain, hauing lost one of the chiefe supporters of his building? He sees, that of three of the strongest heads of the comon weale, two are cut off, Charles Duke of Guienne & Charles Duke of Bourgogne, & he knowes full well, that the King will not leaue this outrage vnreuedged vpon such as remaine. The treatie made at the Abbie of Victory had bene confirmed by the Estates of Brittain. Lewis had by his Deputies renouced all pretension to this Duchie: but hee forgets nothing, though he sleepes. He is now freed from his most mortall enemy: by all probability, he should hereafter imploy his forces in Brittain: he must therefore warrant himselfe with some favorable support, and must seeke protection from the English. This negotiation required much secrecy and silence, for Lewis was exceeding jealous, and discovered cunningly such practises. So as the subtils were surprisid in their owne subtilties. Peter Landays Treasorer of Brittain, was the man best acquainted with the dukes most secret intelligences, and vnder him, William Gueguen. For the dispatches for England, he vsed one Maurice Bromel, who for three yeares space was the messenger to carry letters betwixt the Duke of Brittain and the King of England. It chanced that Bromel passing at some port, discovered himselfe to a seruant of the Kings, who presently aduertised his maiesty. Lewis did cunningly make his profit of these adventures. C Yet must he not rashly apprehend the companion: thinking it best to discover more. The King, to winne this messenger cunningly, imployes a certaine man of Cherebourg in Normandie, who could counsell seite the Dukes hand, the king of England, & their Secretaries; This Agent for the King, treates with Bromel, and for a hundred Crownes for euery letter coming from eyther part, getts a promise of him, & a place appointed to deliuer the letter & to receiue his money. The Agent made coppies, counterfeited their hands, & sealing the vp with a seale either counterfeited, or stolne by Bromel, he sent the coppies into England, & brought the king the originals. In the end, 22. letters, what of the Duke and Edward, fell into the Kings hands, without discovery.

Discovered
by the King.

And although the Duke sought to the English more to defend him at neede, then to offend: yet would he maintaine himselfe in the Kings good fauour. For this effect, one day among others, he sent Chauuin his Chancellor, the Senshal of Fannes, & others of his counsel, to giue Lewis to vnderstand the deuotion he had to his seruice. At that time the king pursued his conquests vpon the heire of Bourgogne, being ready to beseege Arras, as we shall presently shew. Being arriued, they are all committed prisoners, & sequestred vnder diuers gards. After two dayes, the King sends for the Chancellor: reprocheth him, that hauing often conferred with him of the affaires of Brittain, holding him for an honest man, he findes it strange, that he had alwaies so constantly assured him, that his maiesty had no secret intelligence with the King of England, seeing that now the contrary was manifest. The Chancellor continues in this protestation, and E for more assurance engageth his life; but twelue letters written by Gueguen & signed by the Duke, & ten others by Edward, made him hang downe his head, & to confesse himselfe faulty. But for his owne particular, he protests of his innocency, & in cause that he or his companions deputies, be found to haue been acquainted with this intelligence, he will loose his life. The King is satisfied herewith: hee returnes them backe without any farther audience, and giues them the originals, for a prooffe against the Duke. He iustly complains, that making shew to fauour him, hee doth notwithstanding practise with the most ancient enemy of the crowne. That if he do not renounce all intelligence with the King of England, he will not take him for his friend. Chauuin being returned, makes his report, deliues the Kings commandement: his answers, his countenance in speaking, the accents of his words, & the consequences that might ensue. He beseecheth the Duke to retire himselfe in priuate: & then to certyfie his sayings, he layes vpon the table the two and twentie letters.

Lewis discou-

Dukes of Brittain's letters to his Chancellor.

The Duke of Brittain amazed to see his intelligence discovered.

The Duke amazed to see that plainly discovered, which he thought to haue bin comon but to two, sends for Landays. & commands him vpon his life to tel him, by what means 1477 meanes they might fall into the Kings hands; the which must needs proceed from one of the two.

Landays knows the hands & scales, but cannot conceiue the residue: & amazed he offers himselfe to prison, and to loose his life, if he be any way found guiltie. Then he remembers, that onely Bromel had alwaies carried and recarried these letters: they must finde out him, (being then imployed in that action,) and make him vnfold that doubt. He therefore sends after him in post, & takes him at Port-blanc, where he attended a winde to imbarke, and was brought to Nantes. His confession did absolve Landays; and he was cast into the riuier, in a sacke very secretly, least the King should bee aduertised thereof, who sufficiently informed of the Dukes ill mind, & without doubt, turned his armes into Brittaine. But the warre against Mary of Bourgongne troubled him sufficiently: yet to proceed with some lawfull pretext, hee would fortifie himselfe with a graunt he obtained from the Lord of Bouffiac, and of Nichole of Brittaine his wife, the onely heire of Charles of Brittaine, Earle of Ponthieure: a house which in old time did quarell for the succession of this Duchie: by the which transaction, in the year 1479. the 19. of Ianuary, they yeelded vnto him all the rights, they might pretend to the said Duchie. But it is now incorporate to the Crowne, by a iuster title then by armes.

By what meanes, Abbeuille, Dourlans, Montreuil,

Roye, Montdiar, Peronne, Han, Bohain, Saint Quentin, Tournai, Arras, Hedin, Montreuil, Douay, Bouloungue, Terouenne, and other places were reduced to the Kings obedience, and Bourgongne vnto to the Crowne.

He first intelligence the King receiued of the ouerthrow of Charles of Bourgongne, gaue no assurance of his death; for by meanes of the posts he had newly established, he had spedie aduice. Therupō he resolues to eter Bourgongne with the armie he held in Champagne and Barrois attending the Duke, and vpon this sodaine terror to seize vpon the Countrie. And hee imagined to haue both right and meanes to doe it right, for his rebellion & treacherie committed against the Crowne; meanes, for that the flower of all the Nobilitie of Bourgongne was lost, and all his forces dispersed. If happily the Duke liued, this would bee his ruine. It was also to keepe the Germanes and Suisses from the possession thereof, and to saue the prouince from destruction, loth to suffer a stranger to seize thereon, seeing it holds in soueraintie of him. In the meane time he giues away, (in case the Duke be dead) some landes which the Duke possessed, and sends the Admirall with the Lord of Argenton, with authoritie to open all pacquets vpon the way, and if the Duke were dead to receiue into his obedience, all such as would yeeld themselves. Vpon the first day of their journey, they had certaine aduice by a messenger which the Lord of Craon sent to the King. Abbeuille made the way to the rest. The Admirall, and Argenton had sent a man before, to treat with the souldiers; who attending the coming of these noble mē, there came forth to the number of foure hundred Lances. Being come forth, the people open the gates to the Lord of Torty; & they spare the King those crownes & pensios, which the Admirall by vertue of his warrant had promised the Captaines. This was one of the Townes which Charles the 7. had deliuered by the treatie of Arras: the which should (for want of heires males) returne to the Crowne.

Dourlans follows. They summon Arras, the King, pretending this Towne to be his by confiscation, for not performance of duties: and in case of refusall, they threaten force. The Lords of the Raufstein and Cordes make answer to Maister John of Arquerie, (afterwardes chief President of the Parlement at Paris;) that the Countie of Arthois appertayned to Mary of Bourgongne, and came to her directly from Marguerite Countesse

A Countesse of Flanders, Arthois, Bourgongne, Neuers, and Rhetel, married to Phillippe the first Duke of Bourgongne, son to King John, & yōger brother to King Charles the 5. Beseeching him to mainteine the truce made with Duke Charles deceased. So they returne without doing any thing, but onely wonne some men, that soone after ierued the King well: who (resolving to reduce such places by force, as should disobey his command) goes into Picardie. In this voyage, he causeth his Court of Parlement at Paris to come to Noyon, with the masters of requests, and some Princes of the blood, to resolve vpon the processe of James of Armagnac, Duke of Nemours, and Earle of Murche, prisoner in the Bastille at Paris, and taken in the year 75. at Caillit, by Peter of Bourbon Earle of Beauuen: at what time the Dukes wife died, partly for griefe, and partly by childbirth. She was daughter to Charles of Aniou, Earle of Maine. By which Count (being found guiltie of high Treason) he was condemned by a sentence pronounced by master John Boulenger the chief president, to loose his head vpon a scaffold at the Hales at Paris, on munday the 3. of August: and was by the like grace buried at the gray friars, as the Constable had been. He was one of the chiefe of the warre for the common weale: whome the King laboured to bring to his end all hee could. Lewis is exceeding glad, to haue surmounted his most malicious aduersaries: the Duke of Guienne his brother, the Earle of Armagnac, the Constable, the Duke of Nemours. All the house of Aniou was dead, René King of Sicile, John, and Nicholas Dukes of Calabria, and their Cousin the Earle of Maine, afterwards Earle of Prouence, whose successions he had gotten.

C But the more the house of Bourgongne exceeded all the rest in greatnes and power, hauing with the helpe of the English, continually shaken the estate of this realme, for the space of thirty two yeares vnder Charles the 7. and their subiects being alwaies ready to trouble this Crowne by warres: so much the more pleasing was the death of their last Duke vnto him, knowing well, that being now freed of his greatest incomber, he should hereafter finde greater ease. Ye: he erred in his proceedings, not taking so good a course, as he had forecast, in the life of Charles of Bourgongne, in case he should die; for allying him selfe by the marriage of the Dauphin, his sonne, with the heire of Bourgongne, or at the least with some of his Princes, (for that there was a difference of age betwixt them,) hee had easily drawn vnto him the subiects of these large and rich Seignories, and had preserved them from many troubles, the which haue assisted both them and vs, by the same meanes: and freeing them from war, he had greatly fortified his realme, recouering with small toyle, that which he pretended to behis. The which he might easily effect: for the Bourguignons were very humble, without support & without forces: or able to make aboute fiftene hundred horse & foote, which were preserved at this generall ouerthrow. But these are humane discourses, wherein he had done better then thus, resolutely to haue sought the ouerthrow of that house, and by the ruine thereof, to purchase to himselfe friends, in Germanie or elsewhere, as he pretended, but without effect.

Lewis his enror after the death of
Charles.

Presently vpon his arriual, Han, and Bohain yeelded. Saint Quentin takes it selfe, and calls in the Lord of Mouy. Maister William Bische, (borne at Melinsin Niurnois, a man of base qualitie, but enriched and rayfed to great authoritie by Duke Charles.) Governour of Peronne, yeelds the place: and the Lord of Cordes inclines to the french party. They sayled of their enterprise at Gand, but yt succeeded at Tournay. The King had sent Maister Oliuer le Dain his Surgiō, borne in a village neere vnto Gand, not onely to carry letters of credit to Marie of Bourgongne, (who then was in the possession of the Gantois, that suffered no man to speake vnto her, but in the presence of witnesses,) perswading her to yeeld vnto the kings protection, seeing that both by father & mother, she was issued from the blood of France: (being well assured that hee should hardly obtaine her) whilst that hee provided her a husband fit for her qualitie, as also to worke some alteration in the Cittie, discontented with the Priuileges which Philip & Charles had taken from them: & the rigorous exactions they had made. Oliuer hauing staid some daies at Gand, is called to the Town-house to deliuer his charge. He deliue-

He answers, that hee hath no charge but to speake to her in priuate. They reply: it was not the custome, especially, to a young gentlewoman, that was to marrie. He insists, that he will deliuer no thing but to her selfe. They threaten him with force. Hee is amazed, and going from the Counsell, (considering the qualitie of the person) they doe him some disgraces, and if hee had not speedily escaped, hee had been in danger to haue had the riuer for his graue. Doublesse it is a great hazard, when matters of importance are managed by men of meane estate, and the people thinke themselves contemned, if they bee treated with all by men of base qualitie. This barber knewe something: for to prevent this inconuenience, he termed himselfe Earle of Moulun (others write of Melun) whereof he was Capitaine. But Lewis repoled great trust in two men of the same sort. Being gone from Gand, hee retires to Tournay, the which lies vpon the frontiers of Hainault and Flanders, a strong and a goodly Towne, but free and at that time a neuter: seated fitly to keepe those two Prouinces in subiection. Oliuer was there some dayes without suspect, during the which hee corrupted thirtie or fortie men, and fraught with their promises, hee sent secretly to the Lord of Mons, that at the breake of a certaine day appointed, hee with his company and some other troupes, would be in the suburbs. Hee comes at the appointed time, and maister Oliuer with his men, giues him entrance, to the content of the people, but not of the gouernours, of the which hee sent seuen or eight to Paris, who departed not whilest that Lewis liued.

To speake truly, Oliuer shewed both witt and valor in this stratageme, and for the action of Gand, he is not so much to be blamed, as he that employed him. Conde, a small Towne betwixt Tournai and Valenciennes, cutt of all vitrels from the french, and hindered the victualling of Tournay. It was taken and burnt, for that it did but imploy men which might serue elsiwhere, and Tournay was sufficient to keepe the Countie in obedience. It seemed that the prosperitie of the kings affaires and his great desirings began to trouble his spirit: for prooffe whereof, a gentleman of Hainault (the original doth not name him) associated with many others, offers to deliuer vp the principall Townes and places of the said Countie. Hee talkes with the King, who likes not of him, nor of the rest he named. The reason is, they would sell a good piece of senice very deere. Yet he referred them to the Lord of Lude, bred vp from his youth with him. But Lude seasoned with the same humour, transported with his priuate profit, demands at the first, what the townes would giue him to manage their affaires. So as the Hannuyer, (who would haue no competitor in his gaine) departed without effecting of any thing, and the enterprise proued vaine. Without doubt God would not giue us with felicitie, and it is needfull to haue some crosses, to make vs to know our selues. Moreover it was not reasonable to vsurpe any thing vpon this Countie of Hainault, for that it holds of the Empire, and in regard of the ancient alliances betwixt the Emperours and our Kings, whereby they ought not one to take from another. And for prooffe, Cambray, Quefnoy le Conte and some other places of Hainault, had willingly put themselves vnder the protection of Lewis: the which hee deliuered as freely, with the 40. thousand Crownes that they of Cambray had lent him, for the charges of the war.
